

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Lc40.495

Harvard College Library

FROM

John Baker Keys

Engraved by W. 1801

CICERO.

THE
LIFE AND LETTERS OF
MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO.

In One Volume.

By John Galt.

LONDON,
HENRY G. BOHN, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.
MDCCCXLVII.

M. B. Hoombs.

THE

LIFE AND LETTERS

OF

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO.

Essex
THE LIFE OF CICERO. BY DR. MIDDLETON.

CICERO'S LETTERS TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

TRANSLATED BY WM. MELMOTH.

Heberden
CICERO'S LETTERS TO ATTICUS. TRANSLATED BY DR. HEBERDEN.

J

LONDON:

HENRY G. BOHN, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

MDCCCXLVIII.

LC 40.495

1877. June 28,

Giff- of John Baker Esq, of Cincinnati, O.
(H. U. 1877.)

LONDON:
BRADBURY AND EVANS, PRINTERS, WHITEFRIARS.

50 11.5
p

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
CHISTORY OF THE LIFE OF CICERO	1
CICERO'S LETTERS TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS	331
CICERO'S LETTERS TO ATTICUS	619

TO THE

RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD JOHN HERVEY,

LORD KEEPER OF HIS MAJESTY'S PRIVY SEAL.

My Lord,

The public will naturally expect, that in choosing a patron for the LIFE OF CICERO I should address myself to some person of illustrious rank, distinguished by his parts and eloquence, and bearing a principal share in the great affairs of the nation; who, according to the usual style of dedications, might be the proper subject of a comparison with the hero of my piece. Your lordship's name will confirm that expectation, and your character would justify me in running some length into the parallel; but my experience of your good sense forbids me the attempt. For your lordship knows what a disadvantage it would be to any character to be placed in the same light with that of Cicero; that all such comparisons must be invidious and adulatory; and that the following history will suggest a reason in every page, why no man now living can justly be compared with him.

I do not impute this to any superiority of parts or genius peculiar to the ancients; for human nature has ever been the same in all ages and nations, and owes the difference of its improvements to a difference only of culture, and of the rewards proposed to its industry: where these are the most amply provided, there we shall always find the most numerous and shining examples of human perfection. In old Rome, the public honours were laid open to the virtue of every citizen; which, by raising them in their turns to the command of that mighty empire, produced a race of nobles superior even to kings. This was a prospect that filled the soul of the ambitious, and roused every faculty of mind and body to exert its utmost force: whereas in modern states, men's views being usually confined to narrow bounds beyond which they cannot pass, and a partial culture of their talents being sufficient to procure everything that their ambition can aspire to, a great genius has seldom either room or invitation to stretch itself to its full size.

You see, my lord, how much I trust to your good-nature, as well as good sense, when in an epistle dedicatory, the proper place of panegyric, I am depreciating your abilities instead of extolling them; but I remember that it is a history which I am offering to your lordship, and it would ill become me, in the front of such a work, to expose my veracity to any hazard: and my head, indeed, is now so full of antiquity that I could wish to see the dedicatory style reduced to that classical simplicity with which the ancient writers used to present their books to their friends or patrons, at whose desire they were written, or by whose authority they were published: for this was the first use and the sole purpose of a dedication; and as this also is the real ground of my present address to your lordship, so it will be the best argument of my epistle, and the most agreeable to the character of an historian, to acquaint the public with a plain fact, that it was your lordship who first advised me to undertake the LIFE OF CICERO; and, when from a diffidence of my strength and a nearer view of the task, I began to think myself unequal to the weight of it, your lordship still urged and exhorted me to persist, till I had moulded it into the form in which it now appears.

Thus far your lordship was carried by that love for Cicero, which, as one of the best critics of antiquity says of us, is the undoubted proof of a true taste. I wish only that the favour which you have since shown to my English Cicero, may not detract from that praise which is due to your love of the Roman: but, whatever censure it may draw upon your lordship, I cannot prevail with myself to conceal, what does so much honour to my work, that, before it went to the press, your lordship not only saw and approved, but, as the surest mark of your approbation, corrected it. It adds no small credit to the history of Polybius that he professes to have been assisted in it by Scipio and Lælius; and even Terence's style was made the being retouched by the same great hands. You must pardon me, therefore, my lord, if, after the those excellent authors, I cannot forbear boasting, that some parts of my present work have been by the strokes of your lordship's pencil.

It was the custom of those Roman nobles to spend their leisure, not in vicious pleasures or trifling contrived, as we truly call it, to kill the time, but in conversing with the celebrated wits and scholars; in encouraging other people's learning, and improving their own: and here your lordship im with success, and for love of letters and politeness may be compared with the noblest of them. house, like theirs, is open to men of parts and merit; where I have admired your lordship's agreea of treating them all in their own way, by introducing questions of literature, and varying them so art give every one an opportunity, not only of bearing a part, but of leading the conversation in his these liberal exercises you drop the cares of the statesman, relieve your fatigues in the senate, and your mind while you relax it.

Encomiums of this kind, upon persons of your lordship's quality, commonly pass for words of a fashionable language to the great, and make little impression on men of sense, who know learning the fruit of wit or parts, for there your lordship's title would be unquestionable, but an acquisitio labour and study, which the nobles of our days are apt to look upon as inconsistent with the ease and of an elevated fortune, and generally leave to men of professions and inferior life. But your lord different way of thinking, and by your education in a public school and university, has learned earliest youth, that no fortune can exempt a man from pains, who desires to distinguish himself from and that it is a folly, in any condition of life, to aspire to a superior character, without a superior industry to support it. What time, therefore, others bestow upon their sports, or pleasures, or the splendour of a luxurious life, your lordship applies to the improvement of your knowledge; and in hours, when all around you are hushed in sleep, seize the opportunity of that quiet, as the most season of study, and frequently spend a useful day before others begin to enjoy it.

I am saying no more, my lord, than what I know, from my constant admission to your lord morning visits, before good manners would permit me to attempt a visit anywhere else; where I have you commonly engaged with the classical writers of Greece or Rome, and conversing with those with whom Scipio and Lælius used to converse so familiarly when living. Nor does your lordship part for ostentation or amusement only, but for the real benefit both of yourself and others; for I the solid effects of your reading, in your judicious reflections on the policy of those ancient govern have felt your weight even in controversy on some of the most delicate parts of their history.

There is another circumstance peculiar to your lordship which makes this task of study the easier by giving you, not only the greater health, but the greater leisure to pursue it; I mean that singul ance in diet, in which your lordship perseveres with a constancy superior to every temptation that an appetite to rebel; and shows a firmness of mind that subjects every gratification of sense to the reason. Thus, with all the accomplishments of the nobleman, you lead the life of a philosopher; you shine a principal ornament of the court, you practise the discipline of the college.

In old Rome there were no hereditary honours; but when the virtue of a family was extinct, it was extinguished too; so that no man, how nobly soever born, could arrive at any dignity, who did not by his personal merit: and here, again, your lordship seems to have emulated that ancient spirit; for born to the first honours of your country, yet disclaiming, as it were, your birthright, and putting you the foot of a Roman, you were not content with inheriting, but resolved to import new dignities family; and, after the example of your noble father, to open your own way into the supreme court kingdom. In this august assembly your lordship displays those shining talents by which you acqui in it, in the defence of our excellent establishment; in maintaining the rights of the people, yet as prerogative of the crown; measuring them both by the equal balance of the laws, which, by the prov of our ancestors, and the happy settlement at the Revolution, have so fixed their just limits, and mod extent of their influence, that they mutually defend and preserve, but can never destroy each other general ruin.

In a nation like ours, which, from the natural effect of freedom, is divided into opposite parties particular attachments to certain principles, or friendships with certain men, will sometimes draw citizens into measures of a subordinate kind which they cannot wholly approve; yet, whatever is lordship may incur on that account, you will be found, on all occasions of trial, a true friend to our constitution both in church and state; which I have heard you demonstrate with great force to be the bulwark of our common peace and prosperity. From this fundamental point no engagements will ever move or interest draw you; and though men inflamed by opposition are apt to charge each other with designs which were never dreamt of perhaps by either side, yet if there be any who know so little of you as to distrust your principles, they may depend at least on your judgment, that it can never suffer a person of your lordship's rank, born to so large a share of the property as well as the honours of the nation, to think any private interest an equivalent for consenting to the ruin of the public.

I mention this, my lord, as an additional reason for presenting you with the LIFE OF CICERO; for, were I not persuaded of your lordship's sincere love of liberty, and zeal for the happiness of your fellow-citizens, it would be a reproach to you, to put into your hands the life of a man who, in all the variety of his admirable talents, does not shine so glorious in any as in his constant attachment to the true interests of his country, and the noble struggle that he sustained, at the expense even of his life, to avert the impending tyranny that finally oppressed it.

But I ought to ask your lordship's pardon for dwelling so long upon a character which is known to the whole kingdom as well as to myself; not only by the high office which you fill, and the eminent dignity that you bear in it, but by the sprightly compositions of various kinds with which your lordship has often entertained it. It would be a presumption to think of adding any honour to your lordship by my pen, after you have acquired so much by your own. The chief design of my epistle is, to give this public testimony of my thanks for the signal marks of friendship with which your lordship has long honoured me; and to interest your name, as far as I can, in the fate and success of my work, by letting the world know what a share you had in the production of it; that it owed its being to your encouragement; correctness to your pencil; and, what many will think the most substantial benefit, its large subscription to your authority. For, though in this way of publishing it, I have had the pleasure to find myself supported by a noble list of generous friends, who, without being solicited, or even asked by me, have promoted my subscription with an uncommon zeal, yet your lordship has distinguished yourself the most eminently of them in contributing, not only to the number but the splendour of the names that adorn it.

Next to that little reputation with which the public has been pleased to favour me, the benefit of this subscription is the chief fruit that I have ever reaped from my studies. I am indebted for the first to Cicero, for the second to your lordship; it was Cicero who instructed me to write; your lordship who rewards me for writing: the same motive, therefore, which induced me to attempt the history of the one, engages me to dedicate it to the other; that I may express my gratitude to you both in the most effectual manner that I am able, by celebrating the memory of the dead and acknowledging the generosity of my living benefactor.

I have received great civilities on several occasions from many noble persons, of which I shall ever retain a most grateful sense; but your lordship's accumulated favours have long ago risen up to the character of obligations, and made it my perpetual duty, as it had always been my ambition, to profess myself, with the greatest truth and respect,

My lord, your lordship's most obliged and devoted servant,

CONYERS MIDDLETON.

P R E F A C E.

THERE is no part of history which seems capable of yielding either more instruction or entertainment, than that which offers to us the select lives of great and virtuous men who have made an eminent figure on the public stage of the world. In these we see at one view what the annals of a whole age can afford that is worthy of notice ; and in the wide field of universal history, skipping as it were over the barren places, gather all its flowers, and possess ourselves at once of everything that is good in it.

But there is one great fault which is commonly observed in the writers of particular lives, that they are apt to be partial and prejudiced in favour of their subject, and to give us a panegyric, instead of a history. They work up their characters as painters do their portraits ; taking the praise of their art to consist, not in copying, but in adorning nature ; not in drawing a just resemblance, but giving a fine picture ; or exalting the man into the hero : and this indeed seems to flow from the nature of the thing itself, where the very inclination to write is generally grounded on prepossession, and an affection already contracted for the person whose history we are attempting ; and when we sit down to it with the disposition of a friend, it is natural for us to cast a shade over his failings, to give the strongest colouring to his virtues ; and, out of a good character, to endeavour to draw a perfect one.

I am sensible that this is the common prejudice of biographers, and have endeavoured therefore to divest myself of it as far as I was able ; yet dare not take upon me to affirm, that I have kept myself wholly clear from it ; but shall leave the decision of that point to the judgment of the reader : for I must be so ingenuous as to own, that when I formed the plan of this work, I was previously possessed with a very favourable opinion of Cicero ; which, after the strictest scrutiny, has been greatly confirmed and heightened in me ; and in the case of a shining character, such as Cicero's I am persuaded will appear to be, it is certainly more pardonable to exceed rather in our praises of it, out of a zeal for illustrious merit, than to be reserved in doing justice to it, through a fear of being thought partial. But, that I might guard myself equally from both the extremes, I have taken care always to leave the facts to speak for themselves, and to affirm nothing of any moment without an authentic testimony to support it ; which yet, if consulted in the original at its full length, will commonly add more light and strength to what is advanced, than the fragments quoted in the text and the brevity of notes would admit.

But whatever prejudices may be suspected to adhere to the writer, it is certain that in a work of this nature he will have many more to combat in the reader. The scene of it is laid in a place and age which are familiar to us from our childhood : we learn the names of all the chief actors at school, and choose our several favourites according to our tempers or fancies ; and when we are least able to judge of the merit of them, form distinct characters of each, which we frequently retain through life. Thus Marins, Sylla, Cæsar, Pompey, Cato, Cicero, Brutus, Antony, have all their several advocates, zealous for their fame, and ready even to quarrel for the superiority of their virtues. But among the celebrated names of antiquity, those of the great conquerors and generals attract our admiration always the most, and imprint a notion of magnanimity, and power, and capacity for dominion, superior of other mortals : we look upon such as destined by Heaven for empire, and born to rule upon their fellow-creatures ; without reflecting on the numerous evils which are necessary to the acquisition of a glory that is built upon the subversion of nations, and the destruction of the human species. Yet these are the only persons who are thought to shine in history, or to merit the attention of the reader : dazzled with the splendour of their victories, and the pomp of their triumphs, we consider them as the pride and ornament of the human name ; while the pacific and civil character, though of all others the most beneficial to the human kind, whose sole ambition is, to support the laws, the rights and liberty of his country, is looked upon as humble and contemptible on the comparison, for being forced to submit to the power of these oppressors of their country.

In the following history therefore, if I have happened to affirm anything that contradicts the common opinion and shocks the prejudices of the reader, I must desire him to look diligently to the authorities on which it is grounded ; and if these do not give satisfaction, to suspend his judgment still to the end of the work, in the progress of which many things may be cleared up that may appear at first perhaps uncertain and precarious : and in every case, especially that relates to Cicero, I would recommend to him to contemplate the whole character, before he thinks himself qualified to judge of its separate parts, on which the whole will always be found the surest comment.

Quintilian has given us an excellent rule in the very case,—that we should be *circumspect in passing a judgment on men so illustrious, lest, as it happens to the generality of us, we be found at last to condemn what we do not understand. There is another reflection, very obvious, which yet seldom has its due weight, that a writer on any part of history, who has made his particular study, may be presumed to be better acquainted with it than the generality of his readers ; and when he asserts a fact that does not seem to be well grounded, it may fairly be imputed, till a good reason appears to the contrary, to a more extensive view of his subject ; which, by making it clear to himself, is apt to persuade him, that it will be equally clear to everybody else, and that a fuller explication of it would consequently be unnecessary. If these considerations, which are certainly reasonable, have but their due influence, I flatter myself that there will be no just cause to accuse me of any culpable partiality in my accounts of things or persons, or of any other favour to the particular character of Cicero, than what common humanity will naturally bestow upon every character that is worthy of notice upon the whole to be both great and good.

In drawing the characters of a number of persons who all lived in the same city at the same time, trained by the same discipline, and engaged in the same pursuits ; as there are many similar strokes, and a general resemblance in them all, so the chief difficulty will be to prevent them from running into too great an uniformity. This I have endeavoured to avoid, by forming ideal pictures, or such as would please or surprise ; but by attending to particular facts which history has delivered of the men, and tracing them to their sources, and to those correspondent affections from which they derived their birth ; for these are the distinguishing features of the several persons, which, when duly represented, and placed in their proper light, will not fail to exhibit that precise difference in which the peculiar character of each character consists.

As to the nature of my work, though the title of it carries nothing more than the title of Cicero's Life, yet it might properly enough be called the History of Cicero's Times : from his first advancement to the public magistracies, there was not anything of moment transacted in the state in which he did not bear an eminent part : so that, to make the whole work of a piece, I have given a summary account of the Roman affairs during the time even of his minority ; and agreeably to what I promised in my proposals, have c on a series of history through a period of above sixty years, which, for the importance of the events, and the dignity of the persons concerned in them, is by far the most interesting of any in the annals of Rome.

* Modeste tamen et circumspecto judicio de tantis damnum, quæ non intelligunt.—Quintilianus vult pronuncandum est, ne, quod plerique accidit, x. 1.

In the execution of this design, I have pursued as closely as I could that very plan which Cicero himself had sketched out for the model of a complete history. Where he lays it down as a fundamental law, "that the writer should not dare to affirm what was false, or to suppress what was true; nor give any suspicion either of favour or disaffection; that in the relation of facts he should observe the order of time, and sometimes add the description of places; should first explain the counsels, then the acts, and lastly the events of things: that in the counsels he should interpose his own judgment on the merit of them; in the acts relate not only what was done, but how it was done; in the events show what share chance or rashness or prudence had in them; that he should describe likewise the particular characters of all the great persons who bare any considerable part in the story; and should dress up the whole in a clear and equable style, without affecting any ornament or seeking any other praise but of perspicuity." These were the rules that Cicero had drawn up for himself when he was meditating a general history of his country, as I have taken occasion to mention more at large in its proper place.

But as I have borrowed my plan, so I have drawn my materials also, from Cicero; whose works are the most authentic monuments that remain to us of all the great transactions of that age; being the original accounts of one, who himself was not only a spectator, but a principal actor in them. There is not a single part of his writings which does not give some light, as well into his own history as into that of the republic: but his Familiar Letters, and above all, those to Atticus, may justly be called the memoirs of the times; for they contain, not only a distinct account of every memorable event, but lay open the springs and motives whence each of them proceeded; so that, as a polite writer who lived in that very age, and perfectly knew the merit of these letters, says, the man who reads them will have no occasion for any other history of those times^b.

My first business therefore, after I had undertaken this task, was to read over Cicero's works, with no other view than to extract from them all the passages that seemed to have any relation to my design: where the tediousness of collecting an infinite number of testimonies scattered through many different volumes; of sorting them into their classes, and ranging them in proper order; the necessity of overlooking many in the first search, and the trouble of retrieving them in a second or third; and the final omission of several through forgetfulness or inadvertency; have helped to abate that wonder which had often occurred to me, why no man had ever attempted the same work before me, or at least in this enlarged and comprehensive form in which it is now offered to the public.

In my use of these materials, I have chosen to insert as many of them as I could into the body of my work; imagining that it would give both a lustre and authority to a sentiment, to deliver it in the person and the very words of Cicero; especially if they could be managed so as not to appear to be sowed on, like splendid patches, but woven originally into the text as the genuine parts of it. With this view I have taken occasion to introduce several of his letters, with large extracts from such of his orations as gave any particular light into the facts, or customs, or characters described in the history, or which seemed on any other account to be curious and entertaining. The frequent introduction of these may be charged perhaps to laziness, and a design of shortening my pains, by filling up my story with Cicero's words instead of my own: but that was not the case; nor has this part of the task been the easiest to me; as those will readily believe who have ever attempted to translate the classical studiis principum, vitiis ducum, ac mutationibus reipublicæ perscripta sunt, ut nihil in his non appareat.—Corn. Nep. in Vit. Attici, 16.

^b Sexdecim volumina epistolarum ab consulatu ejus usque ad extremum tempus ad Atticum missarum; quæ qui legat, non multum desideret historiam contextam eorum temporum. Sic enim omnia de

writers of Greece or Rome : where the difficulty is, not so much to give their sense, it in their language ; that is, in such as is analogous to it, or what they might be said to speak if they were living at this time ; since a splendour of style, as well as of sense, is necessary to support the idea of a fine writer. While I am representing Cicero the most eloquent of the ancients, flowing with a perpetual ease and delicacy, and in expression, it would be ridiculous to produce no other specimen of it but what is stiff and forced, and offensive to a polite reader : yet this is generally the case of our versions ; where the first wits of antiquity are made to speak such English, as an Englishman of taste would be ashamed to write on any original subject. Verbal translations are inelegant, and necessarily destroy all the beauty of language ; yet by departing too far from the letter, we are apt to vary the sense, and mingle somewhat of our own : the wit of low genius never reach beyond the first, but march from word to word, without the least excursion, for fear of losing themselves ; while men of spirit, who prefer truth to smoothness, usually condemn the mere task of translating, and are vain enough to think of imitating their author. I have endeavoured to take the middle way ; and made it my first care to preserve the sentiment ; and my next to adhere to the words, as far as I was able to do them in an easy and natural style ; which I have varied still agreeably to the different subjects or the kind of writing on which I was employed : and I persuade myself that the original pieces which I have translated from Cicero, as they are certainly the most valuable, so will they be found also the most useful parts of my work, by introducing the reader into the company of one with whom no man ever conversed, as a very eminent writer, without coming away the better for it^d.

After I had gone through my review of Cicero's writings, my next recourse was to other ancients, both Greeks and Romans, who had touched upon the affairs of the world. These served me chiefly to fill up the interstices of general history, and to illustrate passages which were but slightly mentioned by Cicero ; as well as to add some stories and circumstances which tradition had preserved, concerning either Cicero himself or any chief actors whose characters I had delineated.

But the Greek historians who treat professedly of these times, Plutarch, Appian, though they are all very useful for illustrating many important facts of ancient history, would otherwise have been lost, or imperfectly transmitted to us, are not yet to be read without some caution ; as being strangers to the language and customs of Rome, and subject to frequent mistakes, as well as subject to prejudices in their relation of Roman history. Plutarch lived from the reign of Claudius to that of Hadrian, in which he died very near the possession of the priesthood of the Delphic Apollo ; and though he is supposed to have resided in Rome near forty years at different times, yet he never seems to have acquired sufficient skill in the Roman language to qualify himself for the compiler of a Roman history. But if we should allow him all the talents requisite to an historian, yet the attempt of the lives of all the illustrious Greeks and Romans, was above the strength of any single man, and beyond his abilities and leisure soever ; much more of one, who, as he himself tells us, was so engaged in public business, and in giving lectures of philosophy to the great men of Rome, that he had not time to make himself master of the Latin tongue ; nor to acquire any other knowledge of its words, what he had gradually learnt by a previous use and experience of things^e ; his work therefore, from the very nature of it, must needs be superficial and imperfect, and the sketch rather than the completion of a great design.

This we find to be actually true in his account of Cicero's life, where, besides the particular mistakes that have been charged upon him by other writers, we see all the marks of

^c Nec tamen exprimi verbum a verbo necesse erit, surrexerit animo sedatiore ? — Erasmus. Ep. ut interpretes indiserti solent.—Cic. De Finib. iii. Ulatten.

4.

^e Plutarch. in Vit. Demosthen. init. et Vit. P.

^d Quis autem sumpsit hujus libros in manum, quin per Rualdum, c. 14.

inaccuracy, and want of due information, from the poverty and perplexity of the whole performance. He huddles over Cicero's greatest acts in a summary and negligent manner, yet dwells upon his dreams and his jests, which for the greatest part were probably spurious; and in the last scene of his life, which was of all the most glorious, when the whole councils of the empire and the fate and liberty of Rome rested on his shoulders, there he is more particularly trifling and empty, where he had the fairest opportunity of displaying his character to advantage as well as of illustrating a curious part of history, which has not been well explained by any writer, though there are the amplest materials for it in Cicero's Letters and Philippic Orations, of which Plutarch appears to have made little or no use.

Appian flourished likewise in the reign of Hadrian¹, and came to Rome probably about the time of Plutarch's death, while his works were in everybody's hands, which he has made great use of, and seems to have copied very closely in the most considerable passages of his history.

Dio Cassius lived still later, from the time of the Antonines to that of Alexander Severus; and besides the exceptions that lie against him in common with the other two, is observed to have conceived a particular prejudice against Cicero, whom he treats on all occasions with the utmost malignity. The most obvious cause of it seems to be his envy to a man who for arts and eloquence was thought to eclipse the fame of Greece; and, by explaining all the parts of philosophy to the Romans in their own language, had superseded in some measure the use of the Greek learning and lectures at Rome, to which the hungry wits of that nation owed both their credit and their bread. Another reason not less probable may be drawn likewise from Dio's character and principles, which were wholly opposite to those of Cicero: he flourished under the most tyrannical of the emperors, by whom he was advanced to great dignity; and being the creature of despotic power, thought it a proper compliment to it to depreciate a name so highly revered for its patriotism, and whose writings tended to revive that ancient zeal and spirit of liberty for which the people of Rome were once so celebrated; for we find him taking all occasions in his history to prefer an absolute and monarchical government to a free and democratical one, as the most beneficial to the Roman state².

These were the grounds of Dio's malice to Cicero, which is exerted often so absurdly that it betrays and confutes itself. Thus in the debates of the senate about Antony, he dresses up a speech for Fufius Calenus, filled with all the obscene and brutal ribaldry against Cicero that a profligate mind could invent: as if it were possible to persuade any man of sense that such infamous stuff could be spoken in the senate at a time when Cicero had an entire ascendant in it: who at no time ever suffered the least insult upon his honour without chastising the aggressor for it upon the spot; whereas Cicero's speeches in these very debates which are still extant, shew that though they were managed with great warmth of opposition, yet it was always with decency of language between him and Calenus, whom, while he reproves and admonishes with his usual freedom, yet he treats with civility, and sometimes even with compliments³.

But a few passages from Dio himself will evince the justice of this censure upon him: He calls Cicero's father a fuller, who yet got his livelihood (he says) by dressing other people's vines and olives; that Cicero was born and bred amidst the scourgings of old clothes and the filth of dunghills; that he was master of no liberal science, nor ever did a single thing in his life worthy of a great man or an orator; that he prostituted his wife; trained up his son in drunkenness; committed incest with his daughter; lived in adultery with Cerellia, whom he owns at the same time to be seventy years old; all which palpable lies, with many more of the same sort that he sine odio omnia; nihil sine dolore. [Ib. vi.] Quapropter ut invitum aspe dissensi a Q. Fufio, ita sum libenter assensus ejus sententia: ex quo judicare debetis me non cum homine solere, sed cum causa dissidere. Itaque non assentior solum, sed etiam gratias ago Q. Fufio, &c.—Phil. xi. 6 tells of Cicero, are yet full as credible as what he declares afterwards of himself, admonished and commanded by a vision from heaven, against his own will and inclination, take the task of writing his history¹.

¹ Vide App. De Bell. Civ. l. ii. p. 481.

² Vide Dio, l. xliv. init.

³ Nam quod me tecum iracunde agere dixisti solere, non est ita. Vehementer me agere fateor; iracunde tamen: omnino irasci amicis non temere soleo, ne si crederetur quidem. Itaque sine verborum contumelia et dissensu possum, sine animi summo dolore non possum. [Phil. viii. 5.] Satis multa cum Fufio, ac

¹ Vide Dio, l. xlv. p. 295, &c.

Upon these collections from Cicero and the other ancients I finished the first draught of my history, before I began to inquire after the modern writers who had treated the same subject before me either in whole or in part. I was unwilling to look into them sooner, lest they fix any prejudice insensibly upon me before I had formed a distinct judgment on the truth of the facts, as they appeared to me from their original records. For in writing history, instead of transcribing the relations of those who have trodden the same ground as we, we should exhibit a series of observations peculiar to ourselves, such as the facts suggested to our own minds from an attentive survey of them, without regard to what others may have delivered about them; and though, in a production of this kind, where materials are common to all, many things must necessarily be said which had been already by others; yet, if the author has any genius, there will always be enough of what is new to distinguish it as an original work, and to give him a right to call it his own, which myself will be allowed to me in the following history. In this inquiry after the mode which had any connexion with my argument, I got notice presently of a greater number than I expected, which bore the title of Cicero's Life; but, upon running over as many as I could readily meet with, I was cured of my eagerness for hunting out the rest, which I perceived them to be nothing else but either trifling panegyrics on Cicero's general character, or imperfect abstracts of his principal acts, thrown together within the compass of a few duodecimo.

There are two books however which have been of real use to me, Sebastiani Corradi and M. T. Ciceronis Historia a Francisco Fabricio: the first was the work of an Italian eminent learning, who spent a great part of his life in explaining Cicero's writings, rather as an apology for Cicero than the history of his life; its chief end being to vindicate character from all the objections that have ever been made to it, and particularly to misrepresentations of Plutarch and the calumnies of Dio. The piece is learned and is written in good Latin; yet the dialogue is carried on with so harsh and forced an air, that of a questioner or treasurer producing the several testimonies of Cicero's acts under the name of genuine money, in opposition to the spurious coins of the Greek historians, that none can read it with pleasure, few with patience. The observations however are generally just and well-grounded, except that the author's zeal for Cicero's honour gets the better sometimes of his judgment, and draws him into a defence of his conduct where even Cicero himself has condemned it.

Fabricius's history is prefixed to several editions of Cicero's works, and is nothing more than a bare detail of his acts and writings, digested into exact order and distinguished by the title of Rome and of Cicero's life, without any explication or comment but what relates to the state of the time, which is the sole end of the work. But as this is executed with diligence and accuracy, so it has eased me of a great share of that trouble which I must otherwise have had in arranging my materials into their proper places, in which task however I have always taken care to consult also the Annales of Pighius.

I did not forget likewise to pay a due attention to the French authors whose works had been translated into English, to coincide with any part of mine, particularly the History of the two Triumvirates, of the Revolutions of the Roman Government, and of the Exile of Cicero, which are all of them ingenious and useful, and have given a fair account of the general state of the facts which they profess to illustrate. As I had already been at the fountain-head whence they had all drawn their materials, I received the chief benefit that I received from them was to make me review with stricter care the passages in which I differed from them, as well as to remind me of some few things which I had omitted, or touched perhaps more slightly than they deserved. But the author of The Exile of Cicero treated his argument the most accurately of them, by supporting his story as he goes with original testimonies from the old authors ; which is the only way of writing history that can give satisfaction or carry conviction along with it, by laying open the ground on which it is built, without which history assumes the air of romance, and makes no other impression than in proportion to our opinion of the judgment and integrity of the compiler.

¹ Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 828.

There is a little piece also in our own language called, Observations on the Life of Cicero, which, though it gives a very different account of Cicero from what I have done, yet I could not but read with pleasure, for the elegance and spirit with which it is written by one who appears to be animated with a warm love of virtue. But to form our notions of a great man from some slight passages of his writings or separate points of conduct, without regarding their connexion with the whole, or the figure that they make in his general character, is like examining things in a microscope which were made to be surveyed in the gross ; every mole rises into a mountain, and the least spot into a deformity : which vanish again into nothing when we contemplate them through their proper medium and in their natural light. I persuade myself therefore that a person of this writer's good sense and principles, when he has considered Cicero's whole history, will conceive a more candid opinion of the man, who, after a life spent in a perpetual struggle against vice, faction, and tyranny, fell a martyr at last to the liberty of his country.

As I have had frequent occasion to recommend the use of Cicero's Letters to Atticus for their giving the clearest light into the history of those times, so I must not forget to do justice to the pains of one who, by an excellent translation and judicious comment upon them, has made that use more obvious and accessible to all ; I mean the learned Mr. Mongault, who, not content with retailing the remarks of other commentators, or out of the rubbish of their volumes with selecting the best, enters upon his task with the spirit of a true critic, and by the force of his own genius has happily illustrated many passages which all the interpreters before him had given up as inexplicable. But since the obscurity of these letters is now in great measure removed by the labours of this gentleman, and especially to his own countrymen, for whose particular benefit and in whose language he writes, one cannot help wondering that the Jesuits, Catrou and Rouille, should not think it worth while, by the benefit of his pains, to have made themselves better acquainted with them ; which, as far as I am able to judge from the little part of their history that I have had the curiosity to look into, would have prevented several mistakes which they have committed, with regard both to the facts and persons of the Ciceronian age.

But instead of making free with other people's mistakes, it would become me perhaps better to bespeak some favour for my own. "An historian," says Diodorus Siculus, "may easily be pardoned for slips of ignorance, since all men are liable to them, and the truth hard to be traced from past and remote ages ; but those who neglect to inform themselves, and through flattery to some or hatred to others knowingly deviate from the truth, justly deserve to be censured." For my part, I am far from pretending to be exempt from errors : all that I can say is, that I have committed none wilfully, and used all the means which occurred to me of defending myself against them. But since there is not a single history, either ancient or modern, that I have consulted on this occasion, in which I cannot point out several, it would be arrogant in me to imagine that the same inadvertency, or negligence, or want of judgment, may not be discovered also in mine : if any man therefore will admonish me of them with candour I shall think myself obliged to him, as a friend to my work, for assisting me to make it more perfect, and consequently more useful ; for my chief motive for undertaking it was, not to serve any particular cause, but to do a general good by offering to the public the example of a character which, of all that I am acquainted with in antiquity, is the most accomplished with every talent that can adorn civil life, and the best fraught with lessons of prudence and duty for all conditions of men, from the prince to the private scholar.

If my pains therefore should have the effect which I propose, of raising a greater attention to the name and writings of Cicero, and making them better understood and more familiar to our youth, I cannot fail of gaining my end ; for the next step to admiring is to imitate, and it is not possible to excite an affection for Cicero, without instilling an affection at the same time for every thing that is laudable : since how much soever people may differ in their judgment of his conduct, yet all have constantly agreed in their judgment of his works, that none now remaining to us from the Heathen world that so beautifully display and recommend all those generous principles that tend to exalt and perfect human nature, and love of virtue, liberty, our country, and of all mankind.

I cannot support this reflection by a better authority than that of Erasmus, who, though he contracted some prejudices against Cicero when young, makes a recantation of the same in the following passage of a letter to his friend Ulattenus¹.

"When I was a boy," says he, "I was fonder of Seneca than of Cicero, and till I was twenty years old could not bear to spend any time in reading him ; while all the other antiquity generally pleased me. Whether my judgment be improved by age, I know not ; but I am certain, that Cicero never pleased me so much when I was fond of those juveniles as he does now when I am grown old ; not only for the divine felicity of his style, but the sanctity of his heart and morals : in short, he has inspired my soul, and made me a better man. I make no scruple, therefore, to exhort our youth to spend their hours in reading his books by heart, rather than in the vexatious squabbles and peevish contentions with which the world abounds. For my own part, though I am now in the decline of life, as soon as I have finished what I have in hand, I shall think it no reproach to me to seek reconciliation with my Cicero, and renew an old acquaintance with him, which for many years has been unhappily intermitted."

Before I conclude this preface it will not be improper to add a short abstract, or synopsis, of the Roman government, from its first institution by Romulus to the time of Cicero's death. Those who have not been conversant in the affairs of Rome, may not come entirely acquainted with the subject of the following history.

The constitution of Rome is very often celebrated by Cicero and other writers, as the most perfect of all governments ; being happily tempered and composed of the three different kinds, which are usually distinguished from each other ; the monarchical, the aristocratical, and the democratical. Their king was elected by the people as the head of the republic ; to be their leader in war, and the guardian of the laws in peace : the senate was his council, chosen also by the people, whose advice he was obliged to govern himself in all his measures : but the sovereign power was lodged in the body of the citizens, or the general society, whose prerogative it was to *make laws, create magistrates, declare war*² ; and to receive appeals in all cases, both from the king and the senate. Some writers have denied this right of an appeal to the people : but Cicero expressly mentions it among the regal constitutions, as old as the foundation of the city. He had demonstrated more at large in his treatise on the Republic ; whence Seneca has taken a passage in confirmation of it ; and intimates, that the same right was declared in the *pontifical books*³. Valerius Maximus gives us an instance of it, which is confirmed by Livy, that *Horatius being condemned to die by king Tullus for killing his sister, was acquitted by his appeal to the people*⁴.

This was the original constitution of Rome even under their kings ; for in the first place, in a state, where there was no force to compel, it was necessary to invite men into

¹ Erasmus. Ep. ad Jo. Ulatt. in Cic. Tuscul. Quæst.

² Statuo esse optime constitutam rempublicam quam ex tribus generibus illis, regali, optimo, et populari, confusa modice.—Fragm. de Rep. ii.

Cum in illis de republica libris persuadere videatur Africanus, omnium rerum publicarum nostram veterem illam fuisse optimam.—De Legib. ii. 10 ; Polyb. vi. p. 460 ; Dion. Hal. ii. 82.

³ Dion. Hal. i. 87.

⁴ Nam cum a primo urbis ortu, regis institutis, partim etiam legibus, auspiciis, cæremorum provocaciones—divinitus essent institutæ. Quæst. iv. 1.

⁵ Cum Ciceronis libros de republica præfatus, provocationem ad populum etiam a rege esse legitur. Idem in pontificalibus libris aliqui putant. — Senec. Ep. 108.

⁶ M. Horatius interfectæ sororis criminis rege damnatus, ad populum provocato judicatus. — Val. Max. viii. 1 ; Liv. i. 26.

proper encouragements; and none could be so effectual as the assurance of liberty, and the privilege of making their own laws'. But the kings, by gradual encroachments, having usurped the whole administration to themselves, and by the violence of their government being grown intolerable to a city trained to liberty and arms, were finally expelled by a general insurrection of the senate and the people. This was the ground of that invincible fierceness and love of their country in the old Romans by which they conquered the world; for the superiority of their civil rights, naturally inspired a superior virtue and courage to defend them; and made them of course the bravest, as long as they continued the freest, of all nations.

By this revolution of the government their old constitution was not so much changed, as restored to its primitive state: for though the name of king was abolished, yet the power was retained; with this only difference, that instead of a single person chosen for life, there were two chosen annually, whom they called consuls, invested with all the prerogatives and ensigns of royalty, and presiding in the same manner in all the affairs of the republic; when to convince the citizens that nothing was sought by the change but to secure their common liberty, and to establish their sovereignty again on a more solid basis, one of the first consuls, P. Valerius Poplicola, confirmed by a new law their fundamental right of an appeal to them in all cases; and by a second law, made it capital for any man to exercise a magistracy in Rome, without their special appointment¹: and as a public acknowledgment of their supreme authority, the same consul never appeared in any assembly of the people, without bowing his fasces or maces to them; which was afterwards the constant practice of all succeeding consuls². Thus the republic reaped all the benefit of a kingly government, without the danger of it; since the consuls, whose reign was but annual and accountable, could have no opportunity of invading its liberty, and erecting themselves into tyrants.

By the expulsion of the kings, the city was divided into two great parties, *the aristocratical and the popular, or the senate and the plebeians*³, naturally jealous of each other's power, and desirous to extend their own; but the nobles or patricians, of whom the senate was composed, were the most immediate gainers by the change, and with the consuls at their head, being now the first movers and administrators of all the deliberations of the state, had a great advantage over the people; and within the compass of sixteen years became so insolent and oppressive, as to drive the body of the plebeians to that secession into the Sacred Mount whence they would not consent to return, till they had extorted a right of creating a new order of magistrates of their own body, called tribunes, invested with full powers to protect them from all injuries, and whose persons were to be sacred and inviolable⁴.

The plebeian party had now got a head exactly suited to their purpose, subject to no control, whose business it was to fight their battles with the nobility; to watch over the liberties of the citizens; and to distinguish themselves in their annual office, by a zeal for the popular interest, in opposition to the aristocratical, who, from their first number five, being increased afterwards to ten, never left teasing the senate with fresh demands, till they had laid open to the plebeian

¹ Romulus seems to have borrowed the plan of his new state from the old government of Athens, as it was instituted by Theseus; who prevailed with the dispersed tribes and families of Attica to form themselves into one city, and live within the same walls, under a free and popular government; distributing its rights and honours promiscuously to them all, and reserving no other prerogative to himself, but to be their captain in war, and the guardian of their laws, &c.—Plutarch. in These. p. 11.

² Sed quoniam regale civitatis genus, prolatum quendam, non tam regni, quam regis vitii repudiatum est; nomen tamen videbitur regis repudiatum, res

manebit, si unus omnibus reliquis magistratibus imperabit.—De Legib. iii. 7.

³ Dion. Hal. v. 292.

⁴ Vocato ad concilium populo, summissis fascibus in concionem ascendit.—Liv. ii. 7.

⁵ Duo genera semper in hac civitate fuerunt,—ex quibus alteri se populares, alteri optimates et haberi et esse voluerunt. Qui ea, quae faciebant, quaeque dicebant, jucunda multitudini esse volebant, populares; qui autem ita se gerebant, ut sua consilia optimo cuique probarent optimates habebantur.—Pro Sext. 45.

⁶ Dion. Hal. vi. 410.

families a promiscuous right to all the magistracies of the republic, and by that means admission into the senate.

Thus far they were certainly in the right, and acted like true patriots ; and after many contests had now brought the government of Rome to its perfect state ; when its honours no longer confined to particular families, but proposed equally and indifferently to every citizen who by his virtue and services, either in war or peace, could recommend himself to the notice and favour of his countrymen ; while the true balance and temperament of power between the senate and people, which was generally observed in regular times, and which the honest wished to establish in all times, was, that the senate should be the authors and directors of all the public counsels, but the people give them their sanction and legal force.

The tribunes, however, would not stop here, nor were content with securing the rights of the commons, without destroying those of the senate ; and as oft as they were disappointed in their private views, and obstructed in the course of their ambition, used to recur always to the populace, whom they could easily inflame to what degree they thought fit, by the promulgation of factious laws for dividing the public lands to the poorer citizens ; or by the free distribution of the abolition of all debts ; which are all contrary to the quiet, and discipline, and public utility of societies. This abuse of the tribunitian power was carried to its greatest height by Gracchi, who left nothing unattempted that could mortify the senate, or gratify the people by their agrarian laws, and other seditious acts, which were greedily received by the citizens. This had in great measure overturned that equilibrium of power in the republic on which its peace and prosperity depended.

But the violent deaths of these two tribunes, and of their principal adherents, put an end to their sedition, and was the first civil blood that was spilt in the streets of Rome, in any of the public dissensions, which till this time had always been composed by the methods of peace and mutual concessions. It must seem strange to observe how these two illustrious brothers, who of all men were the dearest to the Roman people, yet upon the first resort to arms were severally deserted by the multitude in the very height of their authority, and suffered cruelly massacred in the face of the whole city ; which shows what little stress is to be put on the assistance of the populace when the dispute comes to blows ; and that sedition, though it may often shake, yet will never destroy a free state while it continues unarmed and unsustained by a military force. But this vigorous conduct of the senate, though it seemed necessary to the present quiet of the city, yet soon after proved fatal to it ; as it taught all the ambitious a most sensible experiment, that there was no way of supporting an usurped authority but by force ; so that from this time, as we shall find in the following story, all those who aspired to extraordinary powers, and a dominion in the republic, seldom troubled themselves with the senate or people were voting at Rome, but came attended by armies to enforce their pretensions, which were always decided by the longest sword.

The popularity of the Gracchi was grounded on the real affections of the people, gained by many extraordinary privileges and substantial benefits conferred upon them ; but when it was found necessary to control the authority of the senate, and to support that interest which was falsely called popular, instead of courting the multitude by real services and benefits, it was found a much shorter way to corrupt them by money ; a method wholly unknown in the times of the Gracchi, by which the men of power had always a number of mercenaries ready to fill the forum at any warning ; who by clamour and violence preceded them in the public assemblies, and came prepared to ratify whatever was proposed by them : this kept up the form of a legal proceeding ; while by the terror of arms, and a sen-

* Nihil immotum, nihil tranquillum, nihil quietum denique in eodem statu relinquebat, &c.—Vell. Pat. li. 6.

* Itaque homines seditiosi ac turbulenti—conductas habent conciones. Neque id agunt, ut ea dicant et ferant, quæ illi velint audire, qui in concione sed pretio ac mercede perficiunt, ut, quicquid illi velle audire videantur. Num vos exi Gracchos, aut Saturninum, aut quenquam veterum, qui populares habebantur, ullum un-force, the great could easily support, and carry into execution, whatever votes they had once procured in their favour by faction and bribery.

After the death of the younger Gracchus, the senate was perpetually labouring to rescind or to moderate the laws that he had enacted to their prejudice ; especially one that affected them the most sensibly, by taking from them the right of judicature, which they had exercised from the foundation of Rome, and transferring it to the knights. This act, however, was equitable ; for as the senators possessed all the magistracies and governments of the empire, so they were the men whose oppressions were most severely felt, and most frequently complained of ; yet while the judgment of all causes continued in their hands, it was their common practice to favour and absolve one another in their turns, to the general scandal and injury both of the subjects and allies, of which some late and notorious instances had given a plausible pretext for Gracchus's law. But the senate could not bear with patience to be subjected to the tribunal of an inferior order, which had always been jealous of their power, and was sure to be severe upon their crimes ; so that, after many fruitless struggles to get this law repealed, Q. Servilius Cæpio, who was consul about twenty-five years after, procured at last a mitigation of it, by adding a certain number of senators to the three centuries of the knights or equestrian judges ; with which the senate was so highly pleased that they honoured this consul with the title of their patron^b. Cæpio's law was warmly recommended by L. Crassus, the most celebrated orator of that age, who in a speech upon it to the people, defended the authority of the senate with all the force of his eloquence, in which state of things and in this very year of Cæpio's consulship, Cicero was born ; and as Crassus's oration was published and much admired when he was a boy, so he took it, as he afterwards tells us, for the pattern both of his eloquence and his politics^c.

causione habuisse conductum ? Nemo habuit.—Pro Sext. 49.

^b Is—consulatus decore, maximi pontificatus sacerdotia, ut senatus patronus diceretur, assecutus.—Val. Max. vi. 9.

^c Suscit Servilliam legem Crassus—sed hæc Crassi cum edita est oratio—quatuor et triginta tum habebat

annos, totidemque annis mihi ætate præstabat. Is enim consulibus eam legem suscit, quibus nos nati sumus. [Brut. p. 274.] Mihi quidem a pueritia, quasi magistra fuit illa in legem Cæpionis oratio : in qua et auctoritas ornatur senatus, pro quo ordine illa dicuntur.—Ibid. 278.

HISTORY OF THE LIFE

OF

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO.

BY CONYERS MIDDLETON, D.D.

"Hunc igitur spectemus. Hoc propositum sit nobis exemplum. Ille se profecisse sciat, cui Cicero valde placebit."—Quintil. Instit. l. x. 1.

LONDON:

HENRY G. BOHN, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

MDCCCXLVIII.

LONDON :
BRAIDURY AND EVANS, PRINTERS, WHITEFRIARS.

THE HISTORY

OF THE

LIFE OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO.

SECTION I.

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO was born on the third of January^a, in the six hundred and forty-seventh year of Rome, about a hundred and seven years before Christ^b. His birth, if we believe Plutarch, was attended by prodigies, foretelling the future eminence and lustre of his character, which might have passed, he says, for idle dreams, had not the event soon confirmed the truth of the prediction; but since we have no hint of these prodigies from Cicero himself, or any author of that age, we may charge them to the credulity, or the invention of a writer, who loves to raise the solemnity of his story by the introduction of something miraculous.

His mother was called Helvia; a name mentioned in history and old inscriptions among the honourable families of Rome. She was rich, and well descended, and had a sister married to a Roman knight of distinguished merit, C. Aculeo, an intimate friend of the orator, L. Crassus, and celebrated for a singular knowledge of the law; in which his sons likewise, our Cicero's cousins-german, were afterwards very eminent^c. It is remarkable, that Cicero never once speaks of his mother in any part of his writings; but his younger brother Quintus has left a little story of her, which seems to intimate her good management and housewifery; how she used to seal all her wine-casks, the empty as well as the full, that when any of them were found empty and unsealed, she might know them to have been emptied by stealth; it being the most usual theft among the slaves of great families, to steal their master's wine out of the vessels^d.

As to his father's family, nothing was delivered of it, but in extremes^e: which is not to be wondered at, in the history of a man, whose life was so exposed to envy as Cicero's, and who fell a victim at last to the power of his enemies. Some derive his descent from kings, others from mechanics^f; but the truth lay between both; for his family, though it had never borne any of the great offices of the republic, was yet very ancient and honourable^g; of principal distinction and nobility in that part of Italy in which it resided; and of equestrian rank^h, from its first admission to the freedom of Rome.

Some have insinuated, that Cicero affected to say but little of the splendour of his family, for the sake of being considered as the founder of it; and chose to suppress the notion of his regal extraction, for the aversion that the people of Rome had to the name of king; with which, however, he was sometimes reproached by his enemiesⁱ. But those speculations are wholly imaginary; for as oft as there was occasion to mention the character and condition of his ancestors, he speaks of them always with great frankness, declaring them to have been con-

^a See Plutarch's Life of Cicero.

^b Regis progenies et Tullo sanguis ab alto.—Sil. Ital.

^c Hinc enim orti stirpe antiquissima: hic sacra, hic genus, hic majorum multa vestigia.—De Leg. li. 1, 2.

^d The equestrian dignity, or that order of the Roman people which we commonly call knights, had nothing in it analogous or similar to any order of modern knighthood, but depended entirely upon a census, or valuation of their estates, which was usually made every five years by the censors, in their lustrum, or general review of the whole people, when all those citizens, whose entire fortunes amounted to the value of four hundred sestertia, that is, of 322*l.* of our money, were enrolled of course in the list of equites or knights, who were considered as a middle order between the senators and the common people, yet without any other distinction than the privilege of wearing a gold ring, which was the peculiar badge of their order. [Liv. xxiii. 12; Plin. Hist. xxxiii. 1.] The census, or estate necessary to a senator, was double to that of a knight: and if ever they reduced their fortunes below that standard, they forfeited their rank, and were struck out of the roll of their order by the censors.

Si quadringentes sex septem millia desint, Plebs eris.—Hon. Ep. l. 1. 57.

The order of knights therefore included in it the whole provincial nobility and gentry of the empire, which had not yet obtained the honour of the Senate.

ⁱ Vid. Sebast. Corrad. Questura, pp. 43, 44.

^a III Nonas Jan. natali meo.—Ep. ad Att. vii. 5; ib. xiii. 2.

^b This computation follows the common era of Christ's birth, which is placed three years later than it ought to be. Pompey the Great was born also in the same year, on the last of September.—Vid. Figh. Ann., Plin. xxxvii. 2.

^c De Orat. l. 43; li. 1.

^d Mecum olim matrem meam facere memini, que lagenas etiam inanes obsignabat, ne discerentur inanes aliquo furtivo, quo furtim essent exsiccata.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 26.

—Poenet qui ignorare servia,

Et signo lævo non inanis lagenæ.—Hon.

tent with their paternal fortunes, and the private honours of their own city, without the ambition of appearing on the public stage of Rome. Thus in a speech to the people upon his advancement to the consulship, I have no pretence, says he, to enlarge before you, upon the praises of my ancestors; not but that they were all such as myself, who am descended from their blood, and trained by their discipline; but because they lived without this applause of popular fame, and the splendour of these honours, which you confer^k. It is on this account therefore, that we find him so often called a new man; not that his family was new or ignoble, but because he was the first of it, who ever sought and obtained the public magistracies of the state.

The place of his birth was Arpinum; a city anciently of the Samnites, now part of the kingdom of Naples; which, upon its submission to Rome, acquired the freedom of the city, and was inserted into the Cornelian tribe. It had the honour also of producing the great C. Marius; which gave occasion to Pompey to say in a public speech, that Rome was indebted to this corporation for two citizens, who had, each in his turn, preserved it from ruin^l. It may justly therefore claim a place in the memory of posterity, for giving life to such worthies, who exemplified the character which Pliny gives of true glory, by doing what deserved to be written, and writing what deserved to be read; and making the world the happier and the better for their having lived in it^m.

The territory of Arpinum was rude and mountainous, to which Cicero applies Homer's description of Ithaca, —τρηχεὶ δ' ἄλλ' ἀγαθὴ κουροτρόφος, κ. τ. λ.

'Tis rough indeed, yet breeds a generous raceⁿ.

The family seat was about three miles from the town, in a situation extremely pleasant, and well adapted to the nature of the climate. It was surrounded with groves and shady walks, leading from the house to a river called Fibrenus, which was divided into two equal streams by a little island, covered with trees, and a portico contrived both for study and exercise, whither Cicero used to retire when he had any particular work upon his hands. The clearness and rapidity of the stream, murmuring through a rocky channel; the shade and verdure of its banks, planted with tall poplars; the remarkable coldness of the water, and above all, its falling by a cascade into the nobler river Liris, a little below the island; gives us the idea of a most beautiful scene, as Cicero himself has described it. When Atticus first saw it, he was charmed with it, and wondered that Cicero did not prefer it to all his other houses; declaring a contempt of the labour'd magnificence, marble pavements, artificial canals, and forced streams of the celebrated villas of Italy, compared with the natural beauties of this place^o. The house, as Cicero says, was but small and humble in his grandfather's time, according to the ancient frugality, like the Sabine farm of old Curius; till his father beautified and enlarged it into a handsome and spacious habitation.

But there cannot be a better proof of the delightfulness of the place, than that it is by a convent of monks, and called th Dominic^p. Strange revolution! to porticoes converted to monkish clois of the most refined reason, wit, and nursery of superstition, bigotry, and What a pleasure must it give to the Inquisitors, to trample on the ruins of writings, by spreading the light of reason through the world, have been one ground of obstructing their unwearied pains.

Cicero, being the first-born of the family, as usual, the name of his father, Marcus. This name was proper equivalent to that of baptism with us with ceremonies somewhat analogous ninth day, called the lustral, or day of when the child was carried to the friends and, relations of the family, altars of the gods, recommended to the same tutelar deity.

Tullius was the name of the family language, signified flowing streams, or and was derived, therefore, probably from an ancient situation, at the confluence of the

The third name was generally added to some memorable action, quality which distinguished the founder, or the family. Plutarch says, that Tullius was owing to a wart or excrescence of one of his ancestors, in the shape of which the Romans called cicer^q; but more credibly, that all those names reference to any species of grain, as tuli, &c. were acquired by a reputed best husbandmen or improvers of the soil. Tullius, therefore, the family name from the situation of the farm, so Cicero name, from the culture of it by the father, is the most probable; because a held the most liberal employment in those tribes, which resided on their country, the most honourable; and from which Cicero drew his name, of the republic, in great request with the people; being one of the usual large upon them by the rich, and sold ever theatres and streets ready parched or sent us^r.

Cicero's grandfather was living at the birth; and from the few hints which a

^p Appresso la Villa di S. Domenico; hor questo luogo, ove nacque Cicero, col Maro, laquale Villa è discosta da Arpinum. —Vid. Lessa. Alberti Descriptione d'Italia.

^q Est Nundina Romanorum dea, a nono nuncupata, qui lustricus dicitur; est autem quo infantes lustrantur et nomen accipiunt. Sat. i. 16.

^r Pomponius Festus in voce Tullius.

^s This has given rise to a blunder of the busts of Cicero, have formed it of this vetch on his nose; not reflecting, name only, and not the vetch itself, which to him by his ancestors.

^t Hist. Nat. xviii. 3, 1.

^u In cicere, atque faba, bona tu perdasque Latius ut in circo spatieris, aut arneus ut Hor.

Nec, siquid fricti ciceris probat et nuci

^k De Lego Agrar. con. Rull. ad Quirites, 1.

^l De Legib. II. 3; Val. Maxim. II. 2.

^m Plin. Ep.

ⁿ Ad Att. II. 11; Odyss. IV. 27.

^o De Legib. II. 1, 2, 3.

seems to have been a man of business and interest in his country¹. He was at the head of a party in Arpinum, in opposition to a busy turbulent man, M. Caudinus, whose sister he had married, who was pushing forward a popular law, to oblige the town to transact all their affairs by ballot. The case was brought before the Consul Scæurus; in which old Cicero behaved himself so well, that the consul paid him the compliment to wish that a man of his spirit and virtue would come and act with them in the great theatre of the republic, and not confine his talents to the narrow sphere of his own corporation². There is a saying likewise recorded of this old gentleman, That the men of those times were like the Syrian slaves—the more Greek they knew, the greater knaves they were³; which carries with it the notion of an old patriot, severe on the importation of foreign arts, as destructive of the discipline and manners of his country. This grandfather had two sons—Marcus the elder, the father of our Cicero; and Lucius, a particular friend of the celebrated orator M. Antonius, whom he accompanied to his government of Cilicia⁴; and who left a son of the same name, frequently mentioned by Cicero with great affection, as a youth of excellent virtue and accomplishments⁵.

His father Marcus also was a wise and learned man, whose merit recommended him to the familiarity of the principal magistrates of the republic, especially Cato, L. Crassus, and L. Cæsar⁶; but being of an infirm and tender constitution, he spent his life chiefly at Arpinum, in an elegant retreat and the study of polite letters⁷.

But his chief employment, from the time of his having sons, was to give them the best education which Rome could afford, in hopes to excite in them an ambition of breaking through the indolence of the family, and aspiring to the honours of the state. They were bred up with their cousins, the young Aculeos, in a method approved and directed by L. Crassus; a man of the first dignity, as well as the first eloquence in Rome, and by those very masters whom Crassus himself made use of⁸. The Romans were of all people the most careful and exact in the education of their children: their attention to it began from the moment of their birth; when they committed them to the care of some prudent matron of reputable character and condition, whose business it was to form their first habits of acting and speaking; to watch their growing passions, and direct them to their proper objects; to superintend their sports, and suffer nothing immodest or indecent to enter into them; that the mind preserved in its innocence, nor depraved by a taste of false pleasure, might be at liberty to pursue whatever was laudable, and apply its whole strength to that profession, in which it desired to excel⁹.

It was the opinion of some of the old masters, that children should not be instructed in letters till they were seven years old; but the best judges advised, that no time of culture should be lost, and that their literary instruction should keep pace with their moral; that three years only should be allowed to the nurses, and when they first began to speak, that they should begin also to learn¹⁰. It was reckoned a matter likewise of great importance, what kind of language they were first accustomed to hear at home, and in what manner not only their nurses, but their fathers and even mothers, spoke; since their first habits were then necessarily formed, either of a pure or corrupt elocution: thus the two Gracchi were thought to owe that elegance of speaking, for which they were famous, to the institution of their mother Cornelia; a woman of great politeness, whose epistles were read and admired long after her death for the purity of their language¹¹.

This probably was a part of that domestic discipline, in which Cicero was trained, and of which he often speaks; but as soon as he was capable of a more enlarged and liberal institution, his father brought him to Rome, where he had a house of his own¹², and placed him in a public school, under an eminent Greek master, which was thought the best way of educating one who was designed to appear on the public stage, and who, as Quintilian observes, ought to be so bred as not to fear the sight of men, since that can never be rightly learned in solitude, which is to be produced before crowds¹³. Here he gave the first specimen of those shining abilities, which rendered him afterwards so illustrious; and his school-fellows carried home such stories of his extraordinary parts and quickness in learning, that their parents were often induced to visit the school, for the sake of seeing a youth of such surprising talents¹⁴.

About this time a celebrated rhetorician, Flotius, first set up a Latin school of eloquence in Rome, and had a great resort to him¹⁵. Young Cicero was very desirous to be his scholar, but was

¹ De Legib. li. 1.

² Ac nostro quidem hunc, cum res esset ad se delata, Consul Scæurus, utinam. Inquit, M. Cicero, isto animo, alio virtute, in summa republica nobiscum versari, quam in municipali voluntas?—Ibid. lii. 16.

³ Nostros homines similes esse Syrorum venalium; ut vulgus opinio Græce sciret, ita esse nequissimum.—De Orat. li. 65.

⁴ L. L.—A great part of the slaves in Rome were Syrians for the pirates of Cilicia, who used to infect the coasts of Syria, carried all their captives to the market of Delos, and sold them there to the Greeks, through whose hands they usually passed to Rome: those slaves, therefore, who had lived the longest with their Grecian masters, and consequently talked Greek the best, were the most prized in all the little tricks and craft that servitude naturally teaches; which old Cicero, like Cato the Censor, imputed to the arts and manners of Greece itself.—Vid. Ad. Turneb. in Jaco. Cicéronia.

⁵ De Orat. li. 1.

⁶ De Pimib. v. 1; ad Att. li. 5.

⁷ Ep. Fam. xv. 4; De Orat. li. 1.

⁸ Qui cum esset infirmus valetudine, hic fere ætatem suam in literis.—De Legib. li. 1.

⁹ Cuiusque nos cum consobrinis nostris, Aculeonis filiiis, et c. disceremus, quæ Crasso placerent, et ab his doctoribus, quibus ille uteretur, erudiremur.—De Orat. li. 1.

¹ Eligebatur autem aliqua major natu propinqua, cujus probatis spectatisque moribus, omnis cujusquam familie soboles committeretur, &c.—quæ disciplina et severitas eo pertinebat, ad sincera et integra et nulla pravitatibus detorta uniuscujusque natura, toto statim pectore arripere artes honestas, &c.—Tacit. Dial. de Oratorib. 22.

² Quintil. l. 1.

³ Ibid.; it. in Brut. p. 319, edit. Sebast. Corradi.

⁴ This is a farther proof of the wealth and flourishing condition of his family; since the rent of a moderate house in Rome, in a reputable part of the city, fit for one of equestrian rank, was about two hundred pounds sterling per annum.

⁵ Quintil. l. 2.

⁶ Plutarch, in his Life.

⁷ Sueton. de claris Rhetoribus, c. 2.

over-ruled in it by the advice of the learned, who thought the Greek masters more useful in forming him to the bar, for which he was designed. This method of beginning with Greek is approved by Quintilian; because the Latin would come of itself, and it seemed most natural to begin from the fountain, whence all the Roman learning was derived: yet the rule, he says, must be practised with some restriction, nor the use of a foreign language pushed so far to the neglect of the native, as to acquire with it a foreign accent and vicious pronunciation^a.

Cicero's father, encouraged by the promising genius of his son, spared no cost nor pains to improve it by the help of the ablest masters, and among the other instructors of his early youth, put him under the care of the poet Archias, who came to Rome with a high reputation for learning and poetry, when Cicero was about five years old, and lived in the family of Lucullus^b: for it was the custom of the great in those days to entertain in their houses the principal scholars and philosophers of Greece, with a liberty of opening a school, and teaching, together with their own children, any of the other young nobility and gentry of Rome. Under this master, Cicero applied himself chiefly to poetry, to which he was naturally addicted; and made such a proficiency in it, that while he was still a boy, he composed and published a poem, called Glaucus Pontius, which was extant in Plutarch's time^c.

After finishing the course of these puerile studies, it was the custom to change the habit of the boy for that of the man, and take what they called the manly gown, or the ordinary robe of the citizens: this was an occasion of great joy to the young men; who, by this change, passed into a state of greater liberty and enlargement from the power of their tutors^d. They were introduced at the same time into the forum, or the great square of the city, where the assemblies of the people were held and the magistrates used to harangue to them from the rostra, and where all the public pleadings and judicial proceedings were usually transacted: this therefore was the grand school of business and eloquence; the scene on which all the affairs of the empire were determined, and where the foundation of their hopes and fortunes was to be laid: so that they were introduced into it with much solemnity, attended by all the friends and dependants of the family; and after divine rites performed in the capitol, were committed to the special protection of some eminent senator, distinguished for his eloquence or knowledge of the laws, to be instructed by his advice in the management of civil affairs, and to form themselves by his example for useful members and magistrates of the republic.

Writers are divided about the precise time of changing the puerile for the manly gown: what seems the most probable is, that in the old republic it was never done till the end of the tenth year; but when the ancient did to relax, parents, out of indulgence, advanced this era of joy one and gave them the gown at sixteen, a custom in Cicero's time. Under it was granted at pleasure, and at any great or their own relations; for N. from Claudius, when he just entered the tenth year, which, as Tacitus says, before the regular season^e.

Cicero being thus introduced into was placed under the care of Q. M. the augur, the principal lawyer, as a man of that age; who had passed the offices of the republic, with a singular integrity, and was now extremely old, stirred from his side; but carefully in his memory all the remarkable sayings from him, as so many lessons of prudence for future conduct^f; and after his death, he turned himself to another of the same family, a high-priest, a person of equal character and skill in the law; who, though he refused to teach, yet freely gave his advice to young students who consulted him^g.

Under these masters he acquired knowledge of the laws of his country, useful to all who design to enter into and thought to be of such consequence that it was the common exercise of him to learn the laws of the Twelve Tables, they did their poets and classic authors particularly took such pains in this, so well acquainted with the most intimate, as to be able to sustain a dispute with the greatest lawyers of his age, pleading once against his friend S. declared, by way of railery, what I made good likewise in fact, that if him, he would profess himself a lawyer's time^h.

The profession of the law, next to and eloquence, was a sure recommendation to the honours of the republic, and it was preserved as it were hereditary in the noblest families of Romeⁱ; who, by advice gratis to all who wanted it, favour and observance of their fellow-citizens acquired great authority in all the affairs of the state. It was the custom of these old senators for their wisdom and experience, in the morning up and down the forum, in their offering themselves freely to occasion to consult them, not only in but in their private and domestic aff-

^a Ann. xii. 41; Vid. Norris Cenotaph.;

^b 4; It. Sueton. August. 8; et Notae Pith.

^c De Amicit. l.

^d Brut. p. 89. edit.

^e De Legib. ii. 23.

^f Ep. Fam. vii.

^g Pro Murena, 13.

^h Ibid. 14.

ⁱ Quorum vero patres aut majores aliqui fuerunt, si student plerumque in eodem genere: ut Q. Mucius P. filius, in Jure civili.

^b M. vero Manilius nos etiam vidimus bulantem foro; quod erat insignis, cum, facere civibus omnibus consilii sui copiam et ita ambulantes et in solio sedentes docerent non solum ut de Jure civili ad eos, verum colloquenda—de omni denique aut officio a retur.—De Orat. iii. 33.

^a Quintil. l. i.

^b Pro Archia, l. 3.

^c Plutarch. This Glaucus was a fisherman of Anthedon, in Beotia; who, upon eating a certain herb, jumped into the sea, and became a sea-god: the place was ever after called Glaucus's Leap; where there was an oracle of the god, in great vogue with all seamen; and the story furnished the argument to one of Æschylus's tragedies.—Pausan. Beot. c. 22.

^d Cum primum pavido custos mihi purpura cessat.

Pæne. Sat. v. 30.

later times they chose to sit at home with their doors open, in a kind of throne or raised seat, like the confessors in foreign churches, giving access and audience to all people. This was the case of the two Scævolas, especially the augur, whose home was called the oracle of the city²; and who, in the Marsic war, when worn out with age and infirmities, gave free admission every day to all the citizens, as soon as it was light, nor was ever seen by any in his bed during that whole war³.

But this was not the point that Cicero aimed at, to guard the estates only of the citizens: his views were much larger; and the knowledge of the law was but one ingredient of many, in the character which he aspired to, of a universal patron, not only of the fortunes, but of the lives and liberties, of his countrymen; for that was the proper notion of an orator, or pleader of causes, whose profession it was to speak aptly, elegantly, and copiously, on every subject which could be offered to him, and whose art therefore included in it all other arts of the liberal kind, and could not be acquired, to any perfection, without a competent knowledge of whatever was great and laudable in the universe. This was his own idea of what he had undertaken⁴; and his present business therefore was, to lay a foundation fit to sustain the weight of this great character: so that while he was studying the law under the Scævolas, he spent a large share of his time in attending the pleadings at the bar, and the public speeches of the magistrates, and never passed one day without writing and reading something at home; constantly taking notes, and making comments on what he read. He was fond, when very young, of an exercise, which had been recommended by some of the great orators before him, of reading over a number of verses of some esteemed poet, or a part of an oration, so carefully as to retain the substance of them in his memory, and then deliver the same sentiments in different words, the most elegant that occurred to him. But he soon grew weary of this, upon reflecting, that his authors had already employed the best words which belonged to their subject; so that if he used the same, it would do him no good; and if different, would even hurt him, by a habit of using worse. He applied himself therefore to another task of more certain benefit, to translate into Latin the select speeches of the best Greek orators, which gave him an opportunity of observing and employing all the most elegant words of his own language, and of enriching it at the same time with new ones, borrowed or imitated from the Greek⁵. Nor did he yet neglect his poetical studies; for he now translated Aratus on the Phenomena of the Heavens, into Latin verse, of which many fragments are still extant; and published also an original poem of the heroic kind, in honour of his countryman C. Marius. This was much admired, and often read by Atticus; and old Scævola was so pleased with it, that in an epigram, which he seems to have made upon it, he declares, that it would live as long as the Roman name and learning subsisted⁶. There remains still a little specimen of it, describing a memorable omen given to Marius from the oak of Arpinum, which from the spirit and elegance of the description shows, that his poetical genius was scarce inferior to his oratorical, if it had been cultivated with the same diligence⁷. He published another poem also, called Limon; of which Donatus has preserved four lines in the life of Terence, in praise of the elegance and purity of that poet's style⁸. But while he was employing himself in these juvenile exercises for the improvement of his invention, he applied himself with no less industry to philosophy, for the enlargement of his mind and understanding; and, among his other masters, was very fond at this age of Phædrus the Epicurean: but as soon as he had gained a little more experience and judgment of things, he wholly deserted and constantly disliked the principles of that sect; yet always retained a particular esteem for the man, on account of his learning, humanity, and politeness⁹.

The peace of Rome was now disturbed by a domestic war, which writers call the Italic, Social, or Marsic. It was begun by a confederacy of the principal towns of Italy, to support their demand of the freedom of the city. The tribune Drusus had made them a promise of it, but was assassinated in the attempt of publishing a law to confer it. This made them desperate, and resolve to extort by force what they could not obtain by entreaty¹. They alleged it to be unjust to exclude them from the rights of a city which they sustained by their arms; that in all its wars they furnished twice the number of troops which Rome itself did; and had raised it to all that height of power, for which it now despised them². This war was carried on for above two years, with great fierceness on both sides, and various success: two Roman consuls were killed in it, and their armies often defeated; till the confederates, weakened also by frequent losses, and the desertion of one ally after another, were forced at last to submit to the superior fortune of Rome³. During the hurry of the war, the

² Eaque, ut ait Scævola de fratre mel Mario, canescet ævoles innumerabilibus.—De Leg. i. l.

³ *Hic Jovis altisoni subito plinnata satelles
Arboris e trunco, serpentis caucia morsu,
Subjugat ipse feris transigena unguibus anguem
Semianimum, et varia graviter cervicis micantem;
Quem se intorquentem lanianis rostroque cruentans,
Jam satiat animos, jam duros ulta dolores,
Abjicit efflantem, et laceratum addigit in unda,
Seque obitu a solis, nitidos convertit ad ortus.
Hanc ubi præpetibus pennis lapsusque volentem
Conspexit Marius, divini numinis augur,
Fausaque signa suæ laudis, reditusque notavit;
Partibus intonuit oculi Pater ipse sinistris.
Sic aquilæ clarum firmavit Juppiter omen.*

De Divin. l. 47.

⁴ We have no account of the argument of this piece, or of the meaning of its title; it was probably nothing more than the Greek word Λεμῶν, to intimate that the poem, like a meadow or garden, exhibited a variety of different fancies and flowers. The Greeks, as Pliny says, were fond of giving such titles to their books as Παρθένας, Ἐγχεπίδιον, Λεμῶν, &c., [Pref. Hist. Nat.] and Pamphilus the Grammarian, as Suidas tells us, published a Λεμῶν, or a collection of various subjects.—Vid. in Pamphil.

⁵ Ep. Fam. xiii. 1.

⁶ Philop. xii. 27.

⁷ Vell. Pat. ii. 15.

⁸ Flor. iii. 18.

⁶ Est enim sine dubio domus jurisconsulti totius orationis civitatis. Testis est hujusce Q. Mucii Janua et vestibulum, quod in ejus infirmissima valetudine, affectuque jam senile, maxima quotidie frequentia civium, ac numerorum hominum splendore celebratur.—De Orat. i. 4.

⁷ Philop. viii. 16.

⁸ De Orat. i. 3, 6, 13, 16.

⁹ De Orator. i. 34.

business of the forum was intermitted; the greatest part of the magistrates, as well as the pleaders, being personally engaged in it: Hortensius, the most flourishing young orator at the bar, was a volunteer in it the first year, and commanded a regiment the second⁶.

Cicero likewise took the opportunity to make a campaign, along with the consul Cn. Pompeius Strabo, the father of Pompey the Great: this was a constant part of the education of the young nobility, to learn the art of war by personal service, under some general of name and experience; for, in an empire raised and supported wholly by arms, a reputation of martial virtue was the shortest and surest way of rising to its highest honours; and the constitution of the government was such, that as their generals could not make a figure even in camps, without some institution in the politer arts, especially that of speaking gracefully⁷; so those who applied themselves to the peaceful studies, and the management of civil affairs, were obliged to acquire a competent share of military skill, for the sake of governing provinces, and commanding armies, to which they all succeeded of course from the administration of the great offices of the state.

In this expedition Cicero was present at a conference between Pompeius the consul, and Vettius the general of the Marsi, who had given the Romans a cruel defeat the year before, in which the Consul Rutilius was killed⁸. It was held in sight of the two camps, and managed with great decency: the consul's brother Sextus, being an old acquaintance of Vettius, came from Rome on purpose to assist at it; and at the first sight of each other, after lamenting the unhappy circumstance of their meeting at the head of opposite armies, he asked Vettius by what title he should now salute him, of friend or enemy? to which Vettius replied, "Call me friend by inclination; enemy, by necessity⁹." Which shows, that these old warriors had not less politeness in their civil, than fierceness in their hostile encounters.

Both Marius and Sylla served as lieutenants to the consuls in this war, and commanded separate armies in different parts of Italy: but Marius performed nothing in it answerable to his great name and former glory: his advanced age had increased his caution; and after so many triumphs and consulships, he was jealous of a reverse of fortune; so that he kept himself wholly on the defensive, and, like old Fabius, chose to tire out the enemy by declining a battle; content with snatching some little advantages, that opportunity threw into his hands, without suffering them however to gain any against him¹⁰. Sylla, on the other hand, was ever active and enterprising: he had not yet obtained the consulship, and was fighting for it, as it were, in the sight of his fellow-citizens; so that he was constantly urging the enemy to a battle, and glad of every occasion to signalise his military talents, and eclipse the fame of Marius; in which he succeeded to his wish, gained many considerable victories, and took several of their cities by storm, particularly Stabiz, a town of Campania, which he utterly destroyed. Cicero, who seems to have followed the chief scene of the war, and the most important, gives an account of which he was eye-witness, executed with vigour and success; that, as Sylla was before his tent in the fields of Nola, he opened to creep out from the bottom upon which Postumius the haruspex, the sacrifice, proclaiming it to be a favourable omen, called out upon him to lead his army against the enemy. Sylla took the admonition; and drawing out his tent, he attacked and took the strong Samnites under the walls of Nola¹¹. It was thought so glorious, that Sylla gave it painted afterwards in one of the Tusculan villa¹². Thus Cicero was not in the army, than he was in the forum everything that passed; and contrived to be near the person of the general, till of moment might escape his notice.

Upon the breaking out of this war gave the freedom of the city to all the continued firm to them; and at the expense of the destruction of three hundred thousand thought fit, for the sake of their future grant it to all the rest: but this was considered as the foundation of a per was, as an ingenious writer has observed the causes that hastened their ruin; the enormous bulk to which the city was swelling birth to many new disorders, that ruptured and at last destroyed it; and of the laws, calculated for a people whose walls would contain, was too weak to the vast body of Italy: so that from chiefly, all affairs were decided by force, and the influence of the great bringing whole towns into the forum from parts of Italy, or pour in a number of foreigners under the form of citizens; names and persons of real citizens could be distinguished, it was not possible that any act had passed regularly by the suffrage of the people¹³.

The Italic war was no sooner ended, broke out, which, though at a great distance, Rome was one of the most difficult in which it ever was engaged, against king of Pontus, a martial and powerful restless spirit and ambition, with access to the greatest designs; who, disdain his hopes blasted by the overbearing power and confined to the narrow boundary of tary dominion, broke through his barrier and over-ran the lesser Asia like a torrent one day caused eighty thousand Romans be massacred in cold blood¹⁴. His

⁶ Brut. 425.

⁷ Quantum dicendi gravitate et copia valeat, in quo ipso inest quædam dignitas imperatoria.—Pro Lege Manilia, 14.

⁸ Appian. Bell. Civ. p. 376.

⁹ Quem te appellem, inquit? at ille; Voluntate hostem, necessitate hostem.—Phil. xii. 11.

¹⁰ Plutar. in Mar.

¹¹ Plut. in Sylla. In Campano autem agro fœre usque ad Cn. Pompeium et L. C. sules, pridie Kalendas Maii, quo die L. Sylla sociis, id delavit, quod nunc in villas at ibi et Taurania.—Plin. Hist. N. iii. 5.

¹² In Syllæ scriptum historia videmus, quante factum est, ut quum ille in agro Nola ante prætorium, ab infima ara subito antiquum quidem C. Postumius haruspex orabatur De Divin. l. 33; ff. 30.

¹³ De la Grandeur des Romains, &c., c. 9.

¹⁴ Pro Lege Manil. 3.

answerable to the vastness of his attempt, and the inexplicable war that he had now declared against the republic: he had a fleet of above four hundred ships, with an army of two hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifty thousand horse; all completely armed, and provided with military stores, fit for the use of so great a body^a.

Sylla, who had now obtained the consulship, as the reward of his late services, had the province of Asia allotted to him, with the command of the war against Mithridates^b: but old Marius, envious of his growing fame, and desirous to engross every commission which offered either power or wealth, engaged Sulpicius, an eloquent and popular tribune, to get that allotment reversed, and the command transferred from Sylla to himself, by the suffrage of the people. This raised great tumults in the city between the opposite parties, in which the son of Q. Pompeius the consul, and the son-in-law of Sylla, was killed. Sylla happened to be absent, quelling the remains of the late commotions near Nola; but, upon the news of these disorders, he hastened with his legions to Rome; and having entered it after some resistance, drove Marius and his accomplices to the necessity of saving themselves by a precipitate flight. This was the beginning of the first civil war, properly so called, which Rome had ever seen, and what gave both the occasion and the example to all the rest that followed. The tribune Sulpicius was taken and slain; and Marius so warmly pursued, that he was forced to plunge himself into the marshes of Minturnum, up to the chin in water; in which condition he lay concealed for some time, till being discovered and dragged out, he was preserved by the compassion of the inhabitants who, after refreshing him from the cold and hunger which he had suffered in his flight, furnished him with a vessel and all necessaries to transport himself into Africa^c.

Sylla in the meanwhile having quieted the city, and proscribed twelve of his chief adversaries, set forward upon his expedition against Mithridates; but he was no sooner gone, than the civil broils broke out afresh between the new consuls, Cinna and Octavius, which Cicero calls the Octavian war^d. For Cinna, attempting to reverse all that Sylla had established, was driven out of the city by his colleague, with six of the tribunes, and deposed from the consulship. Upon this he gathered an army, and recalled Marius, who, having joined his forces with him, entered Rome in a hostile manner, and, with the most horrible cruelty, put all Sylla's friends to the sword, without regard to age, dignity, or former services. Among the rest fell the Consul C. Octavius, the two brothers L. Cæsar and C. Cæsar, P. Crassus, and the orator, M. Antonius, whose head, as Cicero says, was fixed upon that rostrum, where he had so strenuously defended the republic when consul, and preserved the heads of so many citizens; lamenting, as it were ominously, the misery of that fate which happened afterwards to himself, from the grandson of this very Antonus. Q. Catulus also, though he had been Marius's colleague in the consulship and his victory over the Cimbri, was treated with the same cruelty: for when his friends were interceding for his life, Marius made them no other answer but, "he must die, he must die;" so that he was obliged to kill himself^e.

Cicero saw this memorable entry of his countryman Marius, who, in that advanced age, was so far from being broken, he says, by his late calamity, that he seemed to be more alert and vigorous than ever; when he heard him recounting to the people, in excuse for the cruelty of his return, the many miseries which he had lately suffered; when he was driven from that country which he had saved from destruction; when all his estate was seized and plundered by his enemies; when he saw his young son also the partner of his distress; when he was almost drowned in the marshes, and owed his life to the mercy of the Minturnensians; when he was forced to fly into Africa in a small bark, and become a suppliant to those to whom he had given kingdoms: but that since he had recovered his dignity, and all the rest that he had lost, it should be his care not to forfeit that virtue and courage which he had never lost^f. Marius and Cinna having thus got the republic into their hands, declared themselves consuls: but Marius died unexpectedly, as soon almost as he was inaugurated into his new dignity, on the 13th of January, in the 70th year of his age; and, according to the most probable account, of a pleuritic fever^g.

His birth was obscure, though some call it equestrian; and his education wholly in camps, where he learnt the first rudiments of war under the greatest master of that age, the younger Scipio, who destroyed Carthage; till by long service, distinguished valour, and a peculiar hardness and patience of discipline, he advanced himself gradually through all the steps of military honour, with the reputation of a brave and complete soldier. The obscurity of his extraction, which depressed him with the nobility, made him the greater favourite of the people, who, on all occasions of danger, thought him the only man fit to be trusted with their lives and fortunes, or to have the command of a difficult and desperate war: and in truth, he twice delivered them from the most desperate with which they had ever been threatened by a foreign enemy. Scipio, from the observation of his martial talents, while he had yet but an inferior command in the army, gave a kind of prophetic testimony of his future glory: for being asked by some of his officers, who were supping with him at Numantia, what general the republic would have, in case of any accident to himself; That man! replied he, pointing to Marius, at the bottom of the table. In the field he was cautious and provident; and while he was watching the most favourable opportunities of action, affected to take all his measures

^a Cum necessariis Catuli deprecantibus non semel respondit, sed sæpe, moriatur.—Tusc. Disp. v. 19; De Orat. lib. 3.

^f Post Red. ad Quir. 8.

^g Plutarch. in Mar. The celebrated orator L. Crassus died not long before of the same disease, which might probably be then, as I was told in Rome that it is now, the peculiar distemper of the place. The modern Romans call it puntura, which seems to carry the same notion, that the old Romans expressed by percussus frigore: intimating the sudden stroke of cold, upon a body unusually heated.

^a Appian. Bell. Mithridat. lib. i. p. 171.

^b Id. Bell. Civ. l. i. 383.

^c Pro Flan. 16. This account, that Cicero gives more than once, of Marius's escape, makes it probable, that the famous story of the Gallic soldier, sent into the prison to kill him, was forged by some of the later writers, to make the relation more tragical and affecting.

^d De Div. l. 2; Philip. xiv. 8.

from augurs and diviners; nor ever gave battle, till, by pretended omens and divine admonitions, he had inspired his soldiers with a confidence of victory: so that his enemies dreaded him, as something more than mortal; and both friends and foes believed him to act always by a peculiar impulse and direction from the gods. His merit, however, was wholly military, void of every accomplishment of learning, which he openly affected to despise; so that Arpinum had the singular felicity to produce the most glorious contemner, as well as the most illustrious improver, of the arts and eloquence of Rome. He made no figure, therefore, in the gown, nor had any other way of sustaining his authority in the city, than by cherishing the natural jealousy between the senate and the people; that by his declared enmity to the one, he might always be at the head of the other, whose favour he managed, not with any view to the public good, for he had nothing in him of the statesman or the patriot, but to the advancement of his private interest and glory. In short, he was crafty, cruel, covetous, perfidious; of a temper and talents greatly serviceable abroad, but turbulent and dangerous at home; an implacable enemy to the nobles, ever seeking occasions to mortify them, and ready to sacrifice the republic, which he had saved, to his ambition and revenge. After a life spent in the perpetual toils of foreign or domestic wars, he died at last in his bed, in a good old age, and in his seventh consulship; an honour that no Roman before him ever attained; which is urged by Cotta, the Academic, as one argument amongst others, against the existence of a Providence¹.

The transactions of the forum were greatly interrupted by these civil dissensions; in which some of the best orators were killed and others banished. Cicero however attended the harangues of the magistrates, who possessed the rostra in their turns: and being now about the age of twenty-one, drew up probably those rhetorical pieces which were published by him, as he tells us, when very young, and are supposed to be the same that still remain, on the subject of Invention; but he condemned and retracted them afterwards in his advanced age, as unworthy of his maturer judgment, and the work only of a boy, attempting to digest into order the precepts, which he had brought away from school². In the meanwhile, Philo, a philosopher of the first name in the academy, with many of the principal Athenians, fled to Rome from the fury of Mithridates, who had made himself master of Athens, and all the neighbouring parts of Greece immediately became his scholar, and was taken with his philosophy; and by that professor, gave himself up to that greater inclination, as there was cause that the laws and judicial proceedings designed for the ground of his fame would be wholly overturned by the public disorders³.

But Cinna's party having quelled at home, while Sylla was engaged in Mithridatic war, there was a cease within the city for about three years: course of public business began to flow in its usual channel; and Molo the Rhodian principal orators of that age, and the celebrated teacher of eloquence, happened to Rome at the same time, Cicero presided at his lectures, and resumed his studies with his former ardour⁴. But the spur to his industry was the fame of Hortensius, who made the first figure, and whose praises fired him with such a desire of acquiring the same glory, that he set himself any rest from his studies either at home or abroad. He had in the house with him Diodotus, his preceptor in various parts of learning, particularly in logic, which Zeno, as he used to call a close and contracted eloquence, called eloquence enlarged, and comparing the one to the fist or hand, and the other to the palm opened⁵. Yet with all this attention to logic, he never suffered a day out some exercise in oratory, chiefly claiming, which he generally performed to fellow students, M. Piso and Q. P. young noblemen a little older than himself, whom he had contracted an intimacy with. They declaimed sometimes in Latin, but more frequently in Greek; because the Greek furnished a variety of elegant expressions, and so of imitating and introducing them in Latin, and because the Greek masters, who best, could not correct and improve their declaiming in that language⁶.

In this interval Sylla was performing against Mithridates, whom he had driven out of Greece and Asia, and confined once more to his own territory; yet at Rome, when master, he was declared a public enemy, and his estate confiscated. This insult upon his fortunes made him very desirous to return again, in order to take his revenge upon his enemies: so that after all his success in the war, he was glad to put an end to it by a peace; the chief article of which was, that Sylla should defray the whole expense of his return, and content himself for the future with his kingdom. On his return, he brought

¹ Natus equestri loco. [Vell. Pat. ii. 11.] Se P. Africano discipulum ac militem. [pro Balb. 20; Val. Max. viii. 15.] Populus Romanus non alium repellendis tantis hostibus magis idoneum, quam Marium esse ratus. [Vell. Pat. ii. 12.] Bis Italiam obsidione ac metu liberavit servitutis. [in Cat. iv. 10.] Omnes socii atque hostes credere, illi aut mentem divinam esse, aut deorum nutu cuncta portendi. [Sallust. Bell. Jug. 93.] Conspicuis felicitatis Arpinum, sive unicum literarum glorioseissimum contemptorem, sive abundantissimum fontem intueri velis. [Val. Max. ii. 2.] Quantum bello optimus tantum pace pessimus; immodicus glorie inextinguibilis, impotens, semperque inquietus. [Vell. Pat. ii. 11.] Cur omnium perditissimus, C. Marius, Q. Catulus, prestantissima dignitate virum, mori potuit jubere?—cur tam felicitate, septimum consul, domi suae senex est mortuus? [De Nat. Deor. iii. 32.]

² Quae pueris aut adolescentulis nobis, ex commentariis nostris inchoata ac rudia exciderunt, vix hac aetate digna, et hoc usu, &c.—De Orat. i. 2; Quintil. i. lii. 6.

³ Eodem tempore, cum princeps academici Atheniensium optimatibus, Mithridatice fugisset, Romamque venisset, totum ei in Brut. 430.

⁴ Eodem anno Moloni dedimus operam.—
⁵ Zeno quidem ille, a quo disciplina Stoica demonstrare solebat, quid inter has artes in cum compresserat digitos, pugnumque fecerit alebat ejusmodi esse; cum autem diluxisset, palmas illius similem eloquentis.—Orator. 259. edit. Lamt.

⁶ Brut. pp. 397, 433.

him from Athens the famous library of Apellicon, the Pinax, in which were the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, that were hardly known before in Italy, &c. to be found indeed entire anywhere else". He wrote a letter at the same time to the senate, setting forth his great services, and the ingratitude with which he had been treated; and acquainting them, that he was coming to do justice to the republic and to himself upon the authors of those wrongs. This raised great terrors in the city, which, having lately felt the horrible effects of Marius's entry, expected to see the same tragedy acted over again by Sylla.

But while his enemies were busy in gathering forces to oppose him, Cinna, the chief of them, was killed in a mutiny of his own soldiers. Upon this Sylla hastened his march, to take the benefit of that disturbance, and landed at Brundisium with about thirty thousand men. Hither many of the nobles presently resorted to him, and among them young Pompey, about twenty-three years old, who, without any public character or commission, brought along with him three legions which he had raised by his own credit out of the veterans who had served under his father. He was kindly received by Sylla, to whom he did great service in the progress of the war, and was ever after much favoured and employed by him¹.

Sylla now carried all before him: he defeated one of the consuls, Norbanus, and by the pretence of a treaty with the other consul, Scipio, found means to corrupt his army, and draw it over to himself: he gave Scipio however his life, who went into a voluntary exile at Marseilles². The new consuls chosen, in the mean time, at Rome were Cn. Papirius Carbo and young Marius; the first of whom, after several defeats, was driven out of Italy, and the second besieged in Praeneste; when being reduced to extremity, and despairing of relief, he wrote to Damasippus, then praetor of the city, to call a meeting of the senators, as if upon business of importance, and put the principal of them to the sword. In this massacre many of the nobles perished, and old Scævola, the high-priest, the pattern of ancient temperance and prudence, as Cicero calls him, was slain before the altar of Vesta³: after which sacrifice of noble blood to the names of his father, young Marius put an end to his own life.

Pompey at the same time pursued Carbo into Italy; and having taken him at Lilybeum, sent his head to Sylla, though he begged his life in an obsequious manner at his feet: this drew some reproach upon Pompey, for killing a man to whom he had been highly obliged on an occasion where his father's honour and his own fortunes were attacked. But this is the constant effect of factions in states, to make men prefer the interests of a party, to all the considerations either of private or public duty; and it is not strange, that Pompey, young and ambitious, should pay more regard to the power of Sylla, than to a scruple of honour or gratitude⁴. Cicero, however, says of this Carbo, that there never was a worse citizen, or more wicked man⁵: which will go a great way towards excusing Pompey's act.

Sylla having subdued all who were in arms against him, was now at leisure to take his full revenge on their friends and adherents; in which, by the detestable method of a proscription, of which he was the first author and inventor, he exercised a more infamous cruelty than had ever been practised in cold blood in that, or perhaps in any other city⁶. The proscription was not confined to Rome, but carried through all the towns of Italy; where, besides the crime of party, which was pardoned to none, it was fatal to be possessed of money, lands, or a pleasant seat; all manner of licence being indulged to an insolent army, of carving for themselves what fortunes they pleased⁷.

In this general destruction of the Marian faction, J. Caesar, then about seventeen years old, had much difficulty to escape with his life: he was nearly allied to old Marius, and had married Cinna's daughter; whom he could not be induced to put away, by all the threats of Sylla, who, considering him for that reason as irreconcilable to his interests, deprived him of his wife's fortune and the priesthood, which he had obtained. Caesar therefore, apprehending still somewhat worse, thought it prudent to retire and conceal himself in the country, where, being discovered accidentally by Sylla's soldiers, he was forced to redeem his head by a very large sum: but the intercession of the vestal virgins, and the authority of his powerful relations, extorted a grant of his life very unwillingly from Sylla, who bade them take notice, that he, for whose safety they were so solicitous, would one day be the ruin of that aristocracy, which he was then establishing with so much pains, for that he saw many Mariuses in one Caesar⁸. The event confirmed Sylla's prediction; for by the experience of these times, young Caesar was instructed both how to form and to execute that scheme, which was the grand purpose of his whole life, of oppressing the liberty of his country.

¹ Sed nobis tacentibus Cn. Carbonis, a quo admodum adolescens de paternis bonis in foro dimissus protectus es, jussu tuo intercepti mors animis hominum observabitur, non sine aliqua reprehensione: quia tam ingrato facto, plus L. Syllae viribus, quam propriis indolenti verendum.—Val. Max. v. 3.

² Hoc vero, qui Lilybei a Pompeio nostro est interfectus, improbor nemo, meo judicio, fuit.—Ep. Fam. ix. 21.

³ Primus ille, et utinam ultimus, exemplum proscriptionis inventi, &c.—Vell. Pat. ii. 28.

N.B.—The manner of proscribing was, to write down the names of those who were doomed to die, and expose them on tables fixed up in the public places of the city, with the promise of a certain reward for the head of each person so proscribed. So that though Marius and Cinna massacred their enemies with the same cruelty in cold blood, yet they did not do it in the way of proscription, nor with the offer of a reward to the murderers.

⁴ Namque uti quisque domum aut villam, postremo aut vas aut vestimentum alienum concupiverat, dabat operam, ut in proscriptionum numero esset.—Neque prius finis jugulandi fuit, quam Sylla omnes suos divites explevit.—Salust. Bell. Cat. c. 51; Plutar. in Syll.

⁵ Scirent eum, quem innotuissimum tanto opere cuperant, quandoque optimatum partibus, quasi secum simul defendissent, exitio futurum; nam Caesari multos Marios inesse. [Sueton. J. Cæs. c. 1; Plutar. in Cæs.] Cinna gener, cujus filium ut repudiaret, nullo modo compelli potuit.—Vell. Pat. ii. 42.

¹ First. Life of Sylla.

² Appian. Bell. Civ. l. i. 397, 399.

³ Sylla cum Scipione inter Calas et Teanum—leges inter et conditiones contulerunt; non tenuit omnino colloquium illud sedem, a vi tamen et periculo abfuit.—Philip. iii. 11.

⁴ Pro Sextio, 3.

⁵ De Nat. Deor. iii. 32.

As soon as the proscriptions were over, and the scene grown a little calm, L. Flaccus, being chosen interrex, declared Sylla dictator for settling the state of the republic without any limitation of time, and ratified whatever he had done, or should do, by a special law, that empowered him to put any citizen to death without hearing or trial^a. This office of dictator, which in early times had oft been of singular service to the republic in cases of difficulty and distress, was now grown odious and suspected, in the present state of its wealth and power, as dangerous to the public liberty, and for that reason had been wholly disused and laid aside for one hundred and twenty years past^b: so that Flaccus's law was the pure effect of force and terror; and though pretended to be made by the people, was utterly detested by them. Sylla, however, being invested by it with absolute authority, made many useful regulations for the better order of the government; and by the plenitude of his power changed in a great measure the whole constitution of it, from a democratical to an aristocratical form, by advancing the prerogative of the senate, and depressing that of the people. He took from the equestrian order the judgment of all causes, which they had enjoyed from the time of the Gracchi, and restored it to the senate; deprived the people of the right of choosing the priests, and replaced it in the colleges of priests: but above all, he abridged the immoderate power of the tribunes, which had been the chief source of all their civil dissensions; for he made them incapable of any other magistracy after the tribunate; restrained the liberty of appealing to them; took from them their capital privilege, of proposing laws to the people; and left them nothing but their negative; or, as Cicero says, the power only of helping, not of hurting, any one^c. But that he might not be suspected of aiming at a perpetual tyranny, and a total subversion of the republic, he suffered the consuls to be chosen in the regular manner, and to govern, as usual, in all the ordinary affairs of the city; whilst he employed himself particularly in reforming the disorders of the state, by putting his new laws in execution; and in distributing the confiscated lands of the adverse party among his legions: so that the republic seemed to be once more settled on a legal basis, and the laws and judicial proceedings began to flourish in the forum. About the same time Molo the Rhodian came again to Rome, to solicit the payment of what was due to his country, for their services in the Mithridatic war; which gave Cicero an opportunity of putting himself a second time under his direction, and perfecting his oratorical talents by the farther instructions of so renowned a master^d: whose abilities and character were so highly revered, that he was the first of all foreigners, who was ever allowed to speak to the senate in Greek without an interpreter^e. Which shows in what vogue the Greek learning, and especially eloquence, flourished at this time in Rome.

^a De Leg. Agrar. con. Rull. li. 2.

^b Cujus honoris usurpatio per annos cxx intermissa—ut apparet populum Romanum usum dictatoris non tam desiderasse, quam timuisse potestatem Imperii, quo priores ad vindicandam maximis periculis rempublicam usi fuerant.—Vell. Pat. li. 28.

^c De Legib. li. 10; It. vid. Plin. Annal. ad A. Urb. G. 2.

^d Brut. p. 434.

Cicero had now run through all discipline, which he lays down as necessary to the complete orator: for, in his treatise on this subject, he gives us his own sentiment of Crassus, on the institution required for a perfect orator; declaring, that no man ought to be admitted to it, without being previously acquainted with everything worth knowing in art or in nature: this is implied in the very name of an orator, inasmuch as it is to speak upon every subject that can be proposed to him; and without the knowledge of what he speaks, he can be the prattle only and impertinence. He had learned the rudiments of grammar from the ablest teachers; gone through the studies of humanity and the polite letters with the poet Archias; been instructed in philosophy by the principal professors of each sect; Phædrius, Philo the Academic, Diodotus, and others, acquired a perfect knowledge of the law from the greatest lawyers, as well as the great orators of Rome, the two Scævolas: all which were but ministerial and preparatory to that, on which his hopes and ambition were placed, the reputation of an orator. He himself, therefore, particularly for this purpose, attended the pleadings of all the speakers of his time; and the daily lectures of the most eminent orators of Greece, and was perpetually composing at home, and declaiming under their direction, and that he might neglect nothing, he employed his leisure in any degree to improve and perfect himself. He spent the intervals of his leisure in the company of the ladies; especially of those who were remarkable for a politeness of language and a fluency of speech. Cicero's fathers had been distinguished by a fluency of their eloquence. While he was at law, therefore, under Scævola the advocate, he frequently conversed with his wife Lælia. In his discourse, he says, was tinged with the elegance of her father Lælius, the politeness of his age^f: he was acquainted likewise with the daughter Mucia, who married the young L. Crassus; and with her grand-daughter Licinia; one of them, the wife of L. Crassus, the other, of young Marius; who all excelled in the delicacy of the Latin tongue, which they communicated to their families, and valued themselves in serving and propagating it to their posterity.

Thus adorned and accomplished, he presented himself to the bar about the age of twenty years. Cicero generally did, raw and ignorant of business, and wanting to be formed by time and experience^g; but finished and qualified to sustain any cause which should be proposed to him. It has been controverted by ancients and moderns, what was the cause in which he was engaged: some give it to P. Quinctius; others, for S. Roscius: of them are in the right; for in his

^e Eum ante omnes exterarum gentium interpretum auditum constat.—Val. Max. li. 1.

^f Ac mea quidem sententia, nemo potest laudem cumulatius oratoris, nisi erit omnium rerum atque artium scientiam consecutus.—li. 2.

^g Legimus epistolas Corneliae, matris auditus est nobis Lælia, Cæli filia, expeperit patris elegantiam tinctam vidimus; et filia ambax, quarum sermo nihil fuit notus, &c.—

Quintius he expressly declares, that he had pleaded other causes before it; and in that for Roscius, says only, that it was the first public or criminal cause, in which he was concerned: and it is reasonable to imagine, that he had tried his strength, and acquired some credit in private causes, before he would venture upon a public one of that importance; agreeably to the advice, which Quintilian gives to his young pleaders¹, whose rules are generally drawn from the practice and example of Cæso.

The cause of P. Quintius was, to defend him from an action of bankruptcy, brought against him by a creditor who, on pretence of his having forfeited his recognizance, and withdrawn himself from justice, had obtained a decree to seize his estate, and expose it to sale. The creditor was one of the public criers who attended the magistrates, and, by his interest among them, was likely to oppress Quintius, and had already gained an advantage against him by the authority of Hortensius, who was his advocate. Cicero entered into the cause, at the earnest desire of the famed comedian, Roscius, whose sister was Quintius's wife²: he endeavoured at first to excuse himself; alleging, that he should not be able to speak a word against Hortensius, any more than the other players could act with any spirit before Roscius; but Roscius would take no excuse, having formed such a judgment of him as to think no man so capable of reporting a desperate cause, against a crafty and powerful adversary.

After he had given a specimen of himself to the city in this, and several other private causes, he undertook the celebrated defence of S. Roscius of Ameria, in his 27th year; the same age, as the learned have observed, in which Demosthenes first began to distinguish himself in Athens; as if in these grainages of the first magnitude that was the proper season of blooming towards maturity. The case of Roscius was this:—His father was killed in the late proscription of Sylla; and his estate, worth about 60,000*l.* sterling, was sold among the confiscated estates of the proscribed, for a trifling sum to L. Cornelius Chrysogonus, a young favourite slave whom Sylla had made free, who, to secure his possession of it, accused the son of the murder of his father, and had provided evidence to convict him; so that the young man was likely to be deprived, not only of his fortune, but, by a more villainous cruelty, of his honour also and his life. All the old advocates refused to defend him, fearing the power of the prosecutor, and the resentment of Sylla; since Roscius's defence would necessarily lead them into many complaints on the times, and the oppressions of the great: but Cicero readily undertook it, as a glorious opportunity of enlisting himself into the service of his country, and giving a public testimony of his principles and zeal for that liberty, to which he had devoted the labours of his life. Roscius was acquitted, to the great honour of Cicero; whose courage and address in defending him was applauded by the whole city; so that from this moment he was looked upon as an advocate of the first class, and equal to the greatest causes³.

Having occasion, in the course of his pleading, to mention that remarkable punishment which their ancestors had contrived for the murder of a parent, of sowing the criminal alive into a sack, and throwing him into the river, he says, that the meaning of it was, to strike him at once as it were out of the system of nature, by taking from him the air, the sun, the water, and the earth; that he, who had destroyed the author of his being, should lose the benefit of those elements, whence all things derive their being. They would not throw him to the beasts, lest the contagion of such wickedness should make the beasts themselves more furious: they would not commit him naked to the stream, lest he should pollute the very sea, which was the purifier of all other pollutions; they left him no share of anything natural, how vile or common soever; for what is so common as breath to the living, earth to the dead, the sea to those who float, the shore to those who are cast up? Yet these wretches live so, as long as they can, as not to draw breath from the air; die so as not to touch the ground; are so tossed by the waves as not to be washed by them; so cast out upon the shore as to find no rest even on the rocks⁴. This passage was received with acclamations of applause; yet, speaking of it afterwards himself, he calls it the redundancy of a juvenile fancy, which wanted the correction of his sounder judgment; and, like all the compositions of young men, was not applauded so much for its own sake, as for the hopes which it gave of his more improved and ripened talents⁵.

The popularity of his cause, and the favour of the audience, gave him such spirits, that he exposed the insolence and villany of the favourite Chrysogonus with great gaiety; and ventured even to mingle several bold strokes at Sylla himself; which he took care, however, to palliate, by observing that, through the multiplicity of Sylla's affairs, who reigned as absolute on earth as Jupiter did in heaven, it was not possible for him to know, and necessary even to connive at, many things which his favourites did against his will⁶. He would not complain, he says, in times like those, that an innocent man's estate was exposed to public sale; for were it allowed to him to speak freely on that head, Roscius was not a person of such consequence that he should make a particular complaint on his account; but he must insist upon it, that by the law of the proscription itself, whether it was Flaccus's the interrex, or Sylla's the dictator, for he knew not which to call it, Roscius's estate was not forfeited, nor liable to be sold⁷. In the conclusion, he puts the judges in mind, that nothing was so much aimed at by the prosecutors in this trial, as, by the condemnation of Roscius, to gain a precedent for destroying the children of the proscribed: he conjures them, therefore, by all the gods, not to be the authors of reviving a second proscription, more barbarous and cruel than the first; that the senate refused to bear any part in the first, lest it should be thought to be authorized by the public

¹ Brut. 433. ² Quintil. xii. 6. ³ Pro Quint. 24.
⁴ Ita loqui homines;—huc patronos propter Chrysogoni causam defuturos,—ipso nomine parricidii et atrocitate crimen facit, ut hic nullo negotio tolleretur, cum a nullo defendatur.—Patronos huc defuturos putaverunt; desunt qui illud dicat, qui cum fide defendat, non deest profecto, patronus.—Pro Roscio Amer. 10, 11.

⁵ Prima causa publica, pro S. Roscio dicta, tantum com-mendationis habuit, ut non ulla esset, quæ non nostro digna patrocinio videretur. Deinceps inde multe.—
Brut. 434. ⁶ Pro Rosc. 26.

⁷ Orat. 258. ed. Lamb. ⁸ Pro Rosc. 46. ⁹ Ibid. 43.

council; that it was their business by this sentence to put a stop to that spirit of cruelty, which then possessed the city, so pernicious to the republic, and so contrary to the temper and character of their ancestors.

As by this defence he acquired a great reputation in his youth, so he reflects upon it with pleasure in old age, and recommends it to his son, as the surest way to true glory and authority in his country, to defend the innocent in distress, especially when they happen to be oppressed by the power of the great; as I have often done, says he, in other causes, but particularly in that of Roscius, against Sylla himself in the height of his power¹. A noble lesson to all advocates, to apply their talents to the protection of innocence and injured virtue; and to make justice, not profit, the rule and end of their labours.

Plutarch says, that presently after this trial Cicero took occasion to travel abroad, on pretence of his health, but in reality to avoid the effects of Sylla's displeasure; but there seems to be no ground for this notion; for Sylla's revenge was now satiated, and his mind wholly bent on restoring the public tranquillity; and it is evident, that Cicero continued a year after this in Rome without any apprehension of danger, engaged, as before, in the same task of pleading causes²; and in one especially, more obnoxious to Sylla's resentment, even than that of Roscius: for in the case of a woman of Arretium, he defended the right of certain towns of Italy to the freedom of Rome, though Sylla himself had deprived them of it by an express law; maintaining it to be one of those natural rights, which no law or power on earth could take from them: in which also he carried his point, in opposition to Cotta, an orator of the first character and abilities, who pleaded against him³.

But we have a clear account from himself of the real motive of his journey: my body, says he, at this time was exceedingly weak and emaciated; my neck long and small; which is a habit thought liable to great risk of life, if engaged in any fatigue or labour of the lungs; and it gave the greater alarm to those who had a regard for me, that I used to speak without any remission or variation, with the utmost stretch of my voice, and great agitation of my body; when my friends, therefore, and physicians, advised me to meddle no more with causes, I resolved to run any hazard, rather than quit the hopes of glory which I proposed to myself from pleading: but when I considered, that by managing my voice, and changing my way of speaking, I might both avoid all danger, and speak with more ease, I took a resolution of travelling into Asia, merely for an opportunity of correcting my manner of speaking: so that after I had been

two years at the bar, and acquired a the forum. I left Rome, &c.⁴

He was twenty-eight years old, when he went upon his travels to Greece for a fashionable tour of all those, who were then for curiosity or improvement: his first stop was at Athens, the capital seat of arts and sciences; some writers tell us that he spent there though in truth it was but six months; his quarters with Antiochus, the philosopher of the old Academy; and under the master renewed, he says, those studies which he had been fond of from his earliest youth; he met with his school-fellow T. Porcius Cato from his love to Athens, and his spare part of his days in it, obtained the name of Atticus⁵; and here they revived that memorable friendship which subsisted between them through life with so celebrate and affection. Atticus, being an Epicurean, often drawing Cicero from his host the conversation of Phædrus and the chief professors of that sect, in hopes to convert him; on which subject the many disputes between themselves, which were the view in these visits was but to correct more effectually of the weakness of the mind by observing how easily it might be explained even by the ablest teachers; not give himself up so entirely to the study of rhetoric, as to neglect his rhetorical exercises, which he formed still every day very diligently; he was the Syrian, an experienced master of speaking⁶.

It was in this first journey to Athens that he initiated most probably into the Eleusinian mysteries: for, though we have no account yet we cannot fix it better than in a journey taken both for the improvement of the body. The reverence with which he speaks of these mysteries, and the hints that he gives of their end and use, seem to confirm that he was a learned and ingenious writer has delivered that they were contrived to inculcate the doctrine of God, and the immortality of the soul; first, after observing to Atticus, who was of the initiated, how the gods of the heathen were all but deceased mortals; and that he bids him remember of the mysteries, in order to recollect the reality of that truth: and as to the second initiation to be in fact, what he implied, a real beginning of life to him the way, not only of living with greater ease, but of dying also with a better hope⁷.

¹ Brut. 437.

² Eusebii Chron.

³ Pomponius—ita enim se Athenis collocavit ex Attici et id etiam cognomine videtur.—De Fin. v. 2. ⁴ De Fin. l. 5: De Nat.

⁵ Eodem tamen tempore apud Domitium veterem et non ignobilem dicendi magister exerceri solebam.—Brut. 437.

⁶ See Mr. Warburton's Divine Legation.

⁷ Ipse, illi, majorum gentium dei qui habent nobis in oculum profecti reperiuntur—reminebat initiatus, quæ traduntur mysteriis; tum hoc late patent intelligas.—Tusc. Quæst. l. i. Initiatique, ut appellantur, ita revera prius novimus; neque solum cum lætitia vivimus, sed etiam cum spe meliore moriendi.

N. B. These mysteries were celebrated at

¹ Ut nos et sæpe alias et adolescentes, contra L. Sullæ dominantis opes pro S. Roscio Amerino fecimus: quæ, ut scis, extat oratio.—De Offic. ii. 14.

² Prima causa publica pro S. Roscio dicta—deinceps inde multæ—itaque cum eodem biennium versatus in causis.—Brut. pp. 434, 437.

³ Populus Romanus, L. Sulla dictatore ferente, comitiis centuriatis, municipiis civitatem ademit: ademit illam agris: de agris ratum est: fuit enim populi potestas: de civitate ne, tamdiu quidem valuit, quamdiu illa Sullani temporis arma valuerunt.—Atque ego hanc adolescentulus causam cum agerem, contra hominem disertissimum, contradicente Cotta, et Sulla vivo, judicatum est.—Pro Dom. ad Pontif. 33 pro Cæcina, 33.

From Athens he passed into Asia, where he gathered about him all the principal orators of the country, who kept him company through the rest of his voyage; and with whom he constantly exercised himself in every place, where he made any stay. The chief of them, says he, was Menippus of Stratonica, the most eloquent of all the Asiatics; and if to be neither tedious nor impertinent be the characteristic of an Attic orator, he may justly be ranked in that class. Dionysius also of Magnesia, Eucylus of Cnidos, and Zenocles of Adramyttus, were continually with me, who were reckoned the first rhetoricians of Asia. Nor yet content with these, I went to Rhodes, and applied myself again to Molo, whom I had heard before at Rome; who was both an experienced pleader, and a fine writer, and particularly expert in observing the faults of his scholars, as well as in his method of teaching and improving them: his greatest trouble with me was, to restrain the exuberance of a juvenile imagination, always ready to overflow its banks, within its due and proper channel^d.

But as at Athens, where he employed himself chiefly in philosophy, he did not intermit his oratorical studies, so at Rhodes, where his chief study was oratory, he gave some share also of his time to philosophy, with Posidonius, the most esteemed and learned Stoic of that age, whom he often speaks of with honour, not only as his master, but as his friend^e. It was his constant care, that the progress of the year, with solemn shows and a great pomp of machinery, which drew a mighty concourse to them from all countries. L. Crassus, the great orator, happened to come two days after they were over, and would gladly have persuaded the magistrates to renew them; but not being able to prevail, left the city in disgust^f: which shows how cautious they were of making them too cheap, when they witnessed the sight of them out of the proper season, to one of the first senators of Rome. The shows are supposed to have exhibited a representation of Heaven, Hell, Elysium, Purgatory, and all that related to the future state of the dead: being contrived to inculcate more sensibly, and exemplify the doctrines delivered to the initiated: and as they were a proper subject for poetry, so they are frequently alluded to by the ancient Poets. Cicero, in one of his letters to Atticus, begs of him, at the request of Chilius, an eminent poet of that age, to send them a relation of the Eleusinian rites, which were designed probably for an episode or embellishment to some of Chilius's works^g. This confirms also the probability of that ingenious comment, which the same excellent writer has given on the sixth book of the Æneid, where Virgil, as he observes, in describing the descent into hell, is but tracing out in their poetical order the several scenes of the Eleusinian shows^h.

^d Brut. 437.

^e He mentions a story of this Posidonius, which Pompey often used to tell; that after the Mithridatic war, as he was returning from Syria towards Rome, he called at Rhodes, on purpose to hear him; but being informed, on his arrival there, that he was extremely ill of the gout, he had a mind however to see him; and in his visit, when, after the first compliments, he began to express his concern he found him so ill, that he could not have the pleasure to hear him: But you can hear me, replied Posidonius; we shall it be said, that on the account of any bodily pain, I suffered no great a man to come to me in vain; upon which he entered presently into an argument, as he lay of his knowledge should keep pace with the improvement of his eloquence; he considered the one as the foundation of the other, and thought it in vain to acquire ornaments, before he had provided necessary furniture. He declaimed here in Greek, because Molo did not understand Latin; and upon ending his declamation, while the rest of the company were lavish of their praises, Molo, instead of paying any compliment, sat silent a considerable time, till observing Cicero somewhat disturbed at it, he said, "As for you, Cicero, I praise and admire you; but pity the fortune of Greece, to see arts and eloquence, the only ornaments which were left to her, transplanted by you to Romeⁱ." Having thus finished the circuit of his travels, he came back again to Italy, after an excursion of two years, extremely improved, and changed as it were into a new man: the vehemence of his voice and action was moderated; the redundancy of his style and fancy corrected; his lungs strengthened, and his whole constitution confirmed^j.

^f Diutius enim moratus, nisi Atheniensibus, quod ætymum non referret, adque biduo serius veneram, succensum.—De Orat. III. 20.

^g Chilius te rogat, et ego ejus rogatu Έμολογῶντες.—Ad Att. I. 5.

^h See Divine Legation of Moors, p. 182.

This voyage of Cicero seems to be the only scheme and pattern of travelling from which any real benefit is to be expected: he did not stir abroad till he had completed his education at home; for nothing can be more pernicious to a nation, than the necessity of a foreign one; and after he had acquired in his own country whatever was proper to form a worthy citizen and magistrate of Rome, he went, confirmed by a maturity of age and reason against the impressions of vice, not so much to learn, as to polish what he had learned, by visiting those places, where arts and sciences flourished in their greatest perfection. In a tour, the most delightful of the world, he saw everything that could entertain a curious traveller, yet stayed nowhere any longer than his benefit, not his pleasure, detained him. By his previous knowledge of the laws of Rome, he was able to compare them with those of other cities, and to bring back with him whatever he found useful, either to his country or to himself. He was lodged, wherever he came, in the houses of the great and the eminent; not so much for their birth and wealth, as for their virtue, knowledge, and learning; men honoured and revered in their several cities, as the principal patriots, orators and philosophers of the age. These he made the constant companions of his travels, that he might not lose the opportunity, even on the road, of profiting by their advice and experience; and, from such a voyage, it is no wonder that he brought back every accomplishment which could improve and adorn a man of sense.

Pompey returned about this time victorious from Africa, where he had greatly enlarged the bounds upon his bed, and maintained with great eloquence, that nothing was really good, but what was honest: and being all the while in exquisite torture, he often cried out, O pain, thou shalt never gain thy point; for be as vexatious as thou wilt, I will never own thee to be an evil. This was the perfection of Stoical heroism, to defy sense and nature to the last: while another poor Stoic, Dionysius, a scholar of Zeno, the founder of the sect, when by the torture of the stone, he was forced to confess, that what his master had taught him was false, and that he felt pain to be an evil, is treated by all their writers, as a poltroon and base deserter. Which shows, that all their boasted firmness was owing rather to a false notion of honour and reputation, than to any real principle, or conviction of reason.—Nat. Deor. II. 24; De Finib. v. 31.

ⁱ Plutar. Life of Cic.

^j Brut. 438.

of the empire, by the conquest and addition of many new countries to the Roman dominion. He was received with great marks of respect by the dictator Sylla, who went out to meet him at the head of the nobility, and saluted him by the title of Magnus, or the Great, which from that authority was ever after given to him by all people. But his demand of a triumph disgusted both Sylla and the senate, who thought it too ambitious in one who had passed through none of the public offices, nor was of age to be a senator, to aspire to an honour which had never been granted, except to consuls or prætors: but Pompey, insisting on his demand, extorted Sylla's consent, and was the first whose triumphal car is said to have been drawn by elephants, and the only one of the equestrian order who had ever triumphed; which gave an unusual joy to the people, to see a man of their own body obtain so signal an honour; and much more, to see him descend again from it to his old rank and private condition among the knights¹.

While Pompey, by his exploits in war, had acquired the surname of the Great, J. Cæsar, about six years younger, was giving proofs likewise of his military genius, and serving as a volunteer at the siege of Mitylene; a splendid and flourishing city of Lesbos, which had assisted Mithridates in the late war, and perfidiously delivered up to him M. Aquilius, a person of consular dignity, who had been sent ambassador to that king, and after the defeat of the Roman army had taken refuge in Mitylene, as in a place of the greatest security. Mithridates is said to have treated him with the last indignity; carrying him about in triumph, mounted upon an ass, and forcing him to proclaim everywhere aloud, that he was Aquilius, who had been the chief cause of the war. But the town now paid dear for that treachery, being taken by storm, and almost demolished by Q. Thermus; though Pompey restored it afterwards to its former beauty and liberty, at the request of his favourite freedman, Theophanes. In this siege Cæsar obtained the honour of a civic crown; which, though made only of oaken leaves, was esteemed the most reputable badge of martial virtue; and never bestowed, but for saving the life of a citizen, and killing at the same time an enemy¹.

Sylla died while Cicero was at Athens, after he had laid down his dictatorship and restored liberty to the republic, and, with an uncommon greatness of mind, lived many months as a private senator and with perfect security in that city where he had exercised the most bloody tyranny: but nothing was thought to be greater in his character, than that during the three years, in which the Marians were masters of Italy, he seemed his resolution of pursuing them nor neglected the war which he had in his hands; but thought it his duty, first to subdue the foreign enemy, before he took his rest at home with his citizens². His family was noble and illustrious, which yet, through the indolency of his ancestors, had made no figure in the republic for many generations, and was almost sunk into obscurity, when he produced it again into light, by his services and honours of the state. He was a lover of polite letters, having been careful of himself in all the learning of Greece and Rome, but from a peculiar gaiety of temper, and a desire for the company of mimics and jesters, he was drawn, when young, into a life of luxury and dissipation; so that when he was sent to assist in the Jugurthine war, Marius commanded him in so rough and desperate a service, given him so soft and delicate a quarter, whether roused by the example, or reproach, of his general, he behaved himself with the greatest vigour and courage, offering no man to outdo him in any part of duty or labour, making himself equal even to the lowest of the soldiers, and treating them all by his good offices and his kindness, that he soon acquired the favour of the army, and the character of a brave and skilful commander, and lived to drive Marius himself, banished and proscribed, into that very province which had been condemned by him at first as his enemy. He had a wonderful faculty of concealing his passions and purposes, and was so different in different circumstances, that he was as it were to be two men in one: never more mild and moderate before victory, than more bloody and cruel after it³. In the same art, that he had seen Socrates use to Marius, of raising a kind of contempt of danger in his army, by the use of auspices and divine admonitions: for he carried always about with him a statue of Apollo taken from the temple of Ilium, whenever he had resolved to give battle, to embrace it in sight of the soldier, and to receive the speedy confirmation of its promise⁴. From an uninterrupted course

¹ Vix quidquam in Syllæ operibus clarum quam quod, cum per triennium Cinnam partes Italiam obsiderent, neque illatum dissimulavit, nec quod erat in manibus omnis vitæ ante frangendum hostem, quam civem.—Vell. Pat. li. 24.

² Gentile Patriciæ nobilis fuit; familia pristina majorum ignavia: litores Græciæ a juxta atque doctissimo eruditus.—[Sallust. E.] Uæque ad quæstus suæ comitiæ, vitam illi ludicræ artis amore inquinatam perduxit. Q. Marium consulem moleste tulisse traditur, et periculum in Africa bellum gerenti, tam delicose obvenisset, &c. [Val. Max. vi. 9; Sallust. 95.]

³ Ad simulanda negotia altitudo ingenii [Sallust. Bell. Jugurth. 95.] quæ tam diversa, et se contraria, si quis apud animum suum expedit in uno homine Syllas fuisse crediderit. vi. 9.] Ad eo enim Sylla fuit dissimilis bellis ut dum vincit justissimo lenior; post victo fuerit crudelior—ut in eodem homine duplices simul animi conspiceretur exemplum.—Vell. P.

⁴ Quoties prælium committere destinab

¹ Bellum in Africa maximum confecti, victorem exercitum deportavit. Quid vero tam inauditum, quam equitem Romanum triumphare? [Pro Lege Man. 21.] Africa vero tota subacta—Magnique nomine, spolio inde capto, eques Romanus, id quod antea nemo, curru triumphali invec-tus erat. [Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 26.] Romæ primum juncti elephantibus subiere currum Pompei Magni Africano triumpho. [Ib. viii. 2; Plutar. in Pomp.]

² Quid Mitylene? quæ certe vestre, Quirites, belli lege, et victorie jure factæ sunt: urbs et natura et situ, et doctissimæ ædificiorum et pulchritudine, imprimis nobilis. [De Leg. Agrar. li. 16.] A Thermo in expugnatione Mitylenarum corona civica donatus est. [Suet. J. Cæs. 2.] Illic civis coronæ, militum virtutis insignis clarissimum. [Plin. Hist. Nat. xvi. 4; Vell. Pat. li. 18; Appian. Bell. Mithrid. p. 184; Val. Max. ix. 13.]

and prosperity he assumed the surname, unknown before to the Romans, of Felix or the fortunate; and would have been fortunate indeed, says Velleius, if his life had ended with his victories*. Pliny calls it a wicked title, drawn from the blood and oppression of his country; for which posterity would think him more unfortunate, even than those whom he had put to death†. He had one facility, however, peculiar to himself, of being the only man in history, in whom the odium of the most barbarous cruelties was extinguished by the glory of his great acts. Cicero, though he had a good opinion of his cause, yet detested the inhumanity of his victory, and never speaks of him with respect, nor of his government but as a proper tyranny; calling him a master of three most pestilent vices, luxury, avarice, cruelty‡. He was the first of his family, whose dead body was burnt: for having ordered Marius's remains to be taken out of his grave, and thrown into the river Anio, he was apprehensive of the same insult upon his own, if left to the usual way of burial§. A little before his death, he made his own epitaph, the sum of which was, that no man had ever gone beyond him, in doing good to his friends, or hurt to his enemies¶.

As soon as Sylla was dead, the old dissensions, that had been smothered awhile by the terror of his power, burst out again into a flame between the two factions, supported severally by the two consuls, Q. Catulus and M. Lepidus, who were wholly opposite to each other in party and politics. Lepidus resolved at all adventures to rescind the acts of Sylla, and recall the exiled Marians; and began openly to solicit the people to support him in that resolution: but his attempt, though plausible, was factious and unseasonable, tending to overturn the present settlement of the republic, which, after its late wounds and loss of civil blood, wanted nothing so much as rest and quiet to recover a tolerable degree of strength. Catulus's father, the ablest statesman of his time, and the chief ancestor of the aristocratical interest, had been condemned to die by Marius: the son, therefore, who inherited his virtues, as well as principles, and was confirmed in them by a resentment of that injury, vigorously opposed and effectually disappointed all the designs of his colleague; who, finding himself unable to gain his end without recurring to arms, retired to his government of Gaul, with intent to raise a force sufficient to subdue all opposition; where the fame of his levies and military preparations gave such umbrage to the senate, that they soon abrogated his command. Upon this he came forward into Italy at the head of a great army, and having possessed himself of Etruria without opposition, marched in a hostile manner towards the city, to the demand of a second consulship. He had with him several of the chief magistrates, and the good wishes of all the tribunes, and hoped by the authority of the Marian cause, which was always favoured by the populace, to advance himself into Sylla's place, and usurp the sovereign power of Rome. Catulus in the mean time, upon the expiration of his office, was invested with proconsular authority, and charged with the defence of the government; and Pompey also, by a decree of the senate, was joined with him in the same commission; who, having united their forces before Lepidus could reach the city, came to an engagement with him near the Milvian bridge, within a mile or two from the walls, where they totally routed and dispersed his whole army. But Cisalpine Gaul being still in the possession of his lieutenant, M. Brutus, the father of him who afterwards killed Cæsar, Pompey marched forward to reduce that province: where Brutus, after sustaining a siege in Modena, surrendered himself into his hands; but being conducted, as he desired, by a guard of horse to a certain village upon the Po, he was there killed by Pompey's orders. This act was censured as cruel and unjust, and Pompey generally blamed for killing a man of the first quality, who had surrendered himself voluntarily and on the condition of his life: but he acted probably by the advice of Catulus, in laying hold of the pretext of Brutus's treason, to destroy a man who, from his rank and authority, might have been a dangerous head to the Marian party, and capable of disturbing that aristocracy which Sylla had established, and which the senate and all the better sort were very desirous to maintain. Lepidus escaped into Sardinia, where he died soon after of grief to see his hopes and fortunes so miserably blasted: and thus ended the civil war of Lepidus, as the Roman writers call it, which, though but short-lived, was thought considerable enough by Sallust to be made the subject of a distinct history, of which several fragments are still remaining¶.

As Cicero was returning from his travels towards Rome, full of hopes and aspiring thoughts, his ambition was checked, as Plutarch tells us, by the Delphic oracle; for, upon consulting Apollo by what means he might arrive at the height of glory, he was answered, by making his own genius, and not the opinion of the people, the guide of his life; upon which he carried himself after his return with great caution, and was very shy of pre-

Apollo signum Delphis sublatum, in conspectu militum complexus, orabat, uti promissa maturaret.—Val. Max. i. 1. De Div. l. 33.

* Quod quidem usurparet justissime, si eundem et vincedi et vivendi finem habuisset.—Vell. Pat. ii. 27.

† Tunc hominum ad hoc avi Felicitis sibi cognomen accepit—civilis nempe sanguine, ac patriæ oppugnatione oppressus, &c.—Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 43.

‡ Qui trium pestiferorum vitiorum, luxurie, avaritiæ, crudelitatis, magister fuit.—De Fin. iii. 25; De Offic. ii. 8.

§ Quod hæc ædo an timens suo corpori, primus e patriis cineribus igne voluit cremari.—De Leg. ii. 22; Val. Max. ix. 2.

¶ Plutarch. in Sylla.

The following vetere inscription was found in Italy, in the year 1723, near Cicero's Arpinum, between Atina and Terracina, which had been dedicated probably by Sylla, about the time of his assuming the surname of Felix, soon after the first success and defeat of the chiefs, who were in arms against him at burning:—

IOVI
QUOD PERICVLVM
FELICITER EVASERIT
L. SVLLA
V. S. LA.

¶ M. Lepido, Q. Catulo consulibus, civile bellum pene citius oppressum est quam inciperet—fax illius motus ab ipso Syllæ rogo exarsit. Cupidus namque rerum novarum per insolentiam Lepidus, acta tanti viri rescindere parabat, nec immerito, si tamen posset sine magna clade reipublicæ, &c.—Flor. iii. 27; Plutar. in Pomp.; Appian. i. 416; Sallust. Fragment. Hist. l. 1; Val. Max. vi. 2; Pigh. Annal. A. U. 676.

tending to public honours. But though the rule be very good, yet Cicero was certainly too wise, and had spent too much of his time with philosophers, to fetch it from an oracle which, according to his own account, had been in the utmost contempt for many ages, and was considered by all men of sense as a mere imposture^a. But if he really went to Delphi, of which we have not the least hint in any of his writings, we must impute it to the same motive that draws so many travellers at this day to the Holy House of Loretto; the curiosity of seeing a place so celebrated through the world for its sanctity and riches. After his return, however, he was so far from observing that caution which Plutarch speaks of, that he freely and forwardly resumed his former employment of pleading; and after one year more spent at the bar, obtained in the next the dignity of Quæstor.

Among the causes which he pleaded before his quæstorship was that of the famous comedian Roscius, whom a singular merit in his art had recommended to the familiarity and friendship of the greatest men in Rome^b. The cause was this: One Fannius had made over to Roscius a young slave, to be formed by him to the stage, on condition of a partnership in the profits, which the slave should acquire by acting. The slave was afterwards killed, and Roscius prosecuted the murderer for damages, and obtained, by a composition, a little farm worth about eight hundred pounds, for his particular share. Fannius also sued separately, and was supposed to have gained as much; but pretending to have recovered nothing, sued Roscius for the moiety of what he had received. One cannot but observe from Cicero's pleading the wonderful esteem and reputation in which Roscius then flourished, of whom he draws a very amiable picture.—Has Roscius then, says he, defrauded his partner? Can such a stain stick upon such a man? who, I speak it with confidence, has more integrity than skill, more veracity than experience: whom the people of Rome know to be a better man than he is an actor; and while he makes the first figure on the stage for his art, is worthy of the senate for his virtue^c. In another place he says of him, that he was such an artist, as to seem the only one fit to come upon the stage; yet such a man, as to seem the only one unfit to come upon it at all^d: and that his action was so perfect and admirable, that when a man excelled in any other profession, it was grown into a proverb to call him a Roscius^e. His daily pay for acting is said to have been about thirty pounds sterling^f. Pliny computes his yearly profit at four thousand pounds^g; but Cicero it at five thousand. He was generous and a contemner of money; and a raised an ample fortune from the stipends to the public for many years pay: whence Cicero urges it as incredible who in ten years past might honestly fifty thousand pounds, which he refused to commit a fraud for the four hundred^h.

At the time of Cicero's return from his quæstorship, he reigned in the forum two orators of no great authority, Cotta and Hortensius, who inflamed him with an emulation of Cotta's way of speaking was calm and with great elegance and propriety of diction, sprightly, elevated, and supported by his words and action; who being only thirty years older, than him in his own taste and manner, was considered by him more particularly as his pattern, rather, in gloryⁱ. The business of pleading was a profession of all others the most liberal, and was not mercenary, nor undertaken for it was illegal to take money, or to be present for it: but the richest, the noblest of Rome freely offered their services to the citizens, as the coadjutors and protectors of the innocent. This was a constitution as old as Rome, assigned the patronage of the people to the consuls or senators, without fee or reward, succeeding ages, when, through the ambition of the nobles, it was become a custom for the nobles to make annual presents to their patrons, the body of the citizens was made tributary to the senate, M. Cincius, a tribune, passed a law, prohibiting all senators to accept of gifts on any account, and especially of presents. In the contest about this law, Cincius mentions a smart reply made by the tribune Cento, one of the orators who opposed Cincius asked him with some scorn, What little Cincius, that you are making about? Cincius replied, That you, Caius, for what you use^j. We must not imagine that this generosity of the great was interested, or without any expectation of reward, brought the noblest which a liberal mind

^a H.S. quingenta annua mercede prodatur Nat. vii. 39.

^b Decem his annis proximis H.S. sexagies consequi potuit: noluit.—Pro Roscio, 8.

^c Duo tum excollebant oratores, qui me puditate incitarent, Cotta et Hortensius, &c.

^d Diserti igitur homines, et facile laborant patris est moribus, multorum causas et in gratuito defendentibus, beneficia et patrocinia De Offic. ii. 19.

^e Quid legem Cincium de donis et muneribus vigetis jam et stipendiaria plebs esse Sens [Liv. xxxiv. 4.] Consurant Patres legem flagitant, qua caveretur antiquitus, ne qui orandum pecuniam donumve acciperet. [Tac. 5.] M. Cincius, quo die legem de donis et muneribus C. Cento prodidisset, et satis contumelice Cincio? quæsiisset: Ut emas, inquit, Caius.—Cic. de Orat. ii. 71.

This Cincian law was made in the year 60 and recommended to the people, as Cicero tells Fabius Maximus, in the extremity of his age 4.—Vid. Pigh. Annal. tom. ii. p. 218.

^f Pyrrhi temporibus jam Apollo versus facere desiderat—our isto modo jam oracula non eduntur, non modo nostra estate, sed jam diu, ut modo nihil possit esse contemptum? Quomodo autem ista vis evanuit? an postquam homines minus creduli esse coeperunt?—De Div. ii. 56, 57.

^g Nec vulgi tantum favorem, verum etiam principum familiaritates amplexus est.—Val. Max. viii. 7.

^h Quam populus Romanus meliorem virum, quam histrionem esse arbitratur; qui ita dignissimus est scena, propter artificium; ut dignissimus sit curiæ, propter absentiam.—Pro Q. Roscio, 6.

ⁱ Pro Quinct. 25.

^j Ut in quo quisque artificio excelleret, is in suo genere Roscius diceretur.—De Orat. i. 28.

^k Ut mercedem diurnam de publico mille denarios solus acciperet.—Macrob. Saturn. ii. 10.

cive, the fruit of praise and honour from the public voice of their country: it was the proper instrument of their ambition, and the sure means of advancing them to the first dignities of the state: they gave their labours to the people, and the people repaid them with the honours and preferments which they had the power to bestow: this was a wise and happy constitution, where, by a necessary connexion between virtue and honour, they served mutually to produce and perpetuate each other; where the reward of honours excited merit, and merit never failed to procure honours; the only policy which can make a nation great and prosperous.

Thus the three orators just mentioned, according to the custom and constitution of Rome, were all severally employed this summer in suing for the different offices, to which their different age and rank gave them a right to pretend; Cotta for the consulship, Hortensius the sedileship, Cicero the questorship; in which they all succeeded: and Cicero especially had the honour to be chosen the first of all his competitors by the unanimous suffrage of the tribes; and in the first year in which he was capable of it by law, the thirty-first of his age.¹

The questors were the general receivers or treasurers of the republic; whose number had been gradually enlarged with the bounds and revenues of the empire from two to twenty, as it now stood from the last regulation of Sylla. They were sent usually into the several provinces, one with every provincial governor, to whom they were the next in authority, and had the proper equipage of magistrates, the lictors carrying the fasces before them; which was not, however, allowed to them at Rome. Besides the care of the revenues, it was their business also to provide corn and all sorts of provisions for the use of the armies abroad and the public consumption at home.

This was the first step in the legal ascent and gradation of public honours, which gave an immediate right to the senate, and after the expiration of the office, an actual admission into it during life: and though, strictly speaking, none were held to be complete senators, till they were enrolled at the next lustrum in the list of the censors; yet that was only a matter of form, and what could not be denied to them, unless for the charge and notoriety of some crime, for which every other senator was equally liable to be degraded. These questors, therefore, chosen annually by the people, were the regular and ordinary supply of the vacancies of the senate, which consisted at this time of about five hundred: by which excellent institution the way to the highest order of the state was laid open to the virtue and industry of every private citizen; and the dignity of this sovereign council maintained by a succession of members, whose distinguished merit had first recommended them to the notice and favour of their country.¹

¹ Ne cum questorem in primis cunctis suffragiis populi Romanus faceret.—In Pla. 1: Brut. 440.

² Questura, primus gradus honoris [in Verr. Act. 1. 4.] Populi Romanus, cuius honoribus in amplissimo consilio, et in altissimo gradu dignitatis, atque in hac omnium honorum are collocati sumus. [Post. red. ad Sen. 1.] Ita magistratus censes creaverunt, ut concillium senatus populi propearent sempiternum; deligerentur enim in id concillium ab universo populo, aditusque in hunc concilium ordinem omnium civium industriae ac virtuti parerent.—Pro Sex. 65.

The consuls of this year were Cn. Octavius and C. Scribonius Curio; the first was Cicero's particular friend, a person of singular humanity and benevolence, but cruelly afflicted with the gout, whom Cicero therefore urges as an example against the Epicureans, to show that a life supported by innocence could not be made miserable by pain². The second was a professed orator, or pleader at the bar, where he sustained some credit, without any other accomplishment of art or nature, than a certain purity and splendour of language, derived from the institution of a father who was esteemed for his eloquence: his action was vehement, with so absurd a manner of waving his body from one side to the other, as to give occasion to a jest upon him, that he had learnt to speak in a boat. They were both of them, however, good magistrates; such as the present state of the republic required, firm to the interests of the senate, and the late establishment made by Sylla, which the tribunes were labouring by all their arts to overthrow. These consuls, therefore, were called before the people by Scinius, a bold and factious tribune, to declare their opinion about the revocation of Sylla's acts, and the restoration of the tribunician power, which was now the only question that engaged the zeal and attention of the city: Curio spoke much against it with his usual vehemence and agitation of body; while Octavius sat by, crippled with the gout, and wrapt up in plasters and ointments: when Curio had done, the tribune, a man of a humorous wit, told Octavius, that he could never make amends to his colleague for the service of that day; for if he had not taken such pains to beat away the flies, they would certainly have devoured him³. But while Scinius was pursuing his seditious practices, and using all endeavours to excite the people to some violence against the senate, he was killed by the management of Curio, in a tumult of his own raising⁴.

We have no account of the precise time of Cicero's marriage; which was celebrated most probably in the end of the preceding year, immediately after his return to Rome, when he was about

This account of the manner of filling up the senate is confirmed by many other passages of Cicero's works: for example; when Cicero was elected sedile, the next superior magistrate to the questor, and before his entrance into that office, he took a journey into Sicily to collect evidence against Verres; in the account of which voyage he says, that he went at his own charges, though a senator, into that province, where he had before been questor. [In Verr. 1. 6.] Again; when the government of Cilicia was allotted to him, he begged of young Curio, as he did of all his friends in the senate, not to suffer it to be prolonged to him beyond the year. In his absence, Curio, who before had been only questor, was elected tribune; upon which Cicero, in a congratulatory letter to him on that promotion, taking occasion to renew his former request, says, that he asked it of him before, as of a senator of the noblest birth, and a youth of the greatest interest; but now of a tribune of the people, who had the power to grant him what he asked.—Ep. Fam. 11. 7.

² De Finib. 11. 28.

³ Curio copula nonnulla verborum, nullo alio bono, tenuit oratorum locum. [Brut. 350; it. 323.] Motus erat is, quem C. Julius in perpetuum notavit, cum ex eo, in utramque partem toto corpore vacillante, quæsit, quis loqueretur e litro—Nunquam, inquit, Octavi, collegæ tuo gratiam referes: qui nidi se suo more jactavisset, hodie te istio musce comedissent.—Ibid. 324.

⁴ Vide Ballut. Fragm. Hist. 1. 3. Orat. Maori; Pigh. Ann. 677.

thirty years old : it cannot be placed later, because his daughter was married the year before his consulship, at the age only of thirteen ; though we suppose her to be born this year on the fifth of August, which is mentioned to be her birthday^a. Nor is there any thing certain delivered of the family and condition of his wife Terentia ; yet from her name, her great fortune, and her sister Fabia's being one of the vestal virgins^b, we may conclude that she was nobly descended. This year, therefore, was particularly fortunate to him, as it brought an increase not only of issue, but of dignity into his family, by raising it from the equestrian to the senatorian rank ; and by this early taste of popular favour, gave him a sure presage of his future advancement to the superior honours of the republic.

SECTION II.

THE provinces of the questores being distributed to them always by lot, the island of Sicily happened to fall to Cicero's share^c. This was the first country which, after the reduction of Italy, became a prey to the power of Rome^d, and was then thought considerable enough to be divided into two provinces of Lilybeum and Syracuse ; the former of which was allotted to Cicero : for though they were both united at this time under one prætor or supreme governor, S. Peduceus, yet they continued still to have each of them a distinct questor^e. He received this office not as a gift, but a trust ; and considered it, he says, as a public theatre, in which the eyes of the world were turned upon him ; and that he might act his part with the greater credit, resolved to devote his whole attention to it ; and to deny himself every pleasure, every gratification of his appetites, even the most innocent and natural, which could obstruct the laudable discharge of it^f.

Sicily was usually called the granary of the republic^g ; and the questor's chief employment in it was to supply corn and provisions for the use of the city : but there happening to be a peculiar scarcity this year at Rome, it made the people very clamorous, and gave the tribunes an opportunity of inflaming them the more easily, by charging it to the loss of the tribunician power, and their being left a prey by that means to the oppressions of the great^h. It was necessary therefore to the public quiet, to send out large and speedy supplies from Sicily, by which the island was like to be drained ; so that Cicero had a difficult task to furnish what was sufficient for the demands of the city, without being grievous at the same time to the poor natives :

^a Nonis Sextil.—Ad Att. iv. 1.

^b Ascon. Orat. in Tog. Cand.

^c Me questorem Siciliensium excoepit annua.—Brut. 440.

^d Prima omnium, id quod ornamentum imperii est, provincia est appellata.—In Verr. II. 1.

^e Questores utriusque provincie, qui isto prætore fuerunt.—Ib. 4.

^f Ita questor sum factus, ut mihi honorem illum non solum datum, sed etiam creditum, ut me questuramque meam quasi in aliquo terrarum orbis theatro versari existimarem ; ut omnia semper, quæ jucunda videntur esse, non modo his extraordinariis cupiditatibus, sed etiam ipsi nature ac necessitati denegarem.—In Verr. v. 14.

^g Ille M. Cato sapiens, ocellam penariam reipublicæ, nutrilem plebis Romanæ, Siciliam nominavit.—Ib. II. 2.

^h Vid. Orat. Cotta in fragment. Sallust.

yet he managed the matter with so much address, that he made very great without any burthen upon the province great courtesy all the while to the debtors to the merchants, generosity to the humanity to the allies ; and in such manner of good offices to everybody he gained the love and admiration of all, who decreed greater honours to his departure, than they had ever decreed any of their chief governors^a. During his absence in the country, several young men of quality, who served in the army, having some great disorder and offence against discipline, ran away to Rome for fear of where being seized by the magistratus sent back to be tried before the prætor, but Cicero undertook their defence, for them so well, that he got them all acquitted, and by that means obliged many families of the city.

In the hours of leisure from his public employments he employed himself very diligently, to do at Rome, in his rhetorical studies, the rule which he constantly inculcated, let one day pass without some excellent kind : so that on his return from Sicily his talents were, according to his own trial, in their full perfection and maturity^b. Cicero himself, famous of old for his school, might afford a particular invitation to all of those studies : for the Sicilians, being a sharp and litigious people ; the expulsion of their tyrants, having many varieties among themselves about private rights, required much pleading, were the first rules and taught an art of speaking, Cicero and Tysias were the first professors : above all others, owes its birth to him, never flourish but in a free air^c.

Before he left Sicily he made the tour to see every thing in it that was especially the city of Syracuse, which made the principal figure in its history : first request to the magistrates, who him the curiosities of the place, was the tomb of Archimedes, whose name he did much honour to it ; but to his surprise that they knew nothing at all of the even denied that there was any such thing : yet as he was assured of it beyond the concurrent testimony of writers, he bared the verses inscribed, and that sphere with a cylinder engraved on it, he would not be dissuaded from searching it out. When they had

^a Frumentum in summa caritate maxime miseram : negotiatoribus comia, mercatorum nicipibus liberalis, sociis abstinentia, omni in omni officio diligentissimus : excoegitati Siculis honores in me inauditi.—Pro Plancio

^b Plutarch's Life of Cicero.

^c Jam videbatur illud in me, quicquid fœdum, et habere maturitatem quandam suam.

^d Cum sublatis in Sicilia tyrannis res intervallo judicii repeterentur, tum primis acuta illa gens et controversa natura, artibus Cicero et Tysiam conscripserunt. [una res in omni libero populo, maxime tranquillique civitatibus semper servit, minata est.—De Orat. I. 2.]

near to the gate, where the greatest number of their old sepulchres stood, he observed, in a spot overgrown with shrubs and briars, a small column, which had just appeared above the bushes, with the figure of a sphere and cylinder upon it; this, he immediately told the company, was the thing that they were looking for; and sending in some men to clear the ground of the brambles and rubbish, he found the inscription also which he expected, though the latter part of all the verses was effaced. This, says he, one of the noblest cities of Greece, and that likewise the most learned, had known nothing of the monument of its most deserving and inglorious citizen, if it had not been discovered to them by a native of Arpinum¹. At the expiration of this year he took leave of the Sicilians by a kind and affectionate speech, assuring them of his protection in all their affairs at Rome; in which he was as good as his word, and continued ever after their constant patron, to the great benefit and advantage of the province.

He came away extremely pleased with the success of his administration; and flattering himself that all Rome was celebrating his praises, and that the people would readily grant him everything that he desired; in which imagination he landed at Puteoli, a considerable port adjoining to Baize, the chief seat of pleasure in Italy, where there was a perpetual resort of all the rich and the great, as well for the delights of its situation, as the use of its baths and hot waters. But here, as he himself pleasantly tells the story, he was not a little mortified by the first friend whom he met, who asked him, how long he had left Rome, and what news there? When he answered, that he came from the provinces, "From Africa, I suppose," says another; and, upon his reply, with some indignation, "No, I come from Sicily," added who stood by, and had a mind to be thought clever, said presently, "How I did you not know that Cicero was questor of Syracuse?" Upon which, perceiving it in vain to be angry, he fell into the humor of the place, and made himself one of the company who came to the waters. This mortification gave some little check to his ambition, or taught him rather how to apply it more successfully; and did him more good, he says, than if he had received all the compliments that he expected; for it made him reflect, that the people of Rome had dull ears, but quick eyes; and that it was his business to keep himself always in their sight; nor to be so solicitous how to make them hear of him, as to make them see him: so that from this moment he resolved to abstain from the forum, and to live perpetually in the view of the city; nor to suffer either his porter or his sleep to hinder any man's access to him².

At his return to Rome, he found the consul, L. Lepidus, employing all his power to repel the attempts of a turbulent tribune, L. Quinctius, who had a manner of speaking peculiarly adapted to inflame the multitude, and was perpetually exerting it, to persuade them to reverse Sylla's acts³. These acts were odious to all who affected popularity, especially to the tribunes, who could not brook, with impunity, the diminution of their ancient power; yet all prudent men were desirous to support them, as the best foundation of a lasting peace and firm settlement of the republic. The tribune Sicinius made the first attack upon them soon after Sylla's death, but lost his life in the quarrel; which, instead of quenching, added fuel to the flame; so that C. Cotta, one of the next consuls, a man of moderate principles and obnoxious to neither party, made it his business to mitigate these heats, by mediating between the senate and the tribunes, and remitting a part of the restraint that Sylla had laid upon them, so far as to restore them to a capacity of holding the superior magistracies. But a partial restitution could not satisfy them; they were as clamorous still as ever, and thought it a treachery to be quiet, till they had recovered their whole rights: for which purpose, Quinctius was now imitating his predecessor Sicinius, and exciting the populace to do themselves justice against their oppressors, nor suffer their power and liberties to be extorted from them by the nobles. But the vigour of Lucullus prevented him from gaining any farther advantage, or making any impression this year to the disturbance of the public peace⁴.

C. Verres, of whom we shall have occasion to say more hereafter, was now also prætor of the city, or the supreme administrator of justice; whose decrees were not restrained to the strict letter of the law, but formed usually upon the principles of common equity; which, while it gives a greater liberty of doing what is right, gives a greater latitude withal of doing wrong; and the power was never in worse hands, or more corruptly administered, than by Verres: for there was not a man in Italy, says Cicero, who had a law-suit at Rome, but knew, that the rights and properties of the Roman people were determined by the will and pleasure of his whore⁵.

There was a very extraordinary commission granted this year to M. Antonius, the father of the triumvir; the inspection and command of all the coasts of the Mediterranean: a boundless power, as Cicero calls it⁶, which gave him an opportunity of plundering the provinces, and committing all kinds of outrage on the allies. He invaded Crete without any declaration of war, on purpose to enslave it; and with such an assurance of victory, that he carried more fetters with him than arms⁷. But he met with the fate that he deserved: for the Cretans totally routed him in a naval engagement, and returned triumphant into their ports, with the bodies of their enemies hanging on their masts. Antonius died soon after this disgrace, infamous in his character, nor in any respect a better man, says Asconius, than his son⁸. But Metellus made

¹ Nisi forte C. Cotta, ex factione media consul, aliter quam metu Julia quedam tribunis plebis restituit; et quanquam L. Sicinius primus de potestate tribunicia loqui ausus, musitantibus vobis circumventus erat.—Lucullus superiore anno quantis animis leri in L. Quinctium, vidistis.—Vide Sallust. Hist. Fragment. l. 3. Orat. Macri Licinii; Plut. in Lucull.

² Ut nemo tam rusticus homo, Romam ex illo municipio vadimonii causa venerit, quia secreti jura omnia prætoris urbani nutu atque arbitrio Chalcedonis meretricule gubernari.—In Verr. v. 13.

³ M. Antonii infinitum illud imperium.—Ib. li. 3.
⁴ Primus invasit insulam M. Antonius, cum ingenti quidem victoria spe atque fiducia, adeo ut plures catenas in navibus, quam arma portaret.—Flor. iii. 7.

⁵ Antonium, cum multa contra sociorum salutem, multa contra utilitatem provinciarum et saceret et cogitaret, in mediis ejus injuriis et cupiditatibus mors oppressit.—In Verr. iii. 91.

¹ See Quest. v. 3.

² Pro Flancio, 36.

³ Nemo cum summa potestate predictis, tum ad infirmos animos multitudinis accommodatus.—Pro Cluent. 2; Plutarch. in Lucull.

the Cretans pay dear for their triumph, by the entire conquest of their country; in which war, as Florus says, if the truth must be told, the Romans were the aggressors; and though they charged the Cretans with favouring Mithridates, yet their real motive was the desire of conquering so noble an island¹.

Mithridates also had now renewed the war against Rome; encouraged to it by the diversion which Sertorius was giving at the same time in Spain to their best troops and ablest generals, Metellus and Pompey: so that Lucullus, who on the expiration of his consulship had the province of Asia allotted to him, obtained with it, of course, the command of this war. But while their arms were thus employed in the different extremities of the empire, an ugly disturbance broke out at home, which, though contemptible enough in its origin, began in a short time to spread terror and consternation through all Italy. It took its rise from a few gladiators, scarce above thirty; at the first, who broke out of their school at Capua, and having seized a quantity of arms, and drawn a number of slaves after them, posted themselves on Mount Vesuvius; here they were presently surrounded by the prætor Clodius Glaber, with a good body of regular troops; but forcing their way through them with sword in hand, they assaulted and took his camp, and made themselves masters of all Campania. From this success their numbers presently increased to the size of a just army of forty thousand fighting men: with which they made head against the Roman legions, and sustained a vigorous war for three years, in the very bowels of Italy; where they defeated several commanders of consular and prætorian rank; and, puffed up with their victories, began to talk of attacking Rome. But M. Crassus the prætor, to whom the war was committed, having gathered about him all the forces which were near home, chastised their insolence, and drove them before him to the extremity of Rhegium, where, for want of vessels to make their escape, the greatest part was destroyed, and among them, their general Spartacus, fighting bravely to the last at the head of his desperate troops². This was called the servile war, for which Crassus had the honour of an ovation; it being thought beneath the dignity of the republic to grant a full triumph for the conquest of slaves: but to bring it as near as possible to a triumph, Crassus procured a special decree of the senate to authorise him to wear the laurel crown, which was the proper ornament of the triumph, as myrtle was of the ovation³.

The Sertorian war happened to be finished also, fortunately near the same time. The author of it, Sertorius, was bred under C. Marius, with whom he had served in all his wars, with a singular reputation, not only of martial virtue, but of justice and clemency: for though he was firm to the Marian party, he always disliked and opposed their cruelty, and advised a more temperate use of their power. After the death of Cinna, he fell into Sylla's hands, along with the consul Scipio, when the army abandoned them: Sylla dismissed him with life, on the account, perhaps, of his known moderation; yet taking him to be an utter cause, he soon after proscribed and the necessity of seeking his safety in tries. After several attempts on the coasts of the Mediterranean, he found in Spain, whither all who fled from Rome resorted to him, of whom he formed a gave laws to the whole province. Her credit and address, he raised a force to sustain a war of eight years against the republic; and to make it a que Rome or Spain should possess the world. Q. Metellus, an old experience was sent against him singly at first, but baffled and circumvented by his super dexterity, that the people of Rome send their favourite Pompey to his as the best troops of the empire. Se tained his ground against them by many engagements, in which he gene equal, often superior, was basely mur vate feast, by the treachery of Perper the next to him in command, was glory, and wanted to usurp his pow was of noble birth, and had been pri where he took up arms with the con verse the acts of Sylla, and recall Marians, and after their defeat carri part of their troops to the support but instead of gaining what he expe torius's death, he ruined the cause, made himself the chief, and put an that was wholly supported by the general; for the revolted provinces mitted; and the army having no com new leader, was easily broken and Perperna himself taken prisoner.

Pompey is celebrated on this oc act of great prudence and generosi Perperna, in hopes of saving his make some important discoveries, a his hands all Sertorius's papers, i several letters from the principal sen pressing him to bring his army int sake of overturning the present g ordered the papers to be burnt w them, and Perperna to be killed him⁴. He knew, that the best way discontents of the city, where fact tually at work to disturb the public ease people of those fears which a c

¹ Sylla et consulens, ut prædiximus, Sertorium, proh quanti mox belli facem! dimisit incolumes.—Vell. Pat. ii. 25. 29.

Jam Africæ, jam Balearibus insulis for missusque in oceanum—tandem Hispaniæ tanto hosti uno imperatore resistere potuit: additus Metello Cn. Pompeius, diu, et ancipiti semper acie attrivere: bello, quam suorum scelere, et insidiis.—Flor. iii. 22.

Illa in tantum Sertorium armis extulit, nium diducari non potuerit, Hispaniæ armis plus esset roboris, et uter populu foret.—Vell. Pat. ii. 90.

A M. Perperna et aliis conjuratis cor est, octavo ducatus sui anno; magnus duos imperatores, Pompeium et Met frequentius victor.—Epit. Liv. 96. Vide et Sertorio et Pomp.; Appian. p. 418.

⁴ Plutarch. in Pomp.; Appian. 423.

² Creticorum bellum, si vera volumus noscere, nos fecimus sola vincendi nobilium insulam cupiditate.—Flor. iii. 7.

³ Vide Flor. iii. 20.

⁴ Plut. in Crass.—Crassus, quid est, quod confecto formidolosissimo bello, coronam illam lauream tibi tantopere decerni volueris?—In Pison. 24.

quilt would suggest, rather than push them to the necessity of seeking their security from a change of sides, and the overthrow of the state^a. As he returned into Italy at the head of his victorious army, he happened to fall in luckily with the remains of those fugitives who, after the destruction of Spartacus, had escaped from Crassus, and were making their way in a body towards the Alps, when he intercepted and entirely cut off to the number of five thousand; and in a letter upon it to the senate, said, that Crassus indeed had defeated the gladiators, but that he had plucked up the war by the roots^b. Cicero, likewise, from a particular dislike to Crassus, affected in his public speeches to give Pompey the honour of finishing this war, declaring, that the very fame of his coming had broken the force of it, and his presence extinguished it^c.

For this victory in Spain, Pompey obtained a second triumph, while he was still only a private citizen, and of the equestrian rank: but the next day he took possession of the consulship, to which he had been elected in his absence; and, as if he had been born to command, made his first entry into the senate in the proper post to preside in it. He was not yet full thirty-six years old, but the senate, by a decree, dispensed with the incapacity of age and absence; and qualified him to hold the highest magistracy, before he was capable by law of pretending even to the lowest; and, by his authority, M. Crassus was elected also for his colleague^d.

Crassus's father and elder brother lost their lives in the massacres of Marius and Cinna; but he himself escaped into Spain, and lay there concealed till Sylla's return to Italy, whither he presently resorted to him, in hopes to revenge the ruin of his fortunes and family on the opposite faction. As he was attached to Sylla's cause both by interest and inclination, so he was much considered in it; and being extremely greedy and rapacious, made use of all his credit to enrich himself by the plunder of the enemy, and the purchase of confiscated estates, which Cicero calls his harvest. By these methods he raised an immense wealth, computed at many millions, gathered from the spoils and calamities of his country. He used to say, that no man could be reckoned rich, who was not able to maintain an army out of his own rents^e. And if the accounts of antiquity be true, the number of his slaves was scarce inferior to that of a full army; which, instead of being a burthen, made one part of his revenue; being all trained to some useful art or profession, which enabled them not only to support themselves, but to bring a share of profit to their master. Among the other trades in his family, he is said to have had above five hundred masons and architects constantly employed in building or repairing the houses of the city^f. He had contracted an early envy to Pompey, for his superior credit both with Sylla and the people; which was still aggravated by Pompey's late attempt to rob him of the honour of ending the servile war: but finding himself wholly unequal to his rival in military fame, he applied himself to the arts of peace and eloquence, in which he obtained the character of a good speaker; and by his easy and familiar address, and a readiness to assist all who wanted either his protection or his money, acquired a great authority in all the public affairs; so that Pompey was glad to embrace and oblige him, by taking him for his partner in the consulship.

Five years were now almost elapsed, since Cicero's election to the quaestorship; which was the proper interval prescribed by law, before he could hold the next office of tribune or ædile; and it was necessary to pass through one of these in his way to the superior dignities: he chose, therefore, to drop the tribunate, as being stripped of its ancient power by the late ordinance of Sylla, and began to make interest for the ædileship, while Hortensius at the same time was suing for the consulship. He had employed all this interval in a close attendance on the forum, and a perpetual course of pleading^g, which greatly advanced his interest in the city; especially when it was observed that he strictly complied with the law, by refusing not only to take fees, but to accept even any presents, in which the generality of patrons were less scrupulous^h. Yet all his orations within this period are lost; of which number were those for M. Tullius and L. Varenus, mentioned by Quintillian and Priscian, as extant in their time.

Some writers tell us, that he improved and perfected his action by the instructions of Roscius and Æsopas; the two most accomplished actors in that, or perhaps in any other age, the one in comedy, the other in tragedyⁱ. He had a great esteem indeed for them both, and admired the uncommon perfection of their art: but though he condescended to treat them as friends, he would have disdained to use them as masters. He had formed himself upon a nobler plan, drawn his rules of action from nature and philosophy, and his practice from the most perfect speakers then living in the world; and declares the theatre to be an improper school for the institution of an orator, as teaching gestures too minute and unmanly, and labouring more about the expression of words, than of things^j; nay, he laughs sometimes at Horten-

^a In tanto civium numero, magna multitudo est eorum, qui propter metum patrie peccatorum suorum consilii, non magis conversionesque reipublice querunt.—Pro Sext. 44.

^b Plut. in Pomp.

^c Quod bellum expectatione Pompeii attentatum atque immittatum est; adventu sublatum et sepultum. [Pro Leg. Manil. 11.]—Qui etiam servitia virtute victorieque dominatus.—Pro Sext. 31.

^d Pompeius hoc quoque triumpho, adhuc Eques Romanus, ante diem quam consulatum iniret, curru urbem introitus est.—Vell. Pat. ii. 30.

^e Quid tam singulare, quam ut ex S. C. legibus solutus, omni iure liber, quam ullum illum magistratum per leges capere liceret? Quid tam incredibile, quam ut totum Eques Romanus S. C. triumpharet?—Pro Leg. Man. ii. Vide Plutarch. in Pomp.

^f Itam Syllani temporis mores.—Parad. vi. 2.

^g Nam ex te audierunt, cum diceres, neminem esse divitem, nisi qui exaratum alere posset suis fructibus.—Ib. 1.

^h Plutarch. in Crass.

ⁱ Cum igitur essem in plurimis causis, et in principibus patris quinquennium fore veratus.—Brut. p. 440.

^j Plutarch. in Cicero.

^k Ibid.

^l Quis negat opus esse oratori in hoc oratorio motu, statuque Roscii gestum?—tamen nemo suaserit studiosis dicendi adolescentibus in gestu dicendo histrionum more elaborare.—De Orat. i. 59; Vide Tusc. Disp. iv. 25.

Omnes autem hos motus subsequi debet gestus; non hic, verba exprimens, scenicus, sed universam rem et sententiam: non demonstratione, sed significatione declarans. laterum inflectione hac fortis ac virilis, non ab scena et histrionibus.—Ib. iii. 59.

sins for an action too foppish and theatrical¹, who used to be rallied on that very account by the other pleaders with the title of the player; so that, in the cause of P. Sylla, Torquatus, a free speaker on the other side, called him, by way of ridicule, Dionysia, an actress of those times, in great request for her dancing². Yet Hortensius himself was so far from borrowing his manner from the stage, that the stage borrowed from him; and the two celebrated actors just mentioned, Roscius and Æsopus, are said to have attended all the trials in which he pleaded, in order to perfect the action of the theatre by that of the forum; which seems indeed to be the more natural method of the two, that they who act in feigned life should take their pattern from the true; not those who represent the true, copy from that which is feigned³. We are told, however, by others, what does not seem wholly improbable, that Cicero used to divert himself sometimes with Roscius, and make it an exercise, or trial of skill between them, which could express the same passion the most variously, the one by words, the other by gestures⁴.

As he had now devoted himself to a life of business and ambition, so he omitted none of the usual arts of recommending himself to popular favour, and facilitating his advancement to the superior honours. He thought it absurd, that when every little artificer knew the name and use of all his tools, a statesman should neglect the knowledge of men, who were the proper instruments with which he was to work: he made it his business therefore to learn the name, the place, and the condition of every eminent citizen; what estate, what friends, what neighbours he had; and could readily point out their several houses, as he travelled through Italy⁵. This knowledge, which is useful in all popular governments, was peculiarly necessary at Rome; where the people, having much to give, expected to be much courted; and where their high spirits and privileges placed them as much above the rank of all other citizens, as the grandeur of the republic exceeded that of all other states; so that every man, who aspired to any public dignity, kept a slave or two in his family, whose sole business it was to learn the names and know the persons of every citizen at sight, so as to be able to whisper them to his master, as he passed through the streets, that he might be ready to salute them all familiarly, and shake hands with them, as his particular acquaintance⁶.

¹ Patamus—Patronum tuum cerviculam jactaturum.—In Verr. iii. 19.

² L. Torquatus, subagresti homo ingenio et infestivo—non jam histrionem illum diceret, sed gesticulariam, Dionysiamque eum notissimam saltatriculam nomine appellaret.—Aul. Gell. i. 8.

³ Genus hoc totum oratores, qui sunt veritatis ipsius actores, reliquerunt; imitatores autem veritatis, histriones, occupaverunt.—At sine dubio in omni re vincit imitationem veritas.—De Orat. iii. 56.

⁴ Satis constat, contendere eum cum ipso histrione solitum, utrum ille sepius eandem sententiam variis gestibus efficeret, an ipse per eloquentiæ copiam sermone diverso pronuntiaret.—Macrob. Saturn. ii. 10.

⁵ Plutarch. in Cic. ⁶ Vide De Petitione Consulatus. xi.

Mercesur servum, qui dicet nomina: levum Qui fodiat latus, et cogat trans pondera dextram Porrigere. Hic multura in Fabia valet, ille Velina: Cullibet hic fascies dabit, &c.—Hos. Epist. i. 6.

Plutarch says, that the use of these was contrary to the laws; and that reason, in suering for the public office employ any of them, but took all that himself⁷. But that notion is fully Cicero, who, in his oration for Mure abeard rigour of Cato's stoical principle inconsistency with common life, from cumstance of his having a nomenclator do you mean," says he, "by keeping ter? The thing itself is a mere cheer your duty to call the citizens by the a shame for your slave to know the yourself.—Why do you not speak he has whispered you? Or, after pered, why do you salute them, as them yourself? Or, when you have election, why do you grow careless: them at all? All this, if examined social life, is right; but if by the philosophy, very wicked⁸." As for whatever pains he is said to have way, it appears from several passages that he constantly had a nomenclator on all public occasions⁹.

He was now in his thirty-seventh year for holding the ædileship, which public preferment that was properly tracy, the quaestorship being an office of trust, without any jurisdiction in the ædiles had¹⁰. These ædiles, as well rior officers, were chosen by the people their tribes; a manner of electing free and popular: in which Cicero ædile, as he was before elected by unanimous suffrage of all the tribes, to all his competitors¹¹.

There were originally but two from the body of the people on pret the tribes of a share of their trouble duty, from which the name itself was to take care of the edifices of the city, the markets, weights, and measures the shows and games, which were put on the festivals of their gods¹². Th wards, taking an opportunity when in good humour, prevailed to have two from their order and of superior rank ædiles, from the arm-chair of ivory sat¹³: but the tribunes presently requested concession, and forced the senate to these new ædiles should be chosen into

⁷ Plutarch. in Cato.

⁸ Pro Murena, 38.

⁹ Ut nemo nullius ordinis homo non fuerit, qui mihi obviam non venerit.—Ad

¹⁰ This will explain what Cicero says at entering upon the consulship, at an age, capable even of the lowest magistracy strictly speaking, the ædileship was the called a magistracy; yet Cicero himself, writers, give the same title also to the quaestorship.

¹¹ Me cum quaestorem in primis, ædilem suffragis populus Romanus faciebat.—In

¹² Dionys. Hal. vi. 411.

¹³ ——— dabit, eripietque curule

Cui volet importunus ebur.—Hos. i.

Signa quoque in sella nossem format

Et totum Numide sculptilem dentis or the patrician or plebeian families⁷. But whatever difference there might be at first between the curule and plebeian ædiles, their province and authority seem in later times to be the same, without any distinction but what was nominal; and the two who were chosen the first, were probably called the curule ædiles, as we find Cicero to be now styled. This magistracy gave a precedence in the senate, or a priority of voting and speaking, next after the consuls and prætors; and was the first that qualified a man to have a picture or statue of himself, and consequently ennobled his family⁸: for it was from the number of these statues of ancestors, who had borne curule offices, that the families of Rome were esteemed the more or less noble.

After Cicero's election to the ædileship, but before his entrance into the office, he undertook the famed prosecution of C. Verres, the late prætor of Sicily, charged with many flagrant acts of injustice, rapine, and cruelty, during his triennial government of that island. And since this was one of the memorable transactions of his life, and for which he is greatly celebrated by antiquity, it will be necessary to give a distinct and particular relation of it.

The public administration was at this time, in every branch of it, most infamously corrupt: the great, exalted by their luxury and vices, made no other use of their governments, than to enrich themselves by the spoils of the foreign provinces: their business was to extort money abroad, that they might purchase offices at home, and to plunder the allies, in order to corrupt the citizens. The oppressed in the meanwhile found it in vain to seek relief at Rome, where there was none who cared either to impeach or to condemn a noble criminal; the decision of all trials being in the hands of men of the same condition, who were usually involved in the same crimes, and openly prostituted their judgment on these occasions for favour or a bribe. This had raised a general discontent through the empire, with a particular disgust to that change made by Sylla, of transferring the right of judicature from the equestrian to the senatorian order, which the people were now impatient to get reversed: the prosecution therefore of Verres was both reasonable and popular, as it was likely to give some check to the oppressions of the nobility, as well as comfort and relief to the distressed subjects.

All the cities of Sicily concurred in the impeachment, excepting Syracuse and Messina; for these two being the most considerable of the province, Verres had taken care to keep up a fair correspondence with them. Syracuse was the place of his residence, and Messina the repository of his plunder, whence he exported it all to Italy: and though he would treat even these on certain occasions very arbitrarily, yet in some flagrant instances of his rapine, that he might ease himself of a part of the booty, he used to oblige them with a share of the spoil⁹: so that partly by fear, and partly by favour, he held them generally at his devotion; and at the expiration of his government, procured ample testimonials from them both in praise of his administration. All the other towns were zealous and active in the prosecution, and, by a common petition to Cicero, implored him to undertake the management of it; to which he consented, out of regard to the relation which he had borne to them as quæstor, and his promise made at parting, of his protection in all their affairs. Verres, on the other hand, was supported by the most powerful families of Rome, the Scipios and the Metelli, and defended by Hortensius, who was the reigning orator at the bar, and usually styled the king of the forum¹⁰; yet the difficulty of the cause, instead of discouraging, did but animate Cicero the more, by the greater glory of the victory.

He had no sooner agreed to undertake it, than an unexpected rival started up, one Q. Cæcilius, a Sicilian by birth, who had been quæstor to Verres; and, by a pretence of personal injuries received from him, and a particular knowledge of his crimes, claimed a preference to Cicero in the task of accusing him, or at least to bear a joint share in it. But this pretended enemy was in reality a secret friend, employed by Verres himself to get the cause into his hands in order to betray it: his pretensions, however, were to be previously decided by a kind of process called divination, on account of its being wholly conjectural, in which the judges, without the help of witnesses, were to divine, as it were, what was fit to be done: but in the first hearing Cicero easily shook off this weak antagonist, rallying his character and pretensions with a great deal of wit and humour, and showing, "that the proper patron of such a cause could not be one who offered himself forwardly, but who was drawn to it unwillingly from the mere sense of his duty; one whom the prosecutors desired, and the criminal dreaded; one qualified by his innocence, as well as experience, to sustain it with credit; and whom the custom of their ancestors pointed out and preferred to it." In this speech, after opening the reasons why, contrary to his former practice, and the rule which he had laid down to himself, of dedicating his labours to the defence of the distressed, he now appeared as an accuser, he adds: "the provinces are utterly undone; the allies and tributaries so miserably oppressed, that they have lost even the hopes of redress, and seek only some comfort in their ruin: those, who would have the trials remain in the hands of the senate, complain, that there are no men of reputation to undertake impeachments, no severity in the judges: the people of Rome, in the meanwhile, though labouring under many other grievances, yet desire nothing so ardently, as the ancient discipline and gravity of trials. For the want of trials, the tribunician power is called for again; for the abuse of trials, a new order of judges is demanded; for the scandalous behaviour of judges, the authority of the censors, hated before as too rigid, is now desired and grown popular. In this license of profligate criminals, in the daily complaints of the Roman people, the infamy of trials, the disgrace of the whole senatorian order, as I thought it the only remedy to these mischiefs, for men of abilities and integrity to undertake the cause

¹⁰ In foro ob eloquentiam rege causarum.—Ascon. Argum. in Divinat.

⁷ Liv. vi. ad fin.

⁸ Antiquiores in senatu sententiam dicende locum—Jus magis ad memoriam, posteritatemque prodendam.—In Verr. v. 14.

⁹ Ergo, inquiet aliquis, donavit populo Syracusano istam novitatem, &c.—In Verr. ii. 18.

¹⁰ Messana tuorum adjutrix acclerum, libidinum testis, pudorem ac furorum receptrix, &c.—In Verr. iii. 8. It. 11.

of the republic and the laws, so I was induced the more readily, out of regard to our common safety, to come to the relief of that part of the administration, which seemed the most to stand in need of it.^c

This previous point being settled in favour of Cicero, a hundred and ten days were granted to him by law for preparing the evidence; in which he was obliged to make a voyage to Sicily, in order to examine witnesses, and collect facts to support the indictment. He was aware, that all Verres's art would be employed to gain time, in hopes to tire out the prosecutors, and allay the heat of the public resentment: so that for the greater dispatch he took along with him his cousin, L. Cicero, to ease him of a part of the trouble, and finished his progress through the island in less than half the time which was allowed to him^d.

In all the journeys of this kind, the prosecutor's charges used to be publicly defrayed by the province, or the cities concerned in the impeachment: but Cicero, to show his contempt of money, and disinterestedness in the cause, resolved to put the island to no charge on his account; and in all the places to which he came, took up his quarters with his particular friends and acquaintance in a private manner, and at his own expense^e.

The Sicilians received him everywhere with all the honours due to his uncommon generosity, and the pains which he was taking in their service: but at Syracuse he met with some little affronts from the influence of the prætor Metellus, who employed all his power to obstruct his inquiries, and discourage the people from giving him information. He was invited however by the magistrates with great respect into their senate, where after he had expostulated with them a little for the gilt statue of Verres, which stood there before his face, and the testimonial which they had sent to Rome in his favour; they excused themselves to him in their speeches, and alleged, that what they had been induced to do on that occasion was the effect of force and fear, obtained by the intrigues of a few, against the general inclination; and to convince him of their sincerity, delivered into his hands the authentic accounts of many robberies and injuries which their own city had suffered from Verres in common with the rest of the province. As soon as Cicero retired, they declared his cousin Lucius the public guest and friend of the city, for having signified the same good will towards them, which Cicero himself had always done; and, by a second decree, revoked the public praises which they had before given to Verres. Here Cicero's old antagonist, Cæcilius, appealed against them to the prætor; which provoked the populace to such a degree, that Cicero could hardly restrain them from doing him violence: the prætor dismissed the senate, and declared their act to be irregular, and would not suffer a copy of it to be given to Cicero; whom he reproached at the same time for betraying the dignity of Rome, by submitting not only to speak in a foreign senate, but language, and to talk Greek among them. But Cicero answered him with such resolution, urging the sanction of the penalty of contemning them, that they were forced at last to let him carry away all and records which he required^f.

But the city of Messina continued the last, and firm to its engagements so that when Cicero came thither no compliments from the magistrates of refreshments or quarters; but was for himself, and to be taken care of by his friends. An indignity, he says, which had been offered before to a senator of there was not a king or city upon earth not proud to invite and accommodate him. But he mortified them for it in trial, and threatened to call them before the senate, as for an affront order^g. After he had finished his Sicily, having reason to apprehend returning home by land, not only from who infested all those roads, but from the contrivance of Verres, he chose by sea, and arrived at Rome, to the great satisfaction of his adversaries, much sooner than he was expected, and full charged with most manifold accusations against Verres's guilt.

On his return he found, what he had feared, a strong cabal formed to prolong the arts of delay which interest or morose humour, with design to throw it off a next year, when Hortensius and Metellus were consuls, and Metellus's brother whose united authority the prosecution was baffled: and they had already carried so far, that there was not time enough in the current year to go through the ordinary forms. This put Cicero upon the project, of shortening the method of trial, so as to bring it to an issue at any rate, before the present prætor M. Glabrio and his

^f Alt indignum facinus esse, quod ego in verba fecissem: quod quidem apud Græcos esse, id ferri nullo modo posse.—In Verr. lib. 63, 64.

Valerius Maximus says, that the Romans were anciently so jealous of the honour that they never gave an answer to foreigners and obliged the Greeks themselves to answer by an interpreter, not only in Rome and Asia; in order to inculcate a reverent tongue through all nations. [Lib. ii. 2.] This discipline had long been laid aside; and language had obtained such a vogue in Rome that the great and noble were obliged not only to be ambitious everywhere to speak it.

^g Vide in Verr. iv. 63, 63, 64, 65.

^h Ecce civitas est—Rex denique equestris populi Romani tecto ac domo non in Verr. iv. 11.

ⁱ Non ego a Vibone Vellam parvulo navium prædonum, ac tua tela venissem: festinatio fuit cum periculo capitis.—In Verr. Ascon. Argum. in Divinat.

^k Reperio, Judices, hæc ab istis consiliis, ut quancunque opus esset ratione res apud M. Metellum prætorem causam deceret.

^l Cicero summo consilio videtur in Verre hæc tempora diemini maluisse, quam in eam erat Q. Hortensius comiti futura, invidere were like to be equal judges^a. Instead therefore of spending any time in speaking, or employing his eloquence, as usual, in enforcing and aggravating the several articles of the charge, he resolved to do nothing more than produce his witnesses, and offer them to be interrogated: where the novelty of the thing, and the notoriety of the guilt, which appeared at once from the very recital of the depositions, so confounded Hortensius, that he had nothing to say for his client; who, despairing of all defence, submitted, without expecting the sentence, to a voluntary exile^b.

^c Divinat. 3.

^d Ego Scylliam totam quinquaginta diebus sic obii.—In Verr. Act. i. 2.

^e In Scylliam sum inquirendi causa profectus, quo in negotio—ad hospites meos, ac necessarios, causas communis defensor diverti potius, quam ad eos, qui a me consilium petivissent. Nemini meus adventus labori aut sumptui, neque publicæ neque privatim fuit.—In Verr. i. 6.

From this account it appears, that of the seven excellent orations, which now remain on the subject of this trial, the first two only were spoken, the one called the Divination, the other the first action, which is nothing more than a general preface to the whole cause: the other five were published afterwards, as they were prepared and intended to be spoken, if Verres had made a regular defence: for as this was the only cause in which Cicero had yet been engaged, or ever designed to be engaged as an accuser, so he was willing to leave these orations as a specimen of his abilities in that way, and the pattern of a just and diligent impeachment of a great and corrupt magistrate^c.

In the first contest with Cæcilius he estimates the damages of the Sicilians at above eight hundred thousand pounds^d; but this was a computation at large, before he was distinctly informed of the facts: for after he had been in Sicily, and seen what the proofs actually amounted to, he charges them at somewhat less than half that sum^e: and though the law in these causes gave double damages, yet no more seems to have been allowed in this than the single sum; which gave occasion, as Pitharch intimates, to a suspicion of some corruption or connivance in Cicero, for suffering so great an abatement of the fine: but if there was any abatement at all, it must needs have been made by the consent of all parties, out of regard perhaps to Verres's submission, and shortening the trouble of the prosecutors: for it is certain, that so far from having any imputation of that sort upon Cicero, it highly raised the reputation both of his abilities and integrity, as of one, whom neither money could bribe, nor power terrify from prosecuting a public oppressor; and the Sicilians ever after retained the highest sense of his services, and on all occasions testified the utmost zeal for his person and interests.

From the conclusion of these orations we may observe, that Cicero's vigour in this cause had driven upon him the envy and ill will of the nobility: which was so far however from moving him, that in open defiance of it he declares, "that the nobles were natural enemies to the virtue and industry of all new men; and, as if they were of another race and species, could never be reconciled or induced to favour them, by any observance or good offices whatsoever; that for his part therefore, like many others before him, he would pursue his own course, and make his way to the favour of the people, and the honours of the state, by his diligence and faithful services, without regarding the quarrels to which he might expose himself.—That if in this trial the judges did not answer the good opinion which he had conceived of them, he was resolved to prosecute, not only those who were actually guilty of corruption, but those too who were privy to it: and if any should be so audacious, as to attempt by power or artifice to influence the bench, and screen the criminal, he would call him to answer for it before the people, and show himself more vigorous in pursuing him, than he had been even in prosecuting Verres^f."

But before I dismiss the cause of Verres, it will not be improper to add a short account of some of his principal crimes, in order to give the reader a clearer notion of the usual method of governing provinces, and explain the grounds of those frequent impeachments and public trials, which he will meet with in the sequel of this history: for though few of their governors ever came up to the full measure of Verres's iniquity, yet the greatest part were guilty in some degree of every kind of oppression with which Verres himself was charged. This Cicero frequently intimates in his pleading, and urges the necessity of condemning him for the sake of the example, and to prevent such practices from growing too general to be controlled^g.

The accusation was divided into four heads; 1. of corruption in judging causes; 2. of extortion in collecting the tithes and revenues of the republic; 3. of plundering the subjects of their statues and wrought plate, which was his peculiar taste; 4. of illegal and tyrannical punishments. I shall give a specimen or two of each from the great number that Cicero has collected, which yet, as he tells us, was but a small extract from an infinitely greater, of which Verres had been actually guilty.

There was not an estate in Sicily, of any considerable value, which had been disposed of by will for twenty years past, where Verres had not his emissaries at work to find some flaw in the title, or some omission in executing the conditions of the testator, as a ground of extorting money from the heir. Dio of Halesa, a man of eminent quality, was in quiet possession of a great inheritance, left to him by the will of a relation, who had enjoined him to erect certain statues in the square of the city, on the penalty of forfeiting the estate to the Erycinian Venus. The statues were erected according to the will; yet Verres, having found

^a Nihil certum est non committere, ut in hac causa prius nobis contumque mutetur.—Act. i. 18.

^b Fecit hoc—ut utar testibus statim.—Ibid.—Sed tantummodo citaret testes—et eos Hortensius interrogandos dicit: qua arte ita est fatigatus Hortensius, ut nihil, contra quod disceret, inveniret: ipse etiam Verres, despecto patrocinio, sua sponte discederet in exilium.—Argum. Actum in Act. I.

^c In ceteris orationibus defensor futurus, accusationis officium hic tribuit, qui Verriarum nomine nuncupatur, compensare decrevit; et—in una causa vim huius artis et dignitatem demonstrare.—Acon. Argum. in Lib. et in Ver.

^d Quo nomine abbe te, C. Verres, sestertium milites ex his rebus.—Divin. in Oscell. 5.

^e Moluit C. Verrem—quadringentes sestertium ex his contra legem abstulisse.—Act. i. 18.

^f Proinde siqui sunt, qui in hoc reo aut potentes, aut auidaces, aut artifices ad corrumpeudum iudicium velint esse, ita sint parati, ut discipulante populo Romano mecum sibi rem videant futuram, &c.—In Verr. v. 71.

^g Quid igitur dicit? fecisse alioce.—Sunt quedam omnino in te singularia—quodam tibi cum multis communia. Ergo omittam tuos peccatus, ut ob jus dicendum pecunias acceptas—que forsitan alii quoque fecerint, &c.—Ib. iii. 88.

some little pretence for cavilling, suborned an obscure Sicilian, one of his own informers, to sue for the estate in the name of Venus; and when the cause was brought before him, forced Dio to compound with him for about nine thousand pounds, and to yield to him also a famous breed of mares, with all the valuable plate and furniture of his house¹.

Sopater, an eminent citizen of Halicis, had been accused before the late prætor, C. Sacerdos, of a capital crime, of which he was honourably acquitted: but when Verres succeeded to the government, the prosecutors renewed their charge, and brought him to a second trial before their new prætor; to which Sopater, trusting to his innocence and the judgment of Sacerdos, readily submitted without any apprehension of danger. After one hearing the cause was adjourned, when Timarchides, the freedman and principal agent of Verres, came to Sopater, and admonished him as a friend, not to depend too much on the goodness of his cause and his former absolution, for that his adversaries had resolved to offer money to the prætor, who would rather take it for saving, than destroying a criminal, and was unwilling likewise to reverse the judgment of his predecessor. Sopater, surprised at this intimation, and not knowing what answer to make, promised to consider of it; but declared himself unable to advance any large sum. Upon consulting his friends, they all advised him to take the hint, and make up the matter; so that in a second meeting with Timarchides, after alleging his particular want of money, he compounded the affair for about seven hundred pounds, which he paid down upon the spot². He now took all his trouble to be over: but after another hearing, the cause was still adjourned; and Timarchides came again to let him know that his accusers had offered a much larger sum than what he had given, and advised him, if he was wise, to consider well what he had to do. But Sopater, provoked by a proceeding so impudent, had not the patience even to hear Timarchides, but flatly told him that they might do what they pleased, for he was determined to give no more. All his friends were of the same mind, imagining, that whatever Verres himself might intend to do, he would not be able to draw the other judges into it, being all men of the first figure in Syracuse, who had judged the same cause already with the late prætor, and acquitted Sopater. When the third hearing came on, Verres ordered Petilius, a Roman knight, who was one of the bench, to go and hear a private cause, which was appointed for that day, and of which he was likewise the judge. Petilius refused, alleging that the rest of his assessors would be engaged in the present trial. But Verres declared, that they might all go with him too if they pleased, for he did not desire to detain them; upon which they all presently withdrew, some to sit as judges, and some to serve their friends in the Minucius, Sopater's advocate, seeing thus cleared, took it for granted that not proceed in the trial that day, as out of the court along with the rest; called him back, and ordered him to the defence of his client. "Defend he; "before whom?" "Before Verres, "if you think me worthy to Greek and Sicilian." "I do not worthiness," says Minucius, "but w your assessors were present, who acquainted with the merits of the cause I tell you," says Verres, "for the present." "No more can I," replied "for Petilius begged of me also to with him upon the other trial." And with many threats required him to s lutely refused to act, since the bench w and so left the court together with al Sopater's friends. This somewhat Verres; but after he had been whis times by his clerk Timarchides, he Sopater to speak what he had to sa defence. Sopater implored him by not to proceed to sentence till the rest could be present: but Verres called nesses, and after he had heard one or in a summary way, without their being by any one, put an end to the trial, an the criminal³.

Among the various branches of Ve gains, the sale of offices was a considerable for there was not a magistracy of an disposed of either by lot or a free vo did not arbitrarily sell to the best l priesthood of Jupiter at Syracuse was the most honourable: the method of it was to choose three by a general vot several classes of the citizens, whose afterwards cast into an urn, and the f that was drawn out obtained the Verres had sold it to Theomnastus, a him to be named in the first instance three; but as the remaining part was by lot, people were in great expectatio he would manage that which was not his power. He commanded, therefore place, that Theomnastus should be dex without casting lots; but when the remonstrated against it as contrary to and the law, he called for the law, w that as many lots should be made a persons nominated, and that he whose out the first, should be the priest. them, "how many were nominated;" t "three." "And what more then," required by the law, than that three l cast, and one of them drawn ou answered, "Nothing:" upon which i ordered three lots, with Theomnastus' every one of them, to be cast into the by drawing out any one, the electio mined in his favour⁴.

¹ Hic est Dio—de quo multis primariis viris testibus satisfactum est, H. 8. undecies numeratum esse, ut eam causam, in qua ne tenuissima quidem suspicio posset esse, isto cognoscere obtineret: præterea greges nobilissimarum equarum abactos: argenti vestique stragule domi quod fuerit esse direptum.—In Verr. II. 7.

² Post ad amicos revertit. Qui cum ei fuissent auctores redimende salutis, ad Timarchidem venit. Expositis suis difficultatibus, hominem ad H. 8. lxxx. perducit, eamque ei pecuniam numerat.—Ib. II. 28.

³ Tum repente iste testos citari jubet, alter breviter. Nihil interrogatur. Præco, d clat. Iste, properans de sella, exiit: hom tem, a C. Sacerdote absolutum, indicta caus scribe, mistic, harsupielique condemnavit.

⁴ Numquid igitur oportet nisi tres sortes

The tenth of the corn of all the conquered towns in Sicily belonged to the Romans, as it had formerly done to their own princes, and was always gathered in kind and sent to Rome: but as this was not sufficient for the public use, the pretors had an appointment also of money from the treasury to purchase such farther stores as were necessary for the current year. Now the manner of collecting and ascertaining the quantity of the tithes was settled by an old law of King Hiero, the most moderate and equitable of all their ancient tyrants: but Verres, by a strange sort of edict, ordered, that the owner should pay whatever the collector demanded; but if he exacted more than his due, that he should be liable to a fine of eight times the value*. By this edict he threw the property, as it were, of the island into the power of his officers, to whom he had farmed out the tithes; who, in virtue of the new law, seized into their hands the whole crop of every town, and obliged the owners to give them whatever share of it, or composition in money, they thought fit; and if any refused, they not only plundered them of all their goods, but even tortured their persons, till they had forced them to a compliance*. By this means Verres, having gathered a sufficient quantity of corn from the very tithes to supply the full demands of Rome, put the whole money, that he had received from the treasury, into his own pocket^b; and used to brag, that he had got enough from this single article to screen him from any impeachment: and not without reason; since one of his clerks, who had the management of this corn-money, was proved to have got above ten thousand pounds from the very fees which were allowed for collecting it^c. The poor husbandmen, in the mean time, having no remedy, were forced to run away from their houses, and desert the tilage of the ground; so that from the registers, which were punctually kept in every town, of all the occupiers of arable lands in the island, it appeared, that during the three years' government of Verres, above two thirds of the whole number had entirely deserted their farms, and left their lands uncultivated^d.

Apronius, a man of infamous life and character, was the principal farmer of the tithes: who, when reproached with the cruelty of his exactions, made no scruple to own, that the chief share of the gain was placed to the account of the pretor. These words were charged upon him in the presence of edict? Nihil. Confilij jubet tres, in quibus omnibus scriptum esset nomen Theonastii. Fit clamor maximus: in Jovis filium inordinatum amplissimum per hanc rationem Theonastio datur.—In Verr. II. 61.

* Totæ Hieronica lege rejecta et repudiata—edictum, Joticæ, audite præclarum; quantum decumanus edictum maiorem sibi decumæ dare oportere, ut tantum arator decumano dare cogatur.—&c.—Ib. III. 10.

^b Apronius venit, omne instrumentum diripuit, familiam abstrixit, pecuniam abegit—hominem corripit et suspendi iussit in eleastro, &c.—Ib. 23.

^c Jura vero ab isto omnem filiam ex errore pecuniam, quam his operantibus exstibatibus pro frumento dari, inoffactione videtur.—Ib. 75, &c.

^d Tu ex pecunia publica H. S. tredecies scribam tunc penitus tuo cum abstinere fateare, reliquam tibi ullam diminutionem putas esse?—Ib. 80.

^e Agrimensores ager—ducentos quinquaginta aratores habuit primo anno præture tue. Quid tertio anno? Oportet—hoc perque in omni agro decumano reperiatis.—Ib. 81, 82, &c.

Verres and the magistrates of Syracuse, by one Rubrius, who offered a wager and trial upon the proof of them; but Verres, without showing any concern or emotion at it, privately took care to hush up the matter, and prevent the dispute from proceeding any farther^e.

The same wager was offered a second time, and in the same public manner, by one Scandilius, who loudly demanded judges to decide it: to which Verres, not being able to appease the clamour of the man, was forced to consent, and named them presently out of his own band, Cornelius his physician, Volusius his soothsayer, and Valerius his orier; to whom he usually referred all disputes, in which he had any interest. Scandilius insisted to have them named out of the magistrates of Sicily, or that the matter should be referred to Rome: but Verres declared, that he would not trust a cause, in which his own reputation was at stake, to any but his own friends; and when Scandilius refused to produce his proofs before such arbitrators, Verres condemned him in the forfeiture of his wager, which was forty pounds, to Apronius^f.

C. Heius was the principal citizen of Messana, where he lived very splendidly in the most magnificent house of the city, and used to receive all the Roman magistrates with great hospitality. He had a chapel in his house, built by his ancestors, and furnished with certain images of the gods, of admirable sculpture and inestimable value. On one side stood a Cupid of marble, made by Praxiteles: on the other, a Hercules of brass, by Myron; with a little altar before each god, to denote the religion and sanctity of the place. There were likewise two other figures of brass of two young women, called Canephoræ, with baskets on their heads, carrying things proper for sacrifice after the manner of the Athenians, the work of Polyclethus. These statues were an ornament not only to Heius, but to Messana itself, being known to everybody at Rome, and constantly visited by all strangers, to whom Heius's house was always open. The Cupid had been borrowed by C. Claudius, for the decoration of the forum in his sedulship, and was carefully sent back to Messana; but Verres, while he was Heius's guest, would never suffer him to rest, till he had stripped his chapel of the gods and the canephoræ; and to cover the act from an appearance of robbery, forced Heius to enter them into his accounts, as if they had been sold to him for fifty pounds; whereas at a public auction in Rome, as Cicero says, they had known one single statue of brass, of a moderate size, sold a little before for a thousand^g. Verres had seen likewise at Heius's

^e Eorum omnium, qui decumani vocabantur, princeps erat Q. ille Apronius, quem videtis: de cuius improbitate singulari gravissimarum legationum querimonias audistis.—In Verr. II. 9.

Cum palam Syracusis, te audiente, maximo conventu, P. Rubrius Q. Apronium sponsione lacestivit, ni Apronium deditaret, te sibi in decumis esse socium, &c.—Ib. 57.

^f Ille tu medicum et haruspitem, et præconem tuum recuperatores dabis? [Ib. 60.] Iste viros optimos recuperatores dat, eundem illum medicum Cornelium et haruspitem Volusianum, et Valerium præconem.—Ib. 21, It. 11.

Scandilius postulare de conventu recuperatores. Tum iste negat se de exstimatione sua cuiquam, nisi suis, commissurum—cogit Scandilius quinque illa millia nummum dare atque adnumerare Apronio.—Ib. 60.

^g Erat apud Heium sacrorum magna cum dignitate in ædibus, a maioribus traditum, perantiquum; in quo signa house, a suit of curious tapestry, reckoned the best in Sicily, being of the kind which was called Attalic, richly interwoven with gold; this he resolved also to extort from Heius, but not till he had secured the statues. As soon therefore as he left Messana, he began to urge Heius, by letters, to send him the tapestry to Agrigentum, for some particular service which he pretended; but when he had once got it into his hands, he never restored it^b. Now Messana, as it is said above, was the only city of Sicily that persevered to the last in the interest of Verres; and at the time of the trial sent a public testimonial in his praise by a deputation of its eminent citizens, of which this very Heius was the chief. Yet when he came to be interrogated and cross-examined by Cicero, he frankly declared, that though he was obliged to perform what the authority of his city had imposed upon him, yet that he had been plundered by Verres of his gods, which were left to him by his ancestors, and which he never would have parted with on any conditions whatsoever, if it had been in his power to keep them^c.

Verres had in his family two brothers of Cilicia, the one a painter, the other a sculptor, on whose judgment he chiefly relied in his choice of pictures and statues, and all other pieces of art. They had been forced to fly from their country for robbing a temple of Apollo, and were now employed to hunt out every thing that was curious and valuable in Sicily, whether of public or private property. These brothers having given Verres notice of a large silver ewer, belonging to Pamphilus of Lilybæum, of most elegant work, made by Boethus^d, Verres immediately sent for it, and seized it to his own use; and while Pamphilus was sitting pensive at home, lamenting the loss of his rich vessel, the chief ornament of his sideboard, and the pride of his feasts, another messenger came running to him, with orders to bring two silver cups also, which he was known to have, adorned with figures in relief, to be shown to the prætor. Pamphilus, for fear of greater mischief, took up his cups and carried them away himself: when he came to the palace Verres happened to be asleep, but the brothers were walking in the hall, and waiting to receive him; who, as soon as they saw him, asked for the cups, which he accordingly produced. They commended the work; whilst he with a sorrowful face began to complain, that if they took his cups from him, he should have nothing of any value left in his house. The brothers, seeing his concern, asked how much he paleherrima quatuor, summo artificio, summa nobilitate, &c. [In Verr. iv. 2.] C. Claudius, cujus adilitatem magnificentissimam scimus fulsisse, usus est hoc Cupidine tanto diu, dum forum diis immortalibus, populoque Romano habuit ornatum.—Hæc omnia, quæ dixi, signa ab Heio de sacratio Verres abstulit, &c. [ib. 3.] Ita jussisti, opinor, ipsum in tabulas referre. [ib. 6.] In auctione signum meum non magnum H. S. cxxx millibus ventre non vidi-mus?—In Verr. iv. 7.

^b Quid? illa Attalica, tota Sicilia nominata, ab eodem Heio peripetasmata emere oblitus es?—At quomodo abstulit? &c.—ib. 12.

^c Quid enim poterat Heius respondere?—Primo dixit, se illum publice laudare, quod sibi ita mandatum esset: deinde neque se illa habuisse venalia, neque ulla conditione, si utrum vellet liceret, adduci unquam potuisse ut venderet illa, &c.—In Verr. iv. 7.

^d A celebrated Carthaginian sculptor, who left many famous works behind him.—Vid. Flin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 12; it. xxxiv. 2.

would give to preserve them; in a w^d mandated forty crowns; he offered twer they were debating, Verres awaked s the cups, which being presently show brothers took occasion to observe, not answer to the account that had l them, and were but of paltry work, seen among his plate; to whose aut readily submitted, and so Pamphil cups¹.

In the city of Tindaris there was image of Mercury, which had been res from Carthage by Scipio, and was w the people with singular devotion, a festival. This statue Verres resolved commanded the chief magistrate, Sop taken down and conveyed to Messa people were so inflamed and mutin that Verres did not persist in his de time; but when he was leaving the p his orders to Sopater, with severe t his command executed. Sopater prop ter to the senate, who universally pro it: in short, Verres returned to the t quired for the statue; but was told that the senate would not suffer it down, and had made it capital for any with it without their orders. "Do not Verres, "of your senate and your orde not presently deliver the statue, y scourged to death with rods." Sop moved the affair again to the senate the prætor's threats; but in vain: tl in disorder, without giving any answe reported by Sopater to Verres, who in his tribunal: it was the midst of weather extremely cold, and it rained when Verres ordered Sopater to be s carried into the market-place, and the upon an equestrian statue of C. M. exposed, naked as he was, to the rain and stretched in a kind of torture upo horse; where he must necessarily hav the people of the town, out of compa had not forced their senate to grant t to Verres².

Young Antiochus, King of Syria, h Rome to claim the kingdom of Egypt his mother, passed through Sicily at his return home, and came to Syra Verres, who knew that he had a great him, received him with a particular ci him large presents of wine, and all i for his table; and entertained him most magnificently at supper. The king, pleased with this compliment, invited Verres in his turn to sup with him; when his sideboard was dressed out in a royal manner with his richest plate, and many vessels of solid gold set with precious stones; among which there was a large jug for wine, made out of one entire gem, with a handle of gold to it. Verres greedily surveyed and admired every piece; and the king rejoiced to see the Roman prætor so well satisfied with his entertainment. The next morning, Verres sent to the king to borrow some of his choicest vessels, and particularly the jug, for the sake of showing them, as he pretended, to his own workmen; all which, the king having no suspicion of him, readily sent. But besides these vessels of domestic use, the king had brought with him a large candlestick, or branch for several lights, of inestimable value, all made of precious stones, and adorned with the richest jewels, which he had designed for an offering to Jupiter Capitolinus; but finding the repairs of the capitol not finished, and no place yet ready for the reception of his offering, he resolved to carry it back without showing it to anybody, that the beauty of it might be new and the more surprising when it came to be first seen in that temple. Verres, having got intelligence of this candlestick, sent again to the king, to beg by all means that he would favour him with a sight of it, promising that he would not suffer any one else to see it. The king sent it presently by his servants, who, after they had uncovered and shown it to Verres, expected to carry it back with them to the king; but Verres declared, that he could not sufficiently admire the beauty of the work, and must have more time to contemplate it; and obliged them therefore to go away and leave it with him. Several days passed, and the king heard nothing from Verres; so that he thought proper to remind him, by a civil message, of sending back the vessels; but Verres ordered the servants to call again some other time. In short, after a second message with no better success, the king was forced to speak to Verres himself; upon which Verres earnestly entreated him to make him a present of the candlestick. The king affirmed it to be impossible, on the account of his vow to Jupiter, to which many nations were witnesses. Verres then began to drop some threats, but finding them of no more effect than his entreaties, he commanded the king to depart instantly out of his province: declaring, that he had received intelligence of certain pirates, who were coming from his kingdom to invade Sicily. The poor king, finding himself thus abused and robbed of his treasure, went into the great square of the city, and in a public assembly of the people, calling upon the gods and men to bear testimony to the injury, made a solemn dedication to Jupiter of the candlestick, which he had vowed and designed for the capitol, and which Verres had forcibly taken from him.

¹ Cybrastæ sunt fratres—quorum alterum e oera solitum esse, alterum esse pictorem. tios diocres, ita odorabantur omnia et perve Verr. iv. 13.

Memini Pamphilum Lilybetanum mihi iste ab esse hydriam Boethi manu factam, p et grandi pondere, per potestatem abstuli tristem et conturbatum domum revertisse, &c.

² Tum iste: Quam mihi religionem narra nam? quem ænatum? Vivum te non relinqui virgie, nisi signum traditor—Erat hiema pestas, ut ipsum Sopatrum diocres audisti imber maximus, cum ipse imperat Notoribus —præcipitem in forum delictant, nudumque —cum esset vincetus nudus in ære, in imbi Neque tamen finis huius injuriæ crudelit donec populus atque universa multitudo, commota, senatum clamore coegit, ut ei illud Mercurii polliceretur.—ib. 30, 40.

When any vessel, richly laden, happened to arrive in the ports of Sicily, it was generally seized by his spies and informers, on pretence of its coming from Spain, and being filled with Sertorius's soldiers: and when the commanders exhibited their bills of lading, with a sample of their goods, to prove themselves to be fair traders, who came from different quarters of the world, some producing Tyrian purple, others Arabian spices, some jewels and precious stones, others Greek wines and Asiatic slaves; the very proof, by which they hoped to save themselves, was their certain ruin: Verres declared their goods to have been acquired by piracy, and seizing the ships with their cargoes to his own use, committed the whole crew to prison, though the greatest part of them perhaps were Roman citizens. There was a famous dungeon at Syracuse, called the Latomie, of a vast and horrible depth, dug out of a solid rock, which, having originally been a quarry of stone, was converted to a prison by Dionysius the Tyrant. Here Verres kept great numbers of Roman citizens in chains, whom he had first injured to a degree that made it necessary to destroy them; whence few or none ever saw the light again, but were commonly strangled by his orders.

^a Rex maximo convента Syracusis in foro fiena, ac tunc hominesque contestans, clamare corpit,—candelabrum fœctum e gemmis, quod in Capitolium missurum erat, id sibi C. Verrem abstulisse.—Id etai antea jam natus et agitationis sua consecratum esset, tamen tum eo in sic convента civium Romanorum dare, donare, dicare, candelabrum Jovi Optimo Maximo, &c.—In Verr. iv. 28, 29.

One Gavius, however, a Roman citizen of the town of Cosa, happened to escape from this dreadful place, and run away to Messina; where, fancying himself out of danger, and being ready to embark for Italy, he began to talk of the injuries which he had received, and of going straight to Rome, where Verres should be sure to hear of him. But he might as well have said the words in the prætor's palace, as at Messina; for he was presently seized and secured till Verres's arrival, who, coming thither soon after, condemned him as a spy of the fugitives, first to be scourged in the marketplace, and then nailed to a cross, erected for the purpose, on a conspicuous part of the shore, and looking towards Italy, that the poor wretch might have the additional misery of suffering that cruel death in sight as it were of his home.

The coasts of Sicily being much infested by pirates, it was the custom of all prætors to fit out a fleet every year, for the protection of its trade and navigation. This fleet was provided by a contribution of the maritime towns, each of which usually furnished a ship, with a certain number of men and provisions: but Verres for a valuable consideration sometimes remitted the ship, and always discharged as many of the men as were able to pay for it. A fleet however was equipped of seven ships; but for show rather than service, without their complement either of men or stores, and wholly unfit to act against an enemy; and the command of it was given by him, not to his questor, or one of his lieutenants, as it was usual, but to Cleomenes a Syracusan, whose wife was his mistress, that he might enjoy her company the more freely at home, while the husband was employed abroad. For instead of spending the summer, as other governors used to do, in a progress through his province, he quitted the palace of Syracuse, and retired to a little island, adjoining to the city, to lodge in tents, or rich pavilions, pitched close by the fountain of Arethusa; where, forbidding the approach of men or business to disturb him, he passed two of the hot months in the company of his favourite women, and all the delicacy of pleasure that art and luxury could invent.

^a Quæcumque navis ex Asia veneret, statim certis indicibus et custodibus tenebatur: vectores omnes in Latomias conjiciebantur: onera atque merces in prætoriam domum deferrebantur—eos Sertorianos milites esse, atque a Dianio fugere dicebat, &c.—In Verr. i. 5. 56.

^b Latomias Syracusanas omnes audistis. Opus est ingens magnificum regum ac tyrannorum. Totum est ex maxime mirandam in altitudinem depressum—nihil tam clausum ad exitum, nihil tam tutum ad custodias, nec fieri nec cogitari potest. [Ib. 27.] Carcer ille, qui est a crudelissimo tyranno Dionysio factus, quæ Latomias vocantur, in istius imperio domicilium civium Romanorum fuit.—Ib. 56.

^c Gavius hic quem dico, Cosanus, cum in illo numero civium ab isto in vincula conjectus esset, et nescio quâ ratione clam e Latomilis profugisset—loqui Messanæ corpit, et queri, se civem Romanum in vincula conjectum, sibi recta iter esse Romam, Verri se præto advenienti futurum, &c.—Ib. 61.

The fleet, in the mean time, sailed out of Syracuse in great pomp, and saluted Verres and his company, as it passed; when the Roman prætor, says Cicero, who had not been seen before for many days, showed himself at last to the sailors, standing on the shore in slippers, with a purple cloak and vest, flowing down to his heels, and leaning on the shoulder of a girl, to view this formidable squadron: which, instead of scouring the seas, sailed no farther after several days, than into the port of Pachynus. Here, as they lay peaceably at anchor, they were surprised with an account of a number of pirate frigates, lying in another harbour very near to them: upon which, the admiral Cleomenes cut his cables in a great fright, and, with all the sail that he could make, fled away towards Pelorus, and escaped to land: the rest of the ships followed him as fast as they could; but two of them, which sailed the slowest, were taken by the pirates, and one of the captains killed: the other captains quitted their ships, as Cleomenes had done, and got safe to land. The pirates, finding the ships deserted, set fire to them all that evening, and the next day sailed boldly into the port of Syracuse, which reached into the very heart of the town; where, after they had satisfied their curiosity, and filled the city with a general terror, they sailed out again at leisure, and in good order, in a kind of triumph over Verres and the authority of Rome.

The news of a Roman fleet burnt, and Syracuse insulted by pirates, made a great noise through all Sicily. The captains, in excuse of were forced to tell the truth; that the scandalously unprovided both with men and in no condition to face an enemy, them relating how many of their sail discharged by Verres's particular order, the whole blame was justly laid. When to his ears, he sent for the captain threatening them very severely for that manner, forced them to declare, and also in writing, that every one of them found, after all, that there was no way to the clamour, and that it would need to Rome, he resolved, for the execution of his own crime, to sacrifice the poor captain to them all to death, except the admiral, the most criminal of them all, and the commander also of his ship. In consequence of this resolution, the four remained after fourteen days from the action suspected no danger, were arrested as prisoners. They were all young men, of the families of Sicily, some of them the aged parents, who came presently in garrison to Syracuse, to solicit the prætor's pardon. But Verres was inexorable; throwing them into his dungeon, where they suffered to speak with them, condemned to lose their heads: whilst all the service unhappy parents could do for them, was to the executioner to dispatch them with instead of more, which he brutally refused unless he was paid for it, and to Timarchides the liberty of giving them.

It happened, however, before this loss, that a single pirate-ship was taken by the lieutenants, and brought into Syracuse, proved to be a very rich prize, and had a great number of handsome young fellows, a band of musicians among them, were sent away to Rome as a present to a friend, who had either youth, or beauty, or any art, were distributed to his clerks, to be kept for his use; but the old and deformed, were committed to prison, and reserved for punishment. These pirates had long been a terror to the people, so that they were all eager to see his punishment, and their eyes with his execution: but he found means to redeem his head, and fully kept out of sight, and conveyed in private custody, till Verres could make market of him. The people in the meantime impatient and clamorous for the death of

¹ Erat et Nice, facie eximia, uxor Cleomenis Syracusani. Iste autem cum vir esset Syracusanus, uxorem ejus parum poterat animo soluto ac libero tot in acta dies secum habere. Itaque exogitit rem singularem. Naves, quibus legatus præfuerat, Cleomeni tradit. Clami populi Romani Cleomenem Syracusanum præcesse jubet. Hoc eo facit, ut non solum ille abesset a domo—Nam ætate summa, quo tempore ceteri prætores obire provinciam, et concursare consueverunt, eo tempore—ad luxuriam, libidineque suas—tabernacula, carbasseis intenta vells, collocari jussit in litore, &c.—In Verr. v. 31.

² Ipse autem, qui visus multis diebus non esset, tum se tamen in conspectum nautis pallisper dedit. Stetit solatus prætor populi Romani cum pallio purpureo, tumæque talari, muliercula nixus in litore.—Ib. 33.

Quintilian greatly admires this short description, as placing the very scene and fact before our eyes, and suggesting still much more than is expressed by it: [viii. 3.] but the concise elegance and expressive brevity, in which its beauty consists, cannot possibly be preserved in a translation.

³ Tunc prædonum dux Heracleo repente præter spem, non sua virtute—victor, classem pulcherrimam populi Romani in litus expulsam et ejectam, cum primum advesperasceret, inflammari incendique jussit, &c.—Ib. 35, 36.

⁴ Cleomenem et navarchos ad se vocari jussit, quod hujusmodi de se sermones habuissent, id facere desistant, et in sua quique navi dimittantur, habuisse nautarum, quantum oportuerit, dunt quod vellet esse facturos. Iste in tabula signat signis amicorum. Iste hominibus centibusque inficit catenas jubet. Venit parentes propinquosque miserorum adulescentium. In Verr. v. 39, 40, &c.

⁵ Erat ex navis plena juventutis formas argenti facti atque signati, multa cum stipe, siqui senes aut deformes erant, eos in hoc ducit, qui aliquid forme, ætatis, artificii abduci omnes, nonnullos scribis suis filii distribuit. Symphoniacos homines exul ducit. Romanum muneri misit, &c.—Ib. 35, &c.

when all other prætors used to execute as soon as taken; and knowing the number of them to be great, could not be satisfied with the few old and decrepit, whom Verres willingly sacrificed to their resentment. He took this opportunity, therefore, to clear the dungeons of those Roman citizens, whom he had reserved for such an occasion, and brought out to execution as a part of the piratical crew; but to prevent the imprecations and cries, which citizens used to make of their being free Romans, and to hinder their being known also to any other citizens there present, he produced them all with their heads and faces so muffled up, that they could neither be heard nor seen, and in that cruel manner destroyed great numbers of innocent men². But to finish at last this whole story of Verres: after he had lived many years in a miserable exile, forgotten and deserted by all his friends, he is said to have been relieved by the generosity of Cicero³; yet was proscribed and murdered after all by Marc Antony, for the sake of his fine statues and Corinthian vessels, which he refused to part with⁴: happy only, as Lactantius says, before his death, to have seen the more deplorable end of his old enemy and accuser, Cæsar⁵.

But neither the condemnation of this criminal, nor the concessions already made by the senate, were able to pacify the discontents of the people: they demanded still, as loudly as ever, the restoration of the tribunician power, and the right of jurisdiction to the equestrian order; till after various contentions and tumults, excited annually on that account by the tribunes, they were gratified this year in them both; in the first by Pompey the consul, in the second by L. Cotta the prætor⁶. The tribunes were strenuously assisted in all this struggle by J. Cæsar⁷, and as strenuously opposed by all who wished well to the tranquillity of the city: for long experience had shewn that they had often been, not only the chief disturbers of the public peace, by the abuse of their extravagant power, but the constant tools of all the ambitious, who had any designs of advancing themselves above the laws⁸; for by corrupting one or more of the tribunes, which they were sure to effect by paying their full price, they could either obtain from the people whatever they wanted, or obstruct at least whatever should be attempted against them; so that this act was generally disliked by the better sort, and gave a suspicion of no good intentions in Pompey; who, to remove all jealousies against him on this, or any other account, voluntarily took an oath, that on the expiration of his consulship he would accept no public command or government, but content himself with the condition of a private senator⁹.

Plutarch speaks of this act as the effect of Pompey's gratitude to the people for the extraordinary honours which they had heaped upon him: but Cicero makes the best excuse for it after Pompey's death, which the thing itself would bear, by observing that a statesman must always consider not only what is best, but what is necessary to the times; that Pompey well knew the impatience of the people; and that they would not bear the loss of the tribunician power much longer; and it was the part, therefore, of a good citizen not to leave to a bad one the credit of doing what was too popular to be withstood¹⁰. But whatever were Pompey's views in the restitution of this power, whether he wanted the skill or the inclination to apply it to any bad purpose, it is certain that he had cause to repent of it afterwards, when Cæsar, who had a better head with a worse heart, took the advantage of it to his ruin; and by the help of the tribunes was supplied both with the power and the pretext for overturning the republic¹¹.

As to the other dispute, about restoring the right of judging to the knights, it was thought the best way of correcting the insolence of the nobles, to subject them to the jurisdiction of an inferior order, who, from a natural jealousy and envy towards them, would be sure to punish their oppressions with proper severity. It was ended however at last by a compromise, and a new law was prepared by common consent, to vest this power jointly in the senators and the knights; from each of which orders a certain number was to be drawn annually by lot, to sit in judgment together with the prætor upon all causes¹².

But for the more effectual cure of that general license and corruption of morals, which had infected all orders, another remedy was also provided this year, an election of censors: it ought regularly to have been made every five years, but had now been intermitted from the time of Sylla for about seventeen. These censors were the guardians of the discipline and manners of the city¹³, and had a power to punish vice and immorality by some mark of infamy in all ranks of men, from the highest to the lowest. The persons now chosen were L. Gellius and Cn. Lentulus; both of them mentioned by Cicero as his particular acquaintance, and the last as his intimate friend¹⁴. Their authority, after so long an intermission, was exercised with that severity which the libertinism of the times required; for they expelled above sixty-four from the senate for notorious immoralities, the greatest part for the detestable practice of taking money for

¹ Archipratam ipsum vidit nemo—cum omnes, ut mox est, concurrent, quærentes, videre cuperent, &c. [in Ver. v. 28.] Cum maximus numerus deesset, tum iste in eorum locum, quæ domum suam de piratis abduxerat, substitutus coepit cives Romanos, quos in carcerem antea compulerat. Itaque ad cives Romani non cognoscereantur, captivos obvolutus & carcere ad palam atque necem præcipit, &c.—Ib. 22, &c.

² Quæ de multitudine dicamus eorum, qui captibus involutis in pistrinum captivorumque numero producebantur, et summi ferirentur.—Ib. 60. ³ Senec. vi. Suasor. 6.

⁴ Phil. Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 2. ⁵ Lactant. ii. 4.

⁶ Hæc omnia Pompeius tribunicie potestatis restituit, cujus imaginem Sylla sine re reliquerat.—Vell. Pat. ii. 32.

⁷ Antiores restituendis tribunicie potestatis existimantur.—Varro. in J. Cæs. 5. ⁸ De Legib. iii. 9.

⁹ Qui cum consuli laudabiliter jurasset, se in nullam provinciam ex eo magistratu iturum.—Vell. Pat. ii. 31.

¹⁰ De Legib. 3. 11.

¹¹ Ὅτε θὴ καὶ μέλιστα τῇ Πομπηίῳ μετεμέλανε τὴν δημοκρασίαν—ἀναγκάζοντι αὐτοῖς ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀρχαίου. Appian. ii. p. 445.

¹² Per idem tempus Cotta judicandi munus, quod C. Gracchus ereptum senatui, ad Equites, Sylla ab illis ad senatum transtulerat, æqualiter inter utrumque ordinem partitus est.—Vell. Pat. ii. 32.

¹³ Tu es præfectus moribus, magister veteris disciplinae ac severitatis.—Pro Cluentio, 46.

¹⁴ Nam mihi cum ambobus est amicitia: cum altero vero, magnus usus et summa necessitudo.—Pro Cluentio, 42.

judging causes¹, and among them C. Antonius, the uncle of the triumvir; subscribing their reasons for it, that he had plundered the allies, declined a trial, mortgaged his lands, and was not master of his estate²: yet this very Antonius was elected ædile and prætor soon after in his proper course, and within six years advanced to the consulship: which confirms what Cicero says of this censorian animadversion, that it was become merely nominal, and had no other effect than of putting a man to the blush³.

From the impeachment of Verres, Cicero entered upon the ædileship, and in one of his speeches gives us a short account of the duty of it: "I am now chosen ædile, says he, and am sensible of what is committed to me by the Roman people: I am to exhibit with the greatest solemnity the most sacred sports to Ceres, Liber, and Libera; am to appease and conciliate the mother Flora to the people and city of Rome, by the celebration of the public games; am to furnish out those ancient shows, the first which were called Roman, with all possible dignity and religion, in honour of Jupiter, Juno, Minerva; am to take care also of all the sacred edifices, and indeed of the whole city, &c." The people were passionately fond of all these games and diversions; and the public allowance for them being but small, according to the frugality of the old republic, the ædiles supplied the rest at their own cost, and were often ruined by it. For every part of the empire was ransacked for what was rare and curious, to adorn the splendour of their shows: the Forum, in which they were exhibited, was usually beautified with porticoes built for the purpose, and filled with the choicest statues and pictures which Rome and Italy afforded. Cicero reproaches Appius for draining Greece and the islands of all their furniture of this kind for the ornament of his ædileship⁴: and Verres is said to have supplied his friends, Hortensius and Metellus, with all the fine statues of which he had plundered the provinces⁵.

Several of the greatest men of Cicero's time had distinguished themselves by an extraordinary expense and magnificence in this magistracy; Lucullus, Scæurus, Lentulus, Hortensius⁶, and C. Antonius; who, though expelled so lately from the senate, entertained the city this year with stage-plays, whose scenes were covered with silver; in which he was followed afterwards by Murena⁷:

¹ Quos autem duo censores, clarissimi viri furti et capitarum pecuniarum nomine notaverunt; si non modo in senatum redierunt, sed etiam illarum ipsarum rerum iudiciis absoluti sunt.—Pro Cluent. 42; it. Pigh. Annal. ad A. U. 683. ² Asconius in Orat. in Tog. Cand.

³ Censoris iudicium nihil fere damnato affert præter ruborem. Itaque quod omnis ea iudicatio veretur tantummodo in nomine, animadversio illa ignominia dicta est.—Fragment. c. lib. iv. De Reipub. ex Nonio.

⁴ In Verr. v. 14.

⁵ Omnia signa, tabulas, ornamentorum quod superfuit in fanis et communibus locis, tota e Græcia atque insulis omnibus, honoris populi Romani causa, deportavit.—Pro Dom. ad Pont. 43.

⁶ Asconius.

⁷ De Offic. ii. 16.

⁸ Ego qui trinos ludos ædilis feceram, tamen Antonii ludis commovebar. Tibi, qui casu nullo feceras, nihil huius istam ipsam, quam tu irrides, argentearum scenarum adversatam putas?—Pro Muren. 20.

⁹ Mox, quod etiam in municipiis imitantur, C. Antonius ludos scena argentea fecit; item L. Murena.—Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3.

yet J. Cæsar outdid them all: and it exhibited for his father's funeral, mad furniture of the theatre of solid silver, beasts were then first seen to tread on it but the excess of his expense was but it to the excess of his ambition; for though only purchasing the consulship, he Cæsar took the middle way, and observed which he prescribed afterwards to his expense agreeable to his circumstance neither to hurt his character by a sort of lity, nor his fortunes by a vain ostentativeness; since the one, by making odious, deprives him of the power of the other, by making him necessitous under the temptation of doing ill: thus by declining the ædileship through the consulship¹: and Cæsar, by his was forced to repair his own ruin by republic.

But Cicero's popularity was built on a solid foundation, the affection of his citizens, a sense of his merit and services; yet, once with the custom and humour of the times, furnished the three solemn shows above to the entire satisfaction of the people: which he calls little, in respect to the honours which he had received from the Sicilians, during his ædileship, gave him proofs of their gratitude, by supplying with all manner of provisions which he afforded, for the use of his table and feasts, which he was obliged to provide for the magistracy: but instead of making advantage of their liberality, he applied to the benefit of the poor; and by the extraordinary supply contrived to reduce the price of victuals in the markets.²

Hortensius was one of the consuls which produced nothing memorable by the capture of the Capitol by Q. Lutatius Catulus, had been burnt down in Sylla's time, took the care of rebuilding it, but did not see it finished, which he lamented as an illness, as the only thing wanting to his felicity³. By his death that charge fell as being consul at the time, who dedicated summer with great pomp and solemnity the honour to have his name inscribed on the front⁴.

On the occasion of this festival, he

¹ Cæsar, qui postea dictator fuit, primis munere patris funebri, omni apparatu armatus est, feræque argenteis vasis incedere visum.—Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3.

² Quare si postulat a populo—faciendum pro facultatibus; nos ipsi ut fecimus.—De Off. ii. 16.

³ Nam pro amplitudine honorum, quos et gratia adepti sumus, sane exiguis sumus ad lib. 33. ⁴ Plutarch. in have introduced some instances of luxury not known before in Rome, of covering the area, in which the people sat, with a purple veil, imitating the colour of the sky, and defending from the injuries of it; and of gilding the tiles of this noble fabric, which were made of copper: for though the ceilings of temples had before been sometimes gilt, yet this was the first use of gold on the outside of any building*. Thus the Capitol, like all ancient structures, rose the more beautiful from its ruins: which gave Cicero an opportunity of paying a particular compliment to Catulus in Verres's trial, where he was one of the judges: for Verres having intercepted, as it is said above, the rich swordstick of king Antiochus, which was designed for the Capitol, Cicero, after he had charged him with it, takes occasion to say, "I address myself here to you, Catulus, for I am speaking of your noble and beautiful monument: it is your part to show not only the severity of a judge, but the leniency of an accuser. Your honour is united with that of this temple, and, by the favour of the senate and people of Rome, your name is consecrated with it to all posterity: it must be your care therefore that the Capitol, as it is now restored more splendidly, may be furnished also more richly than it was before; as if the fire had been sent on purpose from heaven, not to destroy the temple of Jupiter, but to require from us one more shining and magnificent than the former⁴."

⁵ Hoc tamen felicitati sue defuisse confectum Capitolium non dedicavisset.—Plin. Hist. Nat. Curiam victor Sylla suscepit, neque tamen hoc unum felicitati negatum.—Tacit. Hist. i.

⁶ The following inscription was found in the Capitol, and is supposed by some to be the which Catulus put up; where it remains says, to the time of Vitellius.—Ib.

Q. LUTATIVVS F. Q. N. CATVLVS SVBSTRYCTIONEM ET TABVLARIVM FACIENDVM CVRAV.

In this year Cicero is supposed to have defended Fonteus and Cæcina. Fonteus had been prætor of the Narbonese Gaul for three years, and was afterwards accused by the people of the province, and one of their princes, Induciomarus, of great oppression and exactions in his government, and especially of imposing an arbitrary tax on the importations of their wines. There were two hearings in the cause, yet but one speech of Cicero's remaining, and that so imperfect, that we can hardly form a judgment either of the merit or the issue of it. Cicero allows the charge of the wines to be a heavy one, if true⁵; and by his method of defence one would suspect it to be so, since his pains are chiefly employed in exciting an aversion to the accusers, and a compassion to the criminal. For, to destroy the credit of the witnesses, he represents the whole nation, "as a drunken, impious, faithless people; natural enemies to all religion, without any notion of the sanctity of an oath, and polluting the altars of their gods with human sacrifices: and what faith, what piety," says he, "can you imagine to be in those, who think that the gods are to be appeased by cruelty and human blood?" And to raise at last the pity of the judges, he urges in a pathetic peroration the intercession and tears of Fonteus's sister, one of the vestal virgins, who was then present; opposing the piety and prayers of this holy suppliant, to the barbarity and perjuries of the impious Gauls; and admonishing the bench of the danger and arrogance of slighting the suit of one, whose petitions, if the gods should reject, they themselves must be all undone, &c.⁶

The cause of Cæcina was about the right of succession to a private estate, which depended on a subtle point of law⁷, arising from the interpretation of the prætor's interdict: it shows, however, his exact knowledge and skill in the civil law, and that his public character and employment gave no interruption to his usual diligence in pleading causes.

After the expiration of his ædileship he lost his cousin Lucius Cicero, the late companion of his journey to Sicily; whose death he laments with all the marks of a tender affection, in the following letter to Atticus.

"You, who of all men know me the best, will easily conceive how much I have been afflicted, and what a loss I have sustained both in my public and domestic life: for in him I had everything which could be agreeable to a man, from the obliging temper and behaviour of another. I make no doubt, therefore, but that you also are affected with it, not only for the share which you bear in my grief, but for your own loss of a relation and a friend, accomplished with every virtue; who loved you, as well from his own inclination, as from what he used to hear of you from me," &c.¹

What made his kinsman's death the more unlucky to him at this juncture, was the want of his help in making interest for the prætorship, for which he now offered himself a candidate, after the usual interval of two years², from the time of his being chosen ædile: but the city was in such a ferment all this summer, that there was like to be no election at all: the occasion of it arose from the publication of some new laws, which were utterly disliked and fiercely opposed by the senate. The first of them was proposed in favour of Pompey, by A. Gabinius, one of the tribunes, as a testimony of their gratitude, and the first fruits, as it were, of that power which he had restored to them. It was to grant him an extraordinary commission for quelling the pirates, who infested the coasts and navigation of the Mediterranean, to the disgrace of the empire, and the ruin of all commerce; by which an absolute command was conferred upon him through all the provinces bordering on that sea, as far as fifty miles within land. These pirates were grown so strong, and so audacious, that they had taken several Roman magistrates and ambassadors prisoners, made some successful descents on Italy itself, and burnt the navy of Rome in the very port

* Quod prius omnium invenit Q. Catulus, cum Capitolium dedicaret.—Plin. xix. 1. Cum sua ætas varie de hisce existimaverit, quod tegulas æneæ Capitolii inauraret prima.—Id. xxxiii. 3. Though Pliny calls Catulus the first inventor of these purple veils, yet Lucretius, who, to some think, died in this year, or, as others more probably, about sixteen years after, speaks of them as of common use in all the theatres.

Carmina et quondam magnis intenta theatris.

Lib. vi. 108.

Et vulgo faciunt id lutes, rursaque vela,
Et fœvagina, cum magnis intenta theatris,
Per malos volgata, trabasque tremantis iant.

Lib. iv. 73.

I cover covered the whole Forum with them, and the two amphitheatres, in all their shows of gladiators and other sports.—Dio, xliii.

¹ Id. Ter. iv. 31.

² Pro Fonteo, 5.

³ Pro Fonteo, 10.

⁴ Ibid. 17.

⁵ Tota mihi causa pro Cæcina, de verbis interdicti fuit: res involutas definiendo explicavimus.—Orator. 29.

⁶ Ad Attic. 1.

⁷ Ut si ad illis fuisset, post biennium tuus annus esset.

—Ep. Fam. x. 25.

⁸ Quis navigaret, qui non se aut mortis aut servitutis periculo committeret, cum aut hieme aut refero prædonum mari navigaret?—Pro Lege Manil. 11.

of Ostia^m. Yet the grant of a power so exorbitant and unknown to the laws was strenuously opposed by Catulus, Hortensius, and all the other chiefs of the senate, as dangerous to the public liberty, nor fit to be entrusted to any single person: they alleged, "That these unusual grants were the cause of all the misery that the republic had suffered from the proscriptions of Marius and Sylla, who, by a perpetual succession of extraordinary commands, were made too great to be controlled by the authority of the laws; that though the same abuse of power was not to be apprehended from Pompey, yet the thing itself was pernicious, and contrary to the constitution of Rome; that the equality of a democracy required, that the public honours should be shared alike by all who were worthy of them; that there was no other way to make men worthy, and to furnish the city with a number and choice of experienced commanders: and if, as it was said by some, there were really none at that time fit to command but Pompey, the true reason was, because they would suffer none to command but Pompeyⁿ." All the friends of Lucullus were particularly active in the opposition; apprehending, that this new commission would encroach upon his province and command in the Mithridatic war: so that Gabinus, to turn the popular clamour on that side, got a plan of the magnificent palace, which Lucullus was building, painted upon a banner, and carried about the streets by his mob; to intimate, that he was making all that expense out of the spoils of the republic^o.

Catulus, in speaking to the people against this law, demanded of them, if everything must needs be committed to Pompey, what they would do if any accident should befall him? Upon which, as Cicero says, he reaped the just fruit of his virtue, when they all cried out with one voice, that their dependence would then be upon him^p. Pompey himself, who was naturally a great dissembler, affected not only an indifference, but a dislike to the employment, and begged of the people to confer it on somebody else; and, after all the fatigues which he had undergone in their service, to give him leave to retire to the care of his domestic affairs, and spare him the trouble and odium of so invidious a commission^q. But this seeming self-denial gave a handle only to his friends to extol his modesty and integrity the more effectually; and, since there had been a precedent for the law a few years before, in favour of a man much inferior both in merit and interest, M. Antonius^r, it was carried

^m Qui ad vos ab exteris nationibus venirent, querar, cum legati populi Romani redempti sint? Mercatoribus tutum mare non fuisse dicam, cum duodecim secures in potestatem prædonum pervenerint?—Quid ego Ostiensæ in commodum, atque illam labem et ignominiam reipublice querar, cum prope inspectantibus vobis, classis ea, cui consuli populi Romani præpositus esset, a prædonibus capta atque oppressa est?—Pro Lege Man. 12.

ⁿ Dio, l. xxxvi. p. 18.

^o Tugurium ut jam videatur esse illa villa, quam ipse tribunus plebis pictam olim in concionibus explicabat, quo fortissimum ac summum civem—in invidiam vocaret.—Pro Sext. 43.

^p Qui cum ex vobis quereretur, si in uno Cn. Pompeio omnia poneretur, aliquid eo factum esset, in quo spes essetis habituri?—Ceptum magnum esse virtutis fructum, cum omnes una prope voce, in eo ipso vos spem habituros esse dixistis.—Pro Lege Man. 20.

^q Dio, l. xxxvi. p. 11.

^r Sed idem hoc ante biennium in M. Antonii prætura decretum.—Vell. Pat. II. 31.

against the united authority of all together, but with the general inclination of when, from the greatest scarcity which had been known for a long time the credit of Pompey's name sunk there at once, as if plenty had been abundant. But, though the senate could not but yet they had their revenge on Gabinus of it, by preventing his being chosen Pompey's lieutenants, which was what he wanted, and what Pompey himself solicited. Pompey probably made him amend another way; since, as Cicero says, he sitous at this time, and so profligate had not carried his law, he must have himself. Pompey had a fleet of sail allowed for this expedition, with lieutenants chosen out of the senate distributed so skillfully through the nations of the Mediterranean, that in days he drove the pirates out of the holes, and in four months put an end to the war: for he did not prepare for it in winter, set out upon it in the beginning, and finished it in the middle of summer.

A second law was published by Lucullus, assigning of distinct seats in the equestrian order, who used before commonly with the populace: but by sixteen rows of benches, next to those which were to be appropriated to their use secured to them, as Cicero says, both and their pleasure^s. The senate obtained the privilege of separate seats about a year before, in the consulship of Scipio Africanus, highly disgusted the people, and says Livy, as all innovations are apt to be, to debate and censure; for many of the condemned all such distinctions in dangerous to the public peace: and afterwards repented, and blamed the law^t. Otho's law, we may imagine greater offence, as it was a greater people, to be removed yet farther from things they were fondest of, the law shows: it was carried however by the

^s Quo die a vobis maritimo bello prætor, tanta repente villas annonæ ex caritate rei frumentariæ consecuta est, ut nomine, quantum vix ex summa ut diuturna pax efficere potuisset.—Pro Lege Man. 12.

^t Ne legatore A. Gabinus Cn. Pompeio postulanti.—Ib. 19.

^u Nisi rogationem de piratico bello legestate ac improbitate coactus piraticam Post redit. in Senat. 5.

^v Plutarch. in Pomp.

^w Ipse autem, ut a Brundisio profectus quædam die totam ad Imperium populi ciam adjunxit—ita tantum bellum—Cn. Pompeio apparuit, in eunte vere suscepti, et fecit.—Pro Lege Man. 12.

^x L. Otho, vir fortis, meus necessarius restituit non solum dignitatem, sed etiam Pro Mur. 19.

^y P. Africanus ille superior, ut dicitur sapientissimis hominibus, qui tum erant seipso sepe accusatus est, quod cum conesset tum primum a populari consensu se separari.—Pro Corn. 1. Fragment. c. l. xxxiv. 54.] Ea res avertit vulgi animi Scipionis vehementer quæsit.—Val. M.

the tribune, and is frequently referred to by the classic writers, as an act very memorable¹, and what made much noise in its time.

C. Cornelius also, another tribune, was pushing forward a third law, of a graver kind, to prohibit bribery in elections by the sanction of the severest penalties: the rigour of it highly displeased the senate, whose warm opposition raised great disorders in the city; so that all other business was interrupted, the elections of magistrates adjourned, and the consuls forced to have a guard. The matter however was compounded, by moderating the severity of the penalties in a new law offered by the consuls, which was accepted by Cornelius, and enacted in proper form under the title of the Calpurnian law, from the name of the consul C. Calpurnius Piso². Cicero speaks of it still as severely drawn³; for besides a pecuniary fine, it rendered the guilty incapable of any public office or place in the senate. This Cornelius seems to have been a brave and honest tribune, though somewhat too fierce and impetuous in asserting the rights of the citizens: he published another law, to prohibit any man's being absolved from the obligation of the laws, except by the authority of the people; which, though a part of the old constitution, had long been usurped by the senate, who dispensed with the laws by their own decrees, and those often made clandestinely, when a few only were privy to them. The senate being resolved not to part with so valuable a privilege, prevailed with another tribune to inhibit the publication of it, when it came to be read; upon which Cornelius took the book from the clerk, and read it himself. This too irregular, and much inveighed against, as a violation of the rights of the tribunate; so that Cornelius was once more forced to compound the matter by a milder law, forbidding the senate to pass any such decrees, unless when two hundred senators were present⁴. These disturbances however proved the occasion of an unexpected honour to Cicero, by giving him a more ample and public testimony of the people's affection; for in three different assemblies convened for the choice of prætors, two of which were dissolved without effect, he was declared every time the first prætor, by the suffrages of all the centuries⁵.

The prætor was a magistrate next in dignity to the consuls, created originally as a colleague or assistant to them in the administration of justice, and to supply their place also in absence⁶. At first there was but one; but as the dominion and affairs of the republic increased, so the number of prætors was gradually enlarged from one to eight. They were chosen, not as the inferior magistrates, by the people voting in their tribes, but in their centuries, as the consuls and censors also were. In the first method, the majority of votes in each tribe determined the general vote of the tribe, and a majority of tribes determined the election, in which the meanest citizen had as good a vote as the best: but in the second the balance of power was thrown into the hands of the better sort, by a wise contrivance of one of their kings, Servius Tullius; who divided the whole body of the citizens into a hundred and ninety-three centuries, according to a census or valuation of their estates; and then reduced these centuries into six classes according to the same rule, assigning to the first or richest class ninety-seven of these centuries, or a majority of the whole number: so that if the centuries of the first class agreed, the affair was over, and the votes of all the rest insignificant⁷.

The business of the prætors was to preside and judge in all causes, especially of a public or criminal kind, where their several jurisdictions were assigned to them by lot⁸; and it fell to Cicero's to sit upon actions of extortion and rapine, brought against magistrates and governors of provinces⁹; in which, as he tells us himself, he had acted as an accuser, sat as a judge, and presided as prætor¹⁰. In this office he acquired a great reputation of integrity by the condemnation of Licinius Mæcer, a person of prætorian dignity and great eloquence; who would have made an eminent figure at the bar, if his abilities had not been sullied by the infamy of a vicious life¹¹. "This man," as Plutarch relates it, "depending upon his interest, and the influence of Crassus, who supported him with all his power, was so confident of being acquitted, that without waiting for sentence, he went home to dress himself, and, as if already absolved, was returning towards the court in a white gown; but being met on his way by Crassus, and informed that he was condemned by the unanimous suffrage of the bench, he took his bed, and died immediately." The story is told differently by other writers: "That Mæcer was actually in the court expecting the issue; but perceiving Cicero ready to give judgment against him, he sent one to let him know that he was dead, and stopping his breath at the same time with a handkerchief, instantly expired; so that Cicero did not proceed to sentence, by which Mæcer's estate was saved to his son Licinius Calvus, an orator afterwards of the first merit and eminence¹²." But from Cicero's own account it appears, that after treating Mæcer in the trial with great candour and equity, he actually condemned him, with the universal approbation of the people; and did himself much more honour and service by it, than he could have reaped, he says, by Mæcer's friendship and interest, if he had acquitted him¹³.

Manilius, one of the new tribunes, no sooner entered into his office, than he raised a fresh disturbance in the city, by the promulgation of a law

¹ From this division of the people into classes, the word classical, which we now apply to writers of the first rank, is derived: for it signified originally persons of the first class, all the rest being styled infra classem.—Aul. Gell. vii. 13.

² In Verr. Act. l. 8.

³ Postulatur apud me prætorem primum de pecuniis repetundis.—Pro Cornel. l. fragm.

⁴ Accusavi de pecuniis repetundis, Judex sedi, prætor quesivi, &c.—Pro Rabir. Post. 4.

⁵ Brutus, 362.

⁶ Plutarch. in Cio.; Val. Max. ix. 12.

⁷ Nos hic incredibili ac singulari populi voluntate de C. Macro transigimus: cui cum æqui fuisset, tamen multo majorem fructum ex populi existimatione, illo damnato, cepimus, quam ex ipsius, si absolutus esset, gratia cepissemus.—Ad Att. l. 4.

D 2

¹ seditioneque magnus in primis Eques

Obno contempto sedet—Hon. Ep. iv. 15.

Ne libitum vamo, qui nos distingit, Ovi.

Juv. III. 169.

² De l. xxxv. c. 18.

³ Null enim severissime scripta Calpurnia.—Pro Mur. 23.

⁴ Accusati argument.—Pro Cornelio.

⁵ Nam cum propter dilationem comitiorum ter prætoribus seculis cunctis renuntiatis sum.—Pro Lege Man. l.

⁶ Aul. Gell. xiii. 15.

for granting to slaves set free a right of voting among the tribes; which gave so much scandal to all, and was so vigorously opposed by the senate, that he was presently obliged to drop it: but being always venal, as Velleius says, and the tool of other men's power, that he might recover his credit with the people, and engage the favour of Pompey, he proposed a second law, that Pompey, who was then in Cilicia extinguishing the remains of the piratic war, should have the government of Asia added to his commission, with the command of the Mithridatic war, and of all the Roman armies in those parts¹. It was about eight years since Lucullus was first sent to that war, in which, by a series of many great and glorious acts, he had acquired a reputation both of courage and conduct equal to that of the greatest generals: he had driven Mithridates out of his kingdom of Pontus, and gained several memorable victories against him, though supported by the whole force of Tigranes, the most potent prince of Asia; till his army, harassed by perpetual fatigues, and debauched by his factious officers, particularly by his brother-in-law young Clodius², began to grow impatient of his discipline, and to demand their discharge. Their disaffection was still increased by the unlucky defeat of one of his lieutenants, Triarius; who, in a rash engagement with Mithridates, was destroyed with the loss of his camp, and the best of his troops: so that as soon as they heard that Glabrio, the consul of the last year, was appointed to succeed him, and actually arrived in Asia, they broke out into an open mutiny, and refused to follow him any further, declaring themselves to be no longer his soldiers: but Glabrio, upon the news of these disorders, having no inclination to enter upon so troublesome a command, chose to stop short in Bithynia, without ever going to the army³.

This mutinous spirit in Lucullus's troops, and the loss of his authority with them, which Glabrio was still less qualified to sustain, gave a reasonable pretext to Manilius's law; and Pompey's success against the pirates, and his being upon the spot with a great army, made it likewise the more plausible: so that after a sharp contest and opposition from some of the best and greatest of the senate, the tribune carried his point, and got the law confirmed by the people. Cicero supported it with all his eloquence, in a speech from the rostra, which he had never mounted till this occasion: where, in displaying the character of Pompey, he draws the picture of a consummate general, with all the strength and beauty of colours which words can give. He was now in the career of his fortunes, and in sight as it were of the consulship, the grand object of his ambition; so that his conduct was suspected to flow from an interested view of facilitating his own advancement, by paying this court to Pompey's power: but the reasons already intimated, and Pompey's singular character of modesty and abstinence, joined to the superiority of his military fame, might probably convince it was not only safe, but necessary to commit a war, which nobody else could such a general; and a power, which ought to be entrusted with, to such a he himself solemnly affirms in the co speech: "I call the gods to witness, and especially those who preside over and inspect the minds of all who public affairs, that I neither do this of any one, nor to conciliate Pompey to procure from any man's greatness port in dangers, or assistance in hon dangers, I shall repel them, as a ma by the protection of my innocence; ar I shall obtain them, not from any si from this place, but from my usual la of life, and the continuance of your f ever pains therefore I have taken i have taken it all, I assure you, for t republic; and so far from serving i my own by it, have gained the ill wi of many, partly secret, partly decla sary to myself, yet not useless perha after so many favours received from very honour which I now enjoy, I b resolution, citizens, to prefer your w of the republic, and the safety of th all my own interests and advantages

J. Cæsar also was a zealous promo but from a different motive than t of Pompey or the republic: his d recommend himself by it to the favour, he foresaw, would be of m than the senate's, and to cast a fres on Pompey, which, by some accid improved afterwards to his hurt; but was to make the precedent familiar, use Pompey might make of it, he one day make a bad one⁴. For this effect of breaking through the barri by which many states have been i from a confidence in the abilities a some eminent citizen, they invest h occasions, with extraordinary powers mon benefit and defence of the socie power so entrusted may in particul singular service, and sometimes even the example is always dangerous, fu petual pretence to the ambitious an to grasp at every prerogative wh granted at any time to the virtuous power, which would save a country oppresses it at last in bad.

Though Cicero had now full empic tor, both in the affairs of state and yet he found time still to act the ad as the judge, and not only to hear ca tribunal, but to plead them also at of the other prætors. He now defe tius, a Roman knight of splendid f tunes, accused before the prætor Q. ing his father in law Oppianicus, w before had been tried and banished, to poison Cluentius. The oration, v lays open a scene of such compl by poisons, murder, incest, suborn corrupting judges, as the poets th

¹ Acon. in Orat. pro Cornel.; Dio, l. xxxvi. 20.

² Semper venalis, et alienæ minister potentiæ, legem tulit, ut bellum Mithridaticum per Cn. Pompeium administraretur.—Vell. Pat. li. 33.

³ Post, exercitu L. Luculli sollicitato per nefandum scelus, fugit illinc.—De Haruspium Responsa. 20; Plutarch. in Lucull.

⁴ Pro Lege Manil. 2, 9; Plutarch. ib.; Dio, l. xxxvi. p. 7.

¹ Pro Lege Manil. 24.

² Dio,

never feigned in any one family; all contrived by the mother of Cicerus against the life and fortunes of her son: "But what a mother!" says Cicero; "one, who is hurried blindfold by the most cruel and brutal passions; whose lust, no sense of shame restrains; who by the viciousness of her mind perverts all the laws of men to the worst ends; who acts with such folly, that none can take her for a human creature; with such violence, that none can imagine her to be a woman; with such cruelty, that none can conceive her to be a mother; one, who has confounded not only the name and the rights of nature, but all the relations of it too: the wife of her son-in-law! the stepmother of her son! the invader of her daughter's bed! in short, who has nothing left in her of the human species but the mere form."

He is supposed to have defended several other criminals this year, though the pleadings are now lost, and particularly M. Fundanius; but what gives the most remarkable proof of his industry, is that during his prætorship, as some of the ancient writers tell us, though he was in full practice and exercise of speaking, yet he frequented the school of a celebrated rhetorician, Gnipho⁷. We cannot suppose that his design was to learn anything new, but to preserve and confirm that perfection which he had already acquired, and prevent any ill habit from growing insensibly upon him, by exercising himself under the observation of so judicious a master. But his chief view certainly was, to give some countenance and encouragement to Gnipho himself, as well as to the art which he professed; and by the presence and authority of one of the first magistrates of Rome, to inspire the young nobles with an ambition to excel in it.

When his magistracy was just at an end, Manilius, whose tribunate expired a few days before, was accused before him of rapine and extortion: and though ten days were always allowed to the criminal to prepare for his defence, he appointed the very next day for the trial. This startled and offended the citizens, who generally favoured Manilius, and looked upon the prosecution as the effect of malice and resentment on the part of the senate, for his law in favour of Pompey. The tribunes therefore called Cicero to an account before the people, for treating Manilius so roughly; who in defence of himself said, that as it had been his practice to treat all criminals with humanity, so he had no design of acting otherwise with Manilius, but on the contrary, had appointed that short day for the trial, because it was the only one of which he was master; and that it was not the part of those who wished well to Manilius, to throw off the cause to another judge. This made a wonderful change in the minds of the audience, who applauding his conduct, desired then that he would undertake the defence of Manilius, to which he consented; and stepping up again into the rostra, laid open the source of the whole affair, with many severe reflections upon the enemies of Pompey⁸. The trial, however, was dropped, on account of the tumults which arose immediately after in the city, from some new incidents of much greater importance.

At the consular election, which was held this summer, P. Autronius Pætus and P. Cornelius Sylla were declared consuls; but their election was no sooner published, than they were accused of bribery and corruption by the Calpurnian law, and being brought to trial, and found guilty before their entrance into office, forfeited the consulship to their accusers and competitors, L. Manlius Torquatus and L. Aurelius Cotta. Catiline also, who from his prætorship had obtained the province of Afric, came to Rome this year to appear a candidate at the election, but being accused of extortion and rapine in that government, was not permitted by the consuls to pursue his pretensions⁹.

This disgrace of men so powerful and desperate engaged them presently in a conspiracy against the state, in which it was resolved to kill the new consuls, with several others of the senate, and share the government among themselves: but the effect of it was prevented by some information given of the design, which was too precipitately laid to be ripe for execution. Cn. Piso, an audacious, needy, factious young nobleman, was privy to it¹⁰; and, as Suetonius says, two more of much greater weight, M. Crassus and J. Cæsar; the first of whom was to be created dictator, the second his master of the horse: but Crassus's heart failing him, either through fear or repentance, he did not appear at the appointed time, so that Cæsar would not give the signal agreed upon, of letting his robe drop from his shoulder¹¹. The senate was particularly jealous of Piso, and hoping to cure his disaffection by making him easy in his fortunes, or to remove him at least from the cabals of his associates, gave him the government of Spain, at the instance of Crassus, who strenuously supported him as a determined enemy to Pompey. But before his setting out, Cæsar and he are said to have entered into a new and separate engagement, that the one should begin some disturbance abroad, while the other was to prepare and inflame matters at home: but this plot also was defeated by the unexpected death of Piso; who was assassinated by the Spaniards, as some say, for his cruelty, or, as others, by Pompey's clients, and at the instigation of Pompey himself¹².

Cicero, at the expiration of his prætorship, would not accept any foreign province¹³, the usual

⁷ Qui tibi, cum L. Volcatius consul in consilio fulsset, ne petendi quidem potestatem esse voluerunt.—Orat. in Tog. cand.

Catilina, pecuniarum repetundarum reus, prohibitus erat petere consulatum.—Sall. Bell. Cat. 18.

⁸ Cn. Piso, adolescens nobilis, summæ audaciæ, egens, factiosus—cum hoc Catilina et Autronius, consilio communicato, parabant in Capitolio L. Cottam et L. Torquatum consules interficere. Ea re cognita, rursus in Nomas Feb. consilium cædis transtulerant.—Ibid.

⁹ Ut principio anni senatum adorirentur, et trucidatis, quos placitum esset, dictatorem Crassum invaderet, ipse ab eo Magister Equitum diceretur.—Crassum penitentia vel metu diem cædi destinatum non obisse, idcirco, ne Cæsarem quidem signum, quod ab eo dari convenerat, dedisse.—Sueton. in J. Cæs. 9.

¹⁰ Pactumque, ut simul foris ille, ipse Romæ, ad res novas consurgerent.—Ibid.

Sunt, qui dicant, imperia ejus injusta barbaros nequissime pati: alii autem, equites illos, Cn. Pompeii veteres clientes, voluntate ejus Pisonem aggressos.—Sall. Bell. Cat. 19.

¹¹ Tu in provinciam ire noluisti: non possum id in te

¹ Pro Cicer. 70.

² Subdum ejus claros viros frequentasse alunt; in his M. Cicerum, etiam cum prætura fungeretur.—Sueton. de vir. Grammat. 7; Macrobi. Saturn. iii. 12.

³ Paterch. in Cio.

reward of that magistracy, and the chief fruit which the generality proposed from it. He had no particular love for money, nor genius for arms, so that those governments had no charms for him: the glory which he pursued was to shine in the eyes of the city, as the guardian of its laws, and to teach the magistrates how to execute, the citizens how to obey them. But he was now preparing to sue for the consulship, the great object of all his hopes; and his whole attention was employed how to obtain it in his proper year, and without a repulse. There were two years necessarily to intervene between the prætorship and consulship; the first of which was usually spent in forming a general interest, and soliciting for it as it were in a private manner; the second in suing for it openly in the proper form and habit of a candidate. The affection of the city, so signally declared for him in all the inferior steps of honour, gave him a strong presumption of success in his present pretensions to the highest: but as he had reason to apprehend a great opposition from the nobility, who looked upon the public dignities as a kind of birth-right, and could not brook their being intercepted and snatched from them by new men¹; so he resolved to put it out of their power to hurt him, by omitting no pains which could be required of a candidate, of visiting and soliciting all the citizens in person. At the election therefore of the tribunes on the sixteenth of July, where the whole city was assembled in the field of Mars, he chose to make his first effort, and to mix himself with the crowd, on purpose to caress and salute them familiarly by name: and as soon as there was any vacation in the forum, which happened usually in August, he intended to make an excursion into the Cisalpine Gaul, and in the character of a lieutenant to Piso, the governor of it, to visit the towns and colonies of that province, which was reckoned very strong in the number of its votes, and so return to Rome in January following². While he was thus employed in suing for the consulship, L. Cotta, a remarkable lover of wine, was one of the censors, which gave occasion to one of Cicero's jokes, that Plutarch has transmitted to us, that happening one day to be dry with the fatigue of his task, he called for a glass of water to quench his thirst; and when his friends stood close around him as he was drinking, You do well, says he, to cover me, lest Cotta should censure me for drinking water.

He wrote about the same time to Atticus, then at Athens, to desire him to engage all that band of Pompey's dependants who were serving under him in the Mithridatic war; and by way of jest, bids him tell Pompey himself, that he would not take it ill of him, if he did not come in person to his election³. Atticus spent many years in this residence at Athens, which gave Cicero an opportunity of employing him to buy a great number of statues for the ornament of his severally that at Tusculum, in which greatest pleasure⁴; for its delightful neighbourhood of Rome, and that of an easy retreat from the hurry in the city: here he had built several galleries, in imitation of the schools at Athens, which he called likewise by names of the Academy and Gymnasium for the same use of philosophy with his learned friends. He had given general commission to purchase for him of Grecian art or sculpture, which was curious, especially of the literary kind for the furniture of his academy⁵; executed to his great satisfaction, at different times several cargoes of which arrived safe at the port of Cajeta Formian villa⁶; and pleased him all both in the choice and the price of the receipt of each parcel he still orders for more.

"I have paid (says he) a hundred pounds, as you ordered, to your agent the Megaric statues. The Mercurius mentioned, of Pentelician marble, heads, give me already great pleasure would have you send me as many as you can, and as soon as possible, with antiques and ornaments which you think proper place, and in my taste, and good enough; but above all, such as will nasium and portico: for I am proud all things of that kind, that probably may blame me, yet I depend on me."

Of all the pieces which Atticus used to have been the most pleased with, pound emblematical figures, representing Minerva, or Mercury and Hercules upon one base, called Hermathena: the name for Hercules being the proper Gymnasium, Minerva of the Academy common to both, they exactly suited for which he desired them⁷. But he on embellishing this Tusculan villa of Grecian work, that he sent over

¹ Quæ tibi mandavi, et quæ tu con nostro Tusculano, velim, ut scribis, cures: molestis et laboribus uno illo in loco. Ad Att. 1. 5.

² Quicquid ejusdem generis habebis, id quod tibi videbitur, ne dubitaveris mittere confido.—Ad Att. 1. 9; vid. lib. 5. 6.

³ Signa, quæ curasti, ea sunt ad Cajetam. Ibid. 3.

⁴ Hermathena tua me valde delectat.—me de Hermathena scribis, per mihi grati Hermes commune omnium, et Minervæ insignis ejus gymnasii.—Ibid. 4. Signa naves, cum commodissime poteris, velim.

⁵ The learned generally take these Hermathenas to be nothing more than a tall stone, which was the emblem of Mercury of the other deity, Minerva or Hercules, and sort there are several still extant, as is described in the books of antiquities. I think, that the heads of both the deities also joined together upon the same pedestal ways, as we see in those antique figures now indiscriminately called Janus's.

reprehendere, quod in mæpso prætor—probavi.—Pro Muren. 20.

¹ Non idem mihi licet quod illis, qui nobili genere nati sunt, quibus omnia populi Romani beneficia dormientibus deferuntur.—In Verr. v. 70.

² Quoniam videtur in suffragis multum posse Gallia, cum Romæ a judiciis forum refrigerit, excurreremus mense Septembri legati ad Plonem.—Ad Att. 1. 1.

³ Illam manum tu mihi cura ut præstes, Pompeii nostri amici. Nega me ei iratum fore, si ad mea comitia non venerit.—Ibid.

plans of his ceilings, which were of stucco-work, in order to bespeak pieces of sculpture or painting to be inserted in the compartments; with the covers of two of his wells or fountains, which according to the custom of those times they used to form after some elegant pattern, and adorn with figures in relief.

Nor was he less eager in making a collection of Greek books, and forming a library, by the same opportunity of Atticus's help. This was Atticus's own passion, who having free access to all the libraries of Athens, was employing his slaves in copying the works of their best writers, not only for his own use, but for sale also, and the common profit both of the slave and the master: for Atticus was remarkable above all men of his rank for a family of learned slaves, having scarce a footboy in his house who was not trained both to read and write for him. By this advantage he had made a very large collection of choice and curious books, and signified to Cicero his design of selling them; yet seems to have intimated withal, that he expected a larger sum for them than Cicero would easily spare: which gave occasion to Cicero to beg of him in several letters to reserve the whole number for him, till he could raise money enough for the purchase.

"Pray keep your books," says he, "for me, and do not despair of my being able to make them mine; which if I can compass, I shall think myself richer than Crassus, and despise the fine villas and gardens of them all." Again: "Take care that you do not part with your library to any man, how eager soever he may be to buy it; for I am setting apart all my little rents to purchase that relief for my old age." In a third letter, he says, "That he had placed all his hopes of comfort and pleasure, whenever he should retire from business, in Atticus's reserving these books for him."

But to return to the affairs of the city. Cicero was now engaged in the defence of C. Cornelius, who was accused and tried for practices against the state in his late tribunate, before the prætor Q. Gallus. This trial, which lasted four days, was one of the most important in which he had ever been concerned: the two consuls presided in it; and all the chiefs of the senate, Q. Catulus, L. Lucullus, Hortensius, &c. appeared as witnesses against the criminal; whom Cicero defended, as Quintilian says, not only with strong, but shining arms, and with a force of eloquence that drew acclamations from the people. He published two orations spoken in this cause, whose loss is a public detriment to the literary world, since they were reckoned among the most finished of his compositions: he himself refers to them as such; and the old critics have drawn many examples from them of that genuine eloquence, which extorts applause and excites admiration.

C. Papius, one of the tribunes, published a law this year to oblige all strangers to quit the city, as one of his predecessors, Pennus, had done likewise many years before him. The reason which they alleged for it, was the confusion occasioned by the multitude and insolence of foreigners, who assumed the habit and usurped the rights of citizens: but Cicero condemns all these laws as cruel and inhospitable, and a violation of the laws of nature and humanity.

Catiline was now brought to a trial for his oppressions in Africa: he had been soliciting Cicero to undertake his defence; who at one time was much inclined, or determined rather to do it, for the sake of obliging the nobles, especially Cæsar and Crassus, or of making Catiline at least his friend, as he signifies in a letter to Atticus: "I design," says he, "at present to defend my competitor Catiline: we have judges to our mind, yet such as the accuser himself is pleased with: I hope, if he be acquitted, that he will be the more ready to serve me in our common petition; but if it fall out otherwise, I shall bear it with patience. It is of great importance to me to have you here as soon as possible: for there is a general persuasion, that certain nobles of your acquaintance will be against me; and you, I know, could be of the greatest service in gaining them over." But Cicero changed his mind, and did not defend him; upon a nearer view perhaps of his designs and traitorous practices; to which he seems to allude when, describing the art and dissimulation of Catiline, he declares, that he himself was once almost deceived by him, so as to take him for a good citizen, a lover of honest men, a firm and faithful friend, &c.^b But it is not strange, that a candidate for the consulship, in the career of his ambition, should think of defending a man of the first rank and interest in the city, when all the consular senators, and even the consul himself, Torquatus, appeared with him at the trial, and gave testimony in his favour. Whom Cicero excused, when they were afterwards reproached with it, by observing, that they had no notion of his treasons, nor suspicion at that time of his conspiracy; but out of mere humanity and compassion defended a friend in distress, and in that crisis of his danger overlooked the infamy of his life.^c

His prosecutor was P. Clodius, a young nobleman as profligate as himself; so that it was not difficult to make up matters with such an accuser, who for a sum of money agreed to betray the

* Præterea typos tibi mando, quos in tectorio atrio tui inchoare, et putealis sigillata duo.—Ad Att. l. 10.

† In ea erant poeri literatissimi, anagnostæ optimi, et prætor liberrati; ut ne pedisequus quidem quisquam esset, qui non utrumque horum pulchre facere posset.—Cicero. Mem. in vita Attici, 13.

‡ Libros tuos conserva, et noli desperare, eos me meos habere posse: quod at assessor, supero Crassum divitiis, atque senatus vicos et prata contemno.—Ad Att. l. 4.

§ Bibliothecam tuam cave cuiquam despondas, quamvis minus amatores invenieris.—Ibid. 10.

|| Vides cogites, id quod mihi pollicitus es, quemadmodum bibliothecam nobis conficere possis. Omnem spem delationis nostræ, quam cum in otium venerimus, habere volumus, in tua humanitate postea habemus.—Ibid. 7.

¶ Assens. Argum.

‡ Non servitus modo, sed etiam fulgentibus præliatus est Clodius in causa Cornelii.—Lib. viii. 3.

x Orator. 67, 70.

y Usu vero urbis prohibere peregrinos sane inhumanum est.—De Offic. lib. 11.

z Ad Attic. l. 2. a Ascen. in Tog. cand.

b Melipsum, me, inquam, quondam illo pæne decepti, cum et civis mihi bonus, et optimi cujusque cupidus, et firmus amicus et fidelis videretur.—Pro Cælio, 6.

c Accusati sunt uno nomine consulares—affuerunt Catilinae, eumque laudarunt. Nulla tum patebat, nulla erat cognita conjuratio, &c.—Pro Syll. 29.

cause, and suffer him to escape⁴: which gave occasion to what Cicero said afterwards in a speech against him in the senate, while they were suing together for the consulship: "Wretch! not to see that thou art not acquitted, but reserved only to a severer trial and heavier punishment⁵." It was in this year, as Cicero tells us, under the consuls Cotta and Torquatus, that those prodigies happened, which were interpreted to portend the great dangers and plots that were now hatching against the state, and broke out two years after in Cicero's consulship; when the turrets of the Capitol, the statues of the gods, and the brazen image of the infant Romulus sucking the wolf, were struck down by lightning⁶.

Cicero being now in his forty-third year, the proper age required by law⁷, declared himself a candidate for the consulship along with six competitors, P. Sulpicius Galba, L. Sergius Catilina, C. Antonius, L. Cassius Longinus, Q. Cornificius, C. Licinius Sacerdos. The two first were patricians, the two next plebeians, yet noble; the two last the sons of fathers who had first imported the public honours into their families: Cicero was the only new man among them, or one born of equestrian rank⁸. Galba and Cornificius were persons of great virtue and merit: Sacerdos particular blemish upon him; Cass weak, but not thought so wicked as appeared to be; Antonius and Cat infamous in their lives and charac intrigue and faction had acquired s tereat in the city, and joined all their Cicero, as their most formidable; which they were vigorously supporte and Caesar¹.

This was the state of the competiti the practice of bribing was carried and shamefully by Antonius and Cat senate thought it necessary to give s it by a new and more rigorous law; were proceeding to publish it, L. Muc one of the tribunes, put his negative This tribune had been Cicero's cli fended by him in an impeachment of robbery; but having now sold h enemies, made it the subject of all to ridicule his birth and character, as the consulship: in the debate therefo in the senate upon the merit of his ne provoked to find so desperate a confe him, rose up, and after some raille tulation with Mucius, made a most tive on the flagitious lives and practi competitors, in a speech usually c candida, because it was delivered in the proper habit of all candidates, ar the name itself was derived².

Though he had now business eno hands to engage his whole attention him employed in the defence of Q prætor of the last year, accused of cor in procuring that magistracy. Gal when chosen ædile, had disgusted (not providing any wild beasts for th ment in his public shows; so that to good humour when he stood for the entertained them with gladiators, o giving them in honour of his dec This was his crime, of which he v M. Cælidius, whose father had be before by Gallius. Cælidius was or eloquent and accurate speakers of l easy, flowing, copious style, alwa though seldom warming his audienc the only thing wanting to make hi orator. Besides the public crime ju he charged Gallius with a private on self, a design to poison him; of whic to have manifest proofs, as well from of witnesses, as of his own hand an he told his story with so much ten lence, that Cicero, from his coldnes fact so interesting, and where his attempted, formed an argument to could not be true. "How is it poss

⁴ A Catlina pecuniam accepti, ut turpissime prævaricaretur.—De Harusp. Resp. 20.

⁵ O miser, qui non sentias illo iudicio te non absolutum, verum ad aliquod severius iudicium, ac majus supplicium reservatum.—Orat. in Tog. cand.

⁶ Tactus est ille etiam, qui hanc urbem condidit, Romulus: quem inauratum in Capitolio parvum atque lactantem, uberibus lupinis inhiantem fuisse meministi.—In Catil. iii. 8.

This same figure, as it is generally thought, formed in brass, of the infants Romulus and Remus sucking the wolf, is still preserved and shown in the Capitol, with the marks of a liquefaction by a stroke of lightning on one of the legs of the wolf. Cicero himself has described the prodigy in the following lines:

Hic silvestris erat Romani nominis alitrix
Marta; quæ parvos Mavortis semine natos
Uberibus gravidis vitali rore rigabat.
Quæ tum cum pueris flammato fulminis ictu
Concidit, atque avulsa pedum vestigia liquit.

De Divinat. l. 12.

It was the same statue, most probably, whence Virgil drew his elegant description:

— Geminos huius ubera circum
Ludere pendentes pueros, et lambere matrem
Impavidos. Illam toret cervicæ reflexam Muloere alternos, et corpora fingere linguis.
Æneid. viii. 631.

The martial twins beneath their mother lay,
And hanging on her dugs with wanton play
Securely suck'd: whilst she reclined her head
To lick their tender limbs, and form them as they fed.

et Nonne tertio et tricesimo anno mortem oblit? quæ est etas, nostris legibus, decem annis minor, quam consularis.—Phillip. v. 17.

⁷ The distinction of patrician, plebeian, and noble, may want a little explication. The title of patrician belonged only, in a proper sense, to those families of which the senate was composed in the earliest times, either of the kings, or the first consuls, before the commons had obtained a promiscuous admission to the public honours, and by that means into the senate. All other families, how considerable soever, were constantly styled plebeian. Patrician then and plebeian are properly opposed to each other; but noble common to them both: for the character of nobility was wholly derived from the curule magistracies which any family had borne; and those which could boast of the greatest number, were always nobler; so that many plebeians surpassed themselves in the point of nobility.—Vid in Tog. cand.

¹ Catilina et Antonius, quanquam on infamis eorum vita esset, tamen multum erant enim ambo, ut Ciceronem consu adjutoribus usi firmissimis, M. Crasso Ascon. argum. in Tog. cand.

² Ibid.

¹ Ascon. not. ibid

"Calpurnius, for you to plead in such a manner, if you did not know the thing to be forged? How could you, who act with such force of eloquence in other men's dangers, be so indolent in your own? Where was that grief, that ardour, which was to extort cries and lamentations from the most stupid? We saw no emotion of your mind, none of your body; no striking your forehead, or your thigh; no stamping with your foot: so that instead of feeling ourselves inflamed, we could hardly forbear sleeping, while you were urging all that part of your charge." Cicero's speech is lost, but Calpurnius was acquitted; for we find him afterwards revenging himself in the same kind on this very Calpurnius, by accusing him of bribery in his suit for the consulship¹.

J. Cæsar was one of the assistant judges this year to the prætor, whose province it was to sit upon the sicarii, that is, those who were accused of killing, or carrying a dagger with intent to kill. This gave him an opportunity of citing before him as criminals, and condemning by the law of assassinate, all those, who in Sylla's proscription had been known to kill, or receive money for killing a proscribed citizen; which money Cato also, when he was quæstor the year before, had made them refund to the treasury². Cæsar's view was, to mortify the senate and ingratiate himself with the people, by reviving the Marian cause, which had always been popular, and of which he was naturally the head, on account of his near relation to old Marius: for which purpose he had the hardiness likewise to replace in the Capitol the trophies and statues of Marius, which Sylla had ordered to be thrown down and broken to pieces³. But while he was prosecuting with such severity the agents of Sylla's cruelty, he not only spared, but favoured Catiline, who was one of the most cruel in spilling the blood of the proscribed; having butchered with his own hands, and in a manner the most brutal, C. Marius Gratidianus, a favourite of the people, nearly related both to Marius and Cicero; whose head he carried in triumph through the streets to make a present of it to Sylla⁴. But Cæsar's zeal provoked L. Paullus to bring Catiline also under the lash of the same law, and to accuse him in form, after his repulse from the consulship, of the murder of many citizens in Sylla's proscription: of which though he was notoriously guilty, yet, contrary to all expectation, he was acquitted⁵.

Catiline was suspected also at the same time of another heinous and capital crime, an incestuous commerce with Fabia, one of the vestal virgins, and sister to Cicero's wife. This was charged upon him so loudly by common fame, and gave such scandal to the city, that Fabia was brought to a trial for it; but either through her innocence, or the authority of her brother Cicero, she was readily acquitted: which gave occasion to Cicero to tell him, among the other reproaches on his flagitious life, that there was no place so sacred, whither his very visits did not carry pollution, and leave the imputation of guilt, where there was no real crime subsisting⁶.

As the election of consuls approached, Cicero's interest appeared to be superior to that of all the candidates: for the nobles themselves, though always envious, and desirous to depress him, yet out of regard to the dangers which threatened the city from many quarters, and seemed ready to burst out into a flame, began to think him the only man qualified to preserve the republic, and break the cabals of the desperate, by the vigour and prudence of his administration: for in cases of danger, as Sallust observes, pride and envy naturally subside, and yield the post of honour to virtue⁷. The method of choosing consuls was not by an open vote, but by a kind of ballot, or little tickets of wood, distributed to the citizens with the names of the candidates severally inscribed upon each: but in Cicero's case, the people were not content with this secret and silent way of testifying their inclinations; but before they came to any scrutiny, loudly and universally proclaimed Cicero the first consul: so that, as he himself declared in his speech to them after his election, he was not chosen by the votes of particular citizens, but the common suffrage of the city; nor declared by the voice of the crier, but of the whole Roman people⁸. He was the only new man who had obtained this sovereign dignity, or, as he expresses it, had forced the entrenchments of the nobility for forty years past, from the first consulship of C. Marius, and the only one likewise who had ever obtained it in his proper year, or without a repulse⁹. Antonius was chosen his colleague by the majority of a few centuries above his friend and partner Catiline; which was effected probably by Cicero's management, who considered him as the less dangerous and more tractable of the two.

Cicero's father died this year on the twenty-fourth of November¹⁰, in a good old age, with the comfort to have seen his son advanced to the supreme honour of the city, and wanted nothing to complete the happiness of his life, but the addition of one year more, to have made him a witness of the glory of his consulship. It was in this year

¹ Cum ita vixisti, ut non esset locus tam sanctus, quo non adventus tuus, etiam cum culpa nulla subesset, crimen afferret.—Orat. in Tog. cand.; vid. Acon. ad locum.

² Sed ubi periculum advenit, invidia atque superbia post fuere.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 23.

³ Sed tamen magnificentius esse illo nihil potest, quod meis comitiis non tabellam vindicem tacite libertatis, sed vocem vivam præ vobis indicem vestrarum erga me voluntatum tulistis.—Itaque me non extrema tribus suffragiorum, sed primi illi vestri concursus, neque singule voces præconum, sed una voce universus populus Romanus consulem declaravit.—De Leg. Agrar. con. Rull. li. 2; In Pison. 1.

⁴ Eum locum, quem nobilitas præsidii firmatum, atque omni ratione obvallatum tenebat, me duce roscidistis.—Me esse unum, ex omnibus novis hominibus, de quibus meminisse possumus, qui consulatum petierim, cum primum licitum est; consul factus sum, cum primum petierim.—De Leg. Agrar. ib. i. 2.

⁵ Pater nobis decessit ad diem viii. Kal. Decemb.—Ad Att. i. 6.

⁶ Brutus, pp. 402, 3.

⁷ Epist. Fam. viii. 4.

⁸ Plutarch. in Cato. §. Sueton. J. Cæs. 11.

⁹ Quorum auctoritatem, ut, quibus posset modis, dimiseret, trophies C. Marii, a Sylla olim dejecta, restituit.—Quint. Id.

¹⁰ Qui hominem carissimum populo Romano—omni cruenta vivum laceravit; stanti collum gladio una dextera securit; cum sinistra capillum ejus a vertice teneret, &c.—Vid. De Petitione Consulatus. 3.

Quod caput etiam tum plenum anime et spiritus, ad cylum, neque a Janiculo ad sedem Apollinis, manibus que suis detulit.—In Tog. cand.

¹¹ His absolutum Catilinam.—Ad Att. i. 16; Sallust. Bell. Cat. 2; Dio, l. lvi. p. 34.

also most probably, though some critics seem to dispute it, that Cicero gave his daughter Tullia in marriage at the age of thirteen to C. Piso Frugi, a young nobleman of great hopes, and one of the best families in Rome²: it is certain at least, that his son was born in this same year, as he expressly tells us, in the consulship of L. Julius Cæsar and C. Marcus Figulus³. So that with the highest honour which the public could bestow, he received the highest pleasure which private life ordinarily admits, by the birth of a son and heir to his family.

SECTION III.

CICERO was now arrived through the usual gradation of honours, at the highest which the people could regularly give, or an honest citizen desire. The offices which he had already borne had but a partial jurisdiction, confined to particular branches of the government; but the consuls held the reins, and directed the whole machine with an authority as extensive as the empire itself⁴. The subordinate magistracies, therefore, being the steps only to this sovereign dignity, were not valued so much for their own sake, as for bringing the candidates still nearer to the principal object of their hopes, who through this course of their ambition were forced to practise all the arts of popularity; to court the little as well as the great, to espouse the principles and politics in vogue, and to apply their talents to conciliate friends, rather than to serve the public⁵. But the consulship put an end to this subjection, and with the command of the state gave them the command of themselves: so that the only care left was, how to execute this high office with credit and dignity, and employ the power entrusted to them for the benefit and service of their country.

We are now, therefore, to look upon Cicero in a different light, in order to form a just idea of his character: to consider him, not as an ambitious courtier, applying all his thoughts and pains to his own advancement; but as a great magistrate and statesman, administering the affairs and directing the councils of a mighty empire. And according to the accounts of all the ancient writers, Rome never stood in greater need of the skill and vigilance of an able consul than in this very year. For besides the traitorous cabals and conspiracies of those who were attempting to subvert the whole republic, the new tribunes were also labouring to disturb the present quiet of it: some of them were laws to abolish everything that remain establishment, and to restore the sons scribed to their estates and honours reverse the punishment of P. Sylla and condemned for bribery, and replace senate: some were for expunging all others, for dividing the lands of the poorer citizens⁶: so that, as Cicero delivered into his hands full of terrors distracted by pestilent laws and seditious endangered, not by foreign wars, but in and the traitorous designs of profligate and that there was no mischief incident which the honest had not cause to apprehended to expect⁷.

What gave the greater spirit to these attempts, was Antonius's advance consulship: they knew him to be of principles and embarked in the same themselves, which, by his authority, they to carry into effect. Cicero was aware and foresaw the mischief of a colleague him in power, yet opposite in views, to frustrate all his endeavours for the vice; so that his first care, after their to gain the confidence of Antonius, him from his old engagements to the the republic; being convinced that all of his administration depended upon it therefore, to tempt him by a kind which seldom fails of its effect with character, the offer of power to his as of money to his pleasures: with caught him; and a bargain was pressed upon between them, that Antonius should choice of the best province which was to them at the expiration of their year the custom for the senate to appoint which provinces were to be distributed every several magistrates, who used afterwards for them among themselves; the the prætorian, the consuls for the provinces. In this partition, therefore, donia, one of the most desirable governments the empire, both for command and wealth Cicero's lot, he exchanged it immediately for Cisalpine Gaul, which also soon after in favour of Q. Metellus resolved, as he declared in his inaugural to administer the consulship in such: to put it out of any man's power either or terrify him from his duty: since sought, nor would accept, any profit or benefit, from it whatsoever; the one he, by which a man can discharge it and freedom; so as to chastise those who wish ill to the republic, or despise the ill to himself: a noble declaration, as

² Tulliolam C. Pisoni, L. F. Frugi despondimus.—Ad Attic. l. 3. Is, Casaubon, rather than give up an hypothesis which he had formed about the earlier date of this letter, will hardly allow that Tullia was marriageable at this time, though Cicero himself expressly declares it.—Vid. not. varior. in locum.

³ L. Julio Cæsare et C. Marcio Figulo Consulibus, filiole me auctum scito, salva Terentia.—Ad Attic. l. 3.

⁴ Omnes enim in Consulibus jure et imperio debent esse provincie.—Philipp. iv. 4. Tu summum imperium—gubernacula republice—orbis terrarum imperium a populo Romano petebas.—Pro Mur. 35.

⁵ Jam urbanam multitudinem, et eorum studia, qui conciones tenent, adeptus es, in Pompeio orando, Manili causa recipienda, Cornelio defendendo, &c.—Nec tamen in petendo republica capessenda est, neque in senatu, neque in concione: sed hæc tibi retinenda, &c.—De Petitione Consulatus. 13.

⁶ Pro Sylla, 22, 23.

⁷ Dio, l. xxxvii.

⁸ De Lege Agraria. cont. Rull. l. 8, 9; il. 3.

⁹ Collegam suum Antonium pactione prelerat, ne contra rempublicam dissentiret Cat. 26.

¹⁰ Cum mihi deliberatum et constitutum consulatum, quo uno modo geri gravior et ut neque provinciam, neque honorem, neque aliquid, aut commodum—appetiturus sim—ut posim tribunal plebis republice iram mihi iratum continere.—Contra Rull. l. 8.

be transmitted to posterity for an example to all magistrates in a free state. By this address he entirely drew Antonius into his measures, and had him ever after obsequious to his will¹; or, as he himself expresses it, by his patience and complaisance he softened and calmed him, eagerly desirous of a province, and projecting many things against the state². The establishment of this concord between them was thought to be of such importance to the public quiet, that in his first speech to the people, he declared it to them from the rostra, as an event the most likely to curb the insolence of the factious, and raise the spirits of the honest, and prevent the dangers with which the city was then threatened³.

There was another project likewise which he had much at heart, and made one of the capital points of his administration, to unite the equestrian order with the senate into one common party and interest. This body of men, next to the senators, consisted of the richest and most splendid families of Rome, who, from the ease and affluence of their fortunes, were naturally well-affected to the prosperity of the republic; and being also the constant farmers of all the revenues of the empire, had a great part of the inferior people dependent upon them. Come imagined, that the united weight of these two orders would always be an over-balance to any other power in the state, and a secure barrier against any attempts of the popular and ambitious upon the common liberty⁴. He was the only man in the city capable of effecting such a coalition, being now at the head of the senate, yet the darling of the knights; who considered him as the pride and ornament of their order, whilst he, to ingratiate himself the more with them, affected always in public to boast of that extraction, and to call himself an equestrian; and made it his special care to protect them in all their affairs, and to advance their credit and interest: so that, as some writers tell us, it was the authority of his consulship that first distinguished and established them into a third order of the state⁵. The policy was certainly very good, and the republic reaped great benefit from it in this very year, through which he had the whole body of knights at his devotion, who, with Atticus at their head, constantly attended his orders, and served as a guard to his person⁶: and if the same maxim had been pursued by all succeeding consuls, it might probably have preserved, or would certainly at least have prolonged, the liberty of the republic.

Having laid this foundation for the laudable discharge of his consulship, he took possession of it, as usual, on the first of January. A little before his inauguration, P. Servilius Rullus, one of the new tribunes, who entered always into their office on the tenth of December, had been alarming the senate with the promulgation of an agrarian law. These laws used to be greedily received by the populace, and were proposed, therefore, by factious magistrates, as oft as they had any point to carry with the multitude against the public good: but this law was of all others the most extravagant, and, by a show of granting more to the people than had ever been given before, seemed likely to be accepted. The purpose of it was, to create a decemvirate, or ten commissioners, with absolute power for five years over all the revenues of the republic; to distribute them at pleasure to the citizens; to sell and buy what lands they thought fit; to determine the rights of the present possessors; to require an account from all the generals abroad, excepting Pompey, of the spoils taken in their wars; to settle colonies wheresoever they judged proper, and particularly at Capua; and in short, to command all the money and forces of the empire.

The publication of a law conferring powers so excessive, gave a just alarm to all who wished well to the public tranquillity: so that Cicero's first business was to quiet the apprehensions of the city, and to exert all his art and authority to baffle the intrigues of the tribune. As soon, therefore, as he was invested with his new dignity, he raised the spirits of the senate, by assuring them of his resolution to oppose the law, and all its abettors, to the utmost of his power; nor suffer the state to be hurt, or its liberties to be impaired, while the administration continued in his hands. From the senate he pursued the tribune into his own dominion, the forum; where, in an artful and elegant speech from the rostra, he gave such a turn to the inclination of the people, that they rejected this agrarian law with as much eagerness as they had ever before received one⁷.

He began, "by acknowledging the extraordinary obligations which he had received from them, in preference and opposition to the nobility; declaring himself the creature of their power, and of all men the most engaged to promote their interests; that they were to look upon him as the truly popular magistrate; nay, that he had declared even in the senate, that he would be the people's consul⁸." He then fell into a commendation of the Gracchi, whose name was extremely dear to them, professing, "that he could not be against all agrarian laws, when he recollected, that those two most excellent men, who had the greatest love for the Roman people, had divided the public lands to the citizens; that he was not one of those consuls, who thought it a crime to praise the Gracchi; on whose counsels, wisdom, and laws, many parts of the present government were founded⁹: that his quarrel was to this particular law, which, instead of being popular, or adapted to the true interests of the city, was in reality the establishment of a tyranny, and a creation

⁸ Quis unquam tam secunda concione legem Agrariam suscitavit, quam ego dissuasi?—Con. Rull. ii. 37.

⁹ Ibid. 3.

¹ Ibid. 5.

¹ Plutarch in his life.

² In Pison. 2.

³ Quod ego et concordia, quam mihi constituit cum collegis, invictissima vis hominibus, quos in consulatu habuimus esse et animis et corporis acibus providi, omnibus prosperi erunt, &c.—Con. Rull. ii. 37.

⁴ Et multitudinem cum principibus, equestrem ordinem cum senatu conjunxerim.—In Pison. 3. Neque ulla vis tanta reperitur, quæ conjunctionem vestram, equitumque Romanorum, tantamque conspirationem bonorum omnium perfringere possit.—In Catil. iv. 10.

⁵ Cetero denique stabilitivis equestre nomen in consulatu me: et amicum concilians, ex eo se ordine profectum celebrans, et quæ vires peculiari popularitate querens: ab illa tempore plane hoc tertium corpus in republica factum est, capique adjici senatus populoque Romano eques ordo.—Prim. Hist. N. l. xxxiii. 2.

⁶ Veni, equites Romani, videte, scitis me ortum e vobis, semper semper pro vobis, &c.—Pro Rabir. Post. 6.

⁷ Sane vero cum equitatus ille, quem ego in Clive Capitolina, ad signiferum ac principem, collocaram, senatum deservit.—Ad Att. ii. 1.

of ten kings to domineer over them." This he displays at large, from the natural effect of that power which was granted by it; and proceeds to insinuate, that it was covertly levelled against their favourite Pompey, and particularly contrived to retrench and insult his authority: "Forgive me, citizens, (says he,) for my calling so often upon so great a name: you yourselves imposed the task upon me, when I was praetor, to join with you in defending his dignity as far as I was able: I have hitherto done all that I could do; not moved to it by my private friendship for the man, nor by any hopes of honour, and of this supreme magistracy, which I obtained from you, though with his approbation, yet without his help. Since then I perceive this law to be designed as a kind of engine to overturn his power, I will resist the attempts of these men; and as I myself clearly see what they are aiming at, so I will take care that you shall also see, and be convinced of it too." He then shows, "how the law, though it excepted Pompey from being accountable to the decemvirate, yet excluded him from being one of the number, by limiting the choice to those who were present at Rome; that it subjected likewise to their jurisdiction the countries just conquered by him, which had always been left to the management of the general: upon which he draws a pleasant picture of the tribune Rullus, with all his train of officers, guards, lictors, and apparitors, swaggering in Mithridates's kingdom, and ordering Pompey to attend him, by a mandatory letter, in the following strain:

"P. Servilius Rullus, tribune of the people, decemvir, to Cnaeus Pompey the son of Cnaeus, greeting."

"He will not add (says he) the title of great, when he has been labouring to take it from him by law."

"I require you not to fail to come presently to Sinope, and bring me a sufficient guard with you, while I sell those lands by my law, which you have gained by your valour."

He observes, "that the reason of excepting Pompey was not from any respect to him, but for fear that he would not submit to the indignity of being accountable to their will: but Pompey (says he) is a man of that temper, that he thinks it his duty to bear whatever you please to impose; but if there be anything which you cannot bear yourselves, he will take care that you shall not bear it long against your wills." He proceeds to enlarge upon "the dangers which this law threatened to their liberties: that instead of any good intended by it to the body of the citizens, its purpose was to erect a power for the oppression of them; and on pretence of planting colonies in Italy and the provinces, to settle their own creatures and dependants, like so many garrisons, in all the convenient posts of the empire, to be ready on all occasions to support their tyranny: that Capua was to be their headquarters, their favourite colony; of all cities the proudest, as well as the most hostile and dangerous; in which the wisdom of their ancestors would not suffer the shadow of any power or magistracy to remain; yet now it was to be cherished and advanced to another Rome: that by this law the lands of Campania were to be sold or given away fruitful of all Italy, the surest rev republi, and their constant resour other rents failed them; which neither who of all men studied the people's most, nor Sylla, who gave everything; scruple, durst venture to meddle with conclusion he takes notice "of the and approbation with which they had as a sure omen of their common peace rity; and acquaints them with the cor had established with his colleague; a news of all others the most agreeable; all security to the republic, if they w the same good disposition on futu which they had signified on that day; would make those very men, who h most envious and averse to his advan fess, that the people had seen farther better than they, in choosing him for t

In the course of this contest he offer the tribunes to come into the rostra, as matter with him before the people¹ thought it more prudent to decline th and to attack him rather by fictitious calumnies, sedulously inculcated into tude; that his opposition to the law no good will to them, but an affecti party, and to secure to them the land possessed by his grant; that he was court by it to the seven tyrants, as seven of the principal senators, who to be the greatest favourers of Sylla's the greatest gainers by it; the two Crassus, Catulus, Hortensius, Metellu These insinuations made so great an i the city, that he found it necessary to self against them in a second speech to in which he declared, "that he look law, which ratified all Sylla's acts, to t the most wicked, and the most unli law, as it established a tyranny in t that it had some excuse from the ti their present circumstances, seemed supported; especially by him who, for his consulship, professed himself th peace²; but that it was the height o in Rullus, to charge him with obsti interests for the sake of Sylla's gran very law which that tribune was thetually established and perpetuated tl and showed itself to be drawn by a s Valgius, who possessed more lands th man by that invidious tenure, which this law to be partly confirmed, and chased of him³." This he demonstr express words of the law, "which he omitted, he says, to take notice of be might not revive old quarrels, or mo ment of new dissension in a season sc that Rullus, therefore, who accused hi ing Sylla's acts, was of all others the m

¹ Contra Rullum, li. 6, 11, 13, 14.

² Ib. 18.

³ Ib. 19.

⁴ Ib. 13.

⁵ Ib. 20.

⁶ Ib. 23.

⁷ Ibid. 28, 32.

^a Contra Rullum, li. 29.

^b Si vestrum commodum spectat, veniat cum de agri Campani divisione disputet li. 28. Commodius fecissent tribuni plebis quae apud vos de me deferunt, ea coram p sents dixerunt.—Con. Rull. li. 1.

^c Ibid.

^d Ibid. li. 2.

^e Ibid. li. 1, 4.

^f Ibid. li. 2.

defender of them; for none had ever affirmed them to be good and legal, but to have some plea only from possession and the public quiet; but by this law the estates that had been granted by them were to be fixed upon a better foundation and title than any other estates whatsoever." He concludes by renewing his challenge to the tribunes "to come and dispute with him to his face." But after several fruitless attempts, finding themselves chiefly unable to contend with him, they were forced at last to submit, and to let the affair drop, to the great joy of the senate.

The alarm being over, another accident broke out, which might have endangered the peace of the city, if the effects of it had not been prevented by the authority of Cicero. Otho's law, mentioned above, for the assignment of separate seats to the equestrian order, had highly offended the people, who could not digest the indignity of being thrust so far back from their diversions; and while the pride was still fresh, Otho happening to come into the theatre, was received by the populace with universal hies, but by the knights with loud applause and clapping. Both sides redoubled their clamour with great fierceness, and from reproaches were proceeding to blows,—till Cicero, informed of the tumult, came immediately to the theatre, and calling the people out into the temple of Bellona, so tamed and stung them by the power of his words, and made them so ashamed of their folly and perverseness, that on their return to the theatre they changed their hisses into applauses, and vied with the knights themselves in demonstrations of their respect to Otho's. The speech was soon after published; though from the nature of the thing it must have been made upon the spot, and flowed extempore from the occasion: and as it was much read and admired for several ages after, as a memorable instance of Cicero's command over men's passions, so some have imagined it to be alluded to in that beautiful passage of Virgil¹:

*Ac veluti magno in populo cum sepe coortis est
belli, servitque animis ignobile vulgus;
Quæque faces et saxa volant, furor arma ministrat:
Tum placida gravem et meritis si forte virum quem
Aspercet, silent, arretractaque auribus adstant;
Ille regit dictis animos, et pectora mulcet.*

VIRG. Æn. l. 152.

As when sedition fires the ignoble crowd,
And the wild rabble storms and thirsts for blood;
Of stones and brands a mingled tempest flies,
With all the sudden arms that rage supplies:
If some grave sire appears amidst the strife,
In morals strict and innocence of life,
All stand attentive, while the sage controls
Their wrath, and calms the tempest of their souls.

PRR.

One topic, which Cicero touched in this speech, and the only one of which we have any hint from antiquity, was to reproach the rioters for their want of taste and good sense, in making such a disturbance while Roscius was acting².

There happened about the same time a third instance, not less remarkable, of Cicero's great power of persuasion. Sylla had by an express law excluded the children of the proscribed from the senate and all public honours; which was certainly an act of great violence, and the decree rather of a tyrant, than the law of a free state³. So that the persons injured by it, who were many, and of great families, were now making all their efforts to get it reversed. Their petition was highly equitable, but, from the condition of the times, as highly unseasonable; for in the present disorders of the city, the restoration of an oppressed party must needs have added strength to the old factions; since the first use that they would naturally make of the recovery of their power, would be to revenge themselves on their oppressors. It was Cicero's business, therefore, to prevent that inconvenience, and, as far as it was possible, with the consent of the sufferers themselves: on which occasion this great commander of the human affections, as Quintilian calls him, found means to persuade those unfortunate men, that to bear their injury was their benefit; and that the government itself could not stand, if Sylla's laws were then repealed, on which the quiet and order of the republic were established; acting herein the part of a wise statesman, who will oft be forced to tolerate, and even maintain, what he cannot approve, for the sake of the common good; agreeably to what he lays down in his book of Offices, that many things which are naturally right and just, are yet, by certain circumstances and conjunctures of times, made dishonest and unjust⁴. As to the instance before us, he declared in a speech made several years after, that he had excluded from honours a number of brave and honest young men, whom fortune had thrown into so unhappy a situation, that if they had obtained power, they would probably have employed it to the ruin of the state⁵. The three cases just mentioned make Pliny break out into a kind of rapturous admiration of the man, who could persuade the people to give up their bread, their pleasure, and their injuries, to the charms of his eloquence⁶.

The next transaction of moment in which he was engaged was the defence of C. Rabirius, an aged senator, accused by T. Labienus, one of the tribunes, of treason or rebellion, for having killed L. Saturninus, a tribune, about forty years before, who had raised a dangerous sedition in the city. The fact, if it had been true, was not only legal, but laudable, being done in obedience to a decree of the senate, by which all the citizens were required to take arms in aid of the consuls C. Marius and L. Flaccus.

But the punishment of Rabirius was not the thing aimed at, nor the life of an old man worth the pains of disturbing the peace of the city: the design was to attack that prerogative of the senate by which, in the case of a sudden tumult, they could arm the city at once, by requiring the consuls to take care that the republic received no detri-

¹ Exclusique paternis opibus liberi, etiam petendorum honorum jure prohiberentur.—Vell. Pat. ii. 28.

² Sic multa, quæ honesta natura videntur esse, temporibus sunt non honesta.—De Offic. iii. 25.

³ Ego adolescentes fortes et bonos, sed uos ea conditione fortune, ut, si essent magistratus adepti, reipublicæ statum convulsuri viderentur, comitiorum ratione privavi.—In Plon. 2.

⁴ Quo te, M. Tulli, piaculo taceam? &c.—Plin. Hist. l. vii. 39.

¹ Patearch's Life of Cicero.

² Sestius. Corradi Quæstura, p. 133; Æneid. l. 152.

What gives the greater colour to this imagination is, that Quintilian applies these lines to his character of a commoner, which he professedly forms upon the model of Cato.—Lib. xii. 1.

³ Tacet Saturninus. ii. 10.

ment : which vote was supposed to give a sanction to everything that was done in consequence of it ; so that several traitorous magistrates had been cut off by it, without the formalities of a trial, in the act of stirring up sedition. This practice, though in use from the earliest times, had always been complained of by the tribunes, as an infringement of the constitution, by giving to the senate an arbitrary power over the lives of citizens, which could not legally be taken away without a hearing and judgment of the whole people. But the chief grudge to it was, from its being a perpetual check to the designs of the ambitious and popular, who aspired to any power not allowed by the laws : it was not difficult for them to delude the multitude ; but the senate was not so easily managed, who by that single vote of committing the republic to the consuls, could frustrate at once all the effects of their popularity, when carried to a point which was dangerous to the state : for since in virtue of it, the tribunes themselves, whose persons were held sacred, might be taken off without sentence or trial, when engaged in any traitorous practices, all attempts of that kind must necessarily be hazardous and desperate.

This point therefore, was to be tried on the person of Rabirius, in whose ruin the factious of all ranks were interested. J. Cæsar suborned Labienus to prosecute him ; and procured himself to be appointed one of the Duumviri, or the two judges allotted by the prætor to sit upon trials of treason^o. Hortensius pleaded his cause, and proved by many witnesses, that the whole accusation was false, and that Saturninus was actually killed by the hand of a slave, who for that service obtained his freedom from the public². Cæsar, however, eagerly condemned the old man, who appealed from his sentence to the people ; where nothing, says Suetonius, did him so much service, as the partial and forward severity of his judge³.

The tribunes in the mean while employed all their power to destroy him ; and Labienus would not suffer Cicero to exceed half an hour in his defence⁴ ; and, to raise the greater indignation against the criminal, exposed the picture of Saturninus in the rostra, as of one who fell a martyr to the liberties of the people. Cicero opened the defence with great gravity, declaring, " that in the memory of man there had not been a cause of such importance, either undertaken by a tribune, or defended by a consul : that nothing less was meant by it, than that for the future there should be no senate or public council in the city ; no consent or concurrence of the honest against the rage and rashness of the wicked ; no resource or refuge in the extreme dangers of the republic⁵.—He implores the favour of all the gods, by whose providence their city was more signally governed than by any wisdom of man, to make that day propitious to the security of the state, and to the life and fortunes of an innocent man."—And having possessed the minds of his audience with the sanctity of the cause, he proceeds boldly to wish, " that he had been at liberty to confess, what Hortensius indeed had proved to be false, that Saturninus, the enemy of the Roman people, was killed by Rabirius⁶—that he should have probragged of it, as an act that merited rev of punishment."—Here he was interr clamour of the opposite faction ; but it to be " the faint effort of a small assembly ; and that the body of the were silent, would never have made b they had thought him capable of bei by so feeble an insult ; which he advi drop, since it betrayed only their f inferiority of their numbers."—The as quieted, he goes on to declare, " Rabirius did not kill Saturninus, yet l with intent to kill him, together with and all the best of the city, to which virtue, and duty called him.—He puts mind, " that he was too young to be with the merits of that cause ; that he when Saturninus was killed, and c apprised how odious and detestable h to all people : that some had been l complaining only of his death ; others picture of him in their houses⁷ : that therefore where Labienus had procur ture, which none durst venture to k home ; and much more, that he had t to produce, before an assembly of the had been the ruin of other men's fortu charge Rabirius with this crime was the greatest and worthiest citizens v had ever bred ; and though they were the injury was the same, to rob them o due to their names and memories. Marius, says he, have lived in perpet dangers, if he had conceived no hope himself and his glory beyond the limits When he defeated those innumerable Italy, and saved the republic, did he i everything which related to him wo him ? No, it is not so, citizens ; the of us who exerts himself with praise t the dangers of the republic, but is ind the expectation of a futurity. As tl men, therefore, seem to be divine and many other reasons, so especially for all the best and the wisest there is so s of something hereafter, that they se nothing but what is eternal. I appeal souls of C. Marius, and of all those wis citizens, who, from this life of men, a to the honours and sanctity of the t them, I say, to witness, that I think t to fight for their fame, glory, and men much zeal as for the altars and ter country ; and if it were necessary to defence of their praise, I should ta strenuously as they themselves did for of our common safety," &c.⁸

After this speech the people were t ment on Rabirius, by the suffrage centuries ; but there being reason t some violence and foul play from the the tribunes, Metellus, the augur at that year, contrived to dissolve the a stratagem before they came to a vot greater affairs that presently ensued,

^o Sueton. J. Cæs. 13 ; Dio, p. 42.

² Pro Rabir. 6, 11.

³ Ut ad populum provocanti nihil æque ac iudicis accubitas profuit.—Sueton. ib. 12.

⁴ Pro Rabir. 2.

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ Pro Rabir. 6.

⁷ Ibid. 10.

⁸ Ibid. 5.

⁹ Dio, l. xx.

the attention of the city, prevented the farther prosecution and revival of the cause.

But Cæsar was more successful in another case, in which he was more interested,—his suit for the high priesthood, a post of the first dignity in the republic, vacant by the death of Metellus Pius. Lælius opened his way to it by the publication of a new law, for transferring the right of electing from the college of priests to the people, agreeably to the tenor of a former law, which had been repealed by Sylla. Cæsar's strength lay in the favour of the populace, which, by immense bribes and the profusion of his whole substance, he had gained on this occasion so effectually, that he carried this high office before he had yet been prætor, against two consular competitors of the first authority in Rome, Q. Catulus and P. Servilius Isauricus; the one of whom had been censor, and then bore the title of prince of the senate, and the other been honoured with a triumph: yet he procured more votes against them, even in their own tribes, than they both had out of the whole number of the citizens^a.

Catiline was now renewing his efforts for the consulship with greater vigour than ever, and by such open methods of bribery, that Cicero published a new law against it, with the additional penalty of a ten years' exile; prohibiting likewise all shows of gladiators within two years from the time of suing for any magistracy, unless they were ordered by the will of a person deceased, and on a certain day therein specified^b. Catiline, who knew the law to be levelled at himself, formed a design to kill Cicero, with some other chiefs of the senate^c, on the day of election, which was appointed for the twentieth of October; but Cicero gave information of it to the senate the day before, upon which the election was deferred, that they might have time to deliberate on an affair of so great importance: and the day following, in a full house, he called upon Catiline to clear himself of this charge; where, without denying or excusing it, he bluntly told them that there were two bodies in the republic, naming the senate and the people, the one of them firm with a weak head, the other firm without a head; which last had so well deserved of him, that it should never want a head while he lived. He had made a declaration of the same kind and in the same place a few days before, when upon Cato's threatening him with an impeachment, he fiercely replied, that if any flame should be excited in his fortunes, he would extinguish it, not with water, but a general ruin^d.

These declarations startled the senate, and convinced them that nothing but a desperate conspiracy, ripe for execution, could inspire so daring an assurance: so that they proceeded immediately to that decree which was the usual refuge in all cases of imminent danger, of ordering the consuls to take care that the republic received no harm^e. Upon this Cicero doubled his guard, and called some troops into the city; and when the election of consuls came on, that he might imprint a sense of his own and of the public danger the more strongly, he took care to throw back his gown in the view of the people, and discovered a shining breast-plate, which he wore under it: by which precaution, as he told Catiline afterwards to his face, he prevented his design of killing both him and the competitors for the consulship, of whom D. Junius Silanus and L. Licinius Murena were declared consuls elect^f.

Catiline, thus a second time repulsed, and breathing nothing but revenge, was now eager and impatient to execute his grand plot: he had no other game left; his schemes were not only suspected, but actually discovered by the sagacity of the consul, and himself shunned and detested by all honest men; so that he resolved without farther delay to put all to the hazard of ruining either his country or himself. He was singularly formed both by art and nature for the head of a desperate conspiracy; of an illustrious family, ruined fortunes, profligate mind, undaunted courage, unwearied industry; of a capacity equal to the hardest attempt, with a tongue that could explain, and a hand that could execute it^g. Cicero gives us his just character in many parts of his works, but in none a more lively picture of him than in the following passage^h:

"He had in him," says he, "many, though not express images, yet sketches of the greatest virtues; was acquainted with a great number of wicked men, yet a pretended admirer of the virtuous. His house was furnished with a variety of temptations to lust and lewdness, yet with several incitements also to industry and labour: it was a scene of vicious pleasures, yet a school of martial exercises. There never was such a monster on earth, compounded of passions so contrary and opposite. Who was ever more agreeable at one time to the best citizens? who more intimate at another with the worst? who a man of better principles? who a fouler enemy to this city? who more intemperate in pleasure? who more patient in labour? who more rapacious in plundering? who more profuse in squandering? He had a wonderful faculty of engaging men to his friendship, and obliging them by his observance; sharing with them in common whatever he was master of; serving them with his money, his interest, his pains, and, when there was occasion, by the most daring acts of villany; moulding his nature to his purposes, and bending it every way to his will. With the morose, he could live severely; with the free, gaily; with the old, gravely; with the young, cheerfully; with the enterprising, audaciously; with the vicious, luxuriously. By a temper so various and pliable, he gathered about him the profligate and the rash from all countries, yet held attached to him at the same time many

^a Sall. Bell. Cat. 29; Plutarch. in Cic.

^b Descendi in campum—cum illa lata insignique lorica—ut omnes boni animadvertenter, et cum in metu et periculo consulem viderent, id quod factum est, ad opem præsidiumque meum concurrerunt.—Pro Muren. 26.

^c Cum proximis comitis consularibus, me consulem in campo et competitoribus tuos interficere voluisti, compressi conatus tuos nefarios amicorum præsidio.—In Cat. l. 5.

^d Erat ei consilium ad facinus aptum: consilio autem neque lingua, neque manus deerat.—In Cat. lll. 7.

^e Pro Cæl. 5, 6.

^f Ita potentissimos duos competitors, multumque et ætate et dignitate antecedentes, superavit; ut plura ipse in curiæ tribubus suffragia, quam uterque in omnibus tribus.—Suet. J. Cæ. 13; vide Pigh. Annal.

^g Pro Muren. 23; In Vat. l. 15.

^h Dio, l. xxxviii. 43.

ⁱ Tum enim dixit, duo corpora esse reipublicæ—unum fragile, infirmo capite; alterum firmum, sine capite: huic, cum ita de se meritum esset, caput, se vivo, non defuturum.—Cum idem ille paucis diebus ante Catoni, iudicium minaretur, respondisset,—Si quod esset in suas fortunas mensuram excitatum, id se non aqua, sed ruina restitueret.—Pro Muren. 25.

part of it, the task of massacring their enemies within the city. The rest of the conspirators were not less illustrious for their birth*. The two Syllas were nephews to the dictator of that name; Autronius had obtained the consulship, but was deprived for bribery; and Cassius was a competitor for it with Cicero himself. In short, they were all of the same stamp and character; men whom disappointments, ruined fortunes, and flagitious lives, had prepared for any design against the state; and all whose hopes of ease and advancement depended on a change of affairs, and the subversion of the republic.

At this meeting it was resolved, that a general insurrection should be raised through Italy, the different parts of which were assigned to different leaders; that Catiline should put himself at the head of the troops in Etruria; that Rome should be fired in many places at once, and a massacre begun at the same time of the whole senate, and all their enemies; of whom none were to be spared except the sons of Pompey, who were to be kept as hostages of their peace and reconciliation with the father; that in the consternation of the fire and massacre, Catiline should be ready with his Tuscan army, to take the benefit of the public confusion, and make himself master of the city; where Lentulus, in the meanwhile, as first in dignity, was to preside in their general councils; Cassius to manage the affair of firing it, Cethegus to direct the massacre†. But the vigilance of Cicero being the chief obstacle to all their hopes, Catiline was very desirous to see him taken off before he left Rome; upon which two knights of the company undertook to kill him the next morning in his bed, in an early visit on pretence of business‡. They were both of his acquaintance, and used to frequent his house; and knowing his custom of giving free access to all, made no doubt of being readily admitted, as C. Cornelianus, one of the two, afterwards confessed§.

The meeting was no sooner over, than Cicero had information of all that passed in it; for by the intrigues of a woman named Fulvia, he had gained over Curius her gallant, one of the conspirators of senatorian rank, to send him a punctual account of all their deliberations. He presently imparted his intelligence to some of the chiefs of the city, who were assembled that evening, as usual, at his house; informing them not only of the design, but naming the men who were to execute it, and the very hour when they would be at his gate: all which fell out exactly as he foretold; for the two knights came before break of day, but had the mortification to find the house well guarded, and all admissions refused to them¶.

Catiline was disappointed likewise in another affair of no less moment before he quitted the city; a design to surprise the town of Præneste, one of the strongest fortresses of Italy, within twenty-five miles of Rome; which would have been of singular use to him in the war, and a sure retreat in all events: but Cicero was still beforehand with him, and, from the apprehension of such an attempt, had previously sent orders to the place to keep a special guard; so that when Catiline came in the night to make an assault, he found them so well provided, that he durst not venture upon the experiment¶.

This was the state of the conspiracy, when Cicero delivered the first of those four speeches, which were spoken upon the occasion of it, and are still extant. The meeting of the conspirators was on the sixth of November, in the evening; and on the eighth he summoned the senate to the temple of Jupiter in the capitol, where it was not usually held but in times of public alarm*. There had been several debates before this on the same subject of Catiline's treasons, and his design of killing the consul; and a decree had passed at the motion of Cicero, to offer a public reward to the first discoverer of the plot; if a slave, his liberty, and eight hundred pounds; if a citizen, his pardon, and sixteen hundred§. Yet Catiline, by a profound dissimulation, and the constant professions of his innocence, still deceived many of all ranks; representing the whole as the fiction of his enemy Cicero, and offering to give security for his behaviour, and to deliver himself to the custody of any whom the senate would name; of M. Lepidus, of the prætor Metellus, or of Cicero himself: but none of them would receive him; and Cicero plainly told him, that he should never think himself safe in the same house, when he was in danger by living in the same city with him*: yet he still kept on the mask, and had the confidence to come to this very meeting in the capitol; which so shocked the whole assembly, that none even of his acquaintance durst venture to salute him; and the consular senators quitted that part of the house in which he sat, and left the whole bench clear to him†. Cicero was so provoked by his impudence, that instead of entering upon any business, as he designed, addressing himself directly to Catiline, he broke out into a most severe invective against him; and with all the fire and force of an incensed eloquence, laid open the whole course of his villanies, and the notoriety of his treasons.

He put him in mind, "that there was a decree already made against him, by which he could take venissent, quos ego jam multis ac summis viris ad me id temporis venturos esse predixeram.—In Catil. l. 4.

b Quid? eum tu Præneste Kalendis ipsâ Novembribus occupatum nocturno impetu confideres? Sensistis illam coloniam meo jussu, meis prædiis—esse munitam? —Ibid. l. 3. Præneste—natura munitum.—Vell. Pat. ii. 26.

c Nihil hic munitionibus habendi senatus locus.—Ib. l. 1.

d Si quis indicasset de conjuratione, quæ contra rempublicam facta erat, præmium, servo, libertatem et sestertia centum; liberti, impunitatem et sestertia cc.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 30.

e Cum a me id responsum tulisses, me nullo modo posse tiadem parietibus tuto esse tecum, qui magno in periculo essem, quod tiadem moribus contineremur.—In Catil. l. 8.

f Quis te ex hac tanta frequentia, tot ex tuis amicis ac necessariis salutavit? Quid, quod adventu tuo ista subsellia vacuefacta sunt? &c.—Ib. l. 7.

E

* Curi, Porci, Syllæ, Cethegi, Antonii, Varguntei, quæque Langii: quæ familie? quæ senatus insignia? &c.—Plut. iv. 1.

† Cum Catiline egredereetur ad exercitum, Lentulus in urbe prætor, Cassius incendia, Cethegus caedi præparator.—Pro Syll. 19; Vid. Plut. in Cicero.

‡ Dixisti penultimum tibi esse moras, quod ego viverem: speret enim duo Equites Romani, qui te ista cura liberarent, et non illa ipsa nocte ante lucem me meo in lectulo instructos pollicerentur.—In Catil. l. 4; it. Sallust. Bell. Cat. 35.

§ Tunc tunc pater, Corneli, id quod tandem aliquando malueris, illam sibi officioam provinciam depoposcit.—Pro Syll. 18.

¶ Decum meam majoribus prædiis munivi: exclusi es, qui te in me ad me salutatum miseris; cum illi ipsi his life; and that he ought to have done it long ago, since many, far more eminent and less criminal, had been taken off by the same authority for the suspicion only of treasonable designs; that if he should order him, therefore, to be killed upon the spot, there was cause to apprehend that it would be thought rather too late than too cruel."—But there was a certain reason which yet withheld him: "Thou shalt then be put to death," says he, "when there is not a man to be found so wicked, so desperate, so like to thyself, who will deny it to be done justly.—As long as there is one who dares to defend thee, thou shalt live; and live so as thou now dost, surrounded by the guards which I have placed about thee, so as not to suffer thee to stir a foot against the republic; whilst the eyes and ears of many shall watch thee, as they have hitherto done, when thou little thoughtest of it^a." He then goes on to give a detail of all that had been concerted by the conspirators at their several meetings, to let him see "that he was perfectly informed of every step which he had taken, or designed to take;" and observes, "that he saw several, at that very time in the senate, who had assisted at those meetings." He presses him, therefore, to quit the city; and "since all his councils were detected, to drop the thought of fires and massacres;—that the gates were open, and nobody should stop him!" Then running over the flagitious enormities of his life, and the series of his traitorous practices, he "exhorts, urges, commands him to depart, and, if he would be advised by him, to go into a voluntary exile, and free them from their fears; that, if they were just ones, they might be safer; if groundless, the quieter^b." That though he would not put the question to the house, whether they would order him into banishment or not, yet he would let him see their sense upon it by their manner of behaving while he was urging him to it; for should he bid any other senator of credit, P. Sextius, or M. Marcellus, to go into exile, they would all rise up against him at once, and lay violent hands on their consul: yet when he said it to him, by their silence they approved it; by their suffering it, decreed it; by saying nothing, proclaimed their consent^c. That he would answer likewise for the knights, who were then guarding the avenues of the senate, and were hardly restrained from doing him violence; that if he would consent to go, they would all quietly attend him to the gates.—Yet, after all, if in virtue of his command he should really go into banishment, he foresaw what a storm of envy he should draw by it upon himself; but he did not value that, if by his own calamity he could avert the dangers of the republic: but there was no hope that Catiline could ever be induced to yield to the occasions of the state, or moved with a sense of his crimes, or reclaimed by shame, or fear, or reason, from his madness^d. He exhorts him, therefore, if he would not go into exile, to go at least, where he was expected, into Manlius's camp, and begin the war; provided only, that he would carry out with him all the rest of his crew.—That there he might riot and exult at his full ease, without the mortification of seeing one honest man about him^e.—There he might all that discipline to which he had been lying upon the ground, not only in pulew amours, but of bold and hardy e there he might exert all that boasted hunger, cold, and want, by which I would shortly find himself undone." introduces an expostulation of the re himself, "for his too great lenity, in su a traitor to escape, instead of hurrying mediate death; that it was an instance and ingratitude to the Roman people, new man, who, without any recommen his ancestors, had been raised by them the degrees of honour to sovereign dign for the sake of any danger to himself, care of the public safety^f. To this voice of my country," says he, "and to blame me after the same manner, I sh short answer: that if I had thought advisable to put Catiline to death, I have allowed that gladiator the use ment's life: for if, in former days illustrious citizens, instead of sullyi honour to their memories, by the de Saturninus, the Gracchi, Placcus, and there is no ground to fear, that, by parricide, any envy would lie upon me rity; yet if the greatest was sure to was always my persuasion, that envy virtue was really glory, not envy: b some of this very order, who do not e dangers which hang over us, or else di they see, who, by the softness of their Catiline's hopes, and add strength to racy by not believing it; whose authori many, not only of the wicked, but the if I had punished this man as he des not have failed to cry out upon me f tyrant^g. Now I am persuaded, that once gone into Manlius's camp, whit ally designs to go, none can be so s see that there is a plot; none so wick acknowledge it: whereas, by taking o though this pestilence would be somew it could not be suppressed; but when h himself into rebellion, and carried ou along with him, and drawn together and desperate from all parts of the em this ripened plague of the republic, root and seed of all our evils, will l with him at once." Then applying l to Catiline, he concludes with a sh Jupiter: "With these omens, Catilin perity to the republic, but of destruct and all those who have joined themsel in all kinds of parricide, go thy way impious and abominable war; whilst t whose religion was established with tl of this city, whom we truly call Stator prop of this empire, wilt drive this accomplices from thy altars and temp houses and walls of the city, from the tunes of us all; and wilt destroy punishments, both living and dead, of good men, the enemies of their plunderers of Italy, now confederated i able league and partnership of villany

^a Habemus senatus consultum in te, Catilina, vehementer et grave.—In Catil. l. 1.

^b Ibid. 2.

^c Ibid. 7.

^d Ibid. 9.

^e Ibid. 4.

^f Ibid. 8.

^g In Catil. l. 10.

^h Ibid. 11.

ⁱ Ibid. 12.

Catiline, astonished by the thunder of this speech, had little to say for himself in answer to it; yet, with dejected looks and suppliant voice, he begged of the fathers not to believe too hastily what was said against him by an enemy; that his birth and past life offered everything to him that was hopeful; and it was not to be imagined that a man of patrician family, whose ancestors, as well as himself, had given many proofs of their affection to the Roman people, should want to overturn the government; while Cicero, a stranger and late inhabitant of Rome, was so zealous to preserve it. But as he was going on to give foul language, the senate interrupted him by a general outcry, calling him traitor and parricide: upon which, being furious and desperate, he declared again aloud what he had said before to Cato, that since he was circumvented and driven headlong by his enemies, he would quench the flame which was raised about him, by the common ruin; and so rushed out of the assembly. As soon as he was come to his house, and began to reflect on what had passed, perceiving it in vain to dissemble any longer, he resolved to enter into action immediately, before the troops of the republic were increased, or any new levies made; so that, after a short conference with Lentulus, Cethegus, and the rest, about what had been concerted in the last meeting, having given fresh orders and assurances of his speedy return at the head of a strong army, he left Rome that very night with a small retinue, to make the best of his way towards Etruria*.

He no sooner disappeared, than his friends gave out that he was gone into a voluntary exile at Marcellæ; which was industriously spread through the city the next morning, to raise an odium upon Cicero for driving an innocent man into banishment without any previous trial or proof of his guilt; but Cicero was too well informed of his motions to entertain any doubt about his going to Mantua's camp, and into actual rebellion: he knew that he had sent thither already a quantity of arms, and all the ensigns of military command, with that silver eagle which he used to keep with great supererogation in his house, for its having belonged to C. Marius in his expedition against the Cimbri†. But lest the story should make an ill impression on the city, he called the people together into the forum, to give them an account of what passed in the senate the day before, and of Catiline's leaving Rome upon it.

He began by congratulating with them on Catiline's flight, as on a certain victory; "since the driving him from his secret plots and insidious attempts on their lives and fortunes into open rebellion, was in effect to conquer him: that Catiline himself was sensible of it, whose chief regret in his retreat was not for leaving the city, but for leaving it standing".—But if there be any here,"

* Yum ille furibundus:—Quoniam quidem circumventum, inquit, ab inimicis precepit ager, incendium meum sine exitum.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 31.

† Ibid. 32.

‡ At enim sunt, Quirites, qui dicunt a me in exilium quoniam esse Catilinam.—Ego vehementer ille consul, qui verbe civis in exilium ejicio, &c.—In Catil. ii. 6.

§ Cum facies, cum tubas, cum signa militaria, cum signum illam argentum, cui ille etiam sacrum aculeum domi meo fecerat, aculeum esse premissem.—Ib.; Sallust. Bell. Cat. 33.

¶ In Catil. ii. 1.

says he, "who blame me for what I am boasting of, as you all indeed justly may, that I did not rather seize than send away so capital an enemy; that is not my fault, citizens, but the fault of the times. Catiline ought long ago to have suffered the last punishment; the custom of our ancestors, the discipline of the empire, and the republic itself, required it. But how many would there have been who would not have believed what I charged him with? How many, who, through weakness, would never have imagined it, or through wickedness would have defended it?" He observes, "that if he had put Catiline to death, he should have drawn upon himself such an odium as would have rendered him unable to prosecute his accomplices and extirpate the remains of the conspiracy; but so far from being afraid of him now, he was sorry only that he went off with so few to attend him": that his forces were contemptible, if compared with those of the republic; made up of a miserable, needy crew, who had wasted their substance, forfeited their bails, and would run away not only at the sight of an army, but of the prætor's edict.—That those who had deserted his army, and staid behind, were more to be dreaded than the army itself; and the more so, because they knew him to be informed of all their designs, yet were not at all moved by it: that he had laid open all their councils in the senate the day before, upon which Catiline was so disheartened that he immediately fled: that he could not guess what these others meant; if they imagined that he should always use the same lenity, they were much mistaken; for he had now gained what he had hitherto been waiting for, to make all people see that there was a conspiracy: that now, therefore, there was no more room for clemency, the case itself required severity; yet he would still grant them one thing, to quit the city and follow Catiline; nay, would tell them the way; it was the Aurelian road; and if they would make haste, they might overtake him before night." Then, after describing the profligate life and conversation of Catiline and his accomplices, he declares it "insufferably impudent for such men to pretend to plot; the lazy against the active, the foolish against the prudent, the drunken against the sober, the drowsy against the vigilant; who, lolling at feasts, embracing mistresses, staggering with wine, stuffed with victuals, crowned with garlands, daubed with perfumes, belch in their conversations of massacring the honest and firing the city. If my consulship," says he, "since it cannot cure, should cut off all these, it would add no small period to the duration of the republic; for there is no nation which we have reason to fear, no king who can make war upon the Roman people; all disturbances abroad, both by land and sea, are quelled by the virtue of one man; but a domestic war still remains; the treason, the danger, the enemy is within; we are to combat with luxury, with madness, with villany. In this war I profess myself your leader, and take upon myself all the animosity of the desperate: whatever can possibly be healed, I will heal; but what ought to be cut off, I will never suffer to spread to the ruin of the city." He then takes notice of the report of Catiline's being driven into exile, but ridicules the weakness of it; and says, "that he had put that

* In Catil. ii. 2.

† Ibid. 4.

‡ Ibid. 3.

§ Ibid. 5.

matter out of doubt, by exposing all his treasons the day before in the senate^b." He laments "the wretched condition not only of governing, but even of preserving states: For if Catiline," says he, "baffled by my pains and counsels, should really change his mind, drop all thoughts of war, and betake himself to exile, he would not be said to be disarmed and terrified, or driven from his purpose by my vigilance, but uncondemned and innocent to be forced into banishment by the threats of the consul; and there would be numbers who would think him not wicked, but unhappy, and me not a diligent consul, but a cruel tyrant." He declares, "that though, for the sake of his own ease or character, he should never wish to hear of Catiline's being at the head of an army, yet they would certainly hear it in three days' time: that if men were so perverse as to complain of his being driven away, what would they have said if he had been put to death? Yet there was not one of those who talked of his going to Marseilles, but would be sorry for it, if it was true, and wished much rather to see him in Manlius's camp." He proceeds to describe at large the strength and forces of Catiline, and the different sorts of men of which they were composed; and then displaying and opposing to them the superior forces of the republic, he shows it to be "a contention of all sorts of virtue against all sorts of vice; in which, if all human help should fail them, the gods themselves would never suffer the best cause in the world to be vanquished by the worst^d." He requires them, therefore, to "keep a watch only in their private houses, for he had taken care to secure the public without any tumult: that he had given notice to all the colonies and great towns of Catiline's retreat, so as to be upon their guard against him: that as to the body of gladiators, whom Catiline always depended upon as his best and surest band, they were taken care of in such a manner as to be in the power of the republic; though, to say the truth, even these were better affected than some part of the patricians: that he had sent Q. Metellus, the prætor, into Gaul and the district of Picenum, to oppose all Catiline's motions on that side; and, for settling all matters at home, had summoned the senate to meet again that morning, which, as they saw, was then assembling. As for those, therefore, who were left behind in the city, though they were now enemies, yet, since they were born citizens, he admonished them again and again, that his lenity had been waiting only for an opportunity of demonstrating the certainty of the plot: that for the rest, he should never forget that this was his country, he their consul, who thought it his duty either to live with them, or die for them. There is no guard," says he, "upon the gates, none to watch the roads; if any one has a mind to withdraw himself, he may go wherever he pleases; but if he makes the least stir within the city, so as to be caught in any overt act against the republic, he shall know that there are in it vigilant consuls, excellent magistrates, a stout senate; that there are arms, and a prison, which our ancestors provided as the avenger of manifest crimes; and all this shall be transacted in such a manner, that the greatest disorders shall be quelled the least hurry; the greatest dangers, without tumult; a domestic war, the most desperate in our memory, by me, your only leader: I, in my gown; which I will manage so far as it is possible, not one even of the guilty suffer punishment in the city. But if the treachery, and my country's danger, should drive me from this mild resolution, effect, what in so cruel and treacherous a hardly be hoped for, that not one honest man fall, but all of you be safe by the punishment of a few. This I promise, citizens, not from confidence in my own prudence, or from any councils, but from the many evident declarations of the gods, by whose impulse I am led into persuasion; who assist us, not as they used to do at distance, against foreign and remote enemies by their present help and protection, defend temples and our houses. It is your part, therefore, to worship, implore, and pray to the gods, since all our enemies are now subdued both by land and sea, they would continue to preserve which was designed by them for the most glorious and most flourishing, and most powerful from the detestable treasons of its own citizens."

We have no account of this day's debate in the senate, which met while Cicero was speaking to the people, and were waiting his coming from the rostra: but as to Catiline, after a few days on the road to raise and arm his army, he tried through which he passed, and which he had already been disposing to his intent, he marched directly to Manlius's camp, with all the ensigns of military command before him. Upon this news, the senate both him and Manlius public enemies, without pardon to all his followers who were condemned of capital crimes, if they returned to duty by a certain day; and ordered the consuls to make new levies, and that Antonius should go with the army; Cicero stay at guard the city^e.

It will seem strange to some, that Cicero had certain information of Catiline's intent instead of seizing him in the city, not only offered but urged his escape, and forced him to begin the war. But there was good reason for what he did, as he frequently intimates in his speeches; he had many enemies among the plebeians and Catiline many secret friends; and he was perfectly informed of the whole project and extent of the plot, yet the proofs being not yet to be laid before the public, Catiline's rebellion still prevailed, and persuaded the great of his innocence; so that if he had immediately punished him at this time, as he deserved, the whole faction were prepared to raise a clamour against him, by representing his administration as a tyranny, and the plot as contrived to support it: whereas by driving into rebellion, he made all men see the danger to their country; while from an exact account of his troops, he knew them to be so unequal to the republic, that there was no doubt of their being destroyed, if he could be pushed to the ne-

^b In Catil. li. 6.

^c Ibid. 7, 8, 9, 10.

^d Ibid. 11.

^e Ibid. 12. Decrevit uti familie gladiatorie Capuam et in cætera municipia distribuarentur pro cuiusque opibus—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 30.

^f Sallust. Bell. Cat. 32.

declaring himself, before his other projects were ripe for execution. He knew also, that if Catiline was once driven out of the city, and separated from his accomplices, who were a lazy, drunken, thoughtless crew, they would ruin themselves by their own recklessness, and be easily drawn into any trap which he should lay for them: the event showed that he judged right; and by what happened afterwards both to Catiline and to himself, it appeared, that, as far as human caution could reach, he acted with the utmost prudence in regard as well to his own, as to the public safety.

In the midst of all this hurry, and soon after Catiline's flight, Cicero found leisure, according to his custom, to defend L. Murena, one of the consuls elect, who was now brought to a trial for bribery and corruption. Cato had declared in the senate, that he would try the force of Cicero's late law upon one of the consular candidates¹: and since Catiline, whom he chiefly aimed at, was out of his reach, he resolved to fall upon Murena; yet conceived at the same time at the other consul, Silanus, who had married his sister, though equally guilty with his colleague²: he was joined in the accusation by one of the disappointed candidates, S. Sulpicius, a person of distinguished worth and character, and the most celebrated lawyer of the age, for whose service, and at whose instance, Cicero's law against bribery was chiefly provided³.

Murena was bred a soldier, and had acquired great fame in the Mithridatic war, as lieutenant to Lucullus⁴; and was now defended by three, the greatest men, as well as the greatest orators of Rome, Crassus, Hortensius, and Cicero: so that there had seldom been a trial of more expectation, on account of the dignity of all the parties concerned. The character of the accusers makes it reasonable to believe, that there was clear proof of some illegal practices; yet from Cicero's speech, which, though imperfect, is the only remaining monument of the transaction, it seems probable, that they were such only as, though strictly speaking irregular, were yet warranted by custom and the example of all candidates; and though heinous in the eyes of a Cato, or an angry competitor, were usually overlooked by the magistrates and expected by the people.

The accusation consisted of three heads: the scandal of Murena's life; the want of dignity in his character and family; and bribery in the late election. As to the first, the greatest crime which Cato charged him with was dancing; to which Cicero's defence is somewhat remarkable: "He admonishes Cato not to throw out such a calumny so inconsiderately, or to call the consul of Rome a dancer; but to consider how many other crimes a man must needs be guilty of before that of dancing could be truly objected to him; since nobody ever danced, even in solitude, or a private meeting of friends, who was not either drunk or mad; for dancing was always the last act of riotous banquets, gay places, and much jollity: that Cato charged him therefore with what was the effect of many vices, yet with none of those, without which that vice could not possibly subsist; with no scandalous feasts, no amours, no nightly revels, no lewdness, no extravagant expense," &c.¹

As to the second article, the want of dignity, it was urged chiefly by Sulpicius, who being noble and a patrician, was the more mortified to be defeated by a plebeian, whose extraction he contemned: but Cicero "ridicules the vanity of thinking no family good, but a patrician; shows that Murena's grandfather and great-grandfather had been praetors; and that his father also from the same dignity had obtained the honour of a triumph: that Sulpicius's nobility was better known to the antiquaries than to the people; since his grandfather had never borne any of the principal offices, nor his father ever mounted higher than the equestrian rank: that being therefore the son of a Roman knight, he had always reckoned him in the same class with himself, of those who by their own industry had opened their way to the highest honours; that the Curiuses, the Catos, the Pompeiuses, the Mariuses, the Didiiuses, the Caeliuses were all of the same sort: that when he had broken through that barricade of nobility, and laid the consulship open to the virtuous, as well as to the noble; and when a consul, of an ancient and illustrious descent, was defended by a consul, the son of a knight; he never imagined, that the accusers would venture to say a word about the novelty of a family: that he himself had two patrician competitors, the one a profligate and audacious, the other an excellent and modest man; yet that he outdid Catiline in dignity, Galba in interest; and if that had been a crime in a new man, he should not have wanted enemies to object it to him²." He then shows "that the science of arms, in which Murena excelled, had much more dignity and splendour in it than the science of the law, being that which first gave a name to the Roman people, brought glory to their city, and subdued the world to their empire: that martial virtue had ever been the means of conciliating the favour of the people, and recommending to the honours of the state; and it was but reasonable that it should hold the first place in that city, which was raised by it to be the head of all other cities in the world³."

As to the last and heaviest part of the charge, the crime of bribery, there was little or nothing made out against him, but what was too common to be thought criminal; the bribery of shows, plays, and dinners given to the populace; yet not so much by himself, as by his friends and relations, who were zealous to serve him; so that Cicero makes very slight of it, and declares himself "more afraid of the authority, than the accusation of Cato;" and to obviate the influence which the reputation of Cato's integrity might have in the cause, he observes, "that the people in general, and all wise judges, had ever been jealous of the power and interest of an accuser; lest the criminal should be borne down, not by the weight of his crimes, but the superior force of his adversary. Let the authority of the great prevail," says he,

¹ Pro Muren. 6.

² Ibid. 9, 10, 11.

³ Ibid. 7, 8.

¹ Dixi in senatu, me nomen consularis candidati delatorum.—Pro Muren. 30. Quod atrociter in senatu dixisti, non enim dixisses, aut seipsum.—Ib. 31; Plutarch. in Cato.

² Plutarch. in Cato.

³ Legem ambitus flagitanti—gestus est mos et voluntati et dignitati tua.—Pro Muren. 23.

⁴ Legatus L. Lucullus fuit: qui in legatione duxit exercitum—magnas copias hostium fudit, urbem partim vi, partim obsequio cepit.—Pro Muren. 9.

"for the safety of the innocent, the protection of the helpless, the relief of the miserable; but let its influence be repelled from the dangers and destruction of citizens: for if any one should say, that Cato would not have taken the pains to accuse, if he had not been assured of the crime, he establishes a very unjust law to men in distress, by making the judgment of an accuser to be considered as a prejudice or previous condemnation of the criminal^o." He exhorts "Cato not to be so severe on what ancient custom and the republic itself had found useful; nor to deprive the people of their plays, gladiators, and feasts, which their ancestors had approved; nor to take from candidates an opportunity of obliging by a method of expense which indicated their generosity, rather than an intention to corrupt^o."

But whatever Murena's crime might be, the circumstance which chiefly favoured him was, the difficulty of the times, and a rebellion actually on foot; which made it neither safe nor prudent to deprive the city of a consul, who by a military education was the best qualified to defend it in so dangerous a crisis. This point Cicero dwells much upon, declaring, "that he undertook this cause, not so much for the sake of Murena, as of the peace, the liberty, the lives and safety of them all. Hear, hear," says he, "your consul, who, not to speak arrogantly, thinks of nothing day and night but of the republic: Catiline does not despise us so far, as to hope to subdue this city with the force which he has carried out with him: the contagion is spread wider than you imagine; the Trojan horse is within our walls; which, while I am consul, shall never oppress you in your sleep. If it be asked then, what reason I have to fear Catiline? none at all; and I have taken care that nobody else need fear him: yet I say, that we have cause to fear those troops of his, which I see in this very place. Nor is his army so much to be dreaded, as those who are said to have deserted it: for in truth they have not deserted, but are left by him only as spies upon us, and placed as it were in ambush, to destroy us the more securely: all these want to see a worthy consul, an experienced general, a man both by nature and fortune attached to the interests of the republic, driven by your sentence from the guard and custody of the city¹." After urging this topic with great warmth and force, he adds; "We are now come to the crisis and extremity of our danger; there is no resource or recovery for us, if we now miscarry; it is no time to throw away any of the helps which we have, but by all means possible to acquire more. The enemy is not on the banks of the Anio, which was thought so terrible in the Punic war, but in the city and the forum. Good gods! (I cannot speak it without a sigh,) there are some enemies in the very sanctuary; some, I say, even in the senate! The gods grant, that my colleague may quell this rebellion by our arms; whilst I, in the gown, by the assistance of all the honest, will dispel the other dangers with which the city is now big. But what will become of us, if they should slip through our hands into the new year; and find but one consul in the republic, and him employed not in prosecuting the war, but in providing a colleague? Then this plague of Catiline will break out in all its fury, spreading terror, confusion, sword through the city," &c.¹ This action, so forcibly urged, of the necessity two consuls for the guard of the city at the of the new year, had such weight with t that without any deliberation they unacquitted Murena, and would not, as Ci so much as hear the accusation of men eminent and illustrious².

^o Pro Muren. 38.

¹ Ibid. 37.

^o Ibid. 36.

Cicero had a strict intimacy all this Sulpicius, whom he had served with all h in this very contest for the consulship³, a great friendship also with Cato, and t esteem of his integrity; yet he not only this cause against them both, but to t prejudice of their authority, laboured ev them ridiculous; rallying the professio picus as trifling and contemptible, the of Cato as absurd and impracticable, wit humour and wit, that he made the whol very merry, and forced Cato to cry out facetious consul have we⁴! But wha observable, the opposition of these great affair so interesting gave no sort of inter their friendship, which continued as fir to the end of their lives: and Cicero, the longest of them, showed the real⁵ he had for them both after their death curing public honours for the one, and w life and praises of the other. Murena t exposed to so much danger by the prosec seems to have retained no resentment o during his consulship paid a great deferen counsels of Cato, and employed all his support him against the violence of Me colleague in the tribunate. This was a of mind truly noble, and suitable to the persons; not to be shocked by the contradiction of their friends, when thei views on both sides were laudable and yet this must not be wholly charged to t of the men, but to the discipline of the itself, which by a wise policy imposed it on its subjects to defend their fellow c their dangers, without regard to any frien engagements whatsoever⁶. The example kind will be more or less frequent in state portion as the public good happens t ruling principle; for that is a bond of firm to be broken by any little differenc the measures of pursuing it: but wher ambition and party zeal have the ascend every opposition must necessarily create a as it obstructs the acquisition of that go is considered as the chief end of life, priva and advantage.

Before the trial of Murena, Cicero has another cause of the same kind in the d C. Piso, who had been consul four year and acquired the character of a brave and

¹ Pro Muren. 39.

² Defendi consul L. Murenam—nemo illorum clarissimis viris accusantibus, audiendum sibi curavit, cum bellum jam gerente Catilina, o auctore, duos consules Kalendis Jan. scirent esse—Ibid.

³ Ibid. 3.

⁴ Plut. in Cato

⁵ Hanc nobis a majoribus esse traditam dicit nullius amicitia ad propulanda pericula impedit Pro Sylla, 17.

magistrate: but we have no remains of the speech, nor anything more said of it by Cicero, than that Piso was acquitted on the account of his laudable behaviour in his consulship⁷. We learn however from Sallust, that he was accused of oppression and extortion in his government; and that the prosecution was promoted chiefly by J. Caesar, out of revenge for Piso's having arbitrarily punished one of his friends or clients in Cisalpine Gaul⁸.

But to return to the affair of the conspiracy: Lentulus and the rest, who were left in the city, were preparing all things for the execution of their grand design, and soliciting men of all ranks, who seemed likely to favour their cause, or to be of any use to it: among the rest, they agreed to make an attempt on the ambassadors of the Allobroges; a warlike, malicious, faithless people, inhabiting the countries now called Savoy and Dauphiny, greatly disaffected to the Roman power, and already ripe for rebellion. These ambassadors, who were preparing to return home, much out of humour with the senate, and without any redress of the grievances which they were sent to complain of, received the proposal at first very greedily, and promised to engage their nation to assist the conspirators with what they principally wanted⁹, a good body of horse, whenever they should begin the war; but reflecting afterwards, in their cooler thoughts, on the difficulty of the enterprise, and the danger of involving themselves and their country in so desperate a cause, they resolved to discover what they knew to Q. Fabius Sanga, the patron of their city, who immediately gave intelligence of it to the consul¹⁰.

Cicero's instructions upon it were, that the ambassadors should continue to feign the same zeal which they had hitherto shown, and promise everything that was required of them, till they had got a full insight into the extent of the plot, with distinct proofs against the particular actors in it: upon which, at their next conference with the conspirators, they insisted on having some credentials from them to show to their people at home, without which they would never be induced to enter into an engagement so hazardous. This was thought reasonable, and presently complied with; and Vulturcius was appointed to go along with the ambassadors, and introduce them to Catiline on their road, in order to confirm the agreement, and exchange assurances also with him; to whom Lentulus sent at the same time a particular letter under his own hand and seal, though without his name. Cicero, being punctually informed of all these facts, concerted privately with the ambassadors the time and manner of their leaving Rome in the night, and that on the Milvian bridge, about a mile from the city, they should be arrested with their papers and letters about them, by two of the prætors, L. Flaccus and C. Pontinius, whom he had instructed for that purpose, and ordered to lie in ambush near the place, with a strong guard of friends and soldiers: all which was successfully executed, and the whole company brought prisoners to Cicero's house by break of day¹¹.

The rumour of this accident presently drew a resort of Cicero's principal friends about him, who advised him to open the letters before he produced them in the senate, lest, if nothing of moment were found in them, it might be thought rash and imprudent to raise an unnecessary terror and alarm through the city. But he was too well informed of the contents to fear any censure of that kind; and declared, that in a case of public danger he thought it his duty to lay the matter entire before the public council¹². He summoned the senate therefore to meet immediately, and sent at the same time for Gabinus, Statilius, Cethegus, and Lentulus, who all came presently to his house, suspecting nothing of the discovery; and being informed also of a quantity of arms provided by Cethegus for the use of the conspiracy, he ordered C. Sulpicius, another of the prætors, to go and search his house, where he found a great number of swords and daggers, with other arms, all newly cleaned, and ready for present service¹³.

With this preparation he set out to meet the senate in the temple of Concord, with a numerous guard of citizens, carrying the ambassadors and the conspirators with him in custody: and after he had given the assembly an account of the whole affair, Vulturcius was called in to be examined separately; to whom Cicero, by order of the house, offered a pardon and reward, if he would faithfully discover all that he knew: upon which, after some hesitation, he confessed that he had letters and instructions from Lentulus to Catiline, to press him to accept the assistance of the slaves, and to lead his army with all expedition towards Rome, to the intent, that when it should be set on fire in different places, and the general massacre begun, he might be at hand to intercept those who escaped, and join with his friends in the city¹⁴.

The ambassadors were examined next, who declared, that they had received letters to their nation from Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilius; that these three, and L. Cassius also, required them to send a body of horse as soon as possible into Italy, declaring that they had no occasion for any foot; that Lentulus had assured them from the Sibylline books, and the answers of soothsayers, that he was the third Cornelius, who was destined to be master of Rome, as Cinna and Sylla had been before him; and that this was the fatal year marked for the destruction of the city and empire: that there was some dispute between Cethegus and the

⁷ L. Flaccum et C. Pontinium prætores—ad me vocavi, rem exposui; quid fieri placeret ostendi—occulite ad pontem Milvium pervenerunt—ipsi comprehensi ad me, cum jam diluocesseret, deducuntur.—In Catil. iii. 2.

⁸ Cum summis et clarissimis hujus civitatis viris, qui, audita re, frequentes ad me convenerant, litteras a me prius aperiri, quam ad senatum referrem, placeret, ne si nihil esset inventum, temere a me tantus tumultus injectus civitati videretur, me negavi esse facturum, ut de periculo publico non ad publicum concilium rem integram deferrem.—Ib. iii. 3.

⁹ Admonitu Allobrogum—C. Sulpicium—misi, qui ex ædibus Cethegi, si quid telorum esset, efferret; ex quibus ille maximum scarum numerum et gladiatorum extulit.—Ibid.; it. Plutarch. in Cic.

¹⁰ In Cat. iii. 4.

¹ Pro Flacco, 38.

² Sallust. Bell. Cat. 49.

³ Et equitatum in Italiam quamprimum mitterent.—In Catil. iii. 4.

⁴ Allobroges diu incertum habuere, quidnam consilii crederent.—Itaque Q. Fabio Sanga rem omnem, ut cognoverant, aperit.—Sall. Bell. Cat. 41.

⁵ Cicero—legatis præcipit, ut studium conjurationis vehementer silencium, ceteros adeant, bene polliceantur, æque operam, ut eos quam maxime manifestos habeant.—Ibid.

rest about the time of firing the city; for while the rest were for fixing it on the feast of Saturn, or the middle of December, Cethegus thought that day too remote and dilatory.—The letters were then produced and opened—first that from Cethegus; and upon showing him the seal, he allowed it to be his; it was written with his own hand, and addressed to the senate and people of the Allobroges, signifying, that he would make good what he had promised to their ambassadors, and entreating them also to perform what the ambassadors had undertaken for them. He had been interrogated just before about the arms that were found at his house; to which he answered, that they were provided only for his curiosity, for he had always been particularly fond of neat arms: but after his letter was read, he was so dejected and confounded, that he had nothing at all to say for himself.—Statilius was then brought in, and acknowledged his hand and seal; and when his letter was read, to the same purpose with Cethegus's, he confessed it to be his own. Then Lentulus's letter was produced, and his seal likewise owned by him; which Cicero perceiving to be the head of his grandfather, could not help expostulating with him, that the very image of such an ancestor, so remarkable for a singular love of his country, had not reclaimed him from his traitorous designs. His letter was of the same import with the other two; but having leave to speak for himself, he at first denied the whole charge, and began to question the ambassadors and Vulturcius, what business they ever had with him, and on what occasion they came to his house; to which they gave clear and distinct answers, signifying by whom, and how often, they had been introduced to him; and then asked him in their turn, whether he had never mentioned anything to them about the Sibylline oracles; upon which being confounded, or infatuated rather by the sense of his guilt, he gave a remarkable proof, as Cicero says, of the great force of conscience; for not only his usual parts and eloquence, but his impudence too, in which he outdid all men, quite failed him, so that he confessed his crime, to the surprise of the whole assembly. Then Vulturcius desired that the letter to Catiline, which Lentulus had sent by him, might be opened; where Lentulus again, though greatly disordered, acknowledged his hand and seal: it was written without any name, but to this effect: "You will know who I am, from him whom I have sent to you. Take care to show yourself a man; and recollect in what a situation you are; and consider what is now necessary for you. Be sure to make use of the assistance of all, even of the lowest."—Gabinus was then introduced, and behaved impudently for a while; but at last denied nothing of what the ambassadors charged him with.

After the criminals and witnesses were withdrawn, the senate went into a debate upon the state of the republic, and came unanimously to the following resolutions: That public thanks should be decreed to Cicero in the amplest manner; by whose virtue, counsel, and providence, the republic was delivered from the greatest dangers: that Flaccus and Pontinius, the prætors, should be thanked likewise for their vigorous and punctual execution of Cicero's orders: that Antonius, the other consul, should be praised for having removed from his councils all those who were of the conspiracy. That Lentulus, after he had accepted the prætorship, and divested him of his robes—and Cethegus, Statilius, and Gal their other accomplices also, when taken Cæparius, Furius, Chilo, Umbrenus, committed to safe custody; and that thanksgiving should be appointed in Cicero for his having preserved the city from destruction, the citizens from a massacre, and a war^b.

The senate being dismissed, Cicero went into the rostra, and gave the people an account of the whole proceeding, in the manner related: where he observed to them, thanksgiving decreed in his name was which had ever been decreed to any person: that all other thanksgivings had been appointed for some particular services to the state, this alone for saving it: that by the success of these accomplices, all Catiline's hopes were at once; for when he was driving Catiline to the city he foresaw, that if he was once there would be nothing to apprehend from the drowsiness of Lentulus, the fat of Cæparius, and rashness of Cethegus: that Catiline was the soul of the conspiracy; who knew nothing to be done, because he had orders always followed, solicited, and saw it do that if he had not driven him from his country into open rebellion, he could never have the republic from its dangers, or have with so much ease and quiet: that Catiline had not named the fatal day for their departure so long beforehand; nor ever suffered his hand and seal to be brought against him, as a proof of his guilt; all which was so in his absence, that no theft in any private person ever more clearly detected than this conspiracy: that all this was the pure effect of divine influence; not only for its being beyond the reach of human counsel, but because that so remarkably interposed in it, as to show themselves almost visibly: for not to mention the nightly streams of light from the western part of the heavens, flashes of lightning, quakes, &c. he could not omit what happened years before, when the turrets of the city were struck down with lightning; how the citizens called together from all Etruria, declared against slaughter, the overthrow of the laws, and the ruin of the city, were portended, and means were found out of appeasing the gods, which purpose they ordered a new and large temple of Jupiter to be made, and to be placed in position contrary to that of the former temple: its face turned towards the east; intimating if it looked towards the rising sun, the fall of the senate-house, then all plots against it would be detected so evidently, that all should see them. That upon this answer of that year gave immediate orders for erecting and placing the statue; but from the sloth of the work, neither they, nor their success, he himself, could get it finished till that on which, by the special influence of Jupiter, while the conspirators and witnesses were carried through the forum to the temple of Concord, in that very moment the statue was fixed in its place; and, being turned to look upon them and the senate, both they and the senate saw the whole conspiracy detected. And can any man," says he, "be such an enemy to truth, so rash, so mad, as to deny, that all things which we see, and above all, that this city, is governed by the power and providence of the gods?" He proceeds to observe, "that the conspirators must needs be under a divine and judicial infatuation, and could never have trusted affairs and letters of such moment to men barbarous and unknown to them, if the gods had not confounded their senses: and that the ambassadors of a nation so disaffected, and so able and willing to make war upon them, should alight the hopes of submission, and the advantageous offers of men of patrician rank, must needs be the effect of a divine interposition; especially when they might have gained their ends, not by fighting, but by holding their tongues." He exhorts them, therefore, "to celebrate that thanksgiving day religiously with their wives and children". That for all his pains and services he desired no other reward or honour, but the perpetual remembrance of that day: in this he placed all his triumphs and his glory, to have the memory of that day eternally propagated to the safety of the city, and the honour of his consulship; to have it remembered, that there were two citizens living at the same time in the republic, the one of whom was terminating the extent of the empire by the bounds of the horizon itself; the other preserving the seat and centre of that empire". That his case, however, was different from that of their generals abroad, who, as soon as they had conquered their enemies, left them; whereas it was his lot to live still among those whom he had subdued: that it ought to be their care therefore to see, that the malice of those enemies should not hurt him; and that what he had been doing for their good should not redound to his detriment; though as to himself, he had no cause to fear anything, since he should be protected by the guard of all honest men, by the dignity of the republic itself, by the power of conscience, which all those must needs violate who should attempt to injure him: that he would never yield, therefore, to the audaciousness of any, but even provoke and attack all the wicked and the profligate: yet if all their rage at last, when repelled from the people, should turn singly upon him, they should consider what a discouragement it would be hereafter to those who should expose themselves to danger for their safety. That for his part, he would ever support and defend in his private condition what he had acted in his consulship, and show, that what he had done was not the effect of chance, but of virtue: that if any envy should be stirred up against him, it might hurt the curious, but advance his glory.—Lastly, since it was now night, he bade them all go home, and pray to Jupiter, the guardian of them and the city; and though the danger was now over, to keep the same watch in their houses as before, for fear of any surprise; and he would take care, that they should have no occasion to do it any longer."

^b In Cat. lib. 5, 6.

^c Quod mihi primum post hanc urbem conditam contigit—quæ supplicatio, si cum cæteris Quiritibus, hoc interest, quod cætera bene gesta conservata Republica constituta est.—Ibid. 6.

While the prisoners were before the senate, Cicero desired some of the senators, who could write short-hand, to take notes of everything that was said; and when the whole examination was finished and reduced into an act, he set all the clerks at work to transcribe copies of it, which he dispersed presently through Italy and all the provinces, to prevent any invidious misrepresentation of what was so clearly attested and confessed by the criminals themselves, who for the present were committed to the free custody of the magistrates and senators of their acquaintance, till the senate should come to a final resolution about them. All this passed on the third of December, a day of no small fatigue to Cicero, who, from break of day till the evening, seems to have been engaged, without any refreshment, in examining the witnesses and the criminals, and procuring the decree which was consequent upon it; and when that was over, in giving a narrative of the whole transaction to the people, who were waiting for that purpose in the forum. The same night his wife Terentia, with the vestal virgins and the principal matrons of Rome, was performing at home, according to annual custom, the mystic rites of the goddess Bona, or the Good, to which no male creature was ever admitted; and till that function was over, he was excluded also from his own house, and forced to retire to a neighbour's; where, with a select council of friends, he began to deliberate about the method of punishing the traitors; when his wife came in all haste to inform him of a prodigy, which had just happened amongst them; for the sacrifice being over, and the fire of the altar seemingly extinct, a bright flame issued suddenly from the ashes, to the astonishment of the company; upon which the vestal virgins sent her away, to require him to pursue what he had then in his thoughts for the good of his country, since the goddess by this sign had given great light to his safety and glory².

It is not improbable, that this pretended prodigy was projected between Cicero and Terentia; whose sister likewise being one of the vestal virgins, and having the direction of the whole ceremony, might help to effect without suspicion, what had been privately concerted amongst them. For it was of great use to Cicero, to possess the minds of the people, as strongly as he could, with an apprehension of their danger, for the sake of disposing them the more easily to approve the resolution that he had already taken in his own mind, of putting the conspirators to death.

The day following, the senate ordered public rewards to the ambassadors and Vulturcius for their faithful discoveries³; and by the vigour of their proceedings seemed to show an intention of treating their prisoners with the last severity. The city in the mean while was alarmed with the rumour

² Constituti senatores, qui omnium indicum dicta, interrogata, responsa perscriberent: describi ab omnibus statim libraribus, dividi passim et pervulgari atque edi populo Romano imperavi—divisi toti Italiam, emisit in omnes provincias.—Pro Syll. 14, 15.

³ Ut abdicato magistratu, Lentulus, itemque ceteri in liberis custodiis habeantur. Itaque Lentulus, P. Lentulo Spintheri, qui tum ædilis erat; Cethegus Cornificio, &c.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 47.

⁴ Plutarch. in Cic.

⁵ Præmia legatis Allobrogum, Titoque Vultureto datis amplissima.—In Cat. iv. 3.

¹ In Cat. lib. 3, 9.

² Ibid. 10.

³ Ibid. 11.

of fresh plots, formed by the slaves and dependants of Lentulus and Cethegus for the rescue of their masters²; which obliged Cicero to reinforce his guards; and for the prevention of all such attempts, to put an end to the whole affair, by bringing the question of their punishment, without farther delay, before the senate; which he summoned for that purpose the next morning.

The debate was of great delicacy and importance; to decide upon the lives of citizens of the first rank. Capital punishments were rare and ever odious in Rome, whose laws were of all others the least sanguinary; banishment, with confiscation of goods, being the ordinary punishment for the greatest crimes. The senate, indeed, as it has been said above, in cases of sudden and dangerous tumults, claimed the prerogative of punishing the leaders with death by the authority of their own decrees: but this was looked upon as a stretch of power, and an infringement of the rights of the people, which nothing could excuse, but the necessity of the times, and the extremity of danger. For there was an old law of Porcius Læca, a tribune, which granted to all criminals capitally condemned, an appeal to the people; and a later one of C. Gracchus, to prohibit the taking away the life of any citizen without a formal hearing before the people³: so that some senators, who had concurred in all the previous debates, withdrew themselves from this, to show their dislike of what they expected to be the issue of it, and to have no hand in putting Roman citizens to death by a vote of the senate⁴. Here, then, was ground enough for Cicero's enemies to act upon, if extreme methods were pursued: he himself was aware of it, and saw, that the public interest called for the severest punishment, his private interest the gentlest; yet he came resolved to sacrifice all regards for his own quiet to the consideration of the public safety.

As soon therefore as he had moved the question, what was to be done with the conspirators; Silanus, the consul elect, being called upon to speak the first, advised, that those who were then in custody, with the rest who should afterwards be taken, should all be put to death⁵. To this, all who spoke after him, readily assented, till it came to J. Cæsar, then prætor elect, who in an elegant and elaborate speech, "treated that opinion, not as cruel; since death, he said, was not a punishment, but relief to the miserable, and left no sense either of good or ill beyond it; but as new and illegal, and contrary to the constitution of the republic: and though the heinousness of the crime would justify any severity, yet the example was dangerous in a free state; and the salutary use of arbitrary power in good hands, had been the cause of fatal mischiefs when it fell into bad; of which he produced several instances, both in other cities and their own: and though no danger could be apprehended from the such a consul as Cicero; yet in other under another consul, when the sword drawn by a decree of the senate, no misadventure what mischief it might not do, sheathed again: his opinion therefore, that the estates of the conspirators should be and their persons closely confined in towns of Italy; and that it should be any one to move the senate or the people in favour towards them⁶."

These two contrary opinions being the next question was, which of them should Cæsar's had made a great impression on him, and staggered even Silanus, with excuse and mitigate the severity of his Cicero's friends were going forward likely to create the least trouble to Cicero for whose future peace and safety they solicited: when Cicero, observing the heat of the house, and rising up to put the matter to a fourth speech, which now was the subject of this transaction; in which he varied his sentiments with all the skill of an orator and the statesman; and while he showed a perfect neutrality, and to give commendation to both the opinions, labouring all the while to turn the scale in favour of Silanus's, which he considered as an example of severity in the present crisis of the republic.

He declared, "That though it was to him to observe the concern and solicitude the senate had expressed on his account, he begged of them to lay it all aside, and to have any regard to him, to think only of the safety of their families: that he was willing to undergo persecution, if by his labours he could dignify and safety: that his life had been tempted in the forum, the field of Mars, his own house, and in his very bed: that in quiet he had digested many things against them without speaking of them; but if he granted that issue to his consulship, of a massacre, the city from the flames of war, let what fate soever attend would be content with it⁷." He therefore to "turn their whole care upon that it was not a Gracchus, or a Saturninus now in judgment before them; whose design it was to destroy the city, senate and people by a massacre; witness the Gauls and the very slaves convicted by letters, hands, seals, and confessions⁸. That the senate, by several acts, had already condemned them; but he thanks to him; by deposing Lentulus prætorship; by committing them to decrees a thanksgiving; by reward and honours: but as if nothing had yet been resolved to propose to them anew the question of the fact and the punishment: that they intended to do it, it must be deter-

² Liberti et pauci ex clientibus Lentuli opifices atque servitia in vicis ad eum eripendum sollicitabant.—Cethegus autem per nuncios familiam, atque liberos suos, lectos et exercitatos in audaciam orabat, ut, grege facto, cum telis ad eum irrumperent.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 50.

³ Porcia lex virgas ab omnium civium Romanorum corpore amovit—libertatem civium victori eripuit—C. Gracchus legem tulit, ne de capite civium Romanorum injussu vestro judicaretur.—Fro Rabirio, 4.

⁴ Video de istis, qui se populares haberi volunt, abesse non neminem, ne de capite videlicet Romani civis sententiam ferat.—In Catil. iv. 3.

⁵ Sallust. Bell. Cat. 50.

⁶ Sallust. Bell. Cat. 51.

⁷ Ut Silanum, consulem designatum non tentiam suam, quia mutare turpe erat, lenire.—Suet. J. Cæs. 14.

⁸ Plutarch. in Cico.

⁹ Ibid. 2.

¹⁰ In Catil.

night: for the mischief was spread wider than they imagined; had not only infected Italy, but crossed the Alps, and seized the provinces: that it was not to be suppressed by delay and irresolution, but by quick and vigorous measures^c: that there were two opinions now before them; the first, of Silanus, for putting the criminals to death; the second, of Cæsar, who, excepting death, was for every other way of punishing; each, agreeably to his dignity, and the importance of the cause, was for treating them with the last severity: the one thought, that those, who had attempted to deprive them all of life and to extinguish the very name of Rome, ought not to enjoy the benefit of living a moment, and so he showed withal, that this punishment had already been inflicted on seditious citizens: the other imagined, that death was not designed by the gods for a punishment, but the cure of our miseries; so that the wise never suffered it unwillingly, the brave often sought it voluntarily; but that bonds and imprisonment, especially if perpetual, were reserved for the punishment of detestable crimes: those therefore he ordered to be provided for them in the great towns of Italy: yet in this proposal there seemed to be some injustice, if the senate was to impose that burthen upon the towns, or some difficulty, if they were only to desire it: yet if they thought fit to decree it, he would undertake to find those, who would not refuse to comply with it for the public good: that Cæsar, by adding a penalty to the towns if any of the criminals should escape, and enjoining so horrible a confinement without a possibility of being released from it, had deprived them of all hope, the only comfort of unhappy mortals: he had ordered their estates also to be confiscated, and left them nothing but life; which if he had taken away, he would have eased them at once of all further pain, either of mind or body: for it was on this account that the ancients invented those infernal punishments of the dead, to keep the wicked under some awe in this life, who without them would have no dread of death itself^d. That for his own part, he saw how much it was his interest that they should follow Cæsar's opinion, who had always pursued popular measures; and by doing the author of that vote, would secure him from any attack of popular envy; but if they followed Silanus's, he did not know what trouble it might create to himself; yet that the service of the republic ought to supersede all considerations of his danger: that Cæsar, by this proposal, had given them a perpetual pledge of his affection to the state; and showed the difference between the affected flattery of their daily declaimers, and a mind truly popular, which sought nothing but the real good of the people: that he could not but observe, that one of those, who valued themselves on being popular, had absented himself from this day's debate, that he might not give a vote upon the life of a citizen; yet by concurring with them in all their previous votes, he had already passed a judgment on the merits of the cause: that as to the objection urged by Cæsar, of Græchus's law, forbidding to put citizens to death, it should be remembered, that those who were adjudged to be enemies, could no longer be considered as citizens; and that the author of that law had himself suffered death by the order of the people: that since Cæsar, a man of so mild and merciful a temper, had proposed so severe a punishment, if they should pass it into an act, they would give him a partner and companion, who would justify him to the people; but if they preferred Silanus's opinion, it would be easy still to defend both them and himself from any imputation of cruelty: for he would maintain it, after all, to be the gentler of the two; and if he seemed to be more eager than usual in this cause, it was not from any severity of temper, for no man had less of it, but out of pure humanity and clemency."—Then after forming a most dreadful image of "the city reduced to ashes, of heaps of slaughtered citizens, of the cries of mothers and their infants, the violation of the vestal virgins, and the conspirators insulting over the ruins of their country;" he affirms it to be "the greatest cruelty to the republic, to show any lenity to the authors of such horrid wickedness; unless they would call L. Cæsar cruel, for declaring the other day in the senate, that Lentulus, who was his sister's husband, had deserved to die: that they ought to be afraid rather of being thought cruel for a remissness of punishing, than for any severity which could be used against such outrageous enemies: that he would not conceal from them what he had heard to be propagated through the city, that they had not sufficient force to support and execute their sentence^e: but he assured them, that all things of that kind were fully provided; that the whole body of the people was assembled for their defence; that the forum, the temples, and all the avenues of the senate were possessed by their friends; that the equestrian order vied with the senate itself in their zeal for the republic; whom, after a dissension of many years, that day's cause had entirely reconciled and united with them; and if that union, which his consulship had confirmed, was preserved and perpetuated, he was confident that no civil or domestic evil could ever again disturb them^f. That if any of them were shocked by the report of Lentulus's agents running up and down the streets, and soliciting the needy and silly to make some effort for his rescue, the fact indeed was true, and the thing had been attempted; but not a man was found so desperate, who did not prefer the possession of his shed, in which he worked, his little hut and bed in which he slept, to any hopes of change from the public confusion: for all their subsistence depended on the peace and fullness of the city; and if their gain would be interrupted by shutting up their shops, how much more would it be so by burning them?—Since the people then were not wanting in their zeal and duty towards them, it was their part not to be wanting to the peoples^g. That they had a consul snatched from various dangers and the jaws of death, not for the propagation of his own life, but of their security; such a consul as they would not always have, watchful for them, regardless of himself: they had also, what was never known before, the whole Roman people of one and the same mind: that they should reflect how one night had almost demolished the mighty fabric of their

^c In Catil. iv. 3.

^d Inquit ut aliqua in vita formido improbe esset posita, et inferos ejusmodi quædam illi antiqui supplicia impie constituta esse voluerant, quod videlicet intelligebat, his remota, non esse mortem ipsam pertimescendam.—Ibid. 4.

^e In Catil. iv. 6.

^f Ibid. 8.

^g Ibid. 7.

empire, raised by such pains and virtue of men, by such favour and kindness of the gods: that by their behaviour on that day they were to provide, that the same thing should not only never be attempted, but not so much as thought of again by any citizen^b. That as to himself, though he had now drawn upon him the enmity of the whole band of conspirators, he looked upon them as a base, abject, contemptible faction; but if, through the madness of any, it should ever rise again, so as to prevail against the senate and the republic, yet he should never be induced to repent of his present conduct; for death, with which perhaps they would threaten him, was prepared for all men; but none ever acquired that glory of life, which they had conferred upon him by their decrees: for to all others they decreed thanks for having served the republic successfully; to him alone for having saved it. He hoped therefore, that there might be some place for his name among the Scipios, Pauluses, Mariuses, Pompeys; unless it were thought a greater thing to open their way into new provinces, than to provide that their conquerors should have a home at last to return to: that the condition however of a foreign victory was much better than of a domestic one; since a foreign enemy, when conquered, was either made a slave or a friend: but when citizens once turn rebels, and are baffled in their plots, one can neither keep them quiet by force, nor oblige them by favours: that he had undertaken therefore an eternal war with all traitorous citizens; but was confident, that it would never hurt either him or his, while the memory of their past dangers subsisted, or that there could be any force strong enough to overpower the present union of the senate and the knights¹: That in lieu therefore of the command of armies and provinces, which he had declined; of a triumph and all other honours, which he had refused; he required nothing more from them, than the perpetual remembrance of his consulship: while that continued fixed in their minds, he should think himself impregnable: but if the violence of the factious should ever defeat his hopes, he recommended to them his infant son, and trusted, that it would be a sufficient guard, not only of his safety, but of his dignity, to have it remembered, that he was the son of one who, at the hazard of his own life, had preserved the lives of them all." He concludes, by exhorting them to "act with the same courage which they had hitherto shown through all this affair, and to proceed to some resolute and vigorous decree; since their lives and liberties, the safety of the city, of Italy, and the whole empire, depended upon it."

This speech had the desired effect; and Cicero, by discovering his own inclination, gave a turn to the inclination of the senate; when Cato, one of the new tribunes, rose up, and after extolling Cicero to the skies^b, and recommending to the assembly the authority of his example and judgment, proceeded to declare, agreeably to his temper and principles, "That he was surprised to see any debate about the punishment of men, who had begun an actual war against their country: that their deliberation should be, how to secure themselves against them, rather than by them: that other crimes might be punished by commission, but unless this was prevented its effect, it would be vain to seek a remedy: that the debate was not about the punishment or the oppressions of the allies, but about their own lives and liberties; not about the order or manners of the city, on which he never varied his mind in that place, nor about the order or prosperity of their empire, but whether their enemies should possess that empire: that in such a case there could be no room for mercy: That they had long since lost and conferred true names of things: to give away of money was called generosity; and to save was criminal, fortitude. But if they were generous, let it be from the spoils of the enemy; if merciful, to the plunderers of the enemy; let them not be prodigal of the blood and by sparing a few bad destroy all the good. That Caesar indeed had spoken well concerning life and death; taking punishments for a fiction, and ordering criminals therefore to be confined in the towns; as if there was not more danger in those towns, than in Rome itself: that encouragement to the attempts of the wicked where there was less strength to resist than that his proposal could be of no use to the really afraid of them: but if in the great alone had none, there was the more reason for the rest to be afraid for themselves. They were not deliberating on the fate only of the conspirators, but of Catiline's whole army: which would be animated or dejected in proportion to the vigour or remissness of their decree: that the arms of their ancestors were not the arms of their successors: that Rome so great, but their discipline and their laws which were now depraved and corrupted to the extremity of danger it was a shame: that so indolent and irresolute, waiting for the gods to speak first, and trusting, like women, without doing anything for themselves, the help of the gods was not to be obtained by vows and supplications: that success was to be obtained by the active, the provident; that the people gave themselves up to sloth and was in vain for them to pray; they were not gods angry with them: that the flagitious criminals confuted every argument that Catiline was hovering over their army, while his accomplices were within and in the very heart of the city; so that they determined, it could not be kept secret: that the more necessary to determine Wherefore his opinion was, that since they had been convicted, both by testimony and own confession, of a detestable treason against the republic, they should suffer the punishment of death, according to the custom of their country."

Cato's authority, added to the impression Cicero had already made, put an end to the debate, and the senate, applauding his vigour and resolution, resolved upon a decree in consequence of which Silanus had first proposed the punishment and was followed in it by all the consuls yet they ordered the decree to be drawn in words, because he had delivered himself

^b In Catil. iv. 9.

¹ Ibid. 10.

^b Quæ omnia quia Cato laudibus extulerat in oelum.—[Ep. ad Att. xii. 21.] Ita consulis virtutem amplificavit, ut universus senatus in ejus sententiam transiret.—Vell. Pat. II. 35.

¹ Sallust. Bell. Cat. 52.

^a Ibid.

and explicitly upon it than any of them". The vote was no sooner passed, than Cicero resolved to put it in execution, lest the night, which was coming on, should produce any new disturbance: he was directly therefore from the senate, attended by a numerous guard of friends and citizens, and took Lentulus from the custody of his kinsman Lucius Spinther, and conveyed him through the forum to the common prison, where he delivered him to the executioners, who presently strangled him. The other conspirators, Cethegus, Statilius, and Gabinius, were conducted to their execution by the pretors, and put to death in the same manner, together with Cœparius, the only one of their accomplices who was taken after the examination*. When the affair was over, Cicero was conducted home in a kind of triumph by the whole body of the senate and the knights; the streets being all illuminated, and the women and children at the windows and on the tops of houses, to see him pass along, through infinite acclamations of the multitude proclaiming him their saviour and deliverer†.

This was the fifth of December, those celebrated days, of which Cicero used to boast so much ever after, as the most glorious day of his life: and it is certain, that Rome was indebted to him on this day for one of the greatest deliverances which it had ever received since its foundation, and which nothing perhaps but his vigilance and sagacity could have so happily effected: for from the first dawn of the plot, he never rested night or day, till he had got full information of the cabals and numbers of the conspirators‡; by which he easily baffled all their projects, and played with them as in a game; and without any risk to the public would draw them on just far enough to make their guilt manifest, and their ruin inevitable. But his masterpiece was the driving Catiline out of Rome, and tracing him as it were into a rebellion before he was ripe, in hopes that by carrying out with him his accomplices, he would clear the city at once of the whole faction, or by leaving them behind without his head to manage them, would expose them to mere destruction by their own folly: for Catiline's chief trust was not on the open force which he had provided in the field, but on the success of his secret practices in Rome, and on making himself master of the city; the credit of which would have engaged to him of course all the meaner sort, and induced all others through Italy, who wished well to his cause, to declare for him immediately: so that when this apprehension was over, by the silence and punishment of his associates, the senate brought the danger at an end, and that they had nothing more to do but to vote thanksgivings and prayers; looking upon Catiline's army as a crew of fugitives, or banditti, whom their forces were sure to destroy whenever they could meet with them.

But Catiline was in condition still to make a better resistance than they imagined: he had led up his troops to the number of two legions, of about twelve thousand fighting men, of which a fourth part only was completely armed, the rest furnished with what chance offered—darts, lances, clubs. He refused at first to enlist slaves, who flocked to him in great numbers, trusting to the proper strength of the conspiracy, and knowing that he should quickly have soldiers enough, if his friends performed their part at home*. So that when the consul Antonius approached towards him with his army, he shifted his quarters, and made frequent motions and marches through the mountains, sometimes towards Gaul, sometimes towards the city, in order to avoid an engagement till he could hear some news from Rome: but when the fatal account came, of the death of Lentulus and the rest, the face of his affairs began presently to change, and his army to dwindle apace, by the desertion of those whom the hopes of victory and plunder had invited to his camp. His first attempt, therefore, was by long marches and private roads through the Apennine, to make his escape into Gaul; but Q. Metellus, who had been sent thither before by Cicero, imagining that he would take that resolution, had secured all the passes, and posted himself so advantageously with an army of three legions, that it was impossible for him to force his way on that side; whilst on the other, the consul Antonius with a much greater force blocked him up behind, and enclosed him within the mountains†. Antonius himself had no inclination to fight, or at least with Catiline; but would willingly have given him an opportunity to escape, had not his quaestor Sextius, who was Cicero's creature, and his lieutenant Petreius, urged him on against his will to force Catiline to the necessity of a battle‡,—who, seeing all things desperate, and nothing left but either to die or conquer, resolved to try his fortune against Antonius, though much the stronger, rather than Metellus; in hopes still, that out of regard to their former engagements, he might possibly contrive some way at last of throwing the victory into his hands§. But Antonius happened to be seized at that very time with a fit of the gout, or pretended at least to be so, that he might have no share in the destruction of an old friend, so that the command fell of course to a much better soldier and honester man, Petreius,—who, after a sharp and bloody action, in which he lost a considerable part of his best troops, destroyed Catiline and his whole army, fighting desperately to the last man¶. They all fell in the very ranks in which they stood, and, as if inspired with the genuine spirit of their leader, fought not so much to conquer as to sell their lives as dear as they could, and, as Catiline had threatened in the senate, to mingle the public calamity with their own ruin.

* Sperabat propediem magnas copias se habiturum, si Rome socii incepta patravissent—interea servitia repudiabat.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 56.

† Ibid. 57.

‡ Hoc breve diocam:—Si M. Petreii non excellens animo et amore republice virtus, non summa auctoritas apud milites, non mirificus usus in re militari extitisset, neque adjutor ei P. Sextius ad excitandum Antonium, cohortandum, ac impellendum fuisset, datus illo in bello esset hiemi locus, &c.

§ Sextius, cum suo exercitu, summa celeritate est Antonium consecutus. Hic ego quid prodicem, quibus rebus consulam ad rem gerendam excitari; quot stimulos ad-moverit, &c.—Pro Sext. 5.

¶ Ἀφρον δὲ, οὐκ ἐλπίδα αὐτοῦ κατὰ τὸ συννησὶν ἐβελοναχέναι ἄρχην.—Dio, l. xxxvii. p. 47.

* Sallust. Bell. Cat. 59.

* Melius in ejus sententiam est facta discessio.—Ad Act. ii. 11.

† Sallust. Bell. Cat. 56.

‡ Plutarch. in Cic.

§ In eadem die, noctesque consilium, ut quid agerent, post multatam, sententiam ac viderem.—In Catil. iii. 2.

Thus ended this famed conspiracy, in which some of the greatest men in Rome were suspected to be privately engaged, particularly Crassus and Cæsar: they were both influenced by the same motive, and might hope, perhaps, by their interest in the city, to advance themselves, in the general confusion, to that sovereign power which they aimed at. Crassus, who had always been Cicero's enemy, by an officiousness of bringing letters and intelligence to him during the alarm of the plot, seemed to betray a consciousness of some guilt; and Cæsar's whole life made it probable, that there could hardly be any plot in which he had not some share; and in this there was so general a suspicion upon him, especially after his speech in favour of the criminals, that he had some difficulty to escape with life from the rage of the knights who guarded the avenues of the senate; where he durst not venture to appear any more, till he entered upon his prætorship with the new year*. Crassus was actually accused by one Tarquinius, who was taken upon the road as he was going to Catiline, and, upon promise of pardon, made a discovery of what he knew; where, after confirming what the other witnesses had deposed, he added, that he was sent by Crassus to Catiline, with advice to him not to be discouraged by the seizure of his accomplices, but to make the greater haste for that reason to the city, in order to rescue them, and revive the spirits of his other friends. At the name of Crassus the senate was so shocked, that they would hear the man no farther; but calling upon Cicero to put the question, and take the sense of the house upon it, they voted Tarquinius's evidence to be false, and ordered him to be kept in chains, nor to be produced again before them, till he would confess who it was that had suborned him*. Crassus declared afterwards, in the hearing of Sallust, that Cicero was the contriver of this affront upon him^b. But that does not seem probable; since it was Cicero's constant maxim, as he frequently intimates in his speeches, to mitigate and reclaim all men of credit by gentle methods, rather than make them desperate by an unseasonable severity,—and in the general contagion of the city, not to cut off, but to heal, every part that was curable. So that when some information was given likewise against Cæsar, he chose to stifle it, and could not be persuaded to charge him with the plot, by the most pressing solicitations of Catulus and Piso, who were both his particular enemies,—the one for the loss of the high-priesthood, the other for the impeachment above-mentioned^c.

Whilst the sense of all these services was fresh, Cicero was repaid for them to the full of his wishes, and in the very way that he desired, by the warm and grateful applauses of all orders of the city. For besides the honours already mentioned, L. Gellius, who had been consul and censor, said in a speech to the senate, that the republic owed him

* Plutarch. in Cic.

^a Ut nonnulli equites Romani, qui præsidii causa cum telis erant circum ædem Concordiæ—egredienti ex senatu Cæsari gladio minitarentur.—[Sallust. Bell. Cat. 49.] Vix pauci complexu, togaque objecta protexerint. Tunc plane deterritus non modo cessit, sed etiam in reliquum anni tempus curia abstinuit.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 14.

^b Sallust. Bell. Cat. 48.

^c Ipsum Crassum ego postea prædicantem audivi, tantam illam contumeliam sibi a Cicerone impostam.—Ibid.

^d Appian. Bell. Civ. l. ii. p. 430; Sallust. Bell. Cat. 49.

a civic crown for having saved t ruin^d: and Catulus in a full house the father of his country*; as Cai from the rostra, with the loud as the whole people: whence Pliny, in memory, cries out, Hail thou, who luted the parent of thy country's. most glorious which a mortal can v this precedent usurped afterwards b all mortals deserved it the least, proud to extort from slaves and Cicero obtained from the free vote of people of Rome.

—ROMA PAREN:

ROMA PATREM PATRIÆ CICERONEM I

These, Cicero, Rome while free, nor To tyrants' will, thy Country's Pare

All the towns of Italy followed t the metropolis, in decreeing extra to him; and Capua in particular patron, and erected a gilt statue to Sallust, who allows him the c excellent consul, says not a word c honours, nor gives him any greater than what could not be dissembled. There are two obvious reasons for thi first, the personal enmity which, ac dition, subsisted between them; sec of publishing his history, in the reig while the name of Cicero was still ob The other consul Antonius had bu of the thanks and honours which upon this occasion: he was know embarked in the same cause with considered as acting only under a ti penance as it were for past offence the notice which was taken of him was to pay him the slight comp mentioned, for having removed his companions from his friendship and

Cicero made two new laws this as it has been said, against briber the other, to correct the abuse of a legatio libera,—that is, an honora embassy, granted arbitrarily by the of its members, when they travel their private affairs, in order to give character, and a right to be treated or magistrates; which, by the ins great guests, was become a grievous all the states and cities through whi Cicero's design was to abolish it; b from that by one of the tribunes, l to restrain the continuance of it, w unlimited, to the term of one year^k

^d L. Gellius, his audientibus, civium republica dixit.—In Pison. 3; It. A. Gell

^e Me Q. Catulus, princeps hujus ordinis senatu PARENTEM PATRIÆ nominavit.—I

^f Plutarch. in Cic.—Κάτωθεν δ' αὐτοῦ παρπίλος προσαγορεύσας, ἐρεβὴν Applan. p. 431.

^g Salve, primus omnium PARENS PATRIS—Plin. Hist. N. vii. 30.

^h Me inaurata status donarant: meo adcoherant.—In Pis. 11.

ⁱ Atque etiam college meo laus imp qui hujus conjunctionis participes fuisse reipublice consilii removisset.—In Catil

^k Jam illud apertum est, nihil esse tur

At his first entrance into his office, L. Lucullus was soliciting the demand of a triumph for his victories over Mithridates, in which he had been obstructed for three years successively by the intrigues of some of the magistrates¹, who paid their court to Pompey, by putting this affront upon his rival. By the law and custom of the republic, no general, while he was in actual command, could come within the gates of Rome without forfeiting his commission, and consequently all pretensions to a triumph; so that Lucullus continued all this time in the suburbs, till the affair was decided. The senate favoured his suit, and were solicitors for him², but could not prevail, till Cicero's authority at last helped to introduce his triumphal car into the city³; making him some amends by this service for the injury of the Manilian law, which had deprived him of his government. After his triumph he entertained the whole Roman people with a sumptuous feast, and was much caressed by the nobility, as one whose authority would be a proper check to the ambition and power of Pompey: but having now obtained all the honours which he could reasonably hope for in life, and observing the turbulent and distracted state of the city, he withdrew himself not long after from public affairs, to spend the remainder of his days in a polite and splendid retreat⁴. He was a generous patron of learning, and himself eminently learned; so that his house was the constant resort of the principal scholars and wits of Greece and Rome, where he had provided a well-furnished library, with porticoes and galleries annexed, for the convenience of walks and literary conferences, at which he himself used frequently to assist; giving an example to the world of a life truly noble and elegant, if it had not been sullied by too great a tincture of Asiatic softness and Epicurean luxury.

After this act of justice to Lucullus, Cicero had an opportunity, before the expiration of his consulship, to pay all due honour likewise to his friend Pompey; who, since he last left Rome, had gloriously finished the piratic and the Mithridatic war, by the destruction of Mithridates himself: upon the receipt of which news, the senate, at the motion of Cicero, decreed a public thanksgiving in his name of ten days; which was twice as long as had ever been decreed before to any general, even to Marius himself, for his Cimbric victory⁵.

But before we close the account of the memorable events of this year, we must not omit the mention of one, which distinguished it afterwards as a particular era in the annals of Rome, the birth of Octavius, surnamed Augustus, which happened on the twenty-third of September. Velleius calls quoniam legari nihil reipublice causæ—quod quidem genus stupendum ego comedi, quanquam ad commodum senatus pertineret videretur, tamen adprobante senatu frequentatione, nihil mihi leve tribuere plebs tum intercessisset, sustulisset; mirari tamen tempus, et quod erat infinitum, annuum feci.—De Leg. lib. 8.

¹ Plutarch. in Lucull.

² Ibid.

³ Cum victor a Mithridatico bello revertisset, inimicorum columna triumpho tardius, quam deberat, triumphavit. Nos enim consules introduximus pene in urbem curram clarissimam viri.—Academ. lib. 1.

⁴ Plutarch. in Lucull.

⁵ Quo comede referente, primum decem dierum supplicatio decreta Cn. Pompeio Mithridate interfecto; cuius summa primum duplicata est supplicatio consularis.—De Provinc. Consular. 11.

it an accession of glory to Cicero's consulship⁶; but it excites speculations rather of a different sort; on the inscrutable methods of Providence, and the short-sighted policy of man: that in the moment when Rome was preserved from destruction, and its liberty thought to be established more firmly than ever, an infant should be thrown into the world, who, within the course of twenty years, effected what Catiline had attempted, and destroyed both Cicero and the republic. If Rome could have been saved by human counsel, it would have been saved by the skill of Cicero: but its destiny was now approaching: for governments, like natural bodies, have, with the principles of their preservation, the seeds of ruin also essentially mixed in their constitution, which, after a certain period, begin to operate and exert themselves to the dissolution of the vital frame. These seeds had long been fermenting in the bowels of the republic; when Octavius came, peculiarly formed by nature and instructed by art, to quicken their operation, and exact from their maturity.

Cicero's administration was now at an end, and nothing remained but to resign the consulship, according to custom, in an assembly of the people, and to take the usual oath, of his having discharged it with fidelity. This was generally accompanied with a speech from the expiring consul; and after such a year, and from such a speaker, the city was in no small expectation of what Cicero would say to them: but Metellus, one of the new tribunes, who affected commonly to open their magistracy by some remarkable act, as a specimen of the measures which they intended to pursue, resolved to disappoint both the orator and the audience: for when Cicero had mounted the rostra, and was ready to perform this last act of his office, the tribune would not suffer him to speak, or to do anything more, than barely take the oath; declaring, that he, who had put citizens to death unheard, ought not to be permitted to speak for himself: upon which Cicero, who was never at a loss, instead of pronouncing the ordinary form of the oath, exalting the tone of his voice, swore out aloud, so as all the people might hear him, that he had saved the republic and the city from ruin; which the multitude below confirmed with an universal shout, and with one voice cried out, that what he had sworn was true⁷. Thus the intended affront was turned, by his presence of mind, to his greater honour; and he was conducted from the forum to his house, with all possible demonstrations of respect by the whole city.

⁶ Consulatus Cicerois non mediocre adjectus decus, natus eo anno D. Augustus.—Vell. lib. 36; Suet. c. 3; Dio, p. 599.

⁷ Ego cum in concione, abiena magistratu, dicere a tribuno plebis prohiberetur, quæ constitueram: cumque is mihi, tantummodo ut jurarem, permitteret, sine ulla dubitatione juravi, rempublicam atque hanc urbem meo unius opera esse salvam. Mihi populus Romanus universus non unius diei gratulationem, sed æternitatem immortalitatemque donavit, cum meum iurandum tale atque tantum iuratus ipse una voce et consensu approbavit. Quo quidem tempore is meus domum fuit e foro reditus, ut nemo, nisi qui mecum esset, civium esse in numero videretur.—In Plac. 3.

Cum ille mihi nihil nisi ut jurarem permitteret, magna voce juravi verissimum pulcherrimumque iurandum: quod populus item magna voce me vere iurasse juravit.—Ep. Fam. v. 2.

Etenim paulo ante in concione dixerat, ei, qui in alios animadvertisset indicta causa, dicendi ipsi potestatem fieri non oportere.—Ibid.

SECTION IV.

CICERO being now reduced to the condition of a private senator, was to take his place on that venerable bench of consulars, who were justly reckoned the first citizens of the republic. They delivered their opinions the first always in the senate; and commonly determined the opinions of the rest: for as they had passed through all the public offices, and been conversant in every branch of the administration, so their experience gave them great authority in all debates; and having little or nothing farther to expect for themselves, they were esteemed not only the most knowing, but, generally speaking, the most disinterested, of all the other senators, and to have no other view in their deliberations, but the peace and prosperity of the republic.

This was a station exactly suited to Cicero's temper and wishes; he desired no foreign governments, or command of armies; his province was the senate and the forum; to guard, as it were, the vitals of the empire, and to direct all its councils to their proper end, the general good; and in this advanced post of a consular senator, as in a watch-tower of the state, to observe each threatening cloud and rising storm, and give the alarm to his fellow-citizens from what quarter it was coming, and by what means its effects might be prevented*. This, as he frequently intimates, was the only glory that he sought, the comfort with which he flattered himself, that after a life of ambition and fatigue, and a course of faithful services to the republic, he should enjoy a quiet and secure old age, beloved and honoured by his countrymen, as the constant champion and defender of all their rights and liberties. But he soon found himself mistaken, and before he had quitted his office, began to feel the weight of that envy, which is the certain fruit of illustrious merit: for the vigour of his consulship had raised such a zeal and union of all the honest in the defence of the laws, that till this spirit could be broken, or subside again, it was in vain for the ambitious to aim at any power, but through the ordinary forms of the constitution; especially while he, who was the soul of that union, continued to flourish in full credit at the head of the senate. He was now, therefore, the common mark, not only of all the factious, against whom he had declared perpetual war, but of another party not less dangerous, the envious too; whose united spleen never left pursuing him from this moment, till they had driven him out of that city, which he had so lately preserved.

The tribune Metellus began the attack: a fit leader for the purpose; who, from the nobility of his birth, and the authority of his office, was the most likely to stir up some ill humour against him, by insulting and reviling him in all his harangues, for putting citizens to death without a trial; in all which he was strenuously supported by Caesar, who pushed him on likewise to the promulgation of several pestilent laws, which gave great disturbance to the senate. Cicero had no inclination to enter into a contest with the tribune, but to make up the matter with him by sition of the women; particularly of wife of his brother Metellus, and Marcia, the wife of Pompey: he and several common friends to persuade quiet, and desist from his rashness; but was, that he was too far engaged, and out of his power^b: so that Cicero had but to exert all his vigour and eloquence the insults of this petulant magistrat

Caesar, at the same time, was attacked with no less violence; and being now of the prætorship, made it the first to call him to an account for embezzling money in rebuilding the capitol; and a law, to efface his name from the false commission for finishing what Pompey: but the senate bestirred warmly in the cause, that Caesar would drop it^c. This experiment convinced magistrates, that it was not possible to make head against the authority without the help of Pompey, whom therefore, by all the arts of address, draw into their measures. With this published a law, to call him home in order to settle the state, and qu disorders raised by the temerity of C throwing all power into his hands, come in for a share of it with him, him at least with the senate, by ex jealousies between them: but their la to be of so dangerous a tendency, changed their habit upon it, as in public calamity; and by the help of tribunes, particularly of Cato, resolved it to the utmost of their power: so that Metellus began to read it to the snatched it away from him; and when still to pronounce it by heart, Min tribune, stopped his mouth with his threw the assembly into confusion, and commotions in the city; till the themselves supported by the better so came to a new and vigorous resolute ing both Caesar and Metellus from their offices^d.

Caesar resolved at first to act in defence but finding a strong force prepared to thought it more advisable to retire, a trial of arms, till he was better provided shut himself up therefore in his house prudent and submissive behaviour, his peace, and got the decree of the reversed^e. But Metellus, as it was probably between them, fled away to Pompey's, that by misrepresenting

^b Quibus ille respondit, sibi non esse Fam. v. 2.

^c Sueton. J. Cæs. 15; Dio, l. xxxvii. p. 4.

^d Dio, ib.; Plutarch. in Cio.

^e Donec ambo administrationes reipublicæ summoverentur.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 16.

^f Ut compertis paratos, qui vi ac per ar dimissis lictoribus, abjectaque prætexta refugit, pro conditione temporum quieti præter opinionem evenisset, senatus—ac et amplissimis verbis collaudatum, in int inducto priore decreto.—Sueton. ibid.

^g Plutarch. in Ciores.

* Idcirco in hac custodia et tanquam in specula collocati sumus, ut vacuum omni metu populum Romanum nostra vigilia et prospectantia redderemus.—Phil. vii. 7.

things at home, and offering everything on the part of the people, he might instil into him some prejudices against the immoderate power of Cicero and the senate, and engage him, if possible, to declare for the popular interest. Cicero, in the senatus, published an invective oration against Metellus, which is mentioned in his epistles under the title of Metellina: it was spoken in the senate, in answer to a speech which Metellus had made to the people, and is often cited by Quintilian and others, as estant in their time.

The senate having gained this victory over Cæsar and Metellus, by obliging the one to submit, the other to leave the city: Q. Metellus Celer, who resided in Cisalpine Gaul, wrote a peevish and complaining letter to his friend Cicero, upon their treating his brother the tribune so severely: to which Cicero answered with that freedom, which a consciousness of integrity naturally dictates, yet with all that humanity which the sincerest friendship requires; as the reader will observe from the letter itself, which affords many instructive hints both historical and moral.

M. T. Cicero to Q. Metellus Celer, Proconsul.

"You write me word, that considering our mutual affection and late reconciliation, you never imagined, that you should be made the subject of such jest and ridicule by me. I do not well understand what you mean; yet guess that you have been told, that, when I was speaking one day in the senate of many who were sorry for my having preserved the republic, I said, that certain relations of yours, to whom you could refuse nothing, had persuaded with you to suppress what you had prepared to say in the senate in praise of me: when I said this, I added, that in the affair of saving the state I had divided the task with you in such a manner, that I was to secure the city from intestine wars, you to defend Italy from the open arms and secret plots of our enemies; but that this globose partnership had been broken by your friends, were afraid of your making me the least return of the greatest honours and services which you had received from me. In the same discourse, when I was describing the expectation which I had conceived of your speech, and how much I was disappointed by it, it seemed to divert the house, and a moderate laugh ensued; not upon you, but upon my mistake, and the frank and ingenuous confession of my desire to be praised by you. Now, when it must needs be owned, that nothing could be said more honourably towards you, when, in the most shining and illustrious part of my life, I could still to have the testimony of your commendation. As to what you say of our mutual affection, I do not know what you reckon mutual friendship, but I take it to be this; when we repay the good offices which we receive. Should I tell you then, that I gave up my province for your sake, you might justly suspect my sincerity: it suited the temper and circumstances, and I find more and more reason every day to be pleased with it: but I can tell you, that I no sooner resigned it in the assembly of the people, than I began to contrive how to throw it into your hands. I say nothing about the manner of drawing your lots; but would have you only believe, that there was nothing done in it by my colleague without my privacy. Pray recollect what followed; how quickly I assembled the senate after your allotment, how much I said in favour of you, when you yourself told me, that my speech was not only honourable to you, but even injurious to your colleagues. Then as to the decree which passed that day in the senate, it is drawn in such a strain, that as long as it subsists, my good offices to you can never be a secret. After your departure, I desire you also to recollect what I did for you in the senate, what I said of you to the people, what I wrote to you myself; and when you have laid all these things together, I leave it to you to judge, whether at your last coming to Rome you made a suitable return to them. You mention a reconciliation between us; but I do not comprehend how a friendship can be said to be reconciled, which was never interrupted. As to what you write, that your brother ought not to have been treated by me so roughly for a word: in the first place, I beg of you to believe, that I am exceedingly pleased with that affectionate and fraternal disposition of yours, so full of humanity and piety; and in the second, to forgive me if in any case I have acted against your brother, for the service of the republic, to which no man can be a warmer friend than myself: but if I have been acting only on the defensive, against his most cruel attacks, you may think yourself well used, that I have never yet troubled you with any complaints against him. As soon as I found that he was preparing to turn the whole force of his tribunate to my destruction, I applied myself to your wife Claudia, and your sister Mucia, whose zeal for my service I had often experienced, on the account of my familiarity with Pompey, to dissuade him from that outrage; but he, as I am sure you have heard, on the last day of the year put such an affront upon me when consul, and after having saved the state, as had never been offered to any magistrate the most traitorously affected, by depriving me of the liberty of speaking to the people upon laying down my office. But his insult turned only to my greater honour: for when he would not suffer me to do anything more than swear, I swore with a loud voice the truest, as well as the noblest of all oaths; while the people with acclamations swore likewise, that my oath was true. After so signal an injury, I sent to him the very same day some of our common friends, to press him to desist from his resolution of pursuing me: but his answer was, that it was not then in his power: for he had said a few days before in a speech to the people, that he who had punished others without a hearing, ought not to be suffered to speak for himself. Worthy patriot, and excellent citizen! to adjudge the man who had preserved the senate from a massacre, the city from fire, and Italy from a war, to the same punishment which the senate, with the consent of all honest men, had inflicted on the authors of those horrid attempts. I withstood your brother, therefore, to his face; and on the first of January, in a debate upon the republic, handled him in such a manner, as to make him sensible, that he had to do with a man of courage and constancy. Two days after, when he began again to Larangue, in every three words he named and threatened me: nor had he anything so much at heart, as to effect my ruin at any rate; not by the legal way of trial, or judicial proceeding, but by dint of force and violence. If I had not resisted his rashness with firmness and courage, who would not have thought, that the vigour of my consulship had been owing to chance, rather than to virtue? If you have not been informed, that your brother attempted all this against me, be assured that he concealed from you the most material part: but if he told you anything of it, you ought to commend my temper and patience, for not expostulating with you about it: but since you must now be sensible, that my quarrel to your brother was not, as you write, for a word, but a most determined and spiteful design to ruin me, pray observe my humanity, if it may be called by that name, and is not rather, after so flagrant an outrage, a base remissness and abjection of mind. I never proposed anything against your brother, when there was any question about him in the senate; but without rising from my seat, assented always to those who were for treating him the most favourably. I will add farther, what I ought not indeed to have been concerned about, yet I was not displeased to see it done, and even assisted to get it done; I mean, the procuring a decree for the relief of my enemy, because he was your brother. I did not, therefore, attack your brother, but defend myself only against him; nor has my friendship to you ever been variable, as you write, but firm and constant, so as to remain still the same when it was even deserted and slighted by you. And at this very time, when you almost threaten me in your letter, I give you this answer, that I not only forgive, but highly applaud your grief; for I know, from what I feel within myself, how great the force is of fraternal love: but I beg of you also to judge with the same equity of my cause; and if, without any ground, I have been cruelly and barbarously attacked by your friends, to allow that I ought not only not to yield to them, but on such an occasion to expect the help even of you and your army also against them. I was always desirous to have you for my friend, and have taken pains to convince you how sincerely I am yours: I am still of the same mind, and shall continue in it as long as you please; and, for the love of you, will sooner cease to hate your brother, than, out of resentment to him, give any shock to the friendship which subsists between us. Adieu¹."

Si in Them orationem Metellinam addidit quendam; liber hic subdixit.—Ad Att. l. 1. 13.

1 Galat. l. ix. 3; Aul. Gell. xviii. 7.

Cicero, upon the expiration of his consulship, took care to send a particular account of his whole administration to Pompey; in hopes to prevent any wrong impression there from the calumnies of his enemies, and to draw from him some public declaration in praise of what he had been doing. But Pompey, being informed by Metellus and Cæsar of the ill humour which was rising against Cicero in Rome, answered him with great coldness, and, instead of paying him any compliment, took no notice at all of what had passed in the affair of Catiline: upon which Cicero expostulates with him in the following letter with some little resentment, yet so as not to irritate a man of the first authority in the republic, and to whom all parties were forwardly paying their court.

^k Ep. Fam. v. 2.

M. T. Cicero to Cn. Pompeius Emperor¹.

"I had an incredible pleasure, in all people, from the public letter which you gave us in it that assures which, from my confidence in you always been promising. I must tell that your old enemies, but never extremely shocked and disappointed to the particular letter which you thought it brought me so slight an your friendship, yet it was very: nothing is apt to give me so much as the consciousness of my services and if at any time they are not re-ought to be, I am always content of the account should rest on my no doubt, however, but that, if the zeal, which I have always shown for has not yet sufficiently recommend the public interest at least will unite us. But that you may not know what it was, which I expected letter, I will tell it you frankly, as and our friendship require. I expect both to the republic and to our family had some compliment or congratulation on what I lately acted in my country you omitted, I imagine, for fear of to certain persons: but I would have that the things, which I have been safety of my country, are applauded money and judgment of the whole as you come amongst us, you will find with so much prudence and great that you, who are much superior admit me, who am not much inferior a share both of your public confidence and friendship. Adieu^m."

Soon after Catiline's defeat, a fire set on foot at Rome against the rest of the plures, upon the information of one who, among others, impeached J. Novius Niger the questor, as Q. C. in the senate; where, for the secret which he had given very early to Cicero the reward which had been offered coverer of the plot. He affirmed, that what he deposed against Caesar, was told to him by Catiline himself; and Vettius offered to produce a letter to Catiline in Caesar's own hand. Caesar found some difficulty to repel so bold an accusation, and was forced to implore the aid and testimony of Cicero, to prove that he also had given early information of Catiline's designs: but by his vigour and interest in the city, he obtained a full reward at last upon his accusers; for he deprived Curius of the reward, and got Vettius committed to prison, after he had been miserably handled, and almost killed by the mob; nor content with this, he imprisoned the quaestor Novius too, for suffering a superior magistrate to be arraigned before him*.

¹ The word emperor signified nothing in use, than the general or chief commander [Cic. De Orat. i. 48.] in which sense it be all who had supreme command in any part and was never used as a peculiar title. tory, in which some considerable advantage and great numbers of the enemy slain, universal acclamation, used to salute the field with the appellation of emperor; were the sole merit of the action to his duct. This became a title of honour, of manders were proud, as being the effect of victory, and won by their proper valour always the first and necessary step to them. On these occasions, therefore, the title constantly assumed, and given to general letters, both public and private, but was no longer than the commission lasted, by obtained it; that is, to the time of the entrance into the city, from which moment and title expired together of course, as their civil character, and became private

^m Ep. Fam. v. 7.

Several others, however, of considerable rank were found guilty and banished; some of them not appearing to their citation, others after a trial; M. M. Porcius Lecca, C. Cornelius, L. Vargunnius, Servius Sylla, and P. Autronius, &c. The last of these, who lost the consulship four years before upon a conviction of bribery, had been Cicero's school-fellow, and colleague in the quaestorship; and solicited him with many tears to undertake his defence: but Cicero not only refused to defend him, but, from the knowledge of his guilt, appeared as a witness against him*.

P. Sylla also, Autronius's partner and fellow-accuser in the cause of bribery, was now tried for conspiring twice with Catiline; once, when the plot proved abortive, soon after his former trial; and a second time, in Cicero's consulship: he was arraigned in the first by Hortensius, in the last by Cicero. The prosecutor was Torquatus, the son of his former accuser, a young nobleman of great parts and spirit; who ambitious of the triumph of slaying an enemy, and fearing that Cicero would snatch it from him, turned his rancour against Cicero instead of Sylla; and to take off the reverence of his authority, treated his character with great petulance, and employed every topic which could raise an odium and envy upon him: he called him a king, who assumed a power to create or destroy, just as he thought fit; said, that he was the third foreign king who had reigned in Rome after Numa and Tarquinius; and that Sylla would have run away and never stood a trial, if he had not undertaken his cause: whenever he mentioned the plot and the danger of it, it was with so low and feeble a voice, that none but the judges could hear him; but when he spoke of the prison and the death of the conspirators, he uttered it in so loud and lamentable a strain, as to make the whole forum ring with it.

Cicero, therefore, in his reply, was put to the trouble of defending himself, as well as his client. As to Torquatus's calling him foreigner, on the account of his being born in one of the corporate towns of Italy, he owns it; and in that town, he says, whence the republic had been twice preserved from ruin; and was glad that he had nothing to reproach him with, but what affected not only the greatest part, but the greatest men of the city; Curius, Coruncanius, Cato, Marius, &c. but since he had a mind to be witty, and would needs make him a foreigner, why did not he call him a foreign consul, rather than a king; for that would have been much more wonderful, since foreigners had been kings, but never consuls, of Rome. He admonishes him, who was now in the course of his preferment, not to be so free of giving that title to citizens, lest he should one day feel the resentment and power of such foreigners: that if the patricians were so proud, as to treat him and the judges upon the bench as foreigners, yet Torquatus had no right to do it, whose mother was of Asculum¹. Do not call me, then, foreigner any more, says he, lest it turn upon yourself; nor a king, lest you be laughed at; unless you think it kingly, to live so as not to be a slave, not only to any man, but even to any appetite; to condemn all sensual pleasures; to covet no man's gold or silver, or anything else; to speak one's mind freely in the senate; to consult the good, rather than the humour of the people; to give way to none, but to withstand many: if you take this to be kingly, I confess myself a king: but if the insolence of my power, if my dominion, if any proud or arrogant saying of mine provokes you, why do not you urge me with that, rather than the envy of a name, and the contumely of a groundless calumny?"—He proceeds to show, "that his kingdom, if it must be called so, was of so laborious a kind, that there was not a man in Rome who would be content to take his place." He puts him in mind, "that he was disposed to indulge and bear with his perverseness, out of regard to his youth and to his father—though no man had ever thrown the slightest aspersion upon him, without being chastised for it—but that he had no mind to fall upon one whom he could so easily vanquish; who had neither strength, nor age, nor experience enough for him to contend with: he advised him however not to abuse his patience much longer, lest he should be tempted at last to draw out the stings of his speech against him." As to the merits of the cause, though there was no positive proof, yet there were many strong presumptions against Sylla, with which his adversary hoped to oppress him: but Cicero endeavoured to confute them, by appealing "to the tenor and character of his life; protesting in the strongest terms, that he, who had been the searcher and detector of the plot, and had taken such pains to get intelligence of the whole extent of it, had never met with the least hint or suspicion of Sylla's name in it; and that he had no other motive for defending him, but a pure regard to justice; and as he had refused to defend others, nay, had given evidence against them from the knowledge of their guilt, so he had undertaken Sylla's defence, through a persuasion of his innocence²." Torquatus, for want of direct proof, threatened to examine Sylla's slaves by torture: this was sometimes practised upon the demand of the prosecutor; but Cicero observes upon it, "that the effect of those torments was governed always by the constitution of the patient, and the

* Cum impleto Ciceronis testimonio, quædam se de præparatione ultro detulisse docuimus, ne Curio præmia Caesaris, efficeret. Vettium, pro rostris in concione pene perierat, in carcerem conjecit. Eodem Novium quaestum, quod compellari apud se majorem potestatem non esset.—Sueton. Jul. Cæs. 17.

* Veniebat ad me, et sepe veniebat Autronius multis in ichthyaria, supplex, ut se defenderem:—Se meum pueritiam in pueritia, familiarem in adolescentia, amicum in quaestura commemorabat fuisse.—Pro Sylla, c. 2.

¹ Ibid. vii. 10.

² Pro Sylla, vii. 8.

³ Ibid. 16.

⁴ Ibid. 9.

⁵ Ibid. 30.

firmness of his mind and body; by the will and pleasure of the torturer, and the hopes and fears of the tortured; and that in moments of so much anguish there could be no room for truth:" he bids them "put Sylla's life to the rack, and examine that with rigour; whether there was any hidden lust, any latent treason, any cruelty, any audaciousness in it: that there could be no mistake in the cause, if the voice of his perpetual life, which ought to be of the greatest weight, was but attended to." Sylla was acquitted; but Cicero had no great joy from his victory, or comfort in preserving such a citizen, who lived afterwards in great confidence with Cæsar, and commanded his right wing in the battle of Pharsalia^a; and served him afterwards in his power, as he had before served his kinsman Sylla, in managing his confiscations and the sale of the forfeited estates.

About the time of this trial Cicero bought a house of M. Crassus, on the Palatine hill, adjoining to that in which he had always lived with his father, and which he is now supposed to have given up to his brother Quintus. The house cost him near thirty thousand pounds, and seems to have been one of the noblest in Rome; it was built about thirty years before by the famous tribune, M. Livius Drusus; on which occasion we are told, that when the architect promised to build it for him in such a manner, that none of his neighbours should overlook him: but if you have any skill, replied Drusus, contrive it rather so, that all the world may see what I am doing^b. It was situated in the most conspicuous part of the city, near to the centre of all business, overlooking the forum and the rostra; and what made it the more splendid, was its being joined to a portico or colonnade, called by the name of Catulus, who built it out of the Cimbric spoils, on that area where Flaccus formerly lived, whose house was demolished by public authority for his seditious practices with C. Gracchus^c. In this purchase he followed the rule which he recommends in his Offices, with regard to the habitation of a principal citizen; that his dignity should be adorned by his house, but not derived from it: where he mentions several instances of great men, who by the splendour of their houses on this very hill, which were constantly striking the eyes of the people, and imprinting a notion of their magnificence, made their way the more easily to the highest honours of the republic.

A. Gellius tells us, that having resolved to buy the house, and wanting money to pay for it, he borrowed it privately of his client Sylla, when he was under prosecution; but the story taking wind, and being charged upon him, he denied both the borrowing and design of purchasing, yet soon after bought the house; and when he was reproached

^a Pro Sylla, vii. 28.

^b Vid. Cæs. Comment. de Bello Civili.

^c Cum promitteret ei architectus, ita se edificaturum, ut libers a conspectu, immunis ab omnibus arbitris esset. —Tu vero, inquit, si quid in te artis est, ita compone domum meam, ut quoquid agam ab omnibus perspicere possit.—Vell. Pat. H. 14; Ep. Fam. v. 6.

^d M. Placcus, quia cum Graccho contra rempublicam salutem fecerat, et senatus sententia est interfectus, et domus ejus eversa est: in qua porticum post aliquanto Q. Catulus de manubis Cimbricis fecit.—Pro Domo, 38.

^e Ornanda est enim dignitas domo, non ex domo tota querenda.—De Offic. I. 39.

with the denial of it, replied only laugh they must be fools to imagine, that who resolved to buy, he would raise competition by proclaiming it^b.

The story was taken probably from so spurious collections of Cicero's Jests; who handed about not only after his death, in his lifetime, as he often complains: for it is certain, that there was nothing dishonourable in the purchase, so transacted so publicly, that before it was closed, one of his friends congratulated it by letter from Macedonia^c. The truth what he himself does not dissemble, that he rowed part of the money to pay for it, cent; and says merrily upon it, that he so plunged in debt, as to be ready for a that the conspirators would not trust him raised indeed some censure upon his purchasing so expensive a house with money: but Messala, the consul, happened after to buy Antronius's house at a great price and with borrowed money too, it gave him pleasure, that he could justify himself by example of so worthy a magistrate: by purchase, says he, I am thought to have made a good bargain; and men begin to be content that we may use the wealth of our friends, and what contributes to our dignity^d.

But the most remarkable event, which in the end of this year, was the pollution of the mysteries of the Bona Dea, or the Good by P. Clodius; which, by an unhappy consequence, not only involved Cicero in an unexpected calamity, but seems to have first blow towards the ruin of the republic was now quæstor, and by that means descended from the noblest family in Rome, in the vigour of his age, of a graceful person, and flowing eloquence; but with all the advantages of nature, he had a mind incredibly vicious, fierce, insolent, audacious, but above all, profligately wicked, and an open contemner of the laws and men; valuing nothing, that either the laws allowed; nothing, but in proportion to his desperate and above the reach of other disdaining even honours in the commonwealth; nor relishing pleasures, but were impious, adulterous, incestuous^e.

^b Aul. Gell. xii. 12.

^c Als enim, ut ego discecerim omnia omnium his etiam Sestianis in me conferri. Quid? tu id nonne defendis? nonne resistis? &c.—Ep. Fam. Sic audio Cæsarem—si quod afferatur ad eum quod meum non est, rejicere solere.—Ibid. ix. 16.

^d Quod ad me pridem scripseras, velle te bene quod de Crasso domum emeram—Eni cum ipse H. S. xxxv. aliquanto post tuam gratulationem Fam. v. 6.

^e Itaque scito, me nunc tantum habere aris; cupiam conjurare, si quisquam recipiat. Sed per excludunt, &c.—Ibid.

^f Ea emptio et nos bene emisse iudicant homines intelligere coeperunt, licet amicum: bus in emendo ad dignitatem aliquam pervenire Att. i. 13.

^g Exorta est illa rempublice sacris, religionibus ritati vestre, iudiciis publicis fumesta quæstura: idem iste deos, hominesque, pudorem, pietatis tue auctoritatem, jus, fas, leges, iudicia violavit. Haruspice Resp. 20.

Qui ita iudicia penamque contemperat, ut ei an intrigue with Cæsar's wife Pompeia, who, according to annual custom, was now celebrating in her house those awful and mystic sacrifices of the goddess, to which no male creature was ever admitted, and where everything masculine was so scrupulously excluded, that even pictures of that sort were covered during the ceremony¹. This was a proper scene for Clodius's genius to act upon; an opportunity of daring, beyond what man had ever dared before him: the thought of mixing the impurity of his lusts with the sanctity of these venerable rites flattered his imagination so strongly, that he resolved to gain access to his mistress in the very midst of her holy ministry. With this view he dressed himself in a woman's habit, and by the benefit of his smooth face, and the introduction of one of the maids, who was in the secret, hoped to pass without discovery: but by some mistake between him and his guide, he lost his way when he came within the house, and fell in unluckily among the other female servants, who detecting him by his voice, alarmed the whole company by their shrieks, to the great amusement of the matrons, who presently threw a veil over the sacred mysteries, while Clodius found means to escape by the favour of some of the domestics¹.

The story was presently spread abroad, and raised a general scandal and horror through the whole city: in the vulgar, for the profanation of a religion held the most sacred of any in Rome; in the better sort, for its offence to good manners, and the discipline of the republic. Cæsar put away his wife upon it; and the honest of all ranks were for pushing this advantage against Clodius as far as it would go, in hopes to free themselves by it of a citizen, who by this, as well as other specimens of his audaciousness, seemed born to create much disturbance to the state². It had been the constant belief of the populace, that if a man should ever pry into these mysteries, he would be instantly struck blind: but it was not possible, as Cicero says, to know the truth of it before, since no man, but Clodius, had ever ventured upon the experiment: though it was now found, as he tells him, that the blindness of the eyes was converted to that of the mind³.

dictaret, quod aut per naturam fas esset, aut per leges liceret.—Pro Mil. 16.

P. Clodius, homo nobilis, disertus, audax; qui neque dicendi, neque faciendo ullum, nisi quem vellet, nosset modum; malorum propositorum executor acerrimus, infans etiam sororis stupro, &c.—Vell. Pat. ii. 45.

¹ ubi velari pictura jubetur,

Quæcumque alterius sexus imitata figuram est.

JUVEN. vi. 339.

Quod quidem sacrificium nemo ante P. Clodium in sua memoria violavit:—quod sit per Virgines Vestales; fit per populo Romano: fit in ea domo, quæ est in imperio: fit in sacrosancta cœremonia: fit ei domus, cujus ne tamquam quidem viros extra fas est.—De Harusp. Resp. 17.

² P. Clodium, Apelli filium, credo te audisse cum veste mulieris deprehensum domi C. Cæsaris, cum per populo fieret, cumque per manus servulæ servatum et eductum; cum eo insigni infamia.—A. J. Att. i. 12.

³ Videtur, illud æculus tam importunum, audaciam tam immensam adolescentis, furentia, nobilis, vulnerati, non posse arceri otii finibus: erupturum illud malum stuprum, si impunitum fuisset, ad perniciem civitatis.—De Harusp. Resp. 3.

⁴ Aut quæd oculos, ut opinio illius religionis est, non proficiat. Quis enim ante te sacra illa vir sciens viderat,

The affair was soon brought before the senate, where it was resolved to refer it to the college of

A. URB. 692.

CIC. 46.

COOS.

M. PAPIUS

PISO,

M. VALERIUS

MESALLA.

priests, who declared it to be an abominable impiety; upon which the consuls were ordered to provide a law for bringing Clodius to a trial for it before the people⁴. But Q. Fufius Calenus, one of the tribunes, supported by all the Clodian faction, would not permit the law to be offered to the suffrage of the citizens. This raised a great ferment in the city, while the senate adhered to their former resolution, though the consul Piso used all his endeavours to divert them from it, and Clodius, in an abject manner, threw himself at the feet of every senator; yet, after a second debate in a full house, there were fifteen only who voted on Clodius' side, and four hundred directly against him; so that a fresh decree passed, to order the consuls to recommend the law to the people with all their authority, and that no other business should be done till it was carried⁵. But this being likely to produce great disorders, Hortensius proposed an expedient, which was accepted by both parties, that the tribune Fufius should publish a law for the trial of Clodius by the prætor, with a select bench of judges. The only difference between the two laws was, whether he should be tried by the people or by particular judges: but this, says Cicero, was everything. Hortensius was afraid lest he should escape in the squabble without any trial, being persuaded that no judges could absolve him, and that a sword of lead, as he said, would destroy him; but the tribune knew that in such a trial there would be room for intrigue, both in choosing and corrupting the judges, which Cicero likewise foresaw from the first; and wished, therefore, to leave him rather to the effect of that odium in which his character then lay, than bring him to a trial where he had any chance to escape⁶.

Clodius's whole defence was, to prove himself absent at the time of the fact; for which purpose, he produced men to swear that he was then at ut quæquam penam, quæ sequeretur illud æculus, scire posset?—De Harusp. Resp. 18.

Pœna omnis oculorum ad cecitatem mentis est conversa.—Pro Domo, 40.

⁴ Id sacrificium cum Virgines instanturæ, mentionem a Q. Cornificio in senatu factam—post rem ex S. C. ad Pontifices relatum; idque ab eis nefas esse decretum; deinde ex S. C. consules rationem promulgasse: uxori Cæsarem nuncium remisisse—In hac causa Piso, amicitia P. Clodii ductus, operam dat, ut ea rogatio—antiqetur, &c.—Ad Att. i. 13.

⁵ Senatus vocatur; cum decerneretur frequenti senatu, contra pugnant Ploene, ad pedes omnium sigillatim accedente Clodio, ut consules populum cohortarentur ad rogationem accipiendam: homines ad xv. Curioni, nullum S. C. facienti, assenserunt, ex altera parte facile coo. fuerunt.—Senatus decernebat, ut ante, quam rogatio lata esset, ne quid ageretur.—Ibid. 14.

⁶ Postea vero quam Hortensius exogitavit, ut legem de religione Fufius tribunus plebis ferret: in qua nihil aliud a consulari rogatione differrebat, nisi iudicium genus, (in eo autem erant omnia) pugnavitque ut ita fieret; quod et sibi et aliis persuaserat, nullis illum iudicibus effugere posse; contraxi vela, perspicimus inopiam iudicium.—Hortensius—non vidit illud, satis esse illum in infamia et sordibus relinqui, quam infirmo iudicio committi. Sed ductus odio properavit rem deducere in iudicium, cum illum plumbeo gladio jugulatum iri tamen diceret.—A me tamen ab initio consilium Hortensii reprehendebatur.—Ad Att. i. 16.

Interamna, about two or three days' journey from the city. But Cicero being called upon to give his testimony, deposed, that Clodius had been with him that very morning at his house in Rome². As soon as Cicero appeared in the court, the Clodian mob began to insult him with great rudeness; but the judges rose up, and received him with such respect, that they presently secured him from all farther affronts³. Caesar, who was the most particularly interested in the affair, being summoned also to give evidence, declared, that he knew nothing at all of the matter; though his mother Aurelia, and sister Julia, who were examined before him, had given a punctual relation of the whole fact: and being interrogated, how he came then to part with his wife? he replied, that all who belonged to him ought to be free from suspicion as well as guilt⁴. He saw very well how the thing was like to turn, and had no mind to exasperate a man of Clodius's character, who might be of good service to him for the advancement of his future projects. Plutarch says, that Cicero himself was urged on to this act against his will, by the importunity of his wife—a fierce, imperious dame, jealous of Clodius' sister, whom she suspected of some design to get Cicero from her, which by this step she hoped to make desperate. The story does not seem improbable; for, before the trial, Cicero owns himself to be growing every day more cool and indifferent about it; and in his raileries with Clodius after it, touches upon the forward advances which his sister had made towards him; and at the very time of giving his testimony, did it with no spirit, nor said anything more, as he tells us, than what was so well known that he could not avoid saying it⁵.

The judges seemed to act at first with great gravity; granted everything that was asked by the prosecutors; and demanded a guard to protect them from the mob; which the senate readily ordered, with great commendation of their prudence: but when it came to the issue, twenty-five only condemned, while thirty-one absolved him. Crassus is said to have been Clodius's chief manager in tampering with the judges, employing every art and instrument of corruption as it suited the different tempers of the men; and where money would not do, offering even certain ladies and young men of quality to their pleasure. Cicero says, that a "more scandalous company of sharpers never sat down at a gaming-table: infamous senators, beggarly knights, with a few honest men among them, whom Clodius could not exclude; who, in a crew so unlike to themselves, sat with sad and mournful faces, as if afraid of being infected with the contagion of their infamy; and that Catulus, meeting one of them, asked him what they meant by desiring a guard; were they afraid of being robbed of the money which (given them)?"

This transaction, however, gave a concern to Cicero, who laments "the quiet state of the republic which he lished in his consulship, and which he founded in the union of all good men, and broken, if some deity did not interpose single judgment: if that," says he, "a judgment, for thirty of the most scoundrels of Rome to violate all that sacred for the sake of money, and to do false which all the world knows to be he looked upon himself to be particularly by a sentence given in flat contradiction to his own testimony, so he made it his business not to display the iniquity of it, and to stimulate actors in it with all the keenness of In a debate soon after in the senate, on the republic, taking occasion to fall upon he "exhorted the fathers not to be dishonoured by having received one single wound, of such a nature that it ought neither to be feared nor to be feared; for to fear it, was and not to be sensible of it, a stupidity; Catiline was twice acquitted; Catiline also this man was the third, whom a bench had let loose upon the republic. But mistaken, Clodius," says he; "the judges reserved thee for the city, but for a judge designed thee no kindness by keep home, but to deprive thee of the benefit of exile. Wherefore, fathers, rouse yourselves to resume your dignity; there subsists a union among the honest: they have a fresh subject of mortification, yet they are not impaired by it: no new mischief to us; but that only, which lay concealed, covered, and, by the trial of one day, many others are found to be as bad as Clodius, not caring to encounter Cato's speeches, chose to tease him with turn the debate into ridicule. "You gentleman, indeed," says he, "and Baie." "That's not so fine," replied to be caught at the mysteries of the "But what," says he, "has a clown to do at the hot wells?" "Ask it yours," replied Cicero, "who had a right to your Arpinum clown?" "You have

¹ Nosti Calvum—biduo per unum servum gladiatorio ludo, confectis totum negotium. se, promissis, intercessit, dedit. Jam vero (perditam) etiam noctes certarum mulierum leucentulorum nobilium introductiones nobis pro mercedis cumulo fuerunt—xxv. ju fuerunt, ut summo proposito periculo velint, quam perdere omnia. xxxi. fuerunt magis quam fama commoverit. Quorum vidisset quendam;—Quid vos, inquit, peritabat? an, ne nummi vobis eriperentur. Mauculos senatores, nudos equites—paucos inter sui dissimiles et merentes sedebant turpitudinis vehementer permovebantur.—

² Insectandi vero, exagitandisque nudi bus, omnem omnibus studiosis eo fautoribus παρρησιας eripuit.—Ibid. x. It

³ This is supposed to refer to his sister's famous for her intrigues; who had been tempted Cicero to put away Terentia, and his wife.

² Plutarch. in Cic. ; Val. Max. viii. 5.

³ Me vero teste producto; Credo te—audisse, que consurrectio iudicum facta sit, ut me circumsteterint, &c.—Ad Att. i. 16.

⁴ Negavit se quidquam commiserisse, quamvis et mater Aurelia, et soror Julia, apud eosdem iudices, omnia ex fide retulissent: interrogatusque, cur igitur repudiasset uxorem?—Quoniam, inquit, meos tam suspitione quam crimine iudicio carere oportere.—Suet. J. Cæs. 74.

⁵ Noemipal, qui Lycurgei a principio fulscentis, quotide demittitur.—Ad Att. i. 13.

Neque dixi quoloquam pro testimonio, nisi quod erat ita notum atque testatum, ut non possem præterire.—Ibid. 16.

house," says he. "You should have said, judges," replied Cicero. "Those judges," says he, "would not believe you upon your oath." "Yes," replied Cicero, "twenty-five of them gave credit to me; while the rest would not give any to you, but made you pay your money beforehand." This turned the laugh so strongly on Cicero's side, that Clodius was confounded, and forced to sit down*. But being avowed enemies, they never met without some strokes of this kind upon each other; and which, as Cicero observes, must needs appear flat in the narrative, since all their force and beauty depended on the smartness of the contention, and the spirit with which they were delivered†.

The present consuls were M. Pupius Piso and M. Messala; the first of whom, as soon as he entered into office, put a slight affront upon Cicero: for his opinion having been asked always the first by the late consuls, Piso called upon him only the second, on Catulus the third, Hortensius the fourth. This, he says, did not displease him, since it left him more at liberty in his voting, and freed him from the obligation of any complaisance to a man whom he despised‡. This consul was warmly in the interest of Clodius; not so much out of friendship, as a natural inclination to the worst side; for, according to Cicero's account of him, he was a man "of a weak and wicked mind; a churlish, captious swearer, without any turn of wit, and making men laugh by his looks rather than jests; favouring neither the popular nor the aristocratical party; from whom no good was to be expected, because he wished none, nor hurt to be feared, because he durst do none; who would have been more vicious, by having one vice the less, sloth and laziness," &c.¶ Cicero frankly used the liberty which this consul's behaviour allowed him, of delivering his sentiments without any reserve; giving Piso himself no quarter, but exposing everything that he did and said in favour of Clodius, in such a manner as to kindle the senate from decreeing to him the province of Syria, which had been designed, and, in a manner, promised to him*. The other consul, Messala, was of a quite different character; a firm and excellent magistrate, in the true interests of his country, and a constant admirer and imitator of Cicero†.

About this time, Cicero is supposed to have made that elegant oration, still extant, in the defence of his old preceptor, the poet Archias: he

* Though Clodius reproaches Cicero here for the extravagant purchase of a house, yet he himself is said to have given afterwards near four times as much for one, viz. about 115,000*l.* sterling.—Plin. Hist. Nat. l. xxxvi. 15.

† Ad Att. l. 16.

‡ Nam cetera non possunt habere neque vim, neque potentiam, remote illo studio contentiosis.—Ibid.

§ Ibid. 12.

¶ Neque id magis amicitia Clodii ductus, quam studio generis rerum, atque patrium.—Ibid. 14.

Consul autem ipse parvo animo et pravo; tantum cavillator fuisse illo moroso, quod etiam sine dicitate rideretur; facie magis, quam facietis ridiculus: nihil agens cum republica, conjunctus ab optimatibus: a quo nihil agere boni republice, quia non vult; nihil metus mali, qui non adest.—Ibid. 13.

¶ Pro titio minus vitiosus, quod iners, quod somni plenus.—Ibid. 14.

§ Consulium nulla in re consistere unquam sum passus: depressum homini jam Syriam ademi.—Ibid. 16.

¶ Messala consul est egregius, fortis, constans, diligens, sacri legislator, amator, imitator.—Ibid. 14.

expected for his pains an immortality of fame from the praise of Archias's muse; but, by a contrary fate of things, instead of deriving any addition of glory from Archias's compositions, it is wholly owing to his own that the name of Archias has not long ago been buried in oblivion. From the great character given by him of the talents and genius of this poet, we cannot help regretting the entire loss of his works: he had sung in Greek verse the triumphs of Marius over the Cimbri, and of Lucullus over Mithridates; and was now attempting the consulship of Cicero: but this perished with the rest, or was left rather unfinished and interrupted by his death, since we find no farther mention of it in any of Cicero's later writings.

Pompey the Great returned to Rome about the beginning of this year, in the height of his fame and fortunes, from the Mithridatic war. The city had been much alarmed about him, by various reports from abroad, and several tumults at home; where a general apprehension prevailed of his coming at the head of an army to take the government into his hands*. It is certain, that he had it now in his power to make himself master of the republic without the hazard even of a war, or any opposition to controul him. Caesar, with the tribune Metellus, was inviting him to it, and had no other ambition at present than to serve under him: but Pompey was too phlegmatic to be easily induced to so desperate a resolution; or seems rather, indeed, to have had no thoughts at all of that sort, but to have been content with the rank which he then possessed, of the first citizen of Rome, without a rival. He had lived in a perpetual course of success and glory, without any slur, either from the senate or the people, to inspire him with sentiments of revenge, or to give him a pretence for violent measures; and he was persuaded that the growing disorders of the city would soon force all parties to create him Dictator, for the settlement of the state; and thought it of more honour to his character to obtain that power by the consent of his citizens, than to extort it from them by violence. But whatever apprehensions were conceived of him before his coming, they all vanished at his arrival; for he no sooner set foot in Italy, than he disbanded his troops, giving them orders only to attend him in his triumph; and, with a private retinue, pursued his journey to Rome, where the whole body of the people came out to receive him with all imaginable gratulations and expressions of joy for his happy return†.

By his late victories he had greatly extended the barrier of the empire into the continent of Asia, having added to it three powerful kingdoms‡, Pontus, Syria, Bithynia, which he reduced to the con-

* Nam et Cimbricas res adolescens attigit, et ipsi illi C. Mario, qui durior ad hec studia videbatur, juvenis fuit.

† Mithridaticum vero bellum, magnum atque difficile, totum ab hoc expressum est; qui libri non modo L. Lucullum, verum etiam populi Romani nomen illustant.—Nam quas res in consulatu nostro vobiscum simul pro salute urbis atque imperii gemimus, attigit hic veratibus atque inchoavit: quibus auditis, quod mihi magna res et jucunda vis est, hunc ad periculiendum hortatus sum.—Pro Archia, § 11.

‡ Plutarch. in Pomp.

§ Ibid.

* Ut Asia, que imperium antea nostrum terminabat, nunc tribus novis provinciis ipsa cingatur.—De Provin. Consular. 12.

dition of Roman provinces; leaving all the other kings and nations of the East tributary to the republic, as far as the Tigris. Among his other conquests, he took the city of Jerusalem, by the opportunity of a contest about the crown between the two brothers, Hircanus and Aristobulus. The lower town was surrendered to him with little or no opposition, but the fortress of the temple cost him a siege of three months; nor would he have taken it then so easily, as Dio tells us¹, had it not been for the advantage that the besieged gave him by the observance of their weekly sabbaths, on which they abstained so religiously from all work as to neglect even their necessary defence. He showed great humanity to the people, and touched no part of the sacred treasure, or vessels of gold, which were of an immense value²; yet was drawn by his curiosity into such a profanation of their temple, as mortified them more than all that they had suffered by the war: for, in taking a view of the buildings, he entered with his officers not only into the holy place, where none but the priests, but into the holy of holies, where none but the high priest was permitted by the law to enter: by which act, as a very eminent writer, more piously perhaps than judiciously, remarks, he drew upon himself the curse of God, and never prospered afterwards³. He carried Aristobulus and his children prisoners to Rome, for the ornament of his triumph, and settled Hircanus in the government and the high priesthood, but subject to a tribute. Upon the receipt of the public letters which brought the account of his success, the senate passed a decree, that, on all festival days, he should have the privilege to wear a laurel crown with his general's robe; and in the equestrian races of the Circus, his triumphal habit; an honour which, when he had once used, to show his grateful sense of it, he ever after prudently declined, since, without adding anything to his power, it could serve only to increase the envy which many were endeavouring to stir up against him⁴.

On the merit of these great services, he did many acts abroad of a very extraordinary nature; gave what laws he pleased to the whole East; distributed the conquered countries at discretion to the kings and princes who had served him in the wars; built twenty-nine new cities, or colonies; and divided to each private soldier about fifty pounds sterling, and to his officers in proportion; so that the whole of his donative is computed to amount to above three millions of our money⁵.

His first business, therefore, after his return, and what he had much at heart, was to get these acts ratified by public authority. The popular faction promised him everything, and employed all their skill to divert him from a union with Cicero and the senate, and had made a considerable impression upon him; but he found the state of things very different from their representations, saw Cicero still in high credit, and, by his means, the authority of the senate much respected; which obliged him to use great management, and made him so cautious of offending any side that he pleased none. Cicero says of his first speech, that it was not able to the poor, nor relished by the pointed the seditious, yet gave no sa the honest⁶. As he happened to come very heat of Clodius's affair, so he was urged by both parties to declare for the other. Pufus, a busy factious tribune of him, before the people, what he the dius's being tried by the prætor and judges? To which he answered, very cally, as Cicero calls it, that he had ev authority of the senate to be of the gr in all cases. And when the consul M him, in the senate, what his opinion profanation of religion, and the law pr it; he took occasion, without enteric ulars, to applaud in general all that done in it; and upon sitting down, who sat next to him, that he had now he thought, to signify his sentiments of Crassus, observing Pompey's reserv push him to a more explicit declarati the better of him at least in the g of the senate; rising up, therefore, launched out, in a very high strain, int of Cicero's consulship; declaring him to it for his being at that time a senat zen, nay, for his very liberty and his l as often as he saw his wife, his family, s try, so often he saw his obligations to discomposed Pompey, who was at a l stand Crassus's motive; whether it w benefit of an opportunity, which he ha ingratiating himself with Cicero, or t Cicero's acts to be in high esteem, a of them very agreeable to the senate; him the more, for its coming from a qu it was least to be expected; from one v out of regard to him, had always tr particular slight. The incident, how Cicero's spirits, and made him exert h his new hearer, Pompey, with all the eloquence: his topics were, the firm vity of the senate; the concord of th order; the concurrence of all Italy; remains of a baffled conspiracy; th plenty which had since succeeded: displayed with his utmost force, to let his ascendant still in that assembly, a he had been imposed upon by the ac new friends⁷. Pompey likewise, on h presently to change his tone, and af public occasions, to pay so great a cot that the other faction gave him the Cnæus Cicero: and their seeming t generally agreeable to the city, that th of them constantly clapped whenever t

¹ Prima conelo Pompelii—non jucunda: improbe, beatis non grata, bonis non grav gebat.—Ad Att. l. 14.

² Mihi que, ut aessidit, dixit, se putare si do istis rebus easo responsum.—Ibid.

³ Proxime Pompelium sedebam: intel moveri; utrum Crassum inire eam gratis prætermisisset.

Ego autem, dili boni, quomodo δωρεῶντες auditori Pompelii!—Hæc erat ὁμοθυμαδόν, de dinis, de equestri concordia, de consensu immortalis reliquis conjunctionis, de vitali Att. l. 14.

¹ Dio. l. xxxvii. p. 36.

² At Cn. Pompeius, captis Hierosolymis, victor ex illo famo nihil attulit.—Pro Flacco 28.

³ Pridem, Connec. part. II. p. 343.

⁴ Dio. l. xxxvii. p. 39.

⁵ Pila. Hist. l. xxxvii. 2; Appian. De Bello Mithridat.

in the theatre, without a hiss from any quarter'. Yet Cicero easily discovered that all this outward civility was but feigned and artificial; that he was full of envy within, and had no good intentions towards the public; nothing candid or sincere; nothing great, generous, or free in him¹.

There was one point which Pompey resolved to carry this summer against the universal inclination of the city—the election of L. Afranius, one of his enemies, to the consulship; in which he fights, says Cicero, “neither with authority nor interest, but with what Philip of Macedon took every fortune into which he could drive a loaded ass².” Plutarch says, that he himself distributed the money openly in his own gardens; but Cicero mentions it as a current report, that the consul Piso had undertaken to divide it at his house: which gave birth to two new laws, drawn up by Cato and his brother-in-law Domitius Ahenobarbus, and supposed to be levelled at the consul; the one of which gave a liberty to search the houses even of magistrates, on informations of bribery; the other declared all those enemies to the state, at whose houses the division of money were found³. Pompey, however, attacked Afranius upon the city, by which he disgusted all the better sort both of the senate and people⁴.

He had been making preparation all this summer for his triumph, which he deferred to his birth-day, the thirtieth of September, having resided in the meanwhile, as usual, in the suburbs; so that the senate and people, in compliment to him, held their assemblies generally, during that time, without the walls; some of which are mentioned to have been in the Flaminian Circus⁵. His triumph lasted two days, and was the most splendid which had ever been seen in Rome. He built a temple to Minerva out of the spoils, with an inscription giving a summary of his victories: that he had finished a war of thirty years; had vanquished, slain, and taken two millions one hundred and eighty-three thousand men; sunk or taken eight hundred and forty-six ships; reduced to the power of the empire a thousand five hundred and thirty-eight towns and fortresses; and subdued all the countries between the lake Mæotis and the Red Sea⁶.

Quintus Cicero, who, by the help and interest of his brother, was following him at a proper distance, through all the honours of the state, having been praetor the last year, now obtained the government of Asia; a rich and noble province, comprehending the greatest part of what is called Asia Minor. Before he went to take possession of it, he earnestly pressed Atticus, whose sister he married, to go along with him as one of his lieutenants; and resented his refusal so heinously, that Cicero had no small trouble to make them friends again. There is an excellent letter on this subject from Cicero to Atticus, which I cannot forbear inserting, for the light which it gives us into the genuine characters of all the three, as well as of other great men of those times, with a short account also of the present state of the republic.

Cicero to Atticus.

“I perceive from your letter, and the copy of my brother’s which you sent with it, a great alteration in his affection and sentiments with regard to you; which affects me with all that concern which my extreme love for you both ought to give me; and with wonder, at the same time, what could possibly happen either to exasperate him so highly, or to effect so great a change in him. I had observed, indeed, before, what you also mistrusted at your leaving us, that he had conceived some secret disgust which shocked and filled his mind with odious suspicions; which, though I was often attempting to heal, and especially after the allotment of his province, yet I could neither discover that his resentment was so great, as it appears to be from your letter, nor find that what I said had so great an effect upon him as I wished. I comforted myself, however, with a persuasion that he would contrive to see you at Dyrrhachium, or some other place in those parts; and, in that case, made no doubt but that all would be set right; not only by your discourse, and talking the matter over between yourselves, but by the very sight and mutual embraces of each other. For I need not tell you, who know it as well as myself, what a fund of goodness and sweetness of temper there is in my brother, and how apt he is both to take and to forgive an offence. But it is very unlucky that you did not see him, since, by that means, what others have artfully inculcated has had more influence on his mind than either his duty, or his relation to you, or your old friendship, which ought to have had the most. Where the blame of all this lies, it is easier for me to imagine than to write, being afraid lest, while I am excusing my own people, I should be too severe upon yours; for, as I take the case to be, if those of his own family did not make the wound, they might at least have cured it. When we see one another again, I shall explain to you more easily the source of the whole evil, which is spread somewhat wider than it seems to be. As to the letter which he wrote to you from Thessalonica, and what you suppose him to have said of you to your friends at Rome, and on the road, I cannot

¹ Uque eo, ut nostri illi comissatores conjurationis, turbatis juvenes, illum in sermonibus CNAEUM CICERONEM appellent. Itaque et ludis et gladiatoribus mirandas interpres, sine ulla paenoria fistula, auferamus.—Ad Att. l. 16.

² Nos, ut ostendit, admodum diligit, aperte laudat; comita, sed ita ut perspicuum sit, invidet: nihil come, nihil simplex, nihil de τοῖς ταύτουσι honestum, nihil liberum, nihil forte, nihil liberum.—Ibid. l. 13.

³ In eo neque auctoritate, neque gratia pugnat; sed quibus Philippus omnia castella expugnari posse dicebat, in quo modo aellus onustus auro posset ascendere.—Ibid. l. 16.

⁴ Consul sortem ille—suscepisse negotium dicitur, et domi divinos habere: sed S. C. duo jam facta sunt odiosa, quod in consulens facta putantur, Catone et Domitio postulat, &c.—Ibid. l. 16.

⁵ Consul est impositus nobis, quem nemo præter nos philosophos aspicere sine suspiratu posset.—Ibid. l. 18.

⁶ Pilius in concionem produxit Pompelium; res agebatur in Circo Flaminio.—Ibid. l. 14.

^b CN. POMPEIUS. CN. F. MAGNUS. IMP.
BELLO. XXX. ANNORUM. CONFECTO.
FUSIS. FUGATIS. OCCISIS. IN DEITIONEM ACCEPTIS. HOMINUM. CENTIES. VICIES.
SEXIES. CENTENIS. LXXXIII. M.
DEPERMISSIS AUT CAPT. NAVIBUS. DCCXLVI.
OPPIDIS. CASTELLIS. M.D.CCCXVIII.
IN VIDIEM RECEPTIS.
TERRIS. A MÆOTI. LACU. AD RUBRUM.
MARE. EURACTIS.
VOTUM. MERITO. MINERVÆ.
PLIN. Hist. Nat. vii. 26.

conceive what could move him to it. But all my hopes of making this matter easy, depend on your humanity; for if you will but reflect, that the best men are often the most easy, both to be provoked and to be appeased; and that this quickness, if I may so call it, or flexibility of temper, is generally the proof of a good-nature; and above all, that we ought to bear with one another's infirmities or faults, or even injuries; this troublesome affair, I hope, will soon be made up again. I beg of you that it may be so. For it ought to be my special care, from the singular affection which I bear to you, to do everything in my power that all who belong to me may both love and be beloved by you. There was no occasion for that part of your letter, in which you mention the opportunities which you have omitted of employments, both in the city and the provinces, as well at other times as in my consulship. I am perfectly acquainted with the ingenuity and greatness of your mind, and never thought that there was any other difference between you and me, but in a different choice and method of life: whilst I was drawn, by a sort of ambition, to the desire and pursuit of honours, you, by other maxims, in nowise blameable, to the enjoyment of an honourable retreat. But for the genuine character of probity, diligence, exactness of behaviour, I neither prefer myself, nor any man else, to you; and as for love to me, after my brother and my own family, I give you always the first place. For I saw, and saw it in a manner the most affecting, both your solicitude and your joy in all the various turns of my affairs; and was often pleased as well with the applause which you gave me in success, as the comfort which you administered in my fears; and even now, in the time of your absence, I feel and regret the loss, not only of your advice, in which you excel all, but of that familiar chat with you, in which I used to take so much delight. Where then shall I tell you that I most want you? in public affairs? where it can never be permitted to me to sit idle; or in my labours at the bar? which I sustained before through ambition, but now to preserve my dignity; or in my domestic concerns? where, though I always wanted your help before, yet, since the departure of my brother, I now stand the more in need of it. In short, neither in my labours nor rest; neither in business nor retirement; neither in the forum nor at home; neither in public nor in private affairs, can I live any longer without your friendly counsel and endearing conversation. We have often been restrained, on both sides, by a kind of shame, from explaining ourselves on this article; but I was now forced to it by that part of your letter, in which you thought fit to justify yourself and your way of life to me. But to return to my brother: in the present state of the ill humour which he expresses towards you, it happens, however, conveniently, that your resolution of declining all employments abroad was declared and known long beforehand, both to me and your other friends; so that your not being now together cannot be charged to any quarrel or rupture between you, but to your judgment and choice of life. Wherefore both this breach in your union will undoubtedly be healed again, and your friendship with me remain for ever inviolable, as it has hitherto been. We live here in an infirm, wretched, tottering republic: for you have heard, I guess, that our knights are now almost disjoined again from the senate. The first thing which they took the decree for calling the judges to account had taken money in Clodius's affair: I to be absent when it passed; but he afterwards that the whole order resented without complaining openly, I chide the I thought, with great effect; and in a very modest, spoke forcibly and copiously have now another curious petition, scarcely endured, which yet I not only bore with. The company, who hired the Atrium of the censors, complained to the senate through too great an eagerness, they more for them than they were worth, to be released from the bargain. I was advocate, or rather, indeed, the second suus was the man who put them upon request. The thing is odious and shameful public confession of their rashness; but great reason to apprehend, that if they sustain nothing, they would be wholly alienate the senate; so that this point also was managed by me. For, on the first of December, I spoke a great deal on both the two orders, and the advantages of both between them, and was heard very favourably. Nothing, however, is yet the senate appears well disposed; for Marcus consul elect, was the only one who spoke us; though that hero of ours, Cato, was to speak, if the shortness of the day permitted him. Thus, in pursuit of my object I am supporting as well as I can that which my consulship had cemented: but great stress can now be laid upon it, I provided myself another way, and a sure one of maintaining my authority; which I explain by letter, yet will give you a sketch of it. I am in strict friendship with Pompey already what you say—and will be upon as far as caution can serve me, and give them account some other time of my presence in politics. You are to know, in the that Luccius designs to sue directly for consulship; for he will have, it is said, but petitioners: Cæsar, by means of Arrius, to join with him; and Bibulus, by Piso's thinks of joining with Cæsar. Do you think this? Take my word for it, it is no matter. What shall I write farther? There are many things; but for another If you would have us expect you, please know it: at present I shall beg only of you I desire very earnestly, that you would soon as possible. December the fifth.

As to the petition of the knights, mentioned in this letter, Cato, when he came afterwards to it, opposed it so resolutely, that he had it rejected, which Cicero often contrary to all good policy; and sometimes in his letters, that Cato, though only man who had any regard for the republic frequently did mischief by pursuing it absurdly, and without any regard to the

^c Ad Att. l. 17.

^d Unus est, qui curret, constantia magis et quam, ut mihi videtur, consilio et ingenio miseros publicanos, quos habuit amantissimos jam mensem vexat, neque eis a senatu res patitur.—Ad Att. l. 18; it. II. 1.

And upon a review of the transactions which had passed since his consulship, and the turn which the public affairs were then taking, he seems to foretell that the republic could not stand much longer; since this very year had overthrown the two main pillars of it, which he had been erecting with such pains—the authority of the senate, and their union with the knights*.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus and L. Afranius were now consuls. The first had been prætor in Cicero's consulship, and commanded an army against Catiline, and was an excellent magistrate and true patriot; a firm opposer of all the factious, and a professed enemy also to Pompey; in which he was the more heated by a private resentment of the affront offered to his sister Mucia, whom Pompey had lately put away†. His partner, Afranius, was the creature of Pompey's power; but of no credit or service to him, as the account of his luxury and laziness, being fonder of balls than of business. Cicero calls him a man whom none but a philosopher could look upon without sighing; a soldier without spirit, and a prætor but for the railillery of the senate, where Plicanus abused him every day to his face; and so stupid, as not to know the value of what he had purchased‡.

By the help of this consul and some of the tribunes, Pompey imagined that he should readily obtain the ratification of his acts, together with an Agrarian law, which he was pushing forward at the same time, for the distribution of lands to his soldiers; but he was vigorously opposed in them, both by the other consul, Metellus, and the generosity of the senate§. Lucullus declared, that they ought not to confirm his acts in the gross, as if they received them from a master, but to consider them separately, and ratify those only which were found to be reasonable¶. But the tribune Flavius, who was the promoter of the law, impatient of this opposition, and animated by Pompey's power, had the hardness to commit Metellus to prison; and when all the senate followed, and resolved to go to prison too, he clapped his chair at the prison-door to keep them out: but this violence gave such a general scandal to the city, that Pompey found it advisable to draw off the tribune, and release the consul*. In order to allay these heats, Cicero offered an amendment to the law, which satisfied both parties, by securing the possessions of all private proprietors, and hindering the public lands from being given away. His proposal was, that out of the new revenues which Pompey had acquired to the empire, five years' rents should be set apart to purchase lands for the intended distribution†. But the progress of the affair was suspended by the sudden alarm of a Gallic war, which was always terrible to Rome; and being now actually commenced by several revolted nations, called for the immediate care and attention of the government‡.

The senate decreed the two Gauls severally to the two consuls; and required them to make levies without any regard to privilege or exemption from service; and that three senators should be chosen by lot, one of them of consular rank, to be sent with a public character to the other Gallic cities, to dissuade them from joining in the war. In the allotment of these ambassadors, the first lot happened to fall upon Cicero; but the whole assembly remonstrated against it, declaring his presence to be necessary at Rome, and that he ought not to be employed on such an errand. The same thing happened to Pompey, on whom the next lot fell, who was retained also with Cicero, as two pledges of the public safety§. The three at last chosen were Q. Metellus Creticus, L. Flaccus, and Lentulus. The Transalpine Gaul, which was the seat of the war, fell to the lot of Metellus, who could not contain his joy upon it for the prospect of glory which it offered him. "Metellus," says Cicero, "is an admirable consul; I blame him only in one thing: for not seeming pleased with the news of peace from Gaul. He longs, I suppose, to triumph. I wish that he was as moderate in this as he is excellent in all other respects¶."

Cicero now finished in the Greek language, and in the style and manner of Isocrates, what he calls a Commentary or Memoirs of the transactions of his Consulship; and sent it to Atticus, with a desire, if he approved it, to publish it in Athens and the cities of Greece. He happened to receive a piece at the same time, and on the same subject, from Atticus, which he rallies as rough and unpolished, and without any beauty, but its simplicity.

* Dio, l. xxxvii. 52.

† Ex hac ego lege, secunda concionis voluntate, omnia tollebam quæ ad privatorum incommmodum pertinebant.—Unam rationem non rejiciebam, ut ager hac adventitia pecunia emeretur, quæ ex novis vectigalibus per quinquennium reciperetur.—Magna cum Agrariorum gratia confirmabam omnium privatorum possessiones, (is enim est noster exercitus, hominum, ut tute scis, locupletium) populo autem et Pompeio (nam id quoque volebam) satisfaciebam emptione.—Ad Att. l. 19.

‡ Sed hæc tota res interpellata bello refrigerat.—Ad Att. l. 19.

§ Senatus decrevit, ut consules duas Gallias sortirentur; delectus haberetur; vacationes ne valeret; legati cum auctoritate mitterentur, qui adirent Gallie civitates.—Cum de consularibus mea prima sors exisset, una voce senatus frequens me in urbe retinendum censuit. Hoc idem post me Pompeio accidit; ut nos duo, quasi pignora reipublice retineri videremur.—Ibid.

¶ Metellus tuus est egregius consul: unum reprehendo, quod otium e Gallia nunciari non magnopere gaudet. Cupit, credo, triumphare. Hoc vellem medicorum; cætera egregia.—Ibid. 20.

* Nam ut ea breviter, quæ post discessum tuum acta sunt, colligam, jam exclamare necesse est, res Romanas clivis stare non posse.

† Sic file omnes duo firmamenta reipublice per me unum constituta, evellit: nam et senatus auctoritatem abiecit, et ordinem concordiamque dirinxit.—Ad Att. l. 18.

‡ Metellus est consul egregius, et nos amat, &c.—Ibid. l. 19. 20; Dio, l. xxxvii. p. 52.

§ Quam nemo præter nos philosophos aspicere sine suspirio potest.

¶ Audi autem filius, O dii immortales! quam ignavus et sine animo miles! quam dignus, qui Palliano, sicut facit, et ad male sentendum quotidie præbeat!

¶ Alio alter nihil est, ut plane quid emerit, nesciat.

¶ Audi filius vero ita se gerit, ut ejus consulatus non conculcetur est, et magni nostri ómnium.—Ad Att. l. 19. Ibid.

¶ Agraria autem promulgata est a Flavio, sane levis, &c.—Ad Att. l. 18.

¶ Agraria lex a Flavio tribuno plebis vehementer agitata, auctor Pompeio:—Nihil popolare habebat præter motum.—Hinc toti rationi agrariae senatus adversabatur, cupientes Pompeio novam quandam potentiam queri.—Ibid. 19.

* Dio, l. xxxvii. 52.

He sent his own work also to Posidonius of Rhodes, and begged that he would undertake the same argument in a more elegant and masterly manner. But Posidonius answered him with a compliment, that instead of being encouraged to write by the perusal of his piece, he was quite deterred from attempting it. Upon which Cicero says jocosely, that he had confounded the whole Greek nation, and freed himself from the importunity of those little wits, who had been teasing him so long, to be employed in writing the history of his acts^p. What he says in excuse for taking that task upon himself, is, that it was not a panegyric, but a history; which makes our loss of it the greater, since it must have given a more exact account of those times, than can now be possibly had, in an entertaining work, finished with care and elegance; which not only pleased himself, as it seems to have done very highly, but, as he tells us, everybody else: "If there be anything in it," says he, "which does not seem to be good Greek, or polite enough to please your taste, I will not say what Lucullus told you of his own history at Panormus, that he had scattered some barbarisms in it, on purpose to make it appear to be the work of a Roman: for if anything of that kind should be found in mine, it is not with design, but contrary to my intention^q."

Upon the plan of these memoirs, he composed afterwards a Latin poem in three books, in which he carried down the history to the end of his exile, but did not venture to publish it till several years after: not that he was afraid, he says, of the resentment of those whom he had lashed in it, for he had done that part very sparingly, but of those rather whom he had not celebrated, it being endless to mention all who had been serviceable to him^r. This piece is also lost, except a few fragments scattered in different parts of his other writings. The three books were severally inscribed to three of the Muses; of which his brother expresses the highest approbation, and admonishes him to bear in mind what Jupiter recommends in the end of Urania, or the second book; which concluded probably with some moral lesson, not unlike to what Calliope prescribes in the third^s.

^p Tua illa—horridula mihi atque incompta vis sunt: sed tamen erant ornata hoc ipso, quod ornamenta neglex-erant: et ut mulieres, ideo bene olere, quia nihil olebant, videbantur.—Ad me rescripsit jam Rhodo Posidonius, se nostrum illud ἱστορίαις cum legeret, non modo non excitatam ad scribendum, sed etiam plane perterritum esse.
—Conturbavi Græcam nationem: ita vulgo qui instabant, ut darem sibi quod ornaret, jam exhibere mihi modestiam destiterunt.—Ad Att. II. 1.

^q Commentarium consularium meū Græce compositum ad
te misi: in quo si quid erit, quod homini Attico minus Græcum, eruditumque videatur, non dicam, quod tibi, ut opinor, Panormi Lucullus de suis historici dixerat,—se, quo facilius illas probaret Romani hominis esse, idcirco barbara quædam et σάλοια dispersisse. Apud me si quid erit ejusmodi, me imprudente erit et invito.—Att. I. 19.

^r Scripsi etiam versibus tres libros de temporibus meis, quos jam pridem ad te misissem, si esse edendos putassem —sed quia verebar non eos, qui se læsos arbitrantur, etenim id feci parce et molliter; sed eos, quos erat infinitum bene de me meritos omnes nominare.—Ep. Fam. I. 9

^s Quod me admones de nostra Urania, suadesque ut
meminim Jovis orationem, que est in extremo illo libro; ego vero memini, et illa omnia mihi magis scripsi, quam ceteris.—Ep. ad Quint. Frat. II. 9; vid. Ad Att. II. 3; De Divin. I. 11.

Interem cursus, quos prima a parte juve
Quoque adeo Consul virtute animoque
Hoc retine; atque ange famam laudeque

That noble course, in which thy earliest
Was train'd to virtue, liberty, and truth
In which, when Consul, you such honour
While Rome with wonder and applause
The same pursue; and let each growing
A fresh increase of fame and glory bear.

He published likewise at this time of the principal speeches which he had consularship, under the title of his Consul: he chose to make a separate volume. Demosthenes had done of his Philippi to give a specimen of his civil or political being of a different manner, he says, in and crabbed style of the bar, and al only how he spoke, but how he acted first were against the Agrarian law of one to the senate, the other to the third on the tumult about Otho: the Rabirius: the fifth, to the sons of the the sixth, upon his resigning the provin the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth, of Catiline: with two more short ones dixes to those on the Agrarian law. Twelve, four are entirely lost; the third sixth, with one of the short ones; at the rest left maimed and imperfect. He also at this time in Latin verse a the Prognostics of Aratus, which he send to Atticus with the volume of his of which work there are only two or fragments now remaining.

Clodius, who had been contriving al how to revenge himself on Cicero, be give an opening to the scheme, whi formed for that purpose. His project himself chosen tribune, and in that of him out of the city, by the publicatio which by some stratagem or other b obtrude upon the people^t. But as al were incapable of the tribunate, by its titution, so his first step was to m: a plebeian, by the pretence of an adop lebeian house, which could not yet be out the suffrage of the people. Thi wholly new, and contrary to all the fo ing every condition, and serving none which were required in regular adoptio on the first proposal it seemed too ext be treated seriously, and would soon hissed off with scorn, had it not beer and privately supported by persons of weight than Clodius. Caesar was at of it, and Pompey secretly favoured it: n intended to ruin Cicero, but to keep under the lash; and if they could no

^t Fuit enim mihi commodum, quod in eis que Philippice nominantur, entuerat civis mothenes, et quod se ab hoc refractariolo jud genere abjuxerat, ut συνεβόρεός τις et vo videretur, curare, ut mee quoque essent or consulares nominarentur.—Hoc totum σῶμ habeas: et quoniam te cum scripta, tum res in liadem libris perspicies, et que gesserim, et q
—Ad Att. II. 1.

Prognostica mea cum oratiunculis proped
—Ibid.

^u Ille autem non simulat, sed plane tribun
cupit.—Ad Att. II. 1.

into their measures, or make him at least sit quiet, to let Clodius loose upon him. The solicitor of it was one Herennius, an obscure, hardy tribune, who first moved it to the senate, and afterwards to the people, but met with no encouragement from either: for the consul Metellus, though brother-in-law to Clodius, warmly opposed it²; and declared, that he would strangle him sooner with his own hands, than suffer him to bring such a disgrace upon his family³: yet Herennius persisted to press it, but without any visible effect or success; and so the matter hung through the remainder of the year.

Cicero affected to treat it with the contempt which it seemed to deserve; sometimes rallying Clodius with much pleasantry, sometimes admonishing him with no less gravity: he told him in the senate, that his attempt gave him no manner of pain; and that it should not be any more in his power to overturn the state, when a plebeian, than it was in the power of the patricians of the same stamp in the time of his consulship⁴. But whatever face he put outwardly on this affair, it gave him a real uneasiness within, and made him unite himself more closely with Pompey, for the benefit of his protection against a storm, which he saw ready to break upon him; while Pompey, ruffled likewise by the opposition of the senate, was as forward on his side to embrace Cicero, as a person necessary to his interests. Cicero, however, imagining that this step would be censured by many, as a desertion of his old principles, takes frequent occasion to explain the motives of it to his friend Atticus, declaring, "That the absolution of Clodius, the alienation of the knights, the indolence and luxury of the consular senators, who minded nothing but their fish-ponds, their carps and mullets, and yet were all envious of him, made it necessary for him to seek some firmer support and alliance.—That in this new friendship he should attend still to what the Sicilian wag, Epicharmus, whispered, 'Be watchful and distrust, for those are the nerves of the mind'⁵." On another occasion he observes, "That his union with Pompey, though useful to himself, was more useful to the republic, by gaining a man of his power and authority, who was wavering and irresolute, from the hopes and intrigues of the factious: that if this could not have been done without drawing upon himself a charge of levity, he would not have purchased that, or any other advantage, at such a price; but he had managed the matter so, as not to be thought the worse citizen for joining with Pompey, but Pompey himself the better, by declaring for him.—That since Catulus's death, he stood single and unsupported by the other consulars in the cause of the aristocracy; for, as the poet Rhinton says, 'some of them were good for nothing, others cared for nothing'⁶. But how much these fish-mongers of ours envy me, says he, I will write you word another time, or reserve it to our meeting. Yet nothing shall ever draw me away from the senate; both because it is right, and most agreeable to my interest, and that I have no reason to be displeased with the marks of respect which they give me⁷." In a third letter he says, "You chide me gently for my union with Pompey: I would not have you to think, that I sought it only for my own sake; but things were come to such a crisis, that if any difference had happened between us, it must have caused great disturbance in the republic; which I have guarded against in such a manner, that without departing from my own maxims, I have rendered him the better, and made him remit somewhat of his popularity: for you must know, that he now speaks of my acts, which many have been incensing him against, much more gloriously than he does of his own: and declares, that he had only served the state successfully, but that I had saved it⁸. What good this will do to me, I know not; but it will certainly do much to the republic. What if I could make Cæsar also a better citizen, whose winds are now very prosperous; should I do any great harm by it? Nay, if there were none who really envied me, but all were encouraging me as they ought, it would yet be more commendable to heal the vitiated parts of the state, than to cut them off: but now, when that body of knights, who were planted by me in my consulship, with you at their head, as our guard in the capitol, have deserted the senate, and our consulars place their chief happiness in training the fish in their ponds to feed from their hands, and mind nothing else; do not you think, that I am doing good service, by managing so, that those who can do mischief, will not? For as to our friend Cato, you cannot love him more than I do; yet, with the best intentions and the greatest integrity, he often hurts the republic; for he delivers his opinion, as if it were in the polity of Plato, not in the dregs of Romulus⁹. What could be more just, than to call those to an account who had received money for judging? Cato proposed, the senate agreed to it: the knights presently declared war against the senate, not against me; for I was not of that opinion. What more impudent, than to demand a release from their contract? yet it was better to suffer that loss, than to alienate the

¹ Verum præclare Metellus impedit et impedit.—Ad Att. ii. 1.

² Qui consilium incipientem furere atque conantem, sua se rebus interfectum, audiente senatu dixerit.—Pro Cælio, 24.

³ Sed neque magnopere dixi esse nobis laborandum, quod nihil magis ei licitum esset plebeio reipublicam perdere, quam similibus ejus me consule patriciis esset licitum.—Ad Att. ii. 1.

⁴ Cum hoc ego me tanta familiaritate conjunxi, ut uterque nostrum in sua ratione munitor, et in republica frui hac conjunctione esse possit.—

⁵ In his novis amicitii implicati sumus, ut crebro mihi referat Niculus, insusurret Epicharmus, cantilenam illam hæc:

ἄλλοι καὶ μέγιστοι ἀπιστοῦν, ἄρθρα ταῦτα τῶν φρενῶν.
Ad Att. i. 19.

⁶ Illud tamen velim existimes, me hanc viam optima-tum post Catuli mortem nec presidio ullo nec comitatu tenere. Nam ut ait Rhinton, ut opinor,

Οἱ μὲν κατ' οὐδέν εἰσι, οἱ δ' οὐδέν μέλει.

Ad Att. i. 20.

⁷ Mihi vero ut invadeant piscinarum nostri, aut acribam ad te alias, aut in congressum nostrum reservabo. A curia autem nulla me res divellet.—Ibid.

⁸ Quem de meis rebus, in quas multi eum incitarant, multo citio gloriosius, quam de suis prædicare. Sibi enim bene gesta, mihi conservate reipublicæ, dat testimonium.
—Ibid. ii. 1.

⁹ Nam Catonem nostrum non tu amas plus, quam ego.
Sed tamen ille optimo animo utens, et summa fide, nocet interdum reipublicæ; dicit enim tanquam in Platonis voluntatibus, non tanquam in Romuli sæce, sententiam.—Ad Att. ii. 1.

whole order : but Cato opposed it, and prevailed ; so that now, when the consul was thrown into prison, as well as in all the tumults which have lately happened, not one of them would stir a foot ; though, under me, and the consuls who succeeded me, they had defended the republic so strenuously," &c.¹

In the midst of these transactions, Julius Cæsar returned from the government of Spain, which had been allotted to him from his prætorship, with great fame both for his military and political acts. He conquered the barbarous nations by his arms, and civilized them by his laws ; and having subdued the whole country as far as the ocean, and been saluted emperor by the soldiers, came away in all haste to Rome, to sue at the same time for the double honour of a triumph and the consulship². But his demand of the first was, according to the usual forms, incompatible with his pretensions to the second ; since the one obliged him to continue without the city, the other made his presence necessary within : so that finding an aversion in the senate to dispense with the laws in his favour, he preferred the solid to the specious, and dropped the triumph, to lay hold on the consulship³. He designed L. Lucceius for his colleague, and privately joined interests with him, on condition that Lucceius, who was rich, should furnish money sufficient to bribe the centuries. But the senate, always jealous of his designs, and fearing the effects of his power, when supported by a colleague subservient to his will, espoused the other candidate, Bibulus, with all their authority, and made a common purse, to enable him to bribe as high as his competitors ; which Cato himself is said to have approved⁴. By this means they got Bibulus elected, to their great joy ; a man firm to their interests, and determined to obstruct all the ambitious attempts of Cæsar.

Upon Cæsar's going to Spain, he had engaged Crassus to stand bound for him to his creditors, who were clamorous and troublesome, as far as two hundred thousand pounds sterling : so much did he want to be worth nothing, as he merrily said of himself⁵. Crassus hoped, by the purchase of his friendship, to be able to make head against Pompey in the administration of public affairs : but Cæsar, who had long been courting Pompey, and labouring to disengage him from a union with Cicero and the aristocratical interest, easily saw, that as things then stood, their joint strength

¹ Restitit et pervicit Cato. Itaque nunc, consule in carcere incluso, sæpe item seditione commoto, aspiravit nemo eorum, quorum ego concurreo, itemque consules, qui post me fuerunt, rempublicam defendere solebant.—Ad Att. li. 1.

² Jura ipsorum permissu statuerit ; inveteratam quandam barbariam ex Geditanorum moribus et disciplina delerit.—Pro Balbo, 19.

³ Pacatæque provinciæ, pari festinatione, non expectato successore, ad triumphum simul consulatumque decessit.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 18 ; vid. it. Dio. l. xxxvii. p. 54.

⁴ Dio, ibid.

⁵ Pactus ut is, quoniam inferior gratia esset, pecuniæque polleteret, nummos de suo, communi nomine per centurias pronuntiaret. Qua cognita re, optimates, quos metus ceperat, nihil non ausurum eum in summo magistratu, concordi et consentiente collega, auctores Bibulo fuerunt tantundem pollicendi : ac plerique pecunias contulerunt ; ne Catone quidem abnuente eam largitionem e republica fieri.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 19.

⁶ Plutarch. in J. Cæs. ; Appian. De Bello Civ. R. p. 432 ; Sueton. li. 18.

would avail but little towards obtaining what he aimed at, unless they could induce Pompey to join with them : on pretence, therefore, of calling Pompey and Crassus, who had been enemies, he formed the project of a trip between the three ; by which they should oblige themselves to promote each others' and to act nothing but by common agree this Pompey easily consented, on account of which the senate had impolitically given by their perverse opposition to everything he desired or attempted in the state.

This is commonly called the first triumvirate, which was nothing else in reality but a conspiracy of three, the most powerful in Rome, to extort from their country by what they could not obtain by law. The chief motive was, to get his acts confirmed in his consulship ; Cæsar's, by giving to Pompey's glory, to advance his own ; Crassus's, to gain that ascendancy, which not sustain alone, by the authority of Pompey the vigour of Cæsar¹. But Cæsar, who saw the scheme, easily saw, that the chief advantage it would necessarily redound to himself : that the old enmity between the other two might be palliated, could never be healed, leaving a secret jealousy between them by their common help he was sure to make superior to all others, so by managing against the other, he hoped to gain at last victory also over them both². To cement this therefore the more strongly by the ties of friendship, as well as interest, he gave his daughter to Pompey : and from this era all the writers date the origin of the civil war afterwards ensued, and the subversion of the republic in which they ended³.

—tu causa malorum
Facta tribus dominis communis Romæ.—
LOCAN.

Hence flow'd our ills, hence all that civil
When Rome the common slave of three !

Cicero might have made what terms he pleased with the triumvirate ; been admitted even to a share of their power, and a fourth in their government, which seemed to want a man of his character to make it complete. For while the rest were in their governments, and the command abroad, his authority would have been of use at home, to manage the affairs of the republic, and to solicit what they had to transact with the

¹ Hoc consilium Pompeius habuerat, ut tandem transmarinis provinciis per Cæsarem confirmare solum : Cæsar autem, quod animadvertēbat, se Pompeii gloriæ aucturum suum ; et invidia c potentie in illum relegata, confirmaturum vi Crassus, ut quem principatum solus asequi non auctoritate Pompeii, viribus teneret Cæsar.—
li. 44.

² Sciebat enim, se alios facile omnes ipsorum deinde ipsos etiam, unum per alterum, hand multum superaturos esse.—Dio, l. xxxvii. 55.

³ Inter eum et Cn. Pompeium et M. Crassum tentis societas, quæ urbi orbique terrarum, ne diverso quoque tempore, etiam ipsa exitiabilis fuisset.—Pat. li. 44.

Motum ex Metello consule civicum, &c.
Hor. Cart.

people. Cæsar therefore was extremely desirous to add him to the party, or to engage him rather in particular measures with himself; and no sooner entered into the consulship, than he sent him word by their common friend Balbus, that he would be governed in every step by him and Pompey, with whom he would endeavour to join Crassus too*. But Cicero would not enter into any engagements jointly with the three, whose union he abhorred; nor into private measures with Cæsar, whose intentions he always suspected. He thought Pompey the better citizen of the two; took his views to be less dangerous, and his temper more tractable; and imagined, that a separate alliance with him would be sufficient to screen him from the malice of his enemies. Yet this put him under no small difficulty: for if he opposed the triumph, he could not expect to continue well with Pompey; or, if he served it, with the senate: in the first, he saw his ruin; in the second, the loss of his credit. He chose, therefore, what the wise will always choose in such circumstances, a middle way; to temper his behaviour so, that with the constancy of his duty to the republic, he might have a regard also to his safety, by remitting somewhat of his old vigour and contention, without submitting to the meanness of consent or approbation; and when his authority could be of no use to his country, to manage their new masters so, as not to irritate their power to his own destruction; which was all that he desired†. This was the scheme of politics, which, as he often laments, the weakness of the honest, the perverseness of the envious, and the hatred of the wicked, obliged him to pursue.

One of his intimate friends, Papirius Pætus, made him a present about this time of a collection of books, which fell to him by the death of his brother Servius Claudius, a celebrated scholar and critic of that age‡. The books were all at Athens, where Servius probably died; and the manner in which Cicero writes about them to Atticus, shows what value he set upon the present, and what pleasure he expected from the use of it.

"Papirius Pætus," says he, "an honest man, who loves me, has given me the books which his brother Servius left; and since your agent Cincius tells me, that I may safely take them by the Cincian law†, I readily signified my acceptance of them. Now if you love me, or know that I love you, I

* Cæsar consul egit eas res, quarum me participem esse voluit—me in tribus sibi conjunctissimis consularibus esse voluit.—De Prov. Consular. 17.

† Nam fuit apud me Cornelius, hunc dico Balbum, Cæsaris familiaris. Is affirmabat, eum omnibus in rebus meo et Pompeii consilio utrum, daturumque operam ut cum Pompeio Crasso conjungeret. Hic sunt hæc. Conjunctio mihi summa cum Pompeio; ad placet etiam cum Cæsare.—Ad Att. li. 3.

‡ Nihil jam a me asperum in quenquam fit, nec tamen quicquam popolare ac dissolutum; sed ita temperata tota modo est, ut reprobis constantiam præstem, privatis rebus me, propter infirmitatem bonorum, iniquitatem malevolorum, etiam in me improborum; adhibeam quandam clementiam.—Att. l. 19.

§ C. Servius, frater tuus, quem literatissimum fuisse patet, facile diceret, hic versus Plauti non est.—Ep. Fam. x. 16.

¶ The pleasantry which Cicero aims at, turns on the name of Atticus's agent being the same with that of the author of the law; as if, by being of that family, his authority was a good warrant for taking any present.

beg of you to take care by your friends, clients, hosts, freedmen, slaves, that not a leaf of them be lost. I am in extreme want both of the Greek books, which I guess, and the Latin, which I know him to have left: for I find more and more comfort every day, in giving all the time, which I can steal from the bar, to those studies. You will do me a great pleasure, a very great one, I assure you, by showing the same diligence in this, that you usually do in all other affairs, which you take me to have much at heart," &c.*

While Cicero was in the country in the end of the year, his architect Cyrus was finishing for him at Rome some additional buildings to his house on Mount Palatine: but Atticus, who was just returned from Athens, found great fault with the smallness of the windows; to which Cicero gives a jocose answer, bantering both the objection of Atticus, and the way of reasoning of the architects: "You little think, (says he,) that in finding fault with my windows, you condemn the Institution of Cyrus; for when I made the same objection, Cyrus told me, that the prospect of the fields did not appear to such advantage through larger lights. For let the eye be A; the object B, C; the rays D, E; you see the rest. If vision indeed were performed, as you Epicureans hold, by images flying off from the object, those images would be well crowded in so strait a passage; but if by the emission of rays from the eye, it will be made commodiously enough. If you find any other fault, you shall have as good as you bring; unless it can be mended without any cost to me."†

Cæsar and Bibulus entered now into the consulship, with views and principles wholly opposite to each other; while the senate were pleasing themselves with their address, in procuring one consul of their own, to check the ambition of the other, and expecting now to reap the fruit of it. But they presently found upon a trial, that the balance and constitution of the republic was quite changed by the overbearing power of the three; and that Cæsar was too strong to be controlled by any of the legal and ordinary methods of opposition: he had gained seven of the tribunes, of whom Vatinius was the captain of his mercenaries; whose task it was to scour the streets, secure the avenues of the forum, and clear it, by a superior force, of all who were prepared to oppose them.

Clodius, in the mean time, was pushing on the affair of his adoption; and soliciting the people to confirm the law, which he had provided for that purpose. The triumvirate pretended to be against it, or at least to stand neuter; but were watching Cicero's motions, in order to take their measures from his conduct, which they did not find so obsequious as they expected. In this interval it happened, that C. Antonius, Cicero's colleague, who had governed Macedonia from the time of his consulship, was now impeached and brought to a trial for the mal-administration of his province; and being found guilty, was condemned to perpetual exile. Cicero was his advocate, and, in the course of his pleading, happened to fall, with his usual freedom, into a complaint of the times and the oppression of the republic, in a style that was interpreted to reflect severely upon their present rulers. The story was carried directly to Cæsar, and represented to him in such colours, that he resolved to revenge it presently on Cicero, by bringing on Clodius's law; and was so eager in it, that he instantly called an assembly of the people, and being assisted by Pompey, as augur, to make the act legal and auspicious, got the adoption ratified by the people through all the forms^a, within three hours from the time of Cicero's speaking.

* Ad Att. l. 20.

† Referring to the celebrated piece of Xenophon, called by that name.

‡ Ad Att. li. 3.

Bibulus, who was an augur too, being advertised of what was going forward, sent notice to Pompey, that he was observing the heavens and taking the auspices, during which function it was illegal to transact any business with the people^b. But Pompey, instead of paying any regard to his message, gave a sanction to the proceeding, by presiding in it; so that it was carried without any opposition. And thus the bow, as Cicero calls it, which had been kept bent against him and the republic, was at last discharged^c; and a plain admonition given to him, what he had to expect, if he would not be more complying. For his danger was brought one step nearer, by laying the tribunate open to Clodius, whose next attempt would probably reach home to him. These laws of adoption were drawn up in the style of a petition to the people, after the following form:—

"May it please you, citizens, to ordain, that P. Clodius be, to all intents and purposes of law, as truly the son of Fonteius, as if he were begotten of his body in lawful marriage; and that Fonteius have the power of life and death over him, as much as a father has over a proper son: this, citizens, I pray you to confirm in the manner in which it is desired^d."

There were three conditions absolutely necessary to make an act of this kind regular: first, that the adopter should be older than the adopted, and incapable of procreating children, after having endeavoured it without success when he was capable: secondly, that no injury or diminution should be done to the dignity, or the religious rites of either family; thirdly, that there should be no fraud or collusion in it; nor anything sought by it, but the genuine effects of a real adoption. All these particulars were to be previously examined by the college of priests; and if after a due inquiry they approved the petition, it was proposed to the citizens living in Rome according to their original division curiæ, or wards, which seem to have been to our parishes^e; where no business but to be transacted, when an augur or consul serving the heavens. Now in this Clodius, there was not one of these observed: the college of priests was not consulted; the adopter Fonteius had children; was a man obscure and under full twenty years old when Clodius was a senator of the noblest birth in Rome; was there anything meant by it, but to evade the laws, and procure the tribunate affair was no sooner over, than Clodius was adopted, or set free again by his new all his obligations^f. But these obstacles nothing to Cæsar, who always took his way to what he aimed at, and valued no laws, when he had a power sufficient to control them.

But the main trial of strength between consuls was about the promulgation of law, which Cæsar had prepared, for the lands of Campania to twenty of the citizens, who had each three children. Bibulus mustered all his forces to oppose, came down to the forum full of resolution, guarded by three of the tribunes the whole body of the senate; and as he attempted to recommend it, he was opposed by him, and loudly remonstrated against it that it should never pass in his year. They soon came to blows; where Bibulus was roughly handled, his fasces broken, thrown upon his head; his three tribunes and the whole party driven out of the forum. Vatinius, at the head of Cæsar's mob^g tumult was over, and the forum cleared of adversaries, Cæsar produced Pompey into the rostra, to signify their opinion to the people; where Pompey, after speaking in praise of it, declared in the conclusion any should be so hardy as to oppose the sword, he would defend it with his shield. He applauded what Pompey said, and was the acceptance of it; so that it passed without any farther contradiction. This was in the country during this contest of it with great indignation in a letter and wonders at Pompey's policy, in Cæsar in an act so odious, of alienating the revenues of the republic; and says, I

^a Hora fortasse sexta diei questus sum in iudicio, cum C. Antonium defenderem, quædam de republica quæ mihi visa sunt ad causam miserî illius pertinere. Hæc homines improbi ad quosdam viros fortes longe aliter atque a me dicta erant, detulerunt. Hora nona, illo ipso die, tu es adoptatus.—Pro Domo, 14; Vid. Sueton. J. Cæs. 20.

^b Negant fas esse agi cum populo cum de celo servatum sit. Quo die de te lex curiata lata esse dicatur, audes negare de celo esse servatum? Adest præsens vir singulari virtute.—M. Bibulus: hunc consulem illo ipso die contendendo servasse de celo.—Pro Domo, 15.

^c Fuerat ille annus—tanquam intentus arcus in me unum, sicut vulgo rerum ignari loquebantur, re quidem vera, in universam republicam translatione ad plebem furibundi hominis.—Pro Sext. 7.

^d The lawyers and all the later writers, from the authority of A. Gellius, call this kind of adoption, which was confirmed by a law of the people, an adrogation: but it does not appear that there was any such distinction in Cicero's time, who, as oft as he speaks of this act, either to the senate or the people, never uses any other term than that of adoption.—Vide A. Gell. l. v. 19.

^b Comitibus curiatis.

^c Quod jus est adoptionis, Pontifices? adoptet, qui neque procreare liberos jam poterit, sit expertus. Quæ denique causationis, quæ ratio generum ac dignitatis, queri a pontificum collegio solet. Quid est adoptione questum? Adoptat annos viginti minor, senatorem. Liberorumne causa? potest. Habet uxorem? suscepit etiam si omnis notio pontificum cum adoptare cesset.—Pro Domo, ad Pontif. 13.

^d Idemque tu—nomen C. Cæsaris, clementis optimi viri, scelere vero atque audacia tua foro, curiæ, templis, locis publicis omnibus inclusum domi contineres.—In Vat. 9; Vid. Suet. J. Cæs. 20; Plutarch. in Pomp.

^e Dio, libid.

not think to make them amends by his rents on mount Libanus, for the loss of those which he had taken from them in Campania¹. The senate and all the magistrates were obliged, by a special clause of this law, to take an oath to the observance of it; which Cato himself, though he had publicly declared that he would never do it, was forced at last to swallow².

Cicero made his complaint the next day in the senate, of the violence offered to his person; but finding the assembly so cold and intimidated, that nobody cared to enter into the affair, or to move anything about it, he retired to his house in despair, and a resolution to shut himself up for the remaining eight months of the year, and to act no more in public but by his edicts³. This was a weak step in a magistrate armed with sovereign authority; for though it had one effect, which he proposed by it, of turning the odium of the city upon his colleague, yet it had another that overbalanced it, of strengthening the hands and raising the spirits of the adverse party, by leaving the field wholly clear to them.

As Cæsar's view in the agrarian law was to oblige the populace, so he took the opportunity, which the senate had thrown into his hands, of obliging the knights too, by easing them of the disadvantageous contract, which they had long in vain complained of, and remitting a third part of what they had stipulated to pay⁴; and when Cato still opposed it with his usual firmness, he ordered him to be hurried away to prison. He imagined, that Cato would have appealed to the tribunes; but seeing him go along patiently, without speaking a word, and reflecting, that such a violence would create a fresh odium, without serving any purpose, he desired one of the tribunes to interpose and release him⁵. He next procured a special law, from the people, for the ratification of all Pompey's acts in Asia; and in the struggle about it, he terrified and humbled Lucullus, who was the chief opposer, that he brought him to ask pardon of his fact⁶.

He carried it still with great outward respect towards Cicero; and gave him to understand again by Balbus, that he depended on his assistance in the agrarian law: but Cicero contrived to be out of the way, and spent the months of April and May in his villa near Antium, where he had placed his chief collection of books⁷; amusing himself with his studies and his children, or as he says jocosely, in counting the waves. He was projecting however a system of geography, at the request of Atticus, but soon grew weary of it, as a subject too dry and jejune to admit of any ornament⁸; and being desired also by Atticus to send him the copies of two orations which he had lately made, his answer was, that he had torn one of them, and could not give a copy; and did not care to let the other go abroad, for the praises which it bestowed on Pompey; being disposed rather to recant, than publish them, since the adoption of Clodius⁹. He seems indeed to have been too splenetic at present to compose anything but invectives; of which kind he was now drawing up certain anecdotes, as he calls them, or a secret history of the times, to be shown to none but Atticus, in the style of Theopompus, the most satirical of all writers: for all his politics, he says, were reduced to this one point, of hating bad citizens, and pleasing himself with writing against them: and since he was driven from the helm, he had nothing to wish, but to see the wreck from the shore; or, as Sophocles says¹⁰,

Under the shelter of a good warm roof,
With mind serenely calm and prone to sleep,
Hear the loud storm and beating rain without.

Clodius, having got through the obstacle of his adoption, began without loss of time to sue for the tribunate; whilst a report was industriously spread, which amused the city for a while, of a breach between him and Cæsar. He declared everywhere loudly, that his chief view in desiring that office was, to rescind all Cæsar's acts; and Cæsar, on his part, as openly disclaimed any share in his adoption, and denied him to be a plebeian. This was eagerly carried to Cicero by young Curio, who assured him, that all the young nobles were as much incensed against their proud kings as he himself, and would not bear them much longer; and that Memmius and Metellus Nepos had declared against them: which being confirmed also by Atticus's letters, gave no small comfort to Cicero; all whose hopes of any good depended, he says, upon their quarrelling among themselves¹¹.

¹ Etenim γεωγραφικὰ, quæ constitueram, magnum opus est, et hercule sunt res difficiles ad explicandum et δημοσιεύς; nec tam possunt ἀνθροποποιεῖσθαι, quam videbatur.—Ad Att. II. 6.

² Orationes me duas postulas, quarum alteram non libebat mihi scribere, quia abecderam; alteram, ne laudarem eum, quem non amabam.—Ibid. 7.

³ Ut aciat huius Hieroclymarius, traductor ad plebem, quam bonam meis putissimis orationibus gratiam retulerit; quarum expecta divinam καλωδιαν.—Ibid. 9.

⁴ Itaque ἀνέκδοτα, quæ tibi uni legamus, Theopompo genere, aut etiam asperiore multo, panguntur. Neque aliud jam quicquam πολιτεύομαι, nisi odiosum improbum.—Ibid. 6.

⁵ Nunc vero cum cogar exire de navi, non abjectis sed receptis gubernaculis, cupio istorum naufragia ex terra intueri; cupio, ut ait tuus amicus Sophocles, κνῆς ἀκούειν ψεκδὸς εὐδωσύ φρενί.

Ibid. 7.

⁶ Scito Curionem adolescentem venisse me salutatum. Valde ejus sermo de Publio cum tuis literis congruebat. Ipse vero mirandum in modum reges odiosos superbos. Porroque narrabat innoxiam esse juventutem, neque ferre hunc posse.—Ibid. 8.

⁷ Incurrit in me Roma veniens Curio meus.—Publius, inquit, tribunatum plebis petiit. Quid ais? et inimicissimus

¹ Cuius quidem nostri jam plane quid cogitet, nascio.—Ad Att. II. 16.

² Quid dices? Vectigal te nobis in monte Antilibano concessimus, agri Campani abstulimus.—Ibid.

³ Dio, xxviii. 61.

⁴ Ac postero die in senatu conquestum, nec quoquam sperni, qui super tali consternatione referre, aut censere liquet, rudem—in eam coegit desperationem, ut quod placuisse abest, domo abjectus nihil aliud quam per edicta clamaret.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 31.

⁵ Dio, xxviii. 62.

⁶ Plutarch. in Cæs.

⁷ L. Lucullus, liberis resistenti tantum calumniarum tumor iniecit, ut ad genus ultro sibi accederet.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 30.

⁸ Nam aut fortiter resistendum est legi Agrariae, in quo utroque emulatio, sed plena laudis: aut quiescendum, quod etiam distulit, neque ire in Solonium, aut Antium: sed etiam adjuvandum, quod a me sunt Cæsarem sic capere, ut non dubitet.—Ad Att. II. 3.

⁹ Hæc aut libris me delecto, quorum habeo Antil festioniam opam, aut festis numero.—Ibid. 6.

The pretended ground of this rupture, as it is hinted in Cicero's letters, was Clodius' slighting an offer, which the triumvirate made to him, of an embassy to king Tigranes; for being weary of his insolence, and jealous of his growing power, they had contrived this employment as an honourable way of getting rid of him: but in the present condition of the republic, Clodius knew his own importance too well, to quit his views at home, by an offer of so little advantage abroad; and was disgusted, that Cæsar had not named him among the twenty commissioners appointed to divide the Campanian lands; and resolved not to stir from the city till he had reaped the fruits of the tribunate. Cicero mentioning this affair to Atticus, says, "I am much delighted with what you write about Clodius: try all means to search into the bottom of it; and send or bring me word, whatever you either learn or suspect; and especially, what he intends to do about the embassy. Before I read your letter, I was wishing, that he would accept it; not for the sake of declining a battle with him, for I am in wonderful spirits for fighting; but I imagined, that he would lose by it all the popularity which he has gained by going over to the plebeians—What then did you mean by making yourself a plebeian? Was it only to pay a visit to Tigranes? Do not the kings of Armenia use to take notice of patricians?—You see how I had been preparing myself to rally the embassy; which if he slights after all, and if this, as you say, disgusts the authors and promoters of the law, we shall have rare sport. But to say the truth, Publius has been treated somewhat rudely by them; since he, who was lately the only man with Cæsar, cannot now find a place among the twenty; and after promising one embassy, they put him off with another; and while they bestow the rich ones upon Drusus, or Vatinius, reserve this barren one for him, whose tribunate was proposed to be of such use to them. Warm him, I beg of you, on this head, as much as you can; all our hopes of safety are placed on their falling out among themselves, of which, as I understand from Curio, some symptoms begin already to appear." But all this noise of a quarrel was found at last to be a mere artifice, as the event quickly showed: or if there was any real disgust among them, it proceeded no farther than to give the better colour to a report, by which they hoped to impose upon Cicero, and draw some unwary people into a hasty declaration of themselves; and above all, to weaken the obstruction to Clodius's election from that quarter, whence it was chiefly to be apprehended.

Cicero returned to Rome in May, after an interview with Atticus, who went abroad at the same time to his estate in Epirus: he resolved to decline all public business, as much as he decently could, and to give the greatest part of his time to the bar, and to the defence of causes; an employment always popular, which made many friends, and few enemies, so that he was still much frequented at home, and honourably attended abroad, and maintained his dignity, he says, not meanly, quidem Cæsaris, et ut omnia, inquit, ista recedant. Quid Cæsar? inquam. Negat se quicquam de illius adoptione tulisse. Deinde num, Memmii, Metelli Nepotis exprompti odium. Complexus juvenem dimisit, properans ad epistolæ.—Ad Att. li. 12.

^r Ad Att. li. 7.

considering the general oppression; and considering the part which he had borne. Among the other causes which he summer, he twice defended A. Terentius L. Flaccus; men of prætorian dignity both acquitted. The speeches for lost; but that for Flaccus remains, imperfect; in which, though he had been dear for speaking his mind too freely, and for bold reflections on the wretched condition to which the city was now reduced.

This L. Valerius Flaccus had been Cicero's consulship, and received a vote in the senate for his zeal and vigour in Catiline's accomplices; but was not P. Lælius of rapine and oppression in Asia, which was allotted to him for his torship. The defence consists chiefly in the dignity of the criminal, and in the credit of the Asiatic witnesses. Cicero says, "That the judges, who had known the integrity of Flaccus's life through a variety of employments, were themselves affected by it, and could not want to learn especially from Grecians: that for he always been particularly addicted to study and their studies, and knew many worthy men among them: that he had to have learning, the discipline of elegance of writing, a fluency of speech, acuteness of wit: but as to the sanctity they had no notion of it, knew no force and the efficacy of it: that all in giving evidence was, not how to say, but to express what they said:—that he appeared in a cause, but with a resolution never considered what words were proper, but what were proper to do him credit for the last disgrace, to be baffled, outdone in swearing: so that they were the best and worthiest men for witnesses: daring and loquacious:—in short, the nation looked upon an oath as a pledge of all their credit, livelihood, the success of an impudent lie:—Roman witnesses, who were produced, though several of them came and willing to ruin him, yet one observing, with what caution and delivered what they had to say; and he had the greatest desire to hurt, yet for their scruples:—that a Roman testimony, was always jealous of his should go too far; weighed all his views afraid to let anything drop from him and passionately; or to say a syllable than was necessary." Then after

^a Me tuor, ut oppressis omnibus, non d rebus gestis, parum fortiter.—Ad Att. li.

^b Pro Flacco, 4. 5. This character of Roman witnesses is exactly agreeable to what himself a Grecian, had long before those who managed the public money in they gave ever so many bonds and sureties, could not be induced to act home their faith, in the case even of a single in Rome, out of pure reverence to the laws they were never known to violate their management of the greatest sums. [Fol This was certainly true of the old republic make great allowance for the language of large, by what scandalous methods this accusation was procured against Flaccus, and after exposing the vanity of the crimes charged upon him, together with the profligate characters of the particular witnesses; he declares, "that the true and genuine Grecians were all on Flaccus' side, with public testimonies and decrees in his favour.—Here, says he, you see the Athenians, whence humanity, learning, religion, the fruits of the earth, the rights and laws of mankind, are thought to have been first propagated; for the possession of whose city, the gods themselves are said to have contended on the account of its beauty; which is of so great antiquity, that it is reported to have brought forth its own citizens, and the same spot to have been their parent, their nurse, and their country; and of so great authority, that the broken and shattered fame of Greece depends now singly on the credit of this city.—Here also are the Lacedæmonians, whose tried and renowned virtue was condemned not only by nature, but by discipline; who some, of all the nations upon earth, have subsisted the more seven hundred years, without any change in their laws and manners.—Nor can I pass over the city of Marseilles, which knew Flaccus when but a soldier, and afterwards quaestor; the gravity of whose discipline, I think preferable, not only to Greece, but to all other cities; which, though separated so far from the country, the customs, and the language of all Grecians, surrounded by the nations of Gaul, and washed by the waves of barbarism, is so wisely governed by the counsels of an oligarchy, that it is easier to praise their constitution, than to imitate it." One part of the charge against Flaccus was, for prohibiting the Jews to carry out of his province the gold, which they used to collect annually through the empire for the temple of Jerusalem; all which he seized and retained to the treasury at Rome. The charge itself seems to imply, that the Jews made no mean figure at this time in the empire; and Cicero's answer, though it betrays a great contempt of their religion, through his ignorance of it, yet shows, that their numbers and credit were very considerable in Rome. The trial was held near the Aurelian steps, a place of great resort for the populace, and particularly for the Jews, who used it probably as a kind of exchange, or general rendezvous of their countrymen: Cicero therefore proceeds to say, "It was for this reason, Lælius, and for the sake of this crime, that you have chosen this place and this crowd for the trial: you know what a numerous band the Jews are; what concord among themselves; what a bustle they make in our assemblies—I will speak softly, that the judges only may hear me; for there are people ready to incite them against me and against every honest man; and I should not willingly lend any help to that design—Since our gold then is annually carried out of Italy, and all the provinces, in the name of the Jews, to Jerusalem, Flaccus, by a public edict, prohibited the exportation of it from Asia: and where is there a man, judges, who does not truly applaud this act? The senate, on several different occasions, more severely in my consulship, condemned the exportation of gold. To withstand this barbarous superstition was a piece therefore of laudable discipline; and, out of regard to the republic, to condemn the multitude of Jews, who are so tumultuous in all our assemblies, an act of the greatest gravity: but Pompey, it seems, when he took Jerusalem, meddled with nothing in that temple: in which, as on many other occasions, he acted prudently, that in so suspicious and ill-tongued a people, he would not give any handle for calumny; for I can never believe, that it was the religion of Jews and enemies, which hindered this excellent general, but his own modesty." Then after showing, that "Flaccus had not embezzled or seized the gold to his own use, but transmitted it to the public treasury," he observes, that it was not therefore for the sake of the crime, but to raise an envy, that this fact was mentioned; and that the accuser's speech was turned from the judges, and addressed to the circle around them: "Every city," says he, "Lælius, has its religion; we have ours: while Jerusalem flourished, and Judea was at peace with us, yet their religious rites were held inconsistent with the splendour of this empire, the gravity of the Roman name, and the institutions of our ancestors: but much more ought they to be held so now; since they have let us see, by taking arms, what opinion they have of us; and by their being conquered, how dear they are to the gods." He proceeds in the last place to show, what he had intimated in the beginning, "that the real aim of this trial was to sacrifice those, who had signalized themselves against Catiline, to the malice and revenge of the seditious:" and puts the judges in mind, that "the fate of the city, and the safety of all honest men, now rested on their shoulders: that they saw in what an unsettled state things were, and what a turn their affairs had taken: that among many other acts, which certain men had done, they were now contriving, that by the votes and decisions of the judges every honest man might be undone; that these judges indeed had given many laudable judgments in favour of the republic; many, against the wickedness of the conspirators: yet some people thought the republic not yet sufficiently changed, till the best citizens were involved in the same punishment with the worst. C. Antonius," says he, "is already oppressed; let it be so: he had a peculiar infamy upon him: yet even he, if I may be allowed to say it, would not have been condemned by you: upon whose condemnation a sepulchre was dressed up to Catiline, and celebrated with a feast and concourse of our audacious and domestic enemies, and funeral rites performed to him: now the death of Lentulus is to be revenged on Flaccus; and what more agreeable sacrifice can you offer to him, than by Flaccus's blood to satiate his detestable hatred of us all? Let us then appease the manes of Lentulus; pay the last honours to Cethegus; recall the banished; nay, let me also be punished for the excess of my love to my country: I am already named and marked out for a trial; have crimes forged; dangers prepared for me; which if they had attempted by any other method; or if, in the name of the people, they had stirred up the unwary multitude against me, I could better have borne it; but it is not to be endured, that they should think to drive out of the city the authors, the leaders, the champions of our common safety; by the help of senators and knight, who, with one mind and consent, assisted so greatly in the same cause. They know the mind and inclination of the Roman people: the people themselves take all possible occasions of declaring it: there is no variety in their sentiments, or their language. If any one therefore call me thither, I come: I do not only not refuse, but require, the Roman people for my judge: let force only be excluded; let swords and stones be removed; let mercenaries be quiet; let slaves be silent; and when I come to be heard for myself, there will not be a man so unjust, if he be free and a citizen, who will not be of opinion, that they ought to vote me rewards rather than punishment." He concludes, by applying himself, as usual, to move the pity and clemency of the bench towards the person of the criminal, by all the topics proper to excite compassion: "the merit of his former services; the lustre of his family; the tears of his children; the discouragement of the honest; and the hurt which the republic would suffer in being deprived, at such a time, of such a citizen."

We find Cicero applying the same integrity and regard to all acts to the character of his own times.

Pro Flacco, 26.

Pro Flacco, 28.

G 2

Q. Cicero, who succeeded Flaccus in the province of Asia, was now entering into the third year of his government, when Cicero sent him a most admirable letter of advice about the administration of his province; fraught with such excellent precepts of moderation, humanity, justice, and laying down rules of governing, so truly calculated for the good of mankind, that it deserves a place in the closets of all who govern; and especially of those who are entrusted with the command of foreign provinces; who by their distance from any immediate control, are often tempted, by the insolence of power, to acts of great oppression.

The triumvirate was now dreaded and detested by all ranks of men: and Pompey, as the first of the league, had the first share of the public hatred: "so that these affectors of popularity," says Cicero, "have taught even modest men to hiss." Bibulus was continually teasing them by his edicts; in which he inveighed and protested against all their acts. These edicts were greedily received by the city; all people got copies of them; and wherever they were fixed up in the streets, it was scarce possible to pass for the crowds which were reading them. Bibulus was extolled to the skies; "though I know not why," says Cicero, "unless, like another Fabius, he is thought to save the state by doing nothing: for what is all his greatness of mind, but a mere testimony of his sentiments, without any service to the republic?" His edicts however provoked Caesar so far, that he attempted to excite the mob to storm his house, and drag him out by force: and Vatinius actually made an assault upon it,

* Pro Flacco, 38.

† Qui frēmītus hominū? qui iratī animī? quanto in odio noster amicus Magnus?—Ad Att. ii. 13.

Scito nihil unquam falsum tam infame, tam turpe, tam perquam omnibus generibus, ordinibus, statibus offensum, quam hunc statum, qui nunc est: magis mehercule quam vellem, non modo quam putarem. Populares isti jam etiam modestos homines sibilare docuerunt.—Ibid. 19.

‡ Itaque archilochia in illum edicta Bibuli populo ita sunt jucunda, ut eum locum, ubi proponuntur, præ multitudinem eorum qui legunt, transire nequeant.—Ad Att. ii. 21.

§ Bibulus in celo est; nec quare, scio. Sed ita laudatur, quasi unus homo nobis cunctando restituit rem.—Ibid. 19.

Bibuli autem ista magnitudo animi in comitiorum dilatione, quid habet, nisi ipsius judicium sine ulla correctione reipublice.—Ibid. 15.

though without success^b. But while a disliked, lamented, and talked loudly a proceedings; and above all, young Curio of the young nobility; "yet we seek not says "Cicero, through a persuasion, to no resisting, but to our destruction^c."

The inclinations of the people chiefly, as he tells us, in the theatres shows; where, when Caesar entered, received only with a dead applause; but Curio, who followed him, appeared, he as Pompey used to be in the height of And in the Apollinarian plays, Diphilodgian, happening to have some part which were thought to hit the c Pompey, he was forced to repeat them times:

Thou by our miseries art great—

The time will come when thou wilt wretch that greatness—

If neither law nor custom can restrain thee at each of which sentences, the whole took such a roaring and clapping, that they could be quieted^d. Pompey was greatly shocked himself fallen so low in the esteem of the had hitherto lived in the midst of glory stranger to disgrace, which made him impatient under so mortifying a change: scarce refrain from tears," says Cicero what an abject, paltry figure, he made in where he never used to appear but with applause and admiration; meanly harangued the edicts of Bibulus, and displeasing an audience, but himself: a spectacle as none so much as to Crassus; to see him low from such a height:—and as Appellagenes would have been grieved to see their capital pieces besmeared with dirt a real grief to me, to see the man, who painted with all the colours of my art, a sudden so deformed: for though I think, since the affair of Clodius, that I reason to be his friend; yet my love for so great, that no injury could efface it^e.

Caesar, on the other hand, began to ^b Putarat Caesar oratione sua posse impelli ut iret ad Bibulum; multa cum aditionissimam vocem exprimere non potuit.—Ad Att. ii. 21.

^c Qui consulem mortui obsecris, inclusum extrahere ex suis testis conatus sis.—In Vatini.

^d Nunc quidem novo quodam morbo civitas: cum omnes ea, quæ sunt acta, improbant, queant, varietas in re nulla sit, aperteque loquar clare gemant; tamen medicina nulla affertur, resisti sine intermissione posse arbitramur.—Ad

^e Diphilus tragedus in nostrum Pompeium invecus est: Nostra miseria tu es magnus, mihi est diocera. Tandem virtutem istam veniet tempus iter gemes, totius theatri clamore dixit, item: Nam et ejusmodi sunt ii verba, ut in tempus Pompeii scripti esse videantur. Si neque huiusmodi cogunt, et cetera magno cum fremitu dicta sunt.—Ibid. 19.

Valerius Maximus, who tells the same story Diphilus, in pronouncing those sentences, stretched hands towards Pompey, to point him out to the But it appears from Cicero's account of it in the Atticus, that Pompey was then at Capua; whilst an express to him in all haste to acquaint what had passed, and to call him probably to Rome. vi. 2.

* Ut ille tum humilis, ut demissus erat: ut

part of that fruit which he expected from their action: he foresaw, from the first, that the odium of it would fall upon Pompey; the benefit accrue to himself: till Pompey, gradually sinking under the envy, and himself insensibly rising by the power of it, they might come at last to act upon a level: or, as Florus states the several views of the case, Cæsar wanted to acquire; Crassus to increase; Pompey to preserve his dignity^s. So that Pompey in reality was but the dupe of the other two: whereas if he had united himself with Cicero, and through him with the senate; whither his own and his country's interest called him, and where, from the different talents of the men, there could have been no contrast of glory or power; he must have preserved through life, what his utmost ambition seemed to aim at, the character not only of the first, but of the best citizen in Rome: but by his alliance with Cæsar, he lent his authority to the raising up a rival, who gained upon him daily in credit, and grew too strong for him at last in power. The people's disaffection began to open his eyes, and make him sensible of his error; which he frankly owned to Cicero, and seemed desirous of entering into measures with him to retrieve it^a. He saw himself on the brink of a precipice, where to proceed was ruinous, to retreat ignominious: the Romans became his enemies, and the factions had never been his friends: but though it was easy to see his mistake, it was difficult to find a remedy. Cicero pressed the only one which could be effected, an immediate breach with Cæsar; and used arguments to bring him to it; but Cæsar was more successful, and drew Pompey quite away from him^b; and having got possession, entangled him so fast, that he could never disengage himself till it was too late.

But to give a turn to the disposition of the people, or to draw their attention at least another way, Cæsar contrived to amuse the city with the discovery of a new conspiracy to assassinate Pompey. Cicerinus, who in Catiline's affair had impeached Cæsar, and smarted severely for it, was now instructed how to make amends for that step, by weaving a plot upon the opposite party; particularly upon young Curio, the briskest opposer of the minister. For this purpose, he insinuated himself into Curio's acquaintance, and when he was grown familiar, opened to him a resolution, which ut non de aeternum qui aderant, displicebat. O spectaculum mi Crasso jecundum, &c.—Quamquam nemo putabat populi Clavianum negotium me illi amicum esse debere: Pompeio tantum fuit amor, ut exhausti nulla posset injuria.

—Ad Att. li. 21.

Quæ animæ vertebat se—invidia communis potentie in sua regale, confirmaturum viros omnes.—Vell. Pat. li. 44.

§ 1. Pompeio Cæsar dignitatem comparare, Crasso augere, Pompeio retinere, cupientibus, omnibusque pariter potentibus capitula de lavanda republica facile convenit.—Flor. li. 2. 11.

§ 2. Sed quod facile sentias, tandem ipsum Pompeium, vehementerque persequitur, &c.—Ad Att. li. 22.

Primum igitur illud de scire vult, Sampsocranum, nossemus autem, vehementer sui status penitere, restituisse in eum locum euperre, ex quo deciderat, doloremque suum impetire nobis, et medicinam interdum aperte querere: quæ ego possum invenire nullam.—Ibid. 23.

§ 3. M. Bibulo, præstantissimo cive, consulo, nihil sperandum, quantum facere, nitique potui, quin Pompeius a Cæsar conjunctione avocarem. In quo Cæsar fidei fuit: ipse enim Pompeium a mea familiaritate detrahit.—Phil. li. 10.

he pretended to have taken, of killing Pompey, in expectation of drawing some approbation of it from him: but Curio carried the story to his father, who gave immediate information of it to Pompey, and so the matter, being made public, was brought before the senate. This was a disappointment to Vettius, who had laid his measures so, that "he himself should have been seized in the forum with a poniard, and his slaves taken also with poniards; and upon his examination, was to have made the first discovery if Curio had not prevented him. But being now examined before the senate, he denied at first his having any such discourse with Curio; but presently recanted, and offered to discover what he knew, upon promise of pardon, which was readily granted: he then told them, that there was a plot formed by many of the young nobility, of which Curio was the head: that Paulus was engaged in it from the first, with Brutus also and Lentulus, the son of the flamen, with the privacy of his father: that Septimius, the secretary of Bibulus, had brought him a dagger from Bibulus himself.—This was thought ridiculous, that Vettius should not be able to procure a dagger, unless the consul had given him one.—Young Curio was called in to answer to Vettius's information, who soon confounded him, and showed his narrative to be inconsistent and impossible: for he had deposed, that the young nobles had agreed to attack Pompey in the forum on the day when Gabinus gave his show of gladiators, and that Paulus was to be the leader in the attack; but it appeared, that Paulus was in Macedonia at that very time.—The senate therefore ordered Vettius to be clapped into irons, and that if any man released him, he should be deemed a public enemy."

Cæsar, however, unwilling to let the matter drop so easily, brought him out again the next day, and produced him to the people in the rostra; and in that place, where Bibulus, though consul, durst not venture to show himself, exhibited this wretch, as his puppet, to utter whatever he should think fit to inspire. Vettius impeached several here, whom he had not named before in the senate; particularly Lucullus and Domitius: he did not name Cicero, but said, that a certain senator of great eloquence, and consular rank, and a neighbour of the consul, had told him, that the times wanted another Brutus or Ahala. When he had done, and was going down, being called back again and whispered by Vatinius, and then asked aloud, whether he could recollect nothing more, he farther declared, that Piso, Cicero's son-in-law, and M. Laterensis, were also privy to the design^a. But it happened in this, as it commonly does in all plots of the same kind, that the too great eagerness of the managers destroyed its effect: for, by the extravagance to which it was pushed, it confuted itself; and was entertained with so general a contempt by all orders, that Cæsar was glad to get rid of it, by strangling or poisoning Vettius privately in prison, and giving it out, that it was done by the conspirators^b.

The senate had still one expedient in reserve for mortifying Cæsar, by throwing some contemptible province upon him at the expiration of his consulship; as the care of the woods or the roads; or what should give him at least no power to molest them^a. The distribution of the provinces was, by ancient usage and express law, their undoubted prerogative; which had never been invaded or attempted by the people^b; so that this piece of revenge, or rather self-defence, seemed to be clearly in their power; but Cæsar, who valued no law or custom which did not serve his purposes, without any regard to the senate, applied himself to his better friends, the people; and by his agent Vatinius procured from them, by a new and extraordinary law, the grant of Cisalpine Gaul, with the addition of Illyricum, for the term of five years. This was a cruel blow to the power of the senate, and a direct infringement of the old constitution; as it transferred to the people a right which they had never exercised or pretended to before^c. It convinced the senate, however, that all opposition was vain; so that when Cæsar soon after declared a desire to have the Transalpine Gaul added to his other provinces, they decreed it to him readily themselves; to prevent his recurring a second time to the people, and establishing a precedent, so fatal to their authority^d.

^a Ad Att. li. 24; In Vatin. 11; Sueton. J. Cæsar. 20.

^b Frigerius in carcere cervicis ipsi illi Vettio, ne quod indicium corrupti iudicii extaret.—In Vatin. 11.

Cæsar—desperans tam præcipitis consilii eventum, intercepisse veneno indicium creditur.—Sueton. J. Cæsar. 20; Plutarch. in Lucull.

Clodius began now to threaten Cicero with all the terrors of his tribunate; to which he was elected without any opposition: and in proportion as the danger approached, Cicero's apprehensions were every day more and more alarmed. The absence of his friend Atticus, who was lately gone to Epirus, was an additional mortification to him: for Atticus, having a great familiarity with all the Clodian family, might have been of service, either in dissuading Clodius from any attempt, or in fishing out of him at least what he really intended. Cicero pressed him therefore, in every letter, to come back again to Rome: "If you love me, (says he,) as much as I am persuaded you do, hold yourself ready to run hither as soon as I call: though I am doing and will do everything in my power to save you that trouble^e.—My wishes and my affairs require you: I shall want neither counsel, nor courage, nor forces, if I see you here at the time. I have reason to be satisfied with Varro: Pompey talks divinely^f.—How much do I wish that you had staid at Rome! as you surely would have done, if you had imagined how things would happen:

^a Eandem ob causam opera optimatibus data est, ut provincie futuris consulibus minimi negotii, id est, sylvarum callesque, decernerentur.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 19.

^b Tu provincias consulares, quas C. Gracchus, qui unus maxime popularis fuit, non modo non abstulit ab senatu: sed etiam ut necesse esset, quotannis constitui per senatum decreta lege sanxit.—Pro Domo, 9.

^c Eripueras senatui provincie decernende potestatem; imperatoris deligendi iudicium; ararum dispensationem; que nunquam sibi populus Romanus appetivit, qui nunquam hæc a summi consilii gubernatione auferre conatus est.—In Vatini. 15.

^d Initio quidem Galliam Cisalpinam, adjecto Illyrico, lege Vatinia accepit: mox per senatum Comatum quoque: veritis Patribus, ne si ipse negasset, populus etiam hanc daret.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 22.

^e Tu, si me amas tantum, quantum profecto amas, expeditus facito ut sis; si inclamaro, ut accurras. Sed do operam, et dabo, ne sit necesse.—Ad Att. II. 20.

^f Te cum ego desidero, tum etiam res ad tempus illud vocat. Plurimum consilii, animi, presidii denique mihi, si te ad tempus video, accesserit. Varro mihi satisfacit, Pompeius loquitur divinitus.—Ibid. 21.

we should easily have managed Clodius at least for certain what he meant to do sent he flies about; raves; knows no would be at; threatens many; and measures perhaps at last from chance. reflects, in what a general odium the ad of our affairs now is, he seems disposed attacks upon the authors of it: but who considers their power, and their armies, he upon me; and threatens me both with a trial.—Many things may be transacted friend Varro, which, when urged also would have the greater weight; many to be drawn from Clodius himself; many which cannot be concealed from you; but to run into particulars, when I want things—the whole depends on your course he enters into his magistracy^a. Where finds you asleep, awake yourself; if stay come away; if coming, run; if running, credible, what a stress I lay on your confidence; but above all, on your love and fidelity.

Cæsar's whole aim in this affair was Cicero's spirit, and distress him so far, him to a dependence upon him: for while he was privately encouraging Clodius him, he was proposing expedients to his security: he offered to put him in commission, for distributing the lands of with which twenty of the principal se charged: but as it was an invitation or place of one deceased, and not an origination, Cicero did not think it for him to accept it; nor cared on any account to in an affair so odious^b; he then offered, obliging manner, to make him one of his in Gaul, and pressed it earnestly upon was both a sure and honourable way the danger, and what he might have so far only as it served his purpose, with rassing himself with the duty of it^c: after some hesitation, declined this also unwilling to owe the obligation of his safety, and much more to Cæsar; being possible, to defend himself by his own: he could easily have done, if the triumvir not have acted against him. But this exasperated Cæsar, that he resolved to assist Clodius, with all his power, him; and in excuse for it afterwards, to the whole blame on Cicero himself, for obstinately all the friendly offers which him^d. Pompey all this while, to prevent ing himself perhaps into Cæsar's hands him the strongest assurances, confirm

^a Ad Att. II. 22.

^b Quamobrem, si dormis, expergiscere; dædæ; si ingredieris, curre; si curris, advola. est, quantum ego in consiliis et prudentia tua tum est, quantum in amore et fide ponam.—

^c Cosconio mortuo, sum in ejus locum invocari in locum mortui. Nihil me turpius fuisset: neque vero ad istam ipsam dædæ alienius. Sunt enim illi apud bonos invidiosi.

^d A Cæsare valde liberaliter invitator in legem sibi ut sit legatus. Illa et munitor est, et quo minus adsum, cum velim.—Ibid. 18.

Cæsar me sibi vult esse legatum. Honestatio periculosa. Sed ego hoc nunc repudio. Pugnam malo: nihil tamen certi.—Ibid. 19.

^e Ac solet, cum se purgat, in me conferr and vows, that there was no danger; and that he would sooner be killed himself, than suffer him to be hurt; that both Clodius and his brother Appius had solemnly promised to act nothing against him, but to be wholly at his disposal; and if they did not keep their word, that he would let all the world see, how much he preferred Cicero's friendship to all his other engagements. In Cicero's account of this to Atticus, "Varro, (says he,) gives me full satisfaction. Pompey loves me, and treats me with great kindness. Do you believe him? you'll say. Yes, I do. He convinces me, that he is in earnest. —Yet since all men of affairs, in their historical notions, and even poets too in their verses, seemish as always to be upon our guard, nor to believe too easily; I comply with them in one thing; to use all proper caution, as far as I am able; but for the other, find it impossible for me not to believe him."

But whatever really passed between Clodius and Pompey; Cicero perceiving, that Clodius talked in a different strain to everybody else, and denounced nothing but war and ruin to him, began to be very suspicious of Pompey; and prepared to defend himself by his genuine forces, the senate and the knights, with the honest of all ranks, who were ready to fly to his assistance from all parts of Italy. This was the situation of affairs when Clodius entered upon the tribunate; where his first act was, to put the same affront on Bibulus, which had been offered before to Cicero, on laying down that office, by not suffering him to speak to the people, but only to take the accustomed oath.

Q. Metellus Celer, an excellent citizen and patriot, who, from his consulship, obtained the government of Gaul, to which Caesar now succeeded, died suddenly this summer at Rome, in the vigour of his health and flower of his age, not without suspicion of violence. His wife, the sister of Clodius, a lewd, intriguing woman, was commonly thought to have poisoned him, as well to revenge his opposition to all the attempts of her brother, as to gain the greater liberty of pursuing her own interests. Cicero does not scruple to charge her with it in his speech for Cælius, where he gives a moving account of the death of her husband, whom he visited in his last moments; when in broken, faltering accents he foretold the storm which was ready to break both upon Cicero and the republic; and, in the midst of his agonies, signified it to be his only concern in dying, that his friend and his country should be deprived of his help at so critical a conjuncture^b.

By Metellus's death a place became vacant in the college of augurs: and though Cicero was so shy of accepting any favour from the triumvirate, yet he seems inclined to have accepted this, if it had been offered to him, as he intimates in a letter to Atticus. Tell me, says he, every tittle of news that is stirring; and since Nepos is leaving Rome, who is to have his brother's augurate: it is the only thing with which they could tempt me. Observe my weakness! But what have I to do with such things, to which I long to bid adieu, and turn myself entirely to philosophy? I am now in earnest to do it; and wish that I had been so from the beginning^c. But his inclination to the augurate, at this time, was nothing else, we see, but a sudden start of an unweighed thought; no sooner thrown out, than retracted; and dropped only to Atticus, to whom he used to open all his thoughts with the same freedom with which they offered themselves to his own mind^d: for it is certain, that he might have had this very augurate, if he had thought it worth asking for; nay, in a letter to Cato, who could not be ignorant of the fact, he says, that he had actually alighted it; which seems indeed to have been the case^e: for though he was

^b Cum ille—tertio die post quam in curia, quam in rostris, quam in republica florisset, integerrima ætate, optimo habitu, maximis viribus, eriperetur bonis omnibus atque universæ civitati.—Cum me intuens sententiam significabat interruptis atque morientibus vocibus, quanta impenderet procella urbi, quanta tempestas civitati—ut non se emori, quam spoliari suo prædido cum patriam, tum etiam me doleret.—Ex hac igitur domo progressa illa mulier de veneni celeritate dicere audebit?—Pro Cælio, 24.

^c Et nunquid novi omnino: et quoniam Nepos proficiscitur, cuiusnam auguratus deferatur, quo quidem uno ego ab istis capi possum. Vide levitatem meam! Sed quid ego hæc, que cupio deponere, et toto animo atque omni cura phalaropseis? Sic, inquam, in animo est; vellem ab initio.—Ad Att. li. 5.

An ingenious French writer, and an English one also not less ingenious, have taken occasion from this passage to form a heavy charge against Cicero both in his civil and moral character. The Frenchman decants with great gravity on the folble of human nature, and the astonishing weakness of our Orator, in suffering a thought to drop from him, which must for ever ruin his credit with posterity, and destroy that high opinion of his virtue, which he labours everywhere to inculcate. But a proper attention to the general tenor of his conduct would easily have convinced him of the absurdity of so severe an interpretation; and the facts produced in this history abundantly show, that the passage itself cannot admit any other sense than what I have given to it, as it is rendered also by Mr. Mongault, the judicious translator of the Epistles to Atticus, viz. that the augurate was the only bait that could tempt him; not to go into the measures of the triumvirate, for that was never in his thoughts, but to accept anything from them, or suffer himself to be obliged to them.—See Hist. de l'Exil de Clodion, p. 42; Considerations on the Life of Cicero, p. 27.

^d Ego tecum, tanquam tecum loquor.—Ad Att. viii. 14.

^e Sacerdotium denique, cum, quemadmodum te existimare arbitror, non difficillime consequi possem, non appetivi.—Idem post injuriam acceptam—studui quam non temporum culpam: ita me sibi fuisse inimicum, ut in horum quidem a se accipere vellem.—Ad Att. ix. 2.

Non caruerant suspitione oppressi Ciceronis, Cesar et Pompeius. Hoc sibi contraxisse videbatur Cicero, quod inter xx viros dividendo agro Campano esse nolisset.—Vell. Pat. ii. 45.

Pompeius omnia pollicetur et Cesar: quibus ego ita respondeo, ut nihil de mea comparatione diminuum.—Ad Quint. Frat. i. 2.

Pompeius amat nos, carosque habet. Credis? inquires, Respondet: Proves mihi persuadet. Sed quia, ut video, pragmatici homines omnibus historiis præceptis, verbis sineque cavere jubent, et vetant credere; alterum facio, ut credam; alterum, ut non credam, facere non possum. Clodius aliam mihi demonstrat periculum: Pompeius affirmat id esse periculum; adjurat, addit etiam, se prius occisum esse ab eo, quam me violatum iri.—Ad Att. li. 30.

Prius recipere sibi et Clodium et Appium de me: hanc si non servaret, ita latum, ut omnes intelligerent, nihil equisq; amicitia nostra fuisse, &c. Ibid. 22.

Clodius est inimicus nobis. Pompeius confirmat eum sibi latum esse contra me. Mihi periculosum est credere: ad resistendum me paro. Studia spero me summa laborum omnium ordinum.—Ibid. 21.

Si Clodius dixerit, tota Italia concurret: sin autem vi agere conabitur, omnes se et suos liberos, amicos, clientes, libertos, servos, pecunias denique suas pollicentur.—Ad Quint. Frat. i. 2.

within twenty miles of Rome, yet he never stirred from his retreat to solicit or offer himself for it, which he must necessarily have done, if he had any real desire to obtain it.

Cicero's fortunes seemed now to be in a tottering condition: his enemies were gaining ground upon him, and any addition of help from the new magistrates might turn the scale to his ruin. Catulus used to tell him, that he had no cause to fear anything; for that one good consul was sufficient to protect him; and Rome had never known two bad ones in office together, except in Cinna's tyranny¹. But that day was now come; and Rome saw in this year, what it had never seen before in peaceful times since its foundation, two profligate men advanced to that high dignity.

These were L. Calpurnius Piso and A. Gabinius; the one, the father-in-law of Cæsar, the other, the creature of Pompey. Before their entrance into office, Cicero had conceived great hopes of them, and not without reason; for, by the marriage of his daughter, he was allied to Piso; who continued to give him all the marks of his confidence, and had employed him, in his late election, to preside over the votes of the leading century; and when he entered into his office, on the first of January, asked his opinion the third in the senate, or the next after Pompey and Crassus²; and he might flatter himself also, probably, that on account of the influence which they were under, they would not be very forward to declare themselves against him³. But he presently found himself deceived: for Clodius had already secured them to his measures, by a private contract, to procure for them, by a grant of the people, two of the best governments of the empire; for Piso, Macedonia, with Greece and Thessaly; for Gabinius, Cilicia: and when this last was not thought good enough, and Gabinius seemed to be displeased with his bargain, it was exchanged soon after for Syria, with a power of making war upon the Parthians⁴. For this price they agreed to serve him in all his designs, and particularly in the oppression of Cicero; who, on that account, often calls them, not co-brokers of provinces, and sellers of their

They were, both of them, equally corrupt morals, yet very different in their tempers. They had been accused the year before, by P. C. plundering and oppressing the allies: throwing himself at the feet of his judges in the most abject manner, and in the midst of rain, he is said to have moved the compassion of the bench, who thought it punishment of a man of his birth, to be reduced to the state of prostrating himself so miserably, and deformed and besmeared with dirt⁵. But it was Cæsar's authority that saved him, and he cited him at the same time to Clodius outward carriage he affected the mien of a philosopher, and his aspect greatly contributed to give him the credit of that character severe in his looks, squalid in his dress, his speech, morose in his manners, the vestige of antiquity, and a pattern of the ancient ambitious to be thought a patriot, and a man of the old discipline. But this garb of reserve covered a most lewd and vicious mind surrounded always with Greeks, to improve of his learning: but while others entertained the gratification of his lusts, as his companions, or his drunken companions. In was a dirty, sottish, stupid Epicurean; in all the low and filthy pleasures of life; opinion of his wisdom, the splendour of family, and the smoky images of ancestors he resembled in nothing but his complacency commended him to the consulship; while the genuine temper and talents of the man

His colleague Gabinius was no hypocrite: he professed rake from the beginning; gay, luxurious; always curled and perfumed, in a perpetual debauch of gaming, wine, and void of every principle of virtue, honour, duty; and so desperate in his fortunes, that he had no resource, or hopes of subsistence, but ornatissima senatus populi que Romani de me judicia intercedere. Itaque et augur postea fieri volui, quod antea neglexeram.—Ep. Fam. xv. 4.

¹ Audieram ex sapientissimo homine, Q. Catulo, non esse unum consulem improbum, duos vero nunquam post Romanam conditam, excepto illo Cinna tempore, fuisse. Quare meam causam semper fore firmissimam dicere solebat, dum vel unus in republica consul esset.—Post Red. in Sen. 4.

² Consules se optime ostendunt.—Ad Quint. Frat. l. 2. Tu miserorum me affinem tuum, quem tuis comitibus prærogative primum custodem præfeceras; quem kalendis Januariis tertio loco sententiam rogare, constrictum inimicis reipublice tradidisti.—Post Red. in Sen. 7; In Pis. 6, 6.

³ The author of the Exile of Cicero, to aggravate the perfidy of Gabinius, tells us, that Cicero had defended him in a capital cause, and produces a fragment of the oration: but he mistakes the time of the fact; for that defence was not made till several years after this consulship; as we shall see hereafter in its proper place.—Hist. de l'Exil de Cicéron, p. 115.

⁴ Fœdus fecerunt cum tribuno plebis palam, ut ab eo provincias acciperent, quæ vellent—Id autem fœdus meo sanguine lotum sanciri posse dicebant.—Pro Sext. 10.

Cui quidem cum Ciliciam dedisses, mutasti pactionem et Gabini, pretio amplificato, Syriam nominatim dedisti.—Pro Domo, 9.

⁵ Non consules, sed mercatores provinciarum tores vestre dignitatis.—Post Red. in Sen. 4.

¹ L. Piso, a P. Clodio accusatus, quod graves et graves injurias sociis intulisset, haud dubie rubi fortuito auxilio vitavit—quia jam satis graves et sociis dedisse arbitrati sunt huc deductum necesse abloere se tam suppliciter, aut attollere tam cogere.—Val. Max. viii. 1.

² Quam teter incedebat? quam truculentus? ribilis aspectu? Aliquem te ex barbaris illis, veteris imperii, imaginem antiquitatis, columnam dioces interui. Vestitus aspero, nostra hæc pubes, et pene fusca. Capillo ita horrido, ut gravitas in oculo, tanta contractio frontis, ut oculo respiciat, tanquam Atlante cælum, niti [Pro Sext. 8.] Quia tristis semper, quia taciturnus subhorridum atque incultum videbant, et quod mine, ut ingenerata familie frugalitas videretur—etenim animus ejus vultu, flagitia parietibus—laudabat homo doctus philosophos necio quod 9.] Jacobat in suo Græcorum fœtore et vino—Græquini in lectulis, sæpe plures.—In Pis. 10, 27.

His utitur quasi præfectis libidinum earum: tates omnes vestigant atque odorantur: hi sunt instructoresque convivi, &c.—Post Red. in Sen.

Obrepleti ad honores errore hominum, commumum fumorum imaginum, quarum simile nihil habet colorem.—In Pis. 1.

plunder of the republic. In his tribunate, to pay his court to Pompey, he exposed to the mob the plan of Lucullus's house, to show what an expensive fabric one of the greatest subjects of Rome was building, as he would intimate, out of the spoils of the treasury: yet this vain man, oppressed with debts, and scarce able to show his head, found means, from the perquisites of his consulship, to build a much more magnificent palace than Lucullus himself had done*. No wonder then that two such men, ready to sacrifice the empire itself to their lusts and pleasures, should barter away the safety and fortunes of a private senator, whose virtue was a standing reproof to them, and whose very presence gave some check to the free indulgence of their vices.

Clodius having gained the consuls, made his next attempt upon the people, by obliging them with several new laws, contrived chiefly for their advantage, which he now promulgated. First, that corn should be distributed gratis to the citizens. Secondly, that no magistrates should take the auspices, or observe the heavens, when the people were actually assembled on public business. Thirdly, that the old companies or fraternities of the city, which the senate had abolished, should be revived, and new ones instituted. Fourthly, to please those also of higher rank, that the censors should not expel from the senate, or inflict any mark of infamy on any man, who was not first openly accused and convicted of some crime by their joint sentence*. These laws, though generally agreeable, were highly unseasonable; tending to relax the public discipline, at a time when it wanted most to be reinforced: Cicero took them all to be levelled at himself, and contrived to pave the way to his ruin; so that he provided his friend L. Ninnius, one of the tribunes, to put his negative upon them, especially on the law of fraternities, which, under colour of incorporating those societies, gave Clodius an opportunity of gathering an army, and enlisting into his service all the scum and dregs of the city. Dion Cassius says, that Clodius, fearing lest this opposition should retard the effect of his other projects, persuaded Cicero, in an amicable conference, to withdraw his tribune, and give no interruption to his laws, upon a promise and condition that he would not make any attempt against him†: but we find from Cicero's account, that it was the advice of his friends, which induced him to be quiet against his own judgment; because the laws themselves were popular, and did not personally affect him: though he blamed himself soon afterwards for his indolence, and expostulated with Atticus for advising him to it; when he felt to his cost the advantage which Clodius had gained by it‡.

* Alter uenientis affluens, calamistrata coma, despiciebat oculos stuprum.—(effellit naminem)—hominem emersum abluo ex disturnis tenebris lustrorum ac stuprum—vino, pice, leucocitii, adulterisque confectum.—Pro Sext. 9.
Cur ille gurgies, heluatus tecum simul respublice angustias, ad celum tamen extruxit villam in Tusculano visceribus arari.—Pro Domo, 47.

† Vid. Orat. in Pison. 4, et notas Asconii.—Dio, l. xxxviii. p. 67.

‡ Collegia, non ea solum, quæ seminas sustulerat, restituit, sed innumerablem quandam novam ex omni fæce urbis ex servis concitavit.—In Pison. 4.

* Dio, l. xxxviii. p. 67.

† Numquam enim penitus mihi persuaderi, utile nobis esse, ut de collegiis perferri.—Ad Att. iii. 15.

For the true design of all these laws was, to introduce only with better grace the grand plot of the play, the banishment of Cicero, which was now directly attempted by a special law, importing, that whoever had taken the life of a citizen uncondemned and without a trial, should be prohibited from fire and water*. Though Cicero was not named, yet he was marked out by the law: his crime was, the putting Catiline's accomplices to death; which, though not done by his single authority, but by a general vote of the senate, and after a solemn hearing and debate, was alleged to be illegal, and contrary to the liberties of the people. Cicero finding himself thus reduced to the condition of a criminal, changed his habit upon it, as it was usual in the case of a public impeachment, and appeared about the streets in a sordid or mourning gown, to excite the compassion of his citizens; whilst Clodius, at the head of his mob, contrived to meet and insult him at every turn; reproaching him for his cowardice and dejection, and throwing dirt and stones at him†. But Cicero soon gathered friends enough about him to secure him from such insults: "the whole body of the knights and the young nobility, to the number of twenty thousand", with young Crassus at their head, who all changed their habit, and perpetually attended him about the city, to implore the protection and assistance of the people."

The city was now in great agitation, and every part of it engaged on one side or the other. The senate met in the temple of Concord, while Cicero's friends assembled in the capitol; whence all the knights and the young nobles went in their habit of mourning to throw themselves at the feet of the consuls, and beg their interposition in Cicero's favour. Piso kept his house that day on purpose to avoid them; but Gabinius received them with intolerable rudeness, though their petition was seconded by the intreaties and tears of the whole senate: he treated Cicero's character and consulship with the utmost derision, and repulsed the whole company with threats and insults for their fruitless pains to support a sinking cause. This raised great indignation in the assembly,—where the tribune Ninnius, instead of being discouraged by the violence of the consul, made a motion, that the senate also should change their habit with the rest of the city; which was agreed to instantly by a unanimous vote. Gabinius, enraged at this, flew out of the senate into the forum, where he declared to the people from the rostra, "that men were mistaken to imagine that the senate had any power in the republic; that the knights should pay dear for that day's work, when, in Cicero's consulship, they kept guard in the capitol with their drawn swords: and that the hour was now come when those, who lived at that time in fear, should revenge themselves on their enemies: and to confirm the truth of what he said, he banished L. Lamia, a Roman knight, two hundred miles from the city, for his distinguished zeal and activity in Cicero's service‡;" an act of power which no

* Qui civem Romanum indemnatum perimisset, ei aqua et igni interdiceretur.—Vell. Pat. ii. 45.

† Plutarch, in Cicero.

‡ Pro me presente senatus, hominumque viginti milia vestem mutaverunt.—Post Red. ad Quir. 3.

§ Hic subito cum incredibile in Capitolium multitudo ex tota urbe, cunctaque Italia convenisset, vestem mutandam omnes, moque etiam omni ratione, privato consilio, consul before him had ever presumed to exert on any citizen; which was followed presently "by an edict from both the consuls, forbidding the senate to put their late vote in execution, and enjoining them to resume their ordinary dress". And where is there," says Cicero, "in all history, a more illustrious testimony to the honour of any man than that all the honest by private inclination, and the senate by a public decree, should change their habit for the sake of a single citizen?"

But the resolution of changing his gown was too hasty and inconsiderate, and helped to precipitate his ruin. He was not named in the law, nor personally affected by it: the terms of it were general and seemingly just, reaching only to those who had taken the life of a citizen illegally. Whether this was his case or not, was not yet the point in issue, but to be the subject of another trial; so that by making himself a criminal before his time, he shortened the trouble of his enemies, discouraged his friends, and made his case more desperate than he needed to have done; whereas, if he had taken the part of commending or slighting the law, as being wholly unconcerned in it, and when he came to be actually attacked by a second law, and brought to a trial upon it, had stood resolutely upon his defence, he might have baffled the malice of his prosecutors. He was sensible of his error when it was too late; and oft reproaches Atticus, that being a stander-by, and less heated in the game than himself, he would suffer him to make such blunders.

As the other consul, Piso, had not yet explicitly declared himself, so Cicero, accompanied by his son-in-law, who was his near kinsman, took occasion to make him a visit, in hopes to move him to espouse his cause, and support the authority of the senate. They went to him about eleven in the morning, and found him, as Cicero afterwards told the senate, "coming out from a little dirty hovel, fresh from the last night's debauch, with his slip-quoniam publicis ducibus respublica careret, defendendum putarent. Erat eodem tempore senatus in aede Concordiae, cum flets universus ordo cincinnatum consulem orabat, nam alter ille horridus et severus domi se consulto tenebat. Quae tum superbia cœnum illud so labes amplissimi ordinis preces et clarissimorum civium lacrymas repudiavit? Me ipsum ut contemnit hellico patriæ?—Vestris precibus a latrone isto repudiatis, vir incredibili fide.—L. Ninnius ad senatum de republica retulit. Senatusque frequens vestem pro mea salute mutandam censuit.—Exanimatus evolat e senatu—advocat concionem—errare homines, si etiam tum senatum aliquid in republica posse arbitrantur.—Venisse tempus his, qui in timore fuissent, ulciscendi ea.—L. Lamiæ—in concione relegavit, edixitque ut ab urbe abesset milia passuum ducenta.—[Pro Sext. 11, 12, 13; it. Post Red. in Sen. 5.] Quod ante id tempus civi Romano contigit nemini.—Ep. Fam. xi. 16.

7 Cum subito edicunt duo consules, ut ad suum vestitum senatores redirent.—Ep. Fam. xi. 14.

8 Quid enim quisquam potest ex omni memoria sumere illustrius, quam pro uno cive et bono omnes privato consensu, et universum senatum publico consilio mutasse vestem?—Ibid. 12.

9 Nam prior lex nos nihil lēdebat: quam si, ut est promulgata, laudare voluissimus, aut, ut erat negligenda, negligere, nocere omnino nobis non potuisset. Hic mihi primum meum consilium defuit; sed etiam obfuit. Cæci, cæci, inquam, fulmis in vestitu mutando, in populo rogando. Quod, nisi nominatim mecum agi ceptum esset, perniciosum fuit.—Me, meos meis tradidi inimicis, inspectante et tacente te; qui, si non plus ingenio valebas quam ego, certe timebas minus.—Ad Att. iii. 15.

pers on, his head muffled, and his breath of wine, that they could hardly bear the it: he excused his dress, and smell of wine account of his ill health, for which he was he said, to take some vinous medicines kept them standing all the while in that still they had finished their business." Cicero entered into the affair, he frankly that "Gabinus was so miserably poor as able to show his head, and must be utter if he could not procure some rich provision he had hopes of one from Clodius, but of anything from the senate; that for his it was his business to humour him on this as Cicero had humoured his colleague in consulship; and that there was no reason the help of the consuls, since it was every duty to look to himself;" which was they could get from him.

Clodius, all the while, was not idle, but on his law with great vigour; and the people into the Flaminian circus, summoned also the young nobles and the knights so busy in Cicero's cause, to give an account of their conduct to that assembly: but as they appeared, he ordered his slaves and canaries to fall upon them with drawn volleys of stones in so rude a manner, that Cicero was almost killed, and Vibullius senator, so desperately hurt, that he died of his wounds. Here he produced the consuls, to deliver their sentiments to the merit of Cicero's consulship; which he declared, with great gravity, that he condemned the putting citizens to death trial. Piso only said, that he had always the merciful side, and had a great cruelty. The reason of holding this at the Flaminian circus, without the gates was to give Caesar an opportunity of it, who, being now invested with a command, could not appear within the wall therefore, being called upon, after the deliver his mind on the same question that "the proceedings against Lentulus rest were irregular and illegal; but that not approve the design of punishing a them; that all the world knew his secret matter, and that he had given his vote taking away their lives, yet he did not right to propound a law at this time at that were so long past." This answer

b Egero—Gabinium; sine provincia stare spem habere a tribuno plebis—a senatu quidem hujus te cupiditati obsequi, sicut ego fecisse meo: nihil esse quod prædium consulum i sibi quemque consulere oportere, &c.—In Pis.

c Qui adesse nobilissimos adolescentes, h equites Romanos deprecatores meæ salutis ius operarum suarum gladiis et lapidibus ob Sext. 12.

Vidi hunc ipsum Hortensium, lumen et reipublice pene interfici servorum manu—qu Vibullius, senator, vir optimus, cum hoc cuita est mulctatus, ut vitam amisisset.—Pro M. d Proesa voce et vitulenta, quod in cives esset animadversum, id sibi dixit gravis auctissimè displicere.—Post Red. in Sen. 6.

Cum esses interrogatus quid sentires de con respondes, crudelitatem tibi non placere. [Ii semper misericordem fuisse].—Post Red. in Sen.

e Dio, l. xxxviii. p. 60.

and agreeable to the part which he was then acting; for while it confirmed the foundation of Clodius's law, it carried a show of moderation towards Cicero, or, as an ingenious writer expresses it, left appearances only to the one, but did real service to the other¹.

In this same assembly, Clodius got a new law lex enacted, that made a great alteration in the constitution of the republic, viz. the repeal of the Ælian and Fusian laws, by which the people were left at liberty to transact all public business, even on the days called fasti, without being liable to be obstructed by the magistrates on any pretence whatsoever². The two laws, now repealed, had been in force about a hundred years³; and made it unlawful to act anything with the people, while the sacros or consuls were observing the heavens and taking the auspices. This wise constitution was the main support of the aristocratical interest, and a perpetual curb to the petulance of factious tribunes, whose chief opportunity of doing mischief lay in their power of obtruding dangerous laws upon the city, by their credit with the populace. Cicero therefore frequently laments the loss of these two laws, as fatal to the republic; he calls them "the most sacred and salutary laws of the state, the fences of their civil peace and quiet, the very walls and bulwarks of the republic, which had held out against the fierceness of the Gracchi, the madness of Saturninus, the mobs of Drusus, the bloodshed of Cinna, the arms of Sylla;" to be abolished at last by the violence of this worthless tribune.

Pompey, who had hitherto been giving Cicero the strongest assurances of his friendship, and been frequent and open in his visits to him, began now, as the plot ripened towards a crisis, to grow cool and reserved; while the Clodian faction, fearing lest he might be induced at last to protect him, were employing all their arts "to infuse jealousies and suspicions into him of a design against him from Cicero. They posted some of their confidants at Cicero's house, to watch his coming thither, and to admonish him, by whispers and billets put into his hands, to be cautious of venturing himself there, and to take better care of his life; which was inculcated to him likewise so strongly at home by perpetual letters and messages from pretended friends, that he thought fit to withdraw himself from the city, to his house on the Alban hill⁴." It cannot be imagined that he could entertain any real apprehension of Cicero; both Cicero's character and his own make that incredible: but if he had conceived any, it was not, as Cicero says, against him, but against the common enemies of them both, lest they might possibly attempt somewhat in Cicero's name, and, by the opportunity of charging it upon Cicero, hope to get rid of them both at the same time. But the most probable conjecture is, that being obliged, by his engagements with Cæsar, to desert Cicero, and suffer him to be driven out of the city, he was willing to humour these insinuations, as giving the most plausible pretext of excusing his perfidy.

But Cicero had still with him not only all the best, but much the greatest part of the city, determined to run all hazards, and expose their lives for his safety⁵; and was more than a match for all the strength of Clodius and the consuls, if the triumvirate only would stand neuter. Before things came therefore to extremity, he thought it advisable to press Pompey in such a manner, as to know for certain what he had to expect from him: some of his chief friends undertook this task; Lucullus, Torquatus, Lentulus, &c., who, with a numerous attendance of citizens, went to find him at his Alban villa, and to intercede with him not to desert the fortunes of his old friend. He received them civilly, though coldly; referring them wholly to the consuls, and declaring, "that he, being only a private man, could not pretend to take the field against an armed tribune, without a public authority; but if the consuls, by a decree of the senate, would enter into the affair, he would presently arm himself in their defence." With this answer they addressed themselves again to the consuls; but with no better success than before. Gabinus treated them rudely; but Piso calmly told them, that he was not so stout a consul as Torquatus and Cicero had been; that there was no need of arms, or fighting; that Cicero might save the republic a second time, if he pleased, by withdrawing himself, for if he staid it would cost an infinite quantity of civil blood; and in short, that neither he, nor his colleague, nor his son-in-law Cæsar, would relinquish the party of the tribune⁶.

¹ Cum idem illum, ut me metueret, me caveret, monuerunt; idem me, mihi illum uni esse inimicissimum, dicerent.—Pro Domo, 11.

Quem domi meæ certi homines ad eam rem compositi monuerunt, ut esset cautior: ejusque vite a me insidias apud me domi postas esse dixerunt: atque hanc ei suspicionem alii literis mittendis, alii nunciis, alii coram ipse excitaverunt, ut ille, cum a me certe nihil timeret, ab illis, ne quid meo nomine molirentur, cavendum putaret.—Pro Sext. 18.

² Si ego in causam tam bona, tanto studio senatus, consensu tam incredibili bonorum omnium, tam parato, tota denique Italia ad omnem contentionem expedita.—Ibid. 16.

³ Nonne ad te L. Lentulus, L. Torquatus, M. Lucullus venit? Qui omnes ad eum, multique mortales oratum in Albanum obsecratumque venerant, ne meas fortunas desereret, cum republicæ fortunæ conjunctas.—Se contra armatum tribunum plebis sine consilio publico decertare nolle: consulisque ex senatus consulto republicam defendentis, se arma sumpturum.—In Pison. 31.

⁴ Quid, infelix, responderis?—Te non esse tam fortem, quam ipse Torquatus in consulatu fuisset, aut ego: nihil opus esse armis, nihil contentione: me posse iterum republicam servare, alii cecissem; infinitam cædem fore, si restitisssem. Deinde ad extremum, neque se, neque gene-

¹ Exil de Cicéron, p. 133.

² Idem consulis sedentibus atque inspectantibus lata lex est, ne auspicia valerent, ne quis obnunciaret, ne quis legi intercederet; ut omnibus fastis diebus legem ferre liceret: ut lex Ælia, lex Fusian ne valerent. Quæ una rogatio quæ non intelligat, universam republicam esse delictam? [Pro Sext. 15.] Sustulit duas leges, Æliam et Fusian, maxime republicæ salutaris.—De Harusp. Resp. 5.

³ The days fasti were the days on which the courts of law were open, and the prætors sat to hear causes, which were marked for that purpose in the calendars: but before this Clodian law it was not allowed to transact any business upon them with the people.

⁴ Centum prope annos legem Æliam et Fusian tenuerunt.—In Pison. 5.

⁵ Delude sanctissimas leges, Æliam et Fusian, quæ in Gracchorum ferocitate, et in audacia Saturnini; et in Cornelio Drusi, et in cruore Cinnæ, etiam inter *Syllan*am esse vixerunt, solus concularis ac pro nihilo putaris. [In Vain. 8.] Propugnacula murique tranquillitatis et otii.—In Pison. 4.

After this repulse, Cicero resolved to make his last effort on Pompey, by throwing himself in person at his feet. Plutarch tells us, that Pompey slipped out at a back door, and would not see him : but it is certain, from Cicero's account, that he was admitted to an audience ; " and when he began to press and even supplicate him, in a manner the most affecting, that Pompey flatly refused to help him ; alleging in excuse of himself, the necessity which he was under of acting nothing against the will of Cæsar." This experiment convinced Cicero that he had a much greater power to contend with than what had yet appeared in sight : he called therefore a council of his friends, with intent to take his final resolution, agreeably to their advice. The question was, whether it was best to stay and defend himself by force, or to save the effusion of blood by retreating till the storm should blow over. Lucullus advised the first ; but Cato, and above all Hortensius, warmly urged the last ; which concurring also with Atticus's advice, as well as the fears and entreaties of all his own family, made him resolve to quit the field to his enemies, and submit to a voluntary exile^a.

A little before his retreat, he took a small statue of Minerva, which had long been revered in his family as a kind of tutelary deity, and carrying it to the capitol, placed it in the temple of Jupiter, under the title of Minerva, the guardian of the city^b. His view might possibly be to signify, that after he had done all which human prudence could contrive for the defence of the republic, he was now forced to give it up to the protection of the gods, since nothing less than the interposition of some deity could preserve it from ruin ; or rather, as he himself seems to intimate, in the uncertain issue of his flight, and the plunder of his goods which was likely to ensue, he had a mind to preserve this sacred image, in the most conspicuous part of the city, as a monument of his services, which would naturally excite an affectionate remembrance of him in the people, by letting them see that his heart was still there, where he had deposited his gods. After this act he withdrew himself in the night, escorted by a numerous guard of friends, who, after a day's journey or two, left him, with great expressions of tenderness, to pursue his way towards Sicily ; which he proposed for the place of his residence, and where, for his eminent services to the island, he assured himself of a kind reception and safe retreat.

SECTION V.

THE wretched alternative to which Cicero was reduced, of losing either his country or his life, is sufficient to confute all the cavils of those who, rum, neque collegam suum tribuno plebis defuturum.—In Pison. 31.

^a Is, qui nos sibi quondam ad pedes stratos ne sublebat quidem, qui se nihil contra hujus voluntatem facere posse volebat.—Ad Att. x. 4.

^b Lacrymæ meorum me ad mortem tre prohibuerunt.—Ibid. 4 ; Plutarch. in Cicero.

^c Nos, qui illam custodem urbis, omnibus ereptis nostris rebus ac perditis, violari ab impiis pasci non sumus, eamque ex nostra domo in ipsius patris domum detulimus.—De Leg. ii. 17.

from a hint or two in his writings obscure out and not well understood, are so to charge him with the levity of temporizing himself for any bribe which could vanity : for nothing is more evident than might not only have avoided this storm, but have obtained whatever honours he pleased, by into the measures of the triumvirate, as his authority to the support of their party, that the only thing which provoked Cæsar this calamity upon him, was to see all slighted, and his friendship utterly rejected by him^a. This he expressly declares to those who were conscious of the truth of it, " I had tried all means to induce him to take the acts of his consulship ; had offered missions and lieutenantships of what kind what privileges he should desire ; to even a fourth in the alliance of the triumvirate, to hold him in the same rank of friend as Pompey himself : all which I refused, not out of slight to Cæsar, but constant principles, and because I thought the loss of them unbecoming the character which I had maintained ; how wisely I will not dispute ; sure that it was firmly and bravely ; what of baffling the malice of my enemies, I easily have done by that help, I chose to use violence, rather than to desert your interests, to descend from my own rank^b."

Cæsar continued at Rome till he was driven out of it ; but had no sooner his consulship than he began to be affronted himself by two of the new party, Domitius and C. Memmius, who called in question the validity of his acts, and made several motions in the senate to get them annulled by public vote. But the senate had no stomach to meddle with an affair so delicate ; so that the whole ended in fruitless debates and altercations ; and to prevent all attempts of that kind in the future, Cæsar took care always, by force of bribes, to leading magistrates to his interests, and to send off to his province of Gaul^c. But as he expected opposition gave some little ruin to his triumvirate, so it served them as an excuse for their behaviour towards Cicero, that their own dangers were nearer to other people's, and that they were obliged to their own security not to irritate so popular a man as Clodius^d.

^a Hoc sibi contraxisse videbatur Cicero, quod viros dividendo agro Campano esse noluisse.—Ad Att. ix. 2.

^b Consul egit eas res, quarum me participem non habere volebam. Me ille ut quinqueviratum acciperem rogavit, sed sibi conjunctis consularibus esse legationem, quam vellem, quanto cum hoc detulit. Quæ ego non ingrato animo, sed quadam sententia repudiavi, &c.—De Prov. C.

^c Functus consulatu, C. Memmius, L. Domitius, de superioris anni actis referentibus, senatui detulit : nec illo auspicante, triduoque altercationes assumpto, in provinciam abibat. Igitur postea temporis in magno negotio gare semper annuos magistratus, et e petitori adjuvare, aut ad honorem patii pervenire, quod receperant propugnatores absentiam suam.—Cic. 23.

^d Illi autem aliquo tumore perterriti, quod atque omnes res anni superioris labefactari a Clodio, et a senatu, atque principibus civitat

As soon as it was known that Cicero was gone, Clodius filled the forum with his band of slaves and mercenaries, and published a second law to the Roman people, as he called them, though there was not one honest citizen or man of credit amongst them*. The law, as we may gather from the scattered passages of it, was conceived in the following terms:—

"Whereas, M. T. Cicero has put Roman citizens to death unheard and uncondemned; and for that end forged the authority and decree of the senate: may it please you to ordain that he be interdicted from fire and water; that nobody presume to harbour or receive him, on pain of death; and that whoever shall move, speak, vote, or take any step towards recalling him, he shall be treated as a public enemy, unless those should first be recalled to life whom Cicero unlawfully put to death†."

The law was drawn by Sext. Clodius, the kinsman and prime minister of the tribune; though Vatinius also had some claim to it, and was the only one of senatorian rank who openly approved it‡. It was essentially null and invalid, both for the matter and the form: for in the first place it was not properly a law, but what they called a privilege, or an act to inflict penalties on a particular citizen by name, without any previous trial, which was expressly prohibited by the most sacred and fundamental constitutions of the republic§. Secondly, the terms of it were so absurd, that they annulled themselves; for it enacted, not that Cicero may or should be, but that he be interdicted,—which was impossible; since no power on earth, says Cicero, can make a thing to be done before it be done¶. Thirdly, the penal clause being grounded on a suggestion notoriously false, that Cicero had forged the decrees of the senate, it could not possibly stand for want of a foundation‡. Lastly, though it provided that nobody should harbour him, yet it had not ordered him to be expelled, or enjoined him to quit the city¹. It was the custom, in all tribunum popularum a se alienare nolebant, suaque sibi perire pericula esse, quam mea, loquebantur.—Pro Act. 12.

* Non denique suffragii latorem in ista tua proserptione quæsumus, nisi furem ac alicuium reperire potuisti.—Pro Dom. 12.

† Vid. Pro Dom. 18, 19, 30; Post Red. in Sen. 11, 10.

‡ Hanc tibi legem S. Clodius scripsit—homini gentilitate se facinorosissimo S. Clodio, socio tui sanguinis.—Hæc tu scriptore, hoc consiliario, hoc ministro—republicam perdidisti. [Pro Dom. 11, 10, 18.] Ille unus ordinis nostri discusso meo—palam exultavit.—Pro Sext. 64.

§ Voluit legem egerant, vetant XII. tabulis; leges privatis tumebant errogari. Id est enim privilegium.—Pro Dom. 17.

¶ Cum tulli ut interdictum sed ut interdictum sit—Sexte meo, bona venia, quoniam jam dialecticus es—quod facit, non est, sit factum, ferri ad populum, non verbis esse moneat, sed suffragiis confirmari potest? [Ibid. 18.] Quid si de verbis scripta est ista proscriptio, ut se ipsa dissolvat?—Ibid. 19.

N. B. The distinction here intimated between interdictum, and interdictum sit, deserves the attention of all grammarians. They are commonly used indifferently, as terms wholly equivalent; yet according to Cicero's criticism, the one, we see, makes the sense absurd, where the other is just and proper.

¹ Hæc enim, quod M. Tullius falsum senatus consultum voluit, si igitur retulit falsum senatus consultum, tum est repugnant: si non retulit, nulla est.—Pro Dom. 19.

² Delicti de me ac reprobis, non ut extremæ-pœna est, qui reprobis; quam omnes neglexerunt; ejection nulla est.—Ibid. 20.

laws made by the tribes, to insert the name of the tribe which was first called to vote, and of the man who first voted in it for the law, that he might be transmitted down with the law itself, as the principal espouser and promoter of it". This honour was given to one Sedulius, a mean obscure fellow, without any settled habitation, who yet afterwards declared that he was not in Rome at the time, and knew nothing at all of the matter: which gave Cicero occasion to observe, when he was reproaching Clodius with this act, that Sedulius might easily be the first voter, who, for want of a lodging, used to lie all night in the forum; but it was strange, that when he was driven to the necessity of forging a leader, he should not be able to find a more reputable one².

With this law against Cicero, there was another published at the same time, which, according to the stipulation already mentioned, was to be the pay and price for it; to grant to the two consuls the provinces above specified, with a provision of whatever troops and money they thought fit³. Both the laws passed without opposition; and Clodius lost no time in putting the first of them in execution, but fell to work immediately in plundering, burning, and demolishing Cicero's houses, both in the city and the country. The best part of his goods was divided between the two consuls; the marble columns of his Palatine house were carried publicly to Piso's father-in-law, and the rich furniture of his Tusculan villa to his neighbour Gabinius, who removed even the trees of his plantations into his own grounds⁴: and to make the loss of his house in Rome irretrievable, Clodius consecrated the area on which it stood to the perpetual service of religion, and built a temple upon it to the goddess Liberty⁵.

While Cicero's house was in flames, the two consuls, with all their seditious crew around them, were publicly feasting and congratulating each other for their victory, and for having revenged the death of their old friends on the head of Cicero: where, in the gaiety of their hearts, Gabinius openly bragged that he had always been the fa-

³ Tribus Sergia principum fuit: pro tribu, Sextus L. F. Varro primus scivit. This was the form, as appears from fragments of the old laws.—Vid. Frontin. de Aquæd.; Fragment. Legis Thoræ, apud rei agrar. Scriptores; Liv. ix. 38.

⁴ Sedulio princeps, qui se illo die confirmat Romæ non fulsee. Quod si non fuit, quid to audacius, qui in ejus nomen incideris? Quid desperatius, qui ne ementiendo quidem potueris autorem adumbrare meliorem? Sin autem is primus scivit, quod facile potuit, propter inopiam tecti in foro pernoctans. [Pro Dom. 30.] Quam Sedulius se negat scivisse.—Ibid. 31.

⁵ Ut provincias acciperent, quas ipsæ vellent: exercitum et pecuniam quantum vellent. [Pro Sext. 10.—In Pison. 16.] Illo ipso die—mihi relique publicæ perniciæ, Gabinius et Pisoni provincia rogata est.—Pro Sext. 24.

⁶ Uno eodemque tempore domus mea diripiebatur, ardebat: bona ad vicinum consulium de Palatio; de Tusculano ad item alterum vicinum consulium deferrebantur.—Post Red. in Sen. 7.

Cum domus in Palatio, villa in Tusculano, altera ad alterum consulium transferrebat, columnas marmoreas ex ædibus meis, inspectante populo Romano, ad eorum consulium portabantur: in fundum autem vicini consulium non instrumentum, aut ornamenta villæ, sed etiam arbores transferrebantur.—Pro Dom. 24.

⁷ Cum suis dicat se manibus domum civis optimi evertere, et eam liadem manibus consecrare.—Ibid. 40.

vourite of Catiline; and Piso, that he was cousin to Cethegus*. Clodius, in the mean while, not content with exerting his vengeance only on Cicero's houses, pursued his wife and children with the same fury: and made several attempts to get young Cicero, the son, into his hands, then about six years old, with an intent to kill him*; but the child was carefully guarded by the friends of the family, and removed from the reach of his malice. Terentia had taken sanctuary in the temple of Vesta, but was dragged out of it forcibly, by his orders, to the public office or tribunal, where he was sitting, to be examined about the concealment of her husband's effects; but being a woman of singular spirit and resolution, she bore all his insults with a masculine courage†.

But while Clodius seemed to aim at nothing in this affair but the gratification of his revenge, he was carrying on a private interest at the same time, which he had much at heart. The house, in which he himself lived, was contiguous to a part of Cicero's ground; which, being now laid open, made that side of the Palatine hill the most airy and desirable situation in Rome: his intention therefore was, by the purchase of another house which stood next to him, to make the whole area his own, with the benefit of the fine portico and temple annexed: so that he had no sooner demolished Cicero's house, than he began to treat with the owner of the next, Q. Seius Postumus, a Roman knight, who absolutely refused to sell it; and declared, that Clodius, of all men, should never have it, while he lived. Clodius threatened to obstruct his windows; but finding that neither his threats nor offers availed anything, he contrived to get the knight poisoned; and so bought the house, after his death, at the sale of his effects, by outbidding all who offered for it. His next step was, to secure the remaining part of Cicero's area, which was not included in the consecration, and was now also exposed by his direction to a public auction: but as it was not easy to find any citizen who would bid for it, and he did not care to buy it in his own name, he was forced to provide an obscure, needy fellow, called Scato, to purchase it for him, and by that means became master of the most spacious habitation in all the city".

* Domus ardebat in Palatio—Consules epulabantur, et in conjuratum gratulatione versabantur; cum alter se Catilinae delicias, alter Cethegi consobrinum fuisse diceret.—Pro Domo, 24; In Pison. 11; Pro Sext. 24.

† Vexabatur uxor mea: liberi ad necem querabantur.—Pro Sext. 24.

Quid vos uxor mea misera violarat? Quam vexavistis, raptavistis—quid mea filia?—Quid parvus filius?—Quid fecerat, quod eum toties per insidias interficere voluistis?—Pro Domo, 23.

† A te quidem omnia fieri fortissime, atque amantissime video: nec miror; nam ad me P. Valerius scripsit id quod ego maximo cum fletu legi, quemadmodum a Vestæ ad tabulam Valeriam ducta cecidit.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 2.

‡ Ipse cum loci illius, cum ædium cupiditate flagraret.—Pro Domo, 41.

Monumentum iste, nunquam aut religionem ullam excogitavit: habitare laxè et magnifice voluit: duasque et magnas et nobiles domos conjungere. Eodem puncto temporis quo meus discensus isti causam cedis eripuit, a Q. Seio contendit, ut domum sibi venderet. Cum ille id negaret, primo se luminibus ejus esse obstructurum minabatur. Affirmabat Postumus, se vivo, domum suam istius nunquam futuram. Acutus adolescens ex istius sermone intellexit, quid fieri oporteret. Hominem veneno aper-

This desolation of Cicero's fortunes and the misery which he suffered abroad deprived of everything that was dear to made him repent of the resolution of which he ascribes to the envy and treacherous counsellors, who, taking the advantage and the perplexity which he was under him to an act both ruinous and inglorious he chiefly charges on Hortensius; and forbears to name him to Atticus, on the strict friendship between them, yet him very freely to his brother Quintus, every day insidiously to his house, and greatest professions of zeal and affectionally insinuating to his hopes and feelings giving way to the present rage, he could being recalled with glory in three days' time. Hortensius was particularly intimate with Pompey; and might possibly be urged Cicero to this step, in order to escape the disgrace of being forced to act against a high hand. But let that be as it may, Pompey's conduct which shocked Cicero not for its being contrary to his oaths ambitious can easily dispense with, but rather, which they never neglect, but weakness. The consideration of what Pompey made him depend on his side he could have guarded against his treachery could not suspect him of the folly of giving entirely up to Caesar, who was the prince and director of the whole affair.

In this ruffled and querulous state of mind with the recollection of his own and the perfidy of his friends, he frequently that he had not tried the fate of arms, either to conquer bravely or fall honourably he dwells so much upon in his letters, persuaded that it would have been his course. But this is a problem not solved: it is certain that his enemies all arts to urge him to the resolution of as if they apprehended the consequences: stay: and that the real aim of the was, not to destroy, but to humble him no less certain, that all resistance must be vain, if they had found it necessary to tissime sustulit. Emit domum, licitatoribus in Palatio pulcherrimo prospectu porticum (bus pavimentatum trecentum pedum concipissimum peristylum, facile ut omnium domus et dignitate superaret: et homo religiosus, et idem emeret et venderet, tamen illis tantis ausus est suum nomen emptioni ascribere.) Scatonem illum.—Pro Domo, 44.

At in his sedibus, quas tu Q. Seio equitate apertissime interfecto, tenes.—De Harusp.

‡ Me summa simulatione amoris, summaque quotidiana accleratisime, insidiosissimeque juncto etiam Arrio, quorum ego consillis, preceptis destitutus, in hanc calamitatem incidit.—Frat. i. 3.

Sepe triduo summa cum gloria dicebar esse.—Ibid. 4.

† Sed si quicquam fuisset, qui me Pompei tali responso perterritum, a turpissimo consilio.—Ad Att. iii. 15.

Multa, quæ mentem exturbarent meam: et Pompei.—Ad Quint. Frat. i. 4.

Nullum est meum peccatum, nisi quod quibus nefas putaram esse me decipi, aut etiam id expedire quidem arbitrabar.—Ibid.

strength against him; and that they had already proceeded too far, to suffer him to remain in the city, in defiance of them; and if their power had been actually employed to drive him away, his return must have been the more desperate, and they the more interested to keep him out; so that it seems to have been his most prudent part, and the most agreeable to his character, to yield, as he did, to the necessity of the times.

But we have a full account of the motives of his retreat, in the speeches, which he made after his return, both to the senate and the people. "When I saw the senate," says he, "deprived of its leaders; myself partly pushed and partly betrayed by the magistrates; the slaves enrolled by name, under the colour of fraternities; the remains of Cæsar's forces brought again into the field, under their old chiefs; the knights terrified with proscriptions; the corporate towns with military execution; and all with death and destruction; I could still have defended myself by arms; and was advised to it by many brave friends, nor did I want that same courage, which you had all seen me exert on other occasions; but when I saw, at the same time, that, if I conquered my present enemy, there were many more behind, whom I had still to conquer; that, if I happened to be conquered, many honest men would fall both with me and after me; that there were people enough ready to avenge the tribune's blood, while the punishment of mine would be left to the forms of a trial and to posterity; I resolved not to employ force in defending my private safety, after I had defended that of the public without it; and was willing, that honest men should rather lament the ruin of my fortunes, than make their own desperate by adhering to me; and if after all I had fallen alone, that would have been dishonourable to myself: if amidst the slaughter of my citizens, fatal to the republic."

In another speech—"If in so good a cause," says he, "supported with such zeal by the senate; by the concurrence of all honest men; by the ready help of all Italy, I had given way to the rage of a despicable tribune, or feared the levity of two contemptible consuls, I must own myself to have been a coward, without heart or head—but there were other things which moved me. That Clodius was perpetually proclaiming in his harangues, that what he did against me was done by the authority of Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar; that these three were his counsellors in the cabinet, his leaders in the field—one of whom had an army already in Italy, and the other two could raise one wherever they pleased. What then? Was it my part to regard the vain brags of an enemy, falsely thrown out against those eminent men? No; it was not his talking, but their silence, which shocked me; and, though they had other reasons for holding their tongues, yet to one in my circumstances their saying nothing was a declaration; their silence a confession: they had cause indeed to be ashamed on their own account, lest their acts of the year before should be annulled by the prætors and the senate; many people also were instilling jealousies of me into Pompey, and perpetually admonishing him to beware of me; and as for Cæsar, whom some imagined to be angry with me, he was at the gates of the city with an army, the command of which he had given to Appian, my enemy's brother. When I saw all this, which was open and manifest to everybody, what could I do? When Clodius declared in a public speech, that I must either conquer twice, or perish; so that neither my victory nor my fall would have restored the peace of the republic."

Clodius, having satiated his revenge upon Cicero, proposed another law, not less violent and unjust, against Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, to deprive him of his kingdom, and reduce it to a Roman province, and confiscate his whole estate. This prince was brother to the king of Egypt, and reigning by the same right of hereditary succession, in full peace and amity with Rome; accused of no practices nor suspected of any designs against the republic, whose only crime was to be rich and covetous; so that the law was an unparalleled act of injustice, and what Cicero, in a public speech, did not scruple to call a mere robbery^b. But Clodius had an old grudge to the king, for refusing to ransom him, when he was taken by the pirates; and sending him only the contemptible sum of two talents^c. And what, says Cicero, must other kings think of their security, to see their crowns and fortunes at the disposal of a tribune, and six hundred mercenaries^d? The law passed however without any opposition; and to sanctify it, as it were, and give it the better face and colour of justice, Cato was charged with the execution of it; which gave Clodius a double pleasure, by imposing so shameful a task upon the gravest man in Rome. It was a part likewise of the same law, as well as of Cato's commission, to restore certain exiles of Byzantium, whom their city had driven out for crimes against the public peace^e. The engaging Cato in such dirty work was a masterpiece, and served many purposes of great use to Clodius: first, to get rid of a troublesome adversary for the remainder of his magistracy; secondly, to fix a blot on Cato himself, and show, that the most rigid pretenders to virtue might be caught by a proper bait; thirdly, to stop his mouth for the future, as he openly bragged, from clamouring against extraordinary commissions: fourthly, to oblige him, above all, to acknowledge the validity of his acts, by his submitting to bear a part in them^f. The tribune had

^a Pro Sext. 16, 18, 19.

^b Qui cum lege nefaria Ptolemæum, regem Cypri, fratrem regis Alexandrini, eodem jure regnantem, causa incognita, publicasse, populumque Romanum scelere obligasse: cum in ejus regnum, bona, fortunæ, latrocinium hujus imperii immisisset, cujus cum patre, avo, majoribus, societas nobis et amicitia fuisset.—Pro Domo, 8. Rex amicus, nulla injuria commemorata, nullis repetitis rebus, cum bonis omnibus publicaretur. [Pro Sext. 26.] De quo nulla unquam suspicio durior.—Ibid. 27.

^c Dio, xxxviii. p. 78; Appian. l. ii. 441.

^d En! cur cæteri reges stabilem esse fortunam suam arbitrentur, cum—videant, per tribunum aliquem et excentas operas se fortunis spoliari, et regno omni posse nudari?—Pro Sext. 37.

^e Hujus pecunie deportandæ, et si quis suum jussu defenderet, bello gerendo Catonem præfectissi.—Pro Domo, 8. At etiam eo negotio M. Catonis splendorem maculare voluerunt.—Pro Sext. 28.

Tu una lege tulisti, ut Cyprius rex—cum bonis omnibus sub præcone subiceretur, et exules Byzantium reducerentur. Ekdem, inquit, utraque de re negotium dedi.—Pro Domo, 80.

^f Sub honorificentissimo ministerii titulo M. Catonem a the satisfaction to see Cato taken in his trap; and received a congratulatory letter upon it from Cæsar, addressed to him in the familiar style of Cæsar to Clodius, which he read publicly to the people, as a proof of the singular intimacy between them.¹ King Ptolemy, in the mean while, as soon as he heard of the law, and of Cato's approach towards Cyprus, put an end to his life by poison, unable to bear the disgrace of losing at once both his crown and his wealth. Cato executed his commission with great fidelity; and returned the year following in a kind of triumph to Rome, with all the king's effects reduced into money, amounting to about a million and a half sterling, which he delivered with great pomp into the public treasury.²

This proceeding was severely condemned by Cicero, though he touches it in his public speeches with some tenderness for the sake of Cato, whom he labours to clear from any share of the iniquity. "The commission," says he, "was contrived, not to adorn, but to banish Cato; not offered, but imposed upon him. Why did he then obey it? Just as he has sworn to obey other laws, which he knew to be unjust, that he might not expose himself to the fury of his enemies, and without doing any good, deprive the republic of such a citizen. If he had not submitted to the law, he could not have hindered it; the stain of it would still have stuck upon the republic, and he himself suffered violence for rejecting it, since it would have been a precedent for invalidating all the other acts of that year: he considered, therefore, that since the scandal of it could not be avoided, he was the person the best qualified to draw good out of evil, and to serve his country well, though in a bad cause!" But howsoever this may colour, it cannot justify Cato's conduct, who valued himself highly upon his Cyprian transactions, and for the sake of that commission was drawn in, as Clodius expected, to support the authority from which it flowed, and to maintain the legality of Clodius's tribunate, in some warm debates even with Cicero himself.³

Among the other laws made by Clodius, there was one likewise to give relief to the private members of corporate towns, against the public injuries of their communities. The purpose of it was specious, but the real design, to screen a creature of his own, one Merula, of Anagnis, who had been punished or driven from his city for some notorious villanies, and who, in return for this service, erected a statue to his patron, on part of the area of Cicero's house, and inscribed it to Clodius, the author of so excellent a law. But as republica relegavit. [Vell. Pat. li. 45.] Non illi ornandum M. Catonem, sed relegandum putaverunt: qui in concione palam dixit, linguam se evellisse Catoni, quæ semper contra extraordinarias potestates libera fuisset.—Quod si ille repudiasset, dubitatis quin ei vis esset allata, cum omnia acta illius anni per illum unum labefactari videretur?—Pro Sext. 28, 29.

Gratulari tibi, quod idem in posterum M. Catonem, tribunatu tuo removerses.—Pro Domo, 9.

¹ Literas in concione recitasti, quas tibi a C. Cæsare missas esse dicebas, CÆSAR PULCHRO. Cum etiam es argumentatus, amoris esse hoc signum, cum nominibus tantum uteretur.—Ibid.

² Plutarch. in Catone; Flor. iii. 9.

³ Pro Sext. 28, 29.

⁴ Plutarch. in Catone; Dio, l. xxxix. 100.

Cicero told him afterwards in one of his the place itself where the statue stood, th so memorable an injury, confuted both lency of the law and the inscription.¹

But it is time for us to look after Cic flight, who left Rome about the end of 1 on the eighth of April we find him at Vi in the most southern part of Italy, whe several days with a friend named Sica received the copy of the law made ag which after some alteration and corr the limits of his exile to the distan hundred miles from Italy". His the hitherto been wholly bent on Sicily; b was arrived in sight of it, the prætor, C sent him word that he must not set his This was a cruel shock to him, and th of the misery of disgrace—that an old had been highly obliged to him", of party and principles, should refuse him a calamity which he had drawn upon his services to the republic. Speaking wards, when it was not his business severely, "See," says he, "the horro times; when all Sicily was coming o me, the prætor, who had often felt the same tribune, and in the same cause, suffer me to come into the island. W say? That Virgilius, such a citizen, man, had lost all benevolence, all reme our common sufferings, all his piety, and faith towards me? No such thi afraid how he should singly sustain th that storm which had overpowered forces".

This unexpected repulse from Sicily to change his route, and turn back ag Brundisium, in order to pass into Gre Vibo, therefore, that he might not exp Sica to any danger for entertaining hi ing to find no quiet till he could reme beyond the bounds prescribed by the l this he found himself mistaken, for all on his road received him with the marks of respect: inviting him to t quarters with them, and guarding him through their territories with all imagi our and safety to his person. He avoi as much as possible all public places he came to Brundisium, would not en city, though it expressed the warmest

¹ Legem de injuriis publicis tulisti, Anagn Merula per gratiam, qui tibi ob eam legem in meis aedibus posuit; ut locus ipse in tua legem et inscriptionem statum reffelleret. Q nialis multo majori dolori fuit, quam quæ id tor scelera Anagnis fecerat.—Pro Domo, 30.

² Allata est nobis rogatio de pernicio me correctum est, audieramus esse ejusmodi, quadringenta millia liceret esse—statim ite versus contuli—ne et Sica, apud quem eram Att. iii. 4.

³ Plutarch. in Cic.

⁴ Siciliam petivi animo, quæ et ipsa er domus una, conjuncta; et obtinebatur a Viri me uno vel maxime tum vetusta amicitia, tu collegia, tum republica societas. Vido n temporum illorum. Cum ipsa pene insu obviam ferre vellet, prætor ille ejusdem t concionibus propter eandem republuc vexatus, nihil amplius dico, nisi me in Si noluit, &c.—Pro Cn. Plancio. 40.

service, and offered to run all hazards in his defence.

In this interval, he was pressing Atticus in every letter, and in the most moving terms, to come to him; and when he removed from Vibò, gave him daily intelligence of all his stages, that he might still know where to find him, taking it for granted that he would not fail to follow him. But Atticus seems to have given him no answer on this head, nor to have had any thoughts of stirring from Rome. He was persuaded, perhaps, that his company abroad could be of no other use to him than to give some little relief to his present chagrin; whereas his continuance in the city might be of the greatest, not only in relieving, but removing his calamity, and procuring his restoration: or we may imagine, what his character seems to suggest, that though he had a greater love for Cicero than for any man, yet it was always with the exception of not involving himself in the dissensions of his friend, or disturbing the tranquillity of his life by taking any share of another's misery; and that he was following only the dictates of his temper and principles in sparing himself a trouble which would have made him suffer more than his philosophy could easily bear. But whatever was the cause, it gave a fresh mortification to Cicero, who, in a letter upon it, says, "I made no doubt but that I should see you at Tarentum or Brundisium: it would have been convenient for many reasons; and above all, for my design of spending some time with you in Epirus, and regulating all my measures by your advice: but since it has not happened as I wished, I shall add this also to the great number of my other afflictions." He was now lodged in the villa of M. Lenius Flaccus, but far from the walls of Brundisium, where he arrived on the seventeenth of April, and on the last of the same month embarked for Dyrrhachium. In his account of himself to his wife—"I spent thirteen days," says he, "with Flaccus, who for my sake slighted the risk of his fortunes and life; he was deterred by the penalty of the law from performing towards me all the rights of friendship and hospitality: I wish that it may ever be in my power to make him a proper return; I am sure that I shall always think myself obliged to do it." During his stay with Flaccus, he was in no small perplexity about the choice of a convenient place for his residence abroad: Atticus offered him his house in Epirus; which was a castle of some strength, and likely to afford him a secure retreat. But since Atticus could not attend him thither in person, he dropped all thoughts of that, and was inclined to go to Athens; till he was informed, that it would be dangerous for him to travel into that part of Greece; where all those who had been banished for Catiline's conspiracy, and especially Autronius, then resided; who would have had some comfort in their exile to revenge themselves on the author of their misery, if they could have caught him.

Plutarch tells us, that in sailing out of Brundisium, the wind, which was fair, changed of a sudden, and drove him back again; and when he passed over to Dyrrhachium in the second attempt, that there happened an earthquake and a great storm, immediately after his landing; from which the soothsayers foretold, that his stay abroad would not be long. But it is strange, that a writer so fond of prodigies, which nobody else takes notice of, should omit the story of Cicero's dream, which was more to his purpose, and is related by Cicero himself: "That in one of the stages of his flight, being lodged in the villa of a friend, after he had lain restless and wakeful a great part of the night, he fell into a sound sleep near break of day, and when he awaked about eight in the morning, told his dream to those round him: That as he seemed to be wandering disconsolate in a lonely place, C. Marius, with his fasces wreathed with laurel, accosted him, and demanded, why he was so melancholy: and when he answered, that he was driven out of his country by violence; Marius took him by the hand, and bidding him be of courage, ordered the next licitor to conduct him into his monument; telling him, that there he should find safety: upon this, the company presently cried out, that he would have a quick and glorious return." All which was exactly fulfilled; for his restoration was decreed in a certain temple built by Marius, and for that reason called Marius's Monument; where the senate happened to be assembled on that occasion.

This dream was much talked of in the family, and Cicero himself, in that season of his dejection, seemed to be pleased with it; and on the first news of the decree's passing in Marius's monument, declared, that nothing could be more divine; yet in disputing afterwards on the nature of dreams, he perpetually, as accident, maluit, quam custodiam meo capitis dimittere.—Pro Plancio, 41.

Noë Brundilii apud M. Lenium Flaccum dies xiii, fuimus, virum optimum: qui periculum fortunarum et capitis sui præ mea salute neglexit: neque legis improbisime pena deductus est, quo minus hospitii et amicitie jus, officiumque præstaret. Huic utinam gratiam aliquando referre possimus; habebimus quidem semper.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 4.

Quod me rogas et hortaris, ut apud te in Epiro sim; voluntas tua mihi valde grata est.—Sed itineris causa ut diverterem, primum est devium; deinde ab Autronio et cæteris quatuor; deinde sine te. Nam castellum munitum habitanti mihi prodesset, transeunti non est necessarium. Quod si auderem, Athenas peterem: sane ita cadebat ut vellem. Nunc et nostri hostes ibi sunt, et te non habemus.—Ad Att. iii. 7.

De Divin. i. 28; Val. Max. i. 7.

Valerius Maximus calls this monument of Marius the temple of Jupiter; but it appears from Cicero's account to have been the temple of Honour and Virtue.

Quæ causa illa municipia, quæ sunt a Vibone Brundisium, in fide mea essent, iter mihi tutum, multis ministris, magno cum suo metu præstiterunt. Brundisium autem, vel potius ad membra accessit. Urbem unam mihi custodiam declinavi, quæ se vel potius excidit, quam e se compleretur ut eriperet facile pateretur.—Pro Plancio, 41.

Ad te ero, ut ad me Vibonem statim venias.—Si id me laetis mirabor, sed confido te esse facturum.—Ad Ep. ii. 1.

Quæ, ut ad te antea scripsi, si ad nos veneris, consilium meum rei capessimus.—Ibid. 2.

Per Brundisium versus contuli—nunc tu propterea, ut me consequere, ad modo recipiemur. Adhuc invitatur Pompeus.—Ibid. 3.

Nulli mihi optatius cadere posse, quam ut tu me quam potestam consequere.—Ibid. 4.

Non fuerat mihi dubium, quin te Tarenti aut Brundisii visurus essem: idque ad multa pertinuit; in eis, et ipse Epiro consideremus, et de reliquis rebus tuo consilio utamur. Quoniam id non colligit, erit hoc quoque in singulis numeris nostrorum malorum.—Ibid. 6.

In hac M. Lenii Flacci me contuli: cui cum omnis mea, publicatio bonorum, exilium, mors proponeretur,

he asserts them all to be vain and fantastical, and nothing else but the imperfect traces and confused impressions which our waking thoughts leave upon the mind; that, in his flight therefore, as it was natural for him to think much upon his countryman Marius, who had suffered the same calamity; so that was the cause of his dreaming of him; and that no old woman could be so silly, as to give any credit to dreams, if in the infinite number and variety of them they did not sometimes happen to hit right⁷.

When he came to Dyrrhachium, he found confirmed, what he had heard before in Italy, that Achaia and the neighbouring parts of Greece were possessed by those rebels who had been driven from Rome on Catiline's account. This determined him to go into Macedonia, before they could be informed of his arrival, where his friend, Cn. Plancius, was then questor; who no sooner heard of his landing, than he came to find him at Dyrrhachium; where, out of regard to his present circumstances, and the privacy which he affected, dismissing his officers, and laying aside all the pomp of magistracy, he conducted him with the observance of a private companion to his headquarters at Thessalonica, about the twenty-first of May. L. Appuleius was the prætor or chief governor of the province: but though he was an honest man and Cicero's friend, yet he durst not venture to grant him his protection, or show him any public civility, but contented himself with conniving only at what his questor Plancius did⁸.

While Cicero staid at Dyrrhachium, he received two expresses from his brother Quintus, who was now coming home from Asia, to inform him of his intended route, and to settle the place of their meeting: Quintus's design was, to pass from Ephesus to Athens, and thence by land through Macedonia; and to have an interview with his brother at Thessalonica: but the news which he met with at Athens obliged him to hasten his journey towards Rome, where the faction were preparing to receive him with an impeachment, for the maladministration of his province: nor had Cicero at last resolution enough to see him; being unable to bear the tenderness of such a meeting, and much more the misery of parting; and he was apprehensive, besides, that if they once met, they should not be able to part at all, whilst Quintus's presence at home was necessary to their common interests: so that to avoid one affliction, he was forced (he

⁷ Maximeque reliquis eorum rerum moventur in animis, et agitantur, de quibus vigilantes aut cogitavimus aut egimus. Ut mihi temporibus illis multum in animo Marius verfabatur, recordanti, quam ille gravem suum casum magno animo, quam constanti tulisset. Hanc credo causam de illo somnandi fuisse.—De Divin. ii. 67.

An tu censes ullam anum tam deliram futuram fuisse, ut somnis crederet, nisi ista casu nonnunquam forte temere concurrerent?—Ibid. 68.

⁸ Quo cum venissem cognovi, id quod audieram, refertam esse Græciam sceleratissimorum hominum ac nefariorum.—Qui antequam de meo adventu audire potuissem, in Macedoniam ad Planciūque perrexi.—nam simul ac me Dyrrhachium attingisse audivit, statim ad me lictoribus dimissis, insignibus abjectis, veste mutata profectus est.—Thessaloniam me in questorūque perduxit.—Pro Plancio, 41; Post Rem. in Sen. 14.

Hic ego nunc de prætoris Macedonia: nihil dicam amplius, nisi eum et civem optimū semper et mihi amicū fuisse, sed eadem timuisse quæ ceteros.—Pro Plancio, ibid.

says) to endure another most cruel (shunning the embraces of a brother⁹.

L. Tubero, however, his kinsman, his brother's lieutenants, paid him a return towards Italy, and acquainted what he had learned in passing through that the banished conspirators who were actually forming a plot to seize him; for which reason he advised him Asia; where the zeal and affection of would afford him the safest retreat, own and his brother's account¹⁰. Cicero posed to follow this advice and leave for the prætor Appuleius, though a him no encouragement to stay; and Piso, his enemy, was coming to the it the next winter: but all his friend dissuaded his removal to any place from them; and Plancius treated him ately, and contrived to make all thing him, that he dropped the thoughts of quarters. Plancius was in hopes would be recalled with the expiration storship, and that he should have th returning with him to Rome, to reap his fidelity, not only from Cicero's g the favour of the senate and people inconvenience that Cicero found in situation, was the number of soldiers a of people, who frequented the place o business with the questor. For he w and dejected by his misfortune, that cities of Greece were offering their compliments, and striving to do him a honour¹¹, yet he refused to see all c was so shy of the public, that he endure the light¹².

For it cannot be denied, that, in this his exile, he did not behave himself wness which might reasonably be ex one who had borne so glorious a p public; conscious of his integrity, and the cause of his country: for his lett rally filled with such lamentable ex grief and despair, that his best friend

⁹ Quintus frater cum ex Asia venisset Mai. et Athenas venisset idib. valde fuit ei ne quid ab eis acciperet calamitatis, si qui contentus nostris malis non esset. malui præparare Romam, quam ad me ven dicam enim quod verum est,—animum inde ut aut illum amantissimum mei, mollissim in morore aspicere.—atque etiam illud t profecto accidisset, ne a me digredi non acerbissima eventum altera acerbitate non vitavi.—Ad Att. iii. 9; Ad Quint. Frat. i. 3.

¹⁰ Cum ad me L. Tubero, meus necesse meo legatus fuisset, decedens ex Asia v inesset, quas mihi paratas ab exulit audierat, animo amicissimo detulisset. In propter ejus provincie mecum et cum frat tudinem.—Pro Plancio, 41.

¹¹ Plancius, homo officiosissimus, me cu et adhuc retinet.—operat posse fieri, ut meo decedat.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 1.

Longius, quam ita vobis placet, non disco Me adhuc Plancius liberalitate sua retine est injecta, non eadem, quæ mihi, posse no quam rem sibi magno honori ascribere fore.—¹² Plutarch. in Cic.

¹³ Odi enim celebritatem, fugio homines, viz possum.—Ad Att. iii. 7.

his wife, was forced to admonish him sometimes, to rouse his courage¹, and remember his former character. Atticus was constantly putting him in mind of it; and sent him word of a report, that was brought to Rome by one of Crassus's freedmen, that his affliction had disordered his senses: to which he answered, that his mind was still sound, and wished only that it had been always so, when he placed his confidence on those who persistently abused it to his ruin².

But these remonstrances did not please him; he thought them unkind and unseasonable, as he intimates in several of his letters, where he expresses himself very movingly on this subject. "As to your chiding me (says he) so often and so severely, for being too much dejected; what misery is there, I pray you, so grievous, which I do not feel in my present calamity? Did any man ever fall from such a height of dignity, in so good a cause, with the advantage of such talents, experience, interest; such support of all honest men? Is it possible for me to forget what I was? Or not to feel what I am? From what honour, what glory I am driven? From what children? What fortunes? What a brother? Whom, though I love and have ever loved better than myself, yet (that you may perceive what a new sort of affliction I suffer) I refused to see; that I might neither augment my own grief by the sight of his, nor offer myself to him thus ruined, whom he had left so shocking: I omit many other things intolerable to me: for I am hindered by my tears: tell me then, whether I am still to be reproached for giving; or for suffering myself rather to be dejected of what I ought never to have parted with and with my life; which I might easily have preserved, if some perfidious friends had not urged me to my ruin within my own walls," &c.³ In another letter; "Continue (says he) to assist me, as you do, with your endeavours, your advice, and your interest; but spare yourself the pains of comforting, and much more of chiding me: for when you do this, I cannot help charging it to your want of love and concern for me; whom I imagine to be so afflicted with my misfortune, as to be inconceivable even yourself!"⁴

He was now indeed attacked in his weakest part; the only place in which he was vulnerable: to have him so great in affliction as he was in prosperity, should have been a perfection not given to man: but this very weakness flowed from a source which rendered him the more amiable in all the other parts of life; and the same tenderness of disposition which made him love his friends, his children, his country, more passionately than other men, ¹ Tu quod me hortaris, ut animo sim magno, &c.—Ep. lib. xiv. 14.

² Nam quod scribis te audire, me etiam mentis errore dolere affici: mihi vero mens integra est, atque utinam non in periculo fuisset, cum ego ita, quibus salutem meam periculum esse arbitrabar, inimicissimis, crudelissimisque viderer.—Ad Att. iii. 13.

³ Quasi quantor epistolas a te misissas; unam, qua me rogas, ut sim firmiter; alteram, qua Crassus libertum als uti de mea sollicitudine mactaque narrares.—Ibid. 15.

⁴ Ad Att. iii. 16.

⁵ Tu me, ut facis, opera, consilio, gratia juva: consolari debetis: obfurgare vero noli: quod cum facis, ego tuum curam et dolorem desidero: quem ita affectum mea summo esse arbitror, ut te ipsum nemo consolari potest.—Ibid. 11.

made him feel the loss of them more sensibly: "I have twice (says he) saved the republic; once with glory; a second time with misery: for I will never deny myself to be a man; or brag of bearing the loss of a brother, children, wife, country, without sorrow.—For what thanks had been due to me for quitting what I did not value?" In another speech: "I own my grief to have been extremely great; nor do I pretend to that wisdom, which those expected from me, who gave out, that I was too much broken by my affliction: for such a hardness of mind, as of body, which does not feel pain, is a stupidity, rather than a virtue.—I am not one of those to whom all things are indifferent; but love myself and my friends as our common humanity requires; and he who, for the public good, parts with what he holds the dearest, gives the highest proof of love to his country!"

There was another consideration which added no small sting to his affliction; to reflect, as he often does, not only on what he had lost, but how he had lost it, by his own fault; in suffering himself to be imposed upon and deluded by false and envious friends. This he frequently touches upon in a strain which shows that it galled him very severely: "Though my grief (says he) is incredible, yet I am not disturbed so much by the misery of what I feel, as the recollection of my fault,—Wherefore, when you hear how much I am afflicted, imagine that I am suffering the punishment of my folly, not of the event; for having trusted too much to one whom I did not take to be a rascal¹." It must needs be cruelly mortifying to one of his temper; nicely tender of his reputation, and passionately fond of glory; to impute his calamity to his own blunders, and fancy himself the dupe of men not so wise as himself: yet after all, it may reasonably be questioned, whether his inquietude of this sort, was not owing rather to the jealous and querulous nature of affliction itself, than to any real foundation of truth: for Atticus would never allow his suspicions to be just, not even against Hortensius, where they seem to lie the heaviest². This is the substance of what Cicero himself says,

¹ Unus bis reipublicam servavi, semel gloria, iterum erumna mea. Neque enim in hoc me hominem esse inficiabor unquam; ut me optimo fratre, carissimis liberis, fidelissima conjuge, vestro conspectu, patria, hoc honore gradu sine dolore caruisse glorier. Quod si fecissem, quod a me beneficium haberetis, cum pro vobis ea, quæ mihi essent vilia, reliquissem.—Pro Sext. 22.

² Accepi magnam atque incredibilem dolorem: non nego: neque istam mihi sciscio æqualem, quam nonnulli in me requirebant, qui me animo nimis fracto et afflicto esse loquebantur—eamque animi dardem, sicut corpora, quod cum uritur non sentit, stuporem potius, quam virtutem putarem—non tam sapiens quam il, qui nihil curant, sed tam amans tuorum ac tui, quam communis humanitas postulat—qui autem ea reliquit reipublice causa, a quibus summo cum dolore divellitur ei patria cara est.—Pro Domo, 36, 37.

³ Et id incredibilem calamitate afflictus sum, tamen non tam est ex miseria, quam ex culpe nostre recordatione—quare cum me afflictum et confectum luctu audies, extimato me stultitie mee ponam ferro gravius, quam eventi; quod ei crediderim, quem nefarium esse non putarim.—Ad Att. iii. 8; vide 9, 14, 15, 19, &c.

⁴ Nam quod purgas eos, quos ego mihi scripsi invidiasse, et in eis Catonem: ego vero tantum illum puto a scelere isto afuisse, ut maxime doleam plus apud me simulationem aliorum, quam istius fidem valuisse. Ceteri, quos purgas, debent mihi purgati esse, tibi si sunt.—Ibid. 15.

to excuse the excess of his grief; and the only excuse indeed which can be made for him; that he did not pretend to be a stoic, nor aspire to the character of a hero: yet we see some writers labouring to defend him even against himself; and endeavouring to persuade us, that all this air of dejection and despair was wholly feigned and assumed, for the sake of moving compassion, and engaging his friends to exert themselves the more warmly in soliciting his restoration; lest his affliction should destroy him before they could effect it*.

When he had been gone a little more than two months, his friend Ninnius, the tribune, made a motion in the senate to recal him, and repeal the law of Clodius; to which the whole house readily agreed, with eight of the tribunes, till one of the other two, Elius Ligus, interposed his negative: they proceeded however to a resolution, that no other business should be transacted, till the consuls had actually prepared a new law for that purpose². About the same time, Quintus Cicero, who left Asia on the first of May, arrived at Rome; and was received with great demonstrations of respect, by persons of all ranks, who flocked out to meet him³. Cicero suffered an additional anxiety on his account, lest the Clodian cabal, by means of the impeachment, which they threatened, should be able to expel him too: especially since Clodius's brother Appius was the prætor whose lot it was to sit on those trials⁴. But Clodius was now losing ground apace; being grown so insolent on his late success, that even his friends could not bear him any longer: for having banished Cicero, and sent Cato out of his way, he began to fancy himself a match for Pompey; by whose help, or connivance at least, he had acquired all his power; and, in open defiance of him, seized by stratagem into his hands the son of king Tigranes, whom Pompey had brought with him from the East, and kept a prisoner at Rome, in the custody of Flavius the prætor; and instead of delivering him up, when Pompey demanded him, undertook, for a large sum of money, to give him his liberty and send him home. This however did not pass without a sharp engagement between him and Flavius, "who marched out of Rome, with a body of men well armed, to recover, Tigranes by force: but Clodius proved too strong for him; and killed a great part of his company, and among them Papirius, a Roman knight of Pompey's intimate acquaintance, while Flavius also himself had some difficulty to escape with life⁵."

* Absens potius se dolere simulavit, ut suos, quod diximus, magis commoveret: et presens item se doluisse simulavit, ut vir prudentissimus, scems, quod aiunt, serviret.—Corradi Questura, p. 291.

² Decrevit senatus frequens de meo reditu Kal. Jun. dissentiente nullo, referente L. Ninnio—intercessit Ligus iste necio qui, additamentum inimicorum meorum.—Quintus Cicero senatus rejiciebat, nisi de me primum consules retulissent.—Pro Sext. 31.

Non multo post discessum meum me universi revocavisti referente L. Ninnio.—Post Red. in Sen. 2.

³ Huc ad urbem venienti tota obviam civitas cum lacrymis, gemituque processerat.—Pro Sext. 31.

⁴ Mihi etiam unum de malis in metu est, fratris miseri negotium.—Ad Att. iii. 8.

De Quinto fratre nuntii nobis tristat—ane sum in meo infinito morore sollicitus, et eo magis, quod Appii questio est.—Ibid. 17.

⁵ Me expulso, Catone amandato, in eum ipsum se convertit, quo auctore, quo adjutore, in concionibus ea, que

This affront roused Pompey to think of Cicero; as well to correct the arrogance of Clodius as to retrieve his credit, and ingratiate him with the senate and people: he dropped some of his inclination to Cicero's friends, and passed to Atticus, who presently gave him pleasant news: upon which, Cicero, who had no opinion of Pompey's sincerity, was roused to write to him; and sent a long letter to Atticus, telling him at the same time that if Pompey could digest the affront, he had received in the case of Tigranes, despair of his being moved by anything likewise, who had a particular interest in Pompey, desired Atticus to let Cicero know that Pompey would certainly enter into him as soon as he heard from Cæsar, which he did to every day. This intelligence, from an author, raised Cicero's hopes, till the effects of it for a considerable time, he apprehend, that there was either nothing in it, or that Cæsar's answer was adverse, as an end to it⁶. The fact however shows extraordinary deference Pompey paid that he would not take a step in this Rome, without sending first to Gaul, to him about it.

The city was alarmed at the same time by a rumour of a second plot against Pompey: to be contrived by Clodius; one of whom was seized at the door of the senate with which his master had given him, as he was to stab Pompey: which, being accompanied by many daring attacks on Pompey's person, made him resolve to retire to the senate and the forum, till Clodius was expelled from his tribunate, and shut himself up in his house, whither he was still pursued, and actually by one of Clodius's freedmen, Damio. Pompey so audacious could not be overlooked by the tribunes, who came out with all their force to drive away Damio; upon which a great engagement ensued, where Gabinus (as Cicero says) "was forced to break his league with Clodius."

gerebat, omnia, queque gesserat, se facere et facere. Cn. Pompeium—diutius furori suo veniam dari arbitrabatur. Qui ex ejus custodia per Flavium amicum filium, hostem captivum surripulisset; eum virum fortissimum laceisset. Speravit illud cum illo posse conficere, quibuscum ego nolit in periculo dimicare.—Pro Domo, 25.

Ad quartum ab urbe lapidem pugna facta: multi ex utraque parte occiderunt; plures Flavii, inter quos M. Papirius, eques Romanus, familiaris Pompeii. Flavius sine comitibus per fugit.—Ascon. in Millon. 14.

¹ Sermonem tuum et Pompeii cognovi ex Attico. Motum in republica non tantum impendere vitium tu aut vides, aut ad me consolandum afferentem neglecto sublati sunt omnia.—Literarum quas ad Pompeium scripsi, misi tibi.—Ad Att. iii. 13.

Pompeium etiam simulatorem puto.—Ad Q. i. 3.

Ex literis tuis plenus sum expectatione de quidnam de nobis velit, aut ostendat.—Si tibi videretur, qui sperem, facio tuo jussu.—Ad Att. iii. 13.

² Expectationem nobis non parvam attulit scripseras Varronem tibi pro amicitia confirmas nostram Pompeium certe suscepturum; et simul literas, quas expectaret, remissas essent, auctores daturum. Utrum id nihil fuit, an adversum suum literas?—Ibid. 18.

fight for Pompey; at first faintly and unwillingly, but at last heartily; while Piso, more religious, stood firm to his contract, and fought on Clodius' side, till his forces were broken, and he himself wounded, and forced to run away*.

Whether any design was really formed against Pompey's life, or the story was contrived to serve his present views, it seems probable at least that his ears were feigned, and the danger too contemptible to give him any just apprehension; but by shutting himself up at home made an impression upon the vulgar, and furnished a better pretext for turning so quick upon Clodius, and galling that insolence which he himself had used: for this was the constant tenor of his politics, to give a free course to the public disorders, for the sake of displaying his own importance to more advantage; that when the storm was at its height, he might appear at last in the scene, like a deity of the theatre, and reduce all again to order; expecting still, that the people, tired and harassed by these perpetual tumults, would be forced to make him dictator, for settling the quiet of the city. The consuls elect were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Metellus Nepos: the first was Cicero's own friend, the second his old enemy; the same who put that affront upon him on laying down his consulship: his promotion therefore was a great encouragement to Cicero, who took it for granted that he would employ all his power to obstruct his plans; and reflected, as he tells us, "that, though it was a great thing to drive him out, yet, as there were many who hated, and more who envied him, it would not be difficult to keep him out." But Sextus, perceiving which way Pompey's inclination and Caesar's also was turning, found reason to change his mind, or at least to dissemble it; and promised, not only to give his consent, but his assistance, to Cicero's restoration. His colleague, Lentulus, in the mean while, was no sooner elected, than he revived the late motion of Ninnius, who had proposed a vote to recall Cicero; and when Clodius interrupted him and recited that part of the law which made it criminal to move anything about it, Lentulus declared it to be no law, but a mere proscription, and act of violence. This enraged Clodius, and obliged him to exert all his power to support the validity of the law; he threatened ruin and destruction to all who should dare oppose it; and to imprint the greater terror, he stood up on the doors of the senate-house, that none which prohibited all men to speak or act in any manner for Cicero's return, on pain of being treated as enemies. This gave a farther disquiet to Cicero, lest it should dishearten his active friends, and furnish an excuse to the indolent for doing nothing: he insinuates therefore to Atticus what might be said to obviate it; "that all such clauses were only bugbears, without any real force; or otherwise no law could ever be abrogated; and whatever effect this was intended to have, that it must needs fall of course with the law itself."

In this anxious state of his mind, jealous of everything that could hurt, and catching at everything that could help him, another little incident happened, which gave him a fresh cause of uneasiness: for some of his enemies had published an invective oration, drawn up by him for the entertainment only of his intimate friends, against some eminent senator, not named, but generally supposed to be Curio, the father, who was now disposed and engaged to serve him: he was surprised and concerned, that the oration was made public; and his instructions upon it to Atticus are somewhat curious; and show how much he was struck with the apprehension of losing so powerful a friend. "You have stunned me," says he, "with the news of the oration's being published: heal the wound, as you promise, if you possibly can: I wrote it long ago in anger, after he had first written against me; but had suppressed it so carefully that I never dreamed of its getting abroad, nor can imagine how it slipped out: but since, as fortune would have it, I never had a word with him in person, and it is written more negligently than my other orations usually are; I cannot but think that you may disown it, and prove it not to be mine: pray take care of this, if you see any hopes for me; if not, there is the less reason to trouble myself about it."

His principal agents and solicitors at Rome were, his brother Quintus, his wife Terentia, his son-in-law Piso, Atticus, and Sextius. But the brother and the wife, being both of them naturally peevish, seem to have given him some additional disquiet, by their mutual complaints against each other; which obliged him to admonish them gently in his letters, that since their friends were so few, they ought to live more amicably among themselves.

Terentia however bore a very considerable part of the whole affair; and instead of being daunted by the depression of the family, and the ruin of their fortunes, seems to have been animated rather the more to withstand the violences of their enemies, and procure her husband's restoration. But one

* Cum hac non possent diutius jam sustinere, inivit consilium de interitu Cn. Pompeii: quo patefacto, ferroque percussis, ille inclusus domi tandem fuit, quamdum legibus moras in tribunatu.—Pro Sext. 32.

Deprehensus denique cum ferro ad senatum is, quem ad C. Pompeium intermedium collocatum fuisse constabat. In Pisca. 12.

Cum tamen—Gabinus collegit ipse se vix: et contra hunc Clodium, primum simulate; deinde non libenter; ultimum tamen pro Cn. Pompeio vere, vehementerque agnovit.—Tu tamen homo religiosus et sanctus, factus legibus noluisse—itaque in illo tumultu fracti fasces, lectus quoque, quæstio tela, lapides, fugæ.—Ibid.

¶ Minimi sunt multi, invidi pæne omnes. Ejicere nos legibus fuit, excludere facile est.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 3.

* Cum a tribuno plebis vetaretur, cum præclarum caput interiret, ne quis ad vos referret—totam illam, ut ante illud, proscriptionem, non legem putavit.—Post Red. in l. 4.

† Tute scripsesti, quoddam caput legis Clodium in curiæ poste fixisse, ne referri, neve dici liceret.—Ad Att. iii. 15.

Sed vides nunquam esse observatas sanctiones earum legum, quæ abrogantur. Nam si id esset, nulla fere abrogari posset:—sed cum lex abrogatur, illud ipsum abrogatur, quo non eam abrogari oporteat.—Ibid. 23.

‡ Percussisti autem me de oratione prolata: cui vulneri, ut scribis, medere, si quid potes. Scripsit equidem olim iratus, quod ille prior scripserat: sed ita compresseram, ut nunquam manaturam putarem. Quo modo exciderit nescio. Sed quia nunquam accidit, ut cum eo verbo uno concertarem; et quia scripta mihi videtur negligentius, quam ceteræ, puto posse probari non esse meam. Id, si putas me posse sanari, cures velim: sin plane perli, minus laboro.—Ad Att. iii. 12.

§ De Quinto fratre nihil ego te accusavi, sed vos, cum præsertim tam pauci estis, volui esse quam conjunctissimos.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 1.

of Cicero's letters to her in these unhappy circumstances will give the clearest view of her character, and the spirit with which she acted.

"Cicero to Terentia."

"Do not imagine that I write longer letters to any one than to you, unless it be when I receive a long one from somebody else, which I find myself obliged to answer. For I have nothing either to write, nor in my present situation employ myself on anything that is more troublesome to me; and when it is to you and our dear Tulliola, I cannot write without a flood of tears. For I see you the most wretched of women, whom I wished always to see the happiest, and ought to have made so; as I should have done, if I had not been so great a coward. I am extremely sensible of Piso's services to us; have exhorted him, as well as I could, and thanked him as I ought. Your hopes, I perceive, are in the new tribunes: that will be effectual, if Pompey concur with them: but I am afraid still of Crassus. You do everything for me, I see, with the utmost courage and affection: nor do I wonder at it; but lament our unhappy fate, that my miseries can only be relieved by your suffering still greater: for our good friend P. Valerius wrote me word, what I could not read without bursting into tears, how you were dragged from the temple of Vesta to the Valerian Bank. Alas, my light, my darling, to whom all the world used to sue for help! that you, my dear Terentia, should be thus insulted; thus oppressed with grief and distress! and that I should be the cause of it; I, who have preserved so many others, that we ourselves should be undone! As to what you write about the house, that is, about the area; I shall then take myself to be restored, when that shall be restored to us. But those things are not in our power. What affects me more nearly is, that when so great an expense is necessary, it should all lie upon you, who are so miserably stripped and plundered already. If we live to see an end of these troubles, we shall repair all the rest. But if the same fortune must ever depress us, will you throw away the poor remains that are left for your subsistence? For God's sake, my dear life, let others supply the money, who are able, if they are willing: and if you love me, do nothing that can hurt your health, which is already so impaired. For you are perpetually in my thoughts both day and night. I see that you decline no sort of trouble; but am afraid, how you will sustain it. Yet the whole affair depends on you. Pay the first regard therefore to your health, that we may attain the end of all your wishes, and your labours. I know not whom to write to, except to those who write to me, or of whom you send me some good account. I will not remove to a greater distance; since you are against it; but would have you write to me as often as possible, especially if you have any hopes that are well grounded. Adieu, my dear love, adieu. The 5th of October from Thessalonica."

Terentia had a particular estate of her own, not obnoxious to Clodius's law, which she was now offering to sale, for a supply of their present necessities: this is what Cicero refers to, where he entreats her, not to throw away the small remains of her fortunes; which he presses still more warmly in another letter, putting her in mind, "that if their friends did not fall in their duty, not want money; and if they did, it would do but little towards making he implores her therefore not to run who, if there was anything left to be wanted, would, with a moderate share of good fortune, easily recover the rest." in-law, Piso, was extremely affectionate in performing all good offices both to father and the family; and resigned his share of Pontus and Bithynia, on purpose that the more effectually by his Rome: Cicero makes frequent acknowledgments of his kindness and generosity; "Piso's virtue and love for us all is so great that nothing can exceed it; the good that may one day be a pleasure, I am always be an honour, to him."

Atticus likewise supplied them with money: he had already furnished Cicero's exigencies of his flight, with above 2 and upon succeeding to the great uncle Cæcilius, whose name he now as him a fresh offer of his purse: yet his not wholly satisfy Cicero; who though cold and remiss in his service; and it flowed from some secret resentment never received from him, in his situation, any beneficial proofs of his friendship therefore to rouse his zeal, he tried to promise him, in one of his letters, that reason he had to complain on that account all be made up to him, if he lived to fortune," says he, "ever restore me to it shall be my special care, that you, friends, have cause to rejoice at it: hitherto, I confess, you have reaped

^d Tantum scribo, si erunt in officio amici deerit, si non erunt, tu efficere tua pecunia. Per fortunas miseras nostras, vide ne puer perdamus: cui si aliquid erit, ne egeat, in opus est, et mediocri fortuna, ut cetera. Ibid.

^e Qui Pontum et Bithyniam quaestor in neglectis.—Post Red. in Sen. 15.

Pisonis humanitas, virtus, amor in nos est, ut nihil supra eas possit. Utinam eas sit, gloriæ quidem video fore.—Ep. Fam. x. f. Cicero, ex patria fugienti II. 8. duos ginta millia donavit.—Corn. Nep. Vit. Att.

Quod te in tanta hereditate ab omni oculo disti, valde mihi gratum est. Quod faciem saltem polliceris, ut omnibus rebus ceteros juveris id quantum sit presidium. Ibid. 20.

This Cæcilius, Atticus's uncle, was a fastiduous, sometimes mentioned in Cicero's adopted Atticus by his will, and left him his estate, which amounted to above 80,000 had raised this great fortune by the favour of Cæcilius, whom he flattered to the last with a promise to him, yet left the bulk of his estate had been very observant of his humour: he added to his notorious avarice and extortion seized his dead body, and dragged it infamous streets. [Val. Max. vii. 8.] Cicero, congratulating upon his adoption, addresses his letter to F. Pomponianus, Atticus. For in assuming the Adopter, it was usual to add also the name, though changed in its termination to Pomponianus, to preserve the memory of the extraction: to which some added also the name of Cicero in the present case.—Ad Att. 1.

benefit from my kindness; I will manage so for the future, that whenever I am restored, you shall find yourself as dear to me as my brother and my children: if I have been wanting therefore in my duty to you, or rather, since I have been wanting, pray pardon me; for I have been much more wanting to myself." But Atticus begged of him to lay aside all such fancies, and assured him, that there was not the least ground for them; and that he had never been disgusted by anything, which he had either done, or neglected to do for him; and to depend always on his best services, without giving himself the trouble, even of reminding him. Yet after all, the suspicion itself, as it comes from one who knew Atticus so perfectly, seems to leave some little blot upon his character: but whatever cause there might be for it, it is certain, that Cicero at least was as good as his word, and by the care which he took after his return to celebrate Atticus's name in all his writings, has left the most illustrious testimony to posterity of his sincere esteem and affection for him.

Sextius was one of the tribunes elect; and being entirely devoted to Cicero, took the trouble of a journey into Gaul, to solicit Caesar's consent to his restoration; which though he obtained, as well by his own intercession as by Pompey's letters, yet it seems to have been with certain limitations not agreeable to Cicero: for on Sextius's return to Rome, when he drew up the copy of a law which he intended to propose upon his entrance into office; conformable, as we may imagine, to the conditions stipulated with Caesar; Cicero greatly disliked it; as being too general, and without the mention even of his name, nor providing sufficiently either for his dignity, or the restitution of his estate; so that he desires Atticus to take care to get it amended by Sextius¹.

The old tribunes, in the mean while, eight of whom were Cicero's friends, resolved to make one effort more to obtain a law in his favour, which they jointly offered to the people on the twenty-ninth of October: but Cicero was much more displeased with this than with Sextius's: it consisted of three articles; the first of which restored him only to his former rank, but not to his estate: the second was only matter of form, to indemnify the proposers of it: the third enacted, "that if there was anything in it which was prohibited to be promulgated by any former law, particularly by that of Clodius, or which involved the author of such promulgation in any fine or penalty, that in such case it should have no effect." Cicero was surprised, that his friends could be induced to propose such an act, "which seemed to be against him, and to confirm that clause of the Clodian law which made it penal to move anything for him; whereas no clauses of that kind had ever been regarded, or thought to have any special force, but fell of course when the laws themselves were repealed: he observes, "that it was an ugly precedent for the succeeding tribunes, if they should happen to have any scruples; and that Clodius had already taken the advantage of it, when in a speech to the people, on the third of November, he declared, that this act of the tribunes was a proper lesson to their successors, to let them see how far their power extended." He desires Atticus therefore "to find out who was the contriver of it, and how Ninnius and the rest came to be so much overseen as not to be aware of the consequences of it²."

The most probable solution of it is, that these tribunes hoped to carry their point with less difficulty, by paying this deference to Clodius's law, the validity of which was acknowledged by Cato, and several others of the principal citizens³; and they were induced to make this push for it before they quitted their office, from a persuasion, that if Cicero was once restored, on any terms, or with what restrictions soever, the rest would follow of course; and that the recovery of his dignity would necessarily draw after it everything else that was wanted. Cicero seems to have been sensible of it himself on second thoughts, as he intimates, in the conclusion of his letter: "I should be sorry," says he, "to have the new tribunes insert such a clause in their law; yet let them insert what they please: if it will but pass and call me home, I shall be content with it⁴." But the only project of a law which he approved, was drawn by his cousin C. Visellius Aculeo, an eminent lawyer of that age, for another of the new tribunes, T. Fadius, who had been his questor when he was consul: he advised his friends therefore, if there was any prospect of success, to push forward that law, which entirely pleased him⁵.

In this suspense of his affairs at Rome, the troops, which Piso had provided for his government of Macedonia, began to arrive in great numbers at Thessalonica⁶: this greatly alarmed him, and made him resolve to quit the place without delay: and as it was not advisable to move farther from Italy, he ventured to come still nearer, and turned back again to Dyrrhachium: for though this was within the distance forbidden to him by

¹ Ego, si me aliquando vestri et patrie compotem fore fecerit, certe efficiam, ut maxime letere unus ex vestris amicis: meoque officia ac studia, quae parum me laxaverunt (statendum est enim) sic exequar, ut me quoque tibi ac fratri et liberis nostris restitutum putetis. Si illi in te peccavi, ac potius quoniam peccavi, ignoreo: in me enim ipsum peccavi vehementius.—Ad Att. iii. 15.

² Quod me vetras quicquam suspicari accidisse ad causam tuam, quod secus a me erga te commissum, aut perperam videretur, geram tibi morem et liberabor ex cura. Tibi tamen eo plus debeo, quo tua in me sollicitudo fuerit excelsior, quam in te mea.—Ibid. 20.

³ Hoc interim tempore, P. Sextius, designatus iter ad C. Caesarem pro mea salute suscepit. Quid egerit, quantum profuerit, nihil ad causam.—Pro Sext. 32.

⁴ Neque Sextii neque dignitatis satis habet neis canticionis. Sed et maximam ferre oportet, et de bonis diligenter curari: et id animadvertas velim.—Ad Att. iii. 20.

⁵ Quo major est suspicio malitiae alicujus, cum id, quod ad ipsos nihil pertinebat, erat autem contra me, scripserunt. Ut novi tribuni plebis si essent timidores, multo magis sibi eo capite utendum putarent. Neque id a Clodio pretermisum est, dixit enim in concione ad diem iii. Non. Novemb. hoc capite designatis tribune plebis praescriptum esse quid loqueretur. Ut Ninnium et ceteros furgeri investiges velim, et quis attulerit, &c.—Ad Att. iii. 23.

⁶ Video enim quosdam clarissimos viros, aliquot locis judicasse, te cum plebe jure agere potuisse.—Pro Domo, 16.

⁷ Id caput sane nolim novos tribunos plebis ferre: sed perferant modo quidlibet: uno capite quo revocabor, modo res conficiatur, ero contentus.—Ibid. 23.

⁸ Sed si est aliquid in spe, vide legem, quam T. Fadius scripsit Visellius: ea mihi perperat.—Ibid.

⁹ Me adhuc Flancius retinet.—Sed jam cum adventare milites disceretur, faciendum nobis erit, ut ab eo discedamus.—Ibid. 23.

law, yet he had no reason to apprehend any danger, in a town particularly devoted to him, and which had always been under his special patronage and protection. He came thither on the twenty-fifth of November, and gave notice of his removal to his friends at Rome, by letters of the same date, begun at Thessalonica and finished at Dyrrhachium: which shows the great haste which he thought necessary in making this sudden change of his quarters. Here he received another piece of news which displeased him; "that with the consent and assistance of his managers at Rome, the provinces of the consuls elect had been furnished with money and troops by a decree of the senate:" but in what manner it affected him, and what reason he had to be uneasy at it, will be explained by his own letter upon it to Atticus.

"When you first sent me word," says he, "that the consular provinces had been settled and provided for by your consent; though I was afraid lest it might be attended with some ill consequence, yet I hoped that you had some special reason for it which I could not penetrate: but having since been informed, both by friends and letters, that your conduct is universally condemned, I am extremely disturbed at it; because the little hopes, that were left, seem now to be destroyed: for should the new tribunes quarrel with us upon it, what farther hopes can there be? and they have reason to do so; since they were not consulted in it, though they had undertaken my cause, and have lost by our concession all that influence which they would otherwise have had over it; especially when they declare, that it was for my sake only that they desired the power of furnishing out the consuls; not with design to hinder them, but to secure them to my interest; whereas if the consuls have a mind to be perverse, they may now be so without any risk; yet let them be never so well disposed, can do nothing without the consent of the tribunes. As to what you say, that, if you had not agreed to it, the consuls would have carried their point with the people; that could never have been done against the will of the tribunes: I am afraid, therefore, that we have lost by it the affection of the tribunes; or if that still remains, have lost at least our hold on the consuls. There is another inconvenience still, not less considerable; for that important declaration, as it was represented to me, that the senate would enter into nothing till my affair was settled, is now at an end; and in a case not only unnecessary, but new and unprecedented; for I do not believe, that the provinces of the consuls had ever before been provided for until their entrance into office: but having now broken through that resolution which they had taken in my cause, they are at liberty to proceed to any other business, as they please. It is not however to be wondered at, that my friends, who were applied to, should consent to it; for it was hard for any one, to declare openly against a motion so beneficial to the two consuls; it was hard, I say, anything to Lentulus, who has always true friend; or to Metellus, who has great resentments with so much humanity; apprehensive that we have alienated them and cannot hold the consuls: write me desire you, what turn this has taken, at whole affair stands; and write with frankness; for I love to know the truth should happen to be disagreeable." Till December.

But Atticus, instead of answering this rather indeed before he received it, having to visit his estate in Epirus, took his way through Dyrrhachium, on purpose to see and explain to him in person the motives of their conduct. Their interview was but a short one after they parted, Cicero, upon some business, which gave him fresh uneasiness, wrote another letter after him into Epirus, to come back again: "After you left me," says he, "I received letters from Rome, from which I must end my days in this calamity. I speak the truth, (which you will take in), if there had been any hopes of my recovery, who love me so well, would never have left me at such a conjuncture: but I say lest I be thought either ungrateful, or to involve my friends too in my ruin: I beg; that you would not fail, as you promised in your word, to come to me, wherever I shall be, before the first of January."

While he was thus perplexing himself with continual fears and suspicions, his cause was going very prosperously at Rome, and seemed such a train, that it could not be obstructed longer: for the new magistrates, who were on with the new year, were all, except Appian, supposed to be his friends; his enemy Clodius was soon to resign his office, which the greatest part of his power consisted in. Clodius himself was sensible of the fall of his credit, through the superior influence of Cato, who had drawn Cæsar away from him, and forced even Gabinius to desert him: so that of rage and despair, and the desire of revenge, he himself on these new and more powerful grounds he would willingly have dropped the matter. Cicero, or consented even to recal him, but he had persuaded Cicero's friends and the people to join their forces with him against the tribunes. For this end he produced Bibulus and augurs in an assembly of the people, and of them, "whether it was not unlawful to transact any public business, when any of them were without the auspices?" To which they all answered in the affirmative. Then he asked Bibulus, how he was not actually observing the heavens, and whether any of Cæsar's laws were proposed to the people. To which he answered in the affirmative: "that he produced a second time by the prætor A. Cato, added, "that he took the auspices also in the same manner at the time when Clodius's act was confirmed by the people:" but Clodius he gratified his present revenge, little regarding much it turned against himself; but that "all Cæsar's acts ought to be annulled by the senate, as being contrary to the auspices."

¶ Dyrrhachium veni quod et libera civitas est, et in me officiosa.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 1.

Nam ego eo nomine sum Dyrrhachii, ut quam celerrime quid agatur, audiam, et sum tuto. Civitas enim hæc semper a me defensa est.—Ibid. 3.

Quod mei studiosos habeo Dyrrhachinos, ad eos perrexii, cum illa superiora Thessalonice scripsissem.—Ad Att. iii. 22; Ep. Fam. xiv. 1.

that condition, declared publicly, that "he himself would bring back Cicero, the guardian of the city, on his own shoulders".

In the same fit of revenge, he fell upon the consul Gabinius; and in an assembly of the people, which he called for that purpose, with his head veiled, and a little altar and fire before him, consecrated his whole estate. This had been sometimes done against traitorous citizens, and, when legally performed, had the effect of a confiscation, by making the place and effects ever after sacred and public: but in the present case, it was considered only as an act of madness; and the tribune Ninnius, in ridicule of it, consecrated Clodius's estate in the same form and manner, that whatever efficacy was ascribed to the one, the other might justly challenge the same¹.

But the expected hour was now come, which put an end to his detestable tribunate: it had been uniform and of a piece from the first to the last; the most infamous and corrupt that Rome had ever seen: there was scarce an office bestowed at home, or any favour granted to a prince, state, or city abroad, but what he openly sold to the best bidder: "The poets (says Cicero) could not feign a Charybdis so voracious as his rapine: he conferred the title of king on those who had it not, and took it away from who had"; and sold the rich priest-hoods of Asia, as the Turks are said to sell the Grecian bishoprics, without regarding whether they were full or vacant, of which Cicero gives us a remarkable instance: "There was a celebrated temple of Cybele, at Pessinus in Phrygia, where that goddess was worshipped with singular devotion, not only by all Asia, but Europe too; and where the Roman generals themselves often used to pay their vows and make their offerings." Her priest was in quiet possession, without any rival pretender, or any complaint against him; yet Clodius, by a law of the people, granted this priesthood to one Brogitarus, a petty sovereign in those parts, to whom he had before given the title of king: "and I shall think him a king indeed," says Cicero, "if ever he be able to pay the purchase money:" but the spoils of the temple were destined to that use, and would soon have been applied to it, if Deiotarus, king of Galatia, a prince of noble character, and a true friend to Rome, had not defeated the slyness bargain, by taking the temple into his protection, and maintaining the lawful priest against the intruder, nor suffering Brogitarus, though his son-in-law, to pollute or touch anything belonging to it*.

All the ten new tribunes had solemnly promised to serve Cicero; yet Clodius found means to corrupt two of them, S. Atilius Serranus, and Numerius Quinctius Gracchus, by whose help he was enabled still to make head against Cicero's party, and retard his restoration some time longer: but Piso and Gabinius, perceiving the scene to be opening space in his favour, and his return to be unavoidable, thought it time to get out of his way, and retire to their several governments, to enjoy the reward of their perfidy: so that they both left Rome with the expiration of their year, and Piso set out for Macedonia, Gabinius for Syria.

On the first of January the new consul Lentulus, after the ceremony of his inauguration, and his first duty paid, as usual, to religion, entered directly into Cicero's affair, and moved the senate for his restoration[†]; while his colleague Metellus declared, with much seeming candour, "that though Cicero and he had been enemies, on account of their different sentiments in politics, yet he would give up his resentments to the authority of the fathers, and the interests of the republic[‡]." Upon which L. Cotta, a person of consular and censorian rank, being asked his opinion the first, said, "that nothing had been done against Cicero agreeably to right or law, or the custom of their ancestors: that no citizen could be driven out of the city without a trial; and that the people could not condemn, nor even try a man capitally, but in an assembly of their centuries: that the whole was the effect of violence, turbulent times, and an oppressed republic: that in so strange a revolution and confusion of all things, Cicero had only stepped aside, to provide for his future tranquillity, by declining the impending storm; and since he had freed the republic from no less danger by his absence, than he had done before by his presence, that he ought not only to be restored, but to be adorned with new honours: that what his mad enemy had published against him, was drawn so absurdly both in words and sentiments, that, if

* Qui accepta pecunia Pessinuntem ipsum, sedem domiciliumque Matris Deorum vastaria, et Brogitaro, Gallograeco, impuro homini sac nefario, totum illum locum fanumque vendidit. Sacerdotem ab ipsa aris, pulvinaribusque detraxerit. — Quae reges omnes, qui Asiam Europamque tenuerunt, semper summa religione coluerunt. — Quae majores nostri tam sancta duxerunt, ut, nostri imperatores maximis et periculosissimis bellis hulo deo vota facerent, eaque in ipso Pessinunte ad illam ipsam principem aram et in illo loco fanoque persolverent. — Putabo regem, si habuerit unde tibi solvat. — Nam cum multa regia sunt in Delotaro, tum illa maxime, quod tibi nummum nullum dedit. — Quod Pessinuntem per scelus a te violatum, et sacerdotis, sacrique spoliatum recuperavit. — Quod caeremonias ab omni vetustate acceptas a Brogitaro pollui non sinis, mavultque generum suum munere tuo, quam illud fanum antiquitate religionis orare. — Ibid. 13; Pro Sext. 26.

† Kalendis Januariis. — P. Lentulus consul — simul ad deo solemnem religione retulit, nihil humanarum rerum sibi prius, quam de me agendum judicavit. — Post Red. ad Quir. 5.

‡ Quae etiam collega ejus moderatio de me? Qui cum inimicitias sibi mecum ex reipublicae dissensione susceptas esse dixisset, eas se Patribus conscriptis dixit et temporibus reipublicae permissurum. — Pro Sext. 32.

¹ Tu tuo precipitante jam et debilitato tribunatu, impetum patronus subito extitisti. Tu M. Bibulum in concione, tu agures produxisti. Te interrogante agures responderunt, cum de cerlo servatum sit, cum populo agi non posset — tua denique omnis actio posterioribus mentibus fuit, omnia, quae C. Caesar egisset, quae contra auspicia mentis acta, per senatum rescindi oportere. Quod si fieret, de his tuis humeris me, custodem urbis, in urbem restituerem. — Pro Domo, 15.

² Tu, ta, inquam, capite velato, concione advocata, fando posito bona tui Gabinii consecrasti in — quid? exemplis? tuo bona tua nomine L. Ninnius — consecravisti? quod si, quia ad te pertinet, ratum esse negas oportere; ea juramentis in praeclearo tribunatu tuo, quibus in te convenire, recurrere, alios evertere. — Pro Domo, 47, 48.

³ Reges, qui erant, vendidit; qui non erant, appellavit — quoniam denique tam immanem Charybdim poete fingendo cupere poterant, quae tantos exhaurire gurgites possent, quantas iste praedae — exorbuit? — De Harus. Resp. 4.

it had been enacted in proper form, it could never obtain the force of a law : that since Cicero therefore was expelled by no law, he could not want a law to restore him, but ought to be recalled by a vote of the senate."—Pompey, who spoke next, having highly applauded what Cotta said, added, "that for the sake of Cicero's future quiet, and to prevent all farther trouble from the same quarter, it was his opinion, that the people should have a share in conferring that grace, and their consent be joined also to the authority of the senate." After many others had spoken likewise with great warmth in the defence and praise of Cicero, they all came unanimously into Pompey's opinion, and were proceeding to make a decree upon it, when Serranus the tribune rose up and put a stop to it, not flatly interposing his negative, for he had not the assurance to do that, against such a spirit and unanimity of the senate, but desiring only a night's time to consider of it. This unexpected interruption incensed the whole assembly ; some reproached, others entreated him ; and his father-in-law, Oppius, threw himself at his feet, to move him to desist : but all that they could get from him was a promise to give way to the decree the next morning ; upon which they broke up. "But the tribune (says Cicero) employed the night, not as people fancied he would, in giving back the money which he had taken, but in making a better bargain, and doubling his price ; for the next morning, being grown more hardy, he absolutely prohibited the senate from proceeding to any act." This conduct of Serranus surprised Cicero's friends, being not only perfidious and contrary to his engagements, but highly ungrateful to Cicero ; who, in his consulship, had been his special encourager and benefactor^a.

The senate, however, though hindered at present from passing their decree, were too well united, and too strongly supported, to be baffled much longer by the artifices of a faction : they resolved, therefore, without farther delay, to propound a law to the people for Cicero's restoration ; and the twenty-second of the month was appointed for the promulgation of it. When the day came, Fabricius, one of Cicero's tribunes, marched out with a strong guard, before it was light, to get possession of the rostra : but Clodius was too early for him : and having seized all the posts and avenues of the forum, was prepared to give him a warm reception :

^a Tum princeps rogatus sententiam L. Cotta, dixit.—Nihil de me actum esse jure, nihil more majorem, nihil legibus, &c. Quare me, qui nulla lege abessem, non restitui lege, sed senatus auctoritate oportere.—

Post eum rogatus sententiam Cn. Pompeius, approbata, laudatque Cotte sententia, dixit, esse otii mei causa, ut omni populari concertatione defungerer, censere ; ut ad senatus auctoritatem populi quoque Romani beneficium adungeretur. Cum omnes certatim, aliusque alio gravius de mea salute dixisset, serotique sine ulla varietate discessio : surrexit Atilius ; nec ausus est, cum esset emptus, intercedere ; noctem sibi ad deliberandum postulavit. Clamor senatus, querelæ, preces, socer ad pedes abjectus. Ille, se affirmare postero die moram nullam esse facturum. Creditum est ; discessum est : illi interea deliberatori merces, interposita nocte, duplicata est.—Pro Sext. 34.

Deliberatio non in reddenda, quemadmodum nonnulli arbitrabantur, sed, ut patefactum est, in augenda mercede consumpta est.—Post Red. ad Quir. 5.

^b Is tribunus plebis quem ego maximis beneficiis questorem consul ornaveram.—Ibid.

he had purchased some gladiators, for the sake of his sedition, to which he was now pret and borrowed another band of his brother, and with these well armed, at the head slaves and dependants, he attacked Fabricius several of his followers, wounded many more, drove him quite out of the place ; and he to fall in at the same time with Cispus, tribune, who was coming to the aid of his co he repulsed him also with a great slaughter gladiators, heated with this taste of blood, "their way on all sides with their swords, in of Quintus Cicero, whom they met with and would certainly have murdered, if, advantage of the confusion and darkness, not hid himself under the bodies of his slaves freedmen, who were killed around him ; he lay concealed till the fray was over." The Sextius was treated still more roughly, "for particularly pursued and marked out for dition, he was so desperately wounded, as to for dead upon the spot, and escaped death feigning it ;" but while he lay in that supposed to be killed, Clodius reflecting, the murder of a tribune, whose person was would raise such a storm, as might occasion ruin, "took a sudden resolution to kill one own tribunes, in order to charge it upon his saries, and so balance the account by making sides equally obnoxious." The victim of this sacrifice was Numerius Quinctius, an fellow, raised to this dignity by the caprice multitude, who, to make himself the more p had assumed the surname of Gracchus : "a crafty clown (says Cicero) having got some the design, and finding that his blood was t off the envy of Sextius's, disguised himself p in the habit of a muleteer, the same in w first came to Rome, and with a basket up head, while some were calling out for Num others for Quinctius, passed undiscovered confusion of the two names : but he contin this danger till Sextius was known to be and if that discovery had not been made than one would have wished, though they not have fixed the odium of killing their mer where they designed it ; yet they would have ened the infamy of one villany, by coming another, which all people would have p with." According to the account of this tragedy, "the Tiber and all the common were filled with dead bodies, and the blood up with sponges in the forum, where such a slain had never before been seen but in the dissensions of Cinna and Octavius."

^c Princeps rogationis, vir mihi amicissimus. Q. cius templum aliquanto ante lucem occupavit.—forum, comitium, curiam multa de nocte armatis nibus, ac servis occupavissent, impetum faciunt in cium, manus afferunt, occidunt nonnullos, vii multos : venientem in forum, virum optimum M. C.—vi depellunt ; eadem in foro maximam faciunt. districtis gladiis in omnibus fori partibus fratrum oculis querebant, voce pocebant.—Pulsus rostris h tio jacuit, æque servorum et libertorum corporibus o Multis vulneribus acceptis ac debilitato corpore cidato, Sextius, se abiecit exanimatus ; neque ulla ab se mortem, nisi mortis opinione, depulit.—At ipsi paritide.—Aden vim facinoris sui perhorrescit paulo longior opinio mortis Sextii fuisse, Gracillum suum transfundendi in nos criminis causa, &c.

Clodius, flushed with this victory, "set fire with his own hands to the temple of the Nymphs, where the books of the censors and the public registers of the city were kept, which were all consumed with the fabric itself." He then attacked the houses of Milo the tribune, and Cæcilius the prætor, with fire and sword, but was repulsed in both attempts with loss: "Milo took several of Appius's gladiators prisoners, who, being brought before the senate, made a confession of what they knew, and were sent to jail; but were presently released by Serranus." Upon these outrages Milo impeached Clodius in form, for the violation of the public peace: but the consul Metellus, who had not yet shadowed him, with the prætor Appius, and the tribune Serranus, resolved to prevent any process upon it, "and by their edicts prohibited, either the criminal himself to appear, or any one to cite him." Their pretence was, "that the questors were not yet chosen, whose office it was to make the allotment of the judges; while they themselves kept back the election," and were pushing Clodius at the same time into the sedileship, which would screen him, of course, for one year from any prosecution. Milo therefore, finding it impracticable to bring him to justice in the legal method, resolved to deal with him in his own way, by opposing force to force; and for this end purchased a band of gladiators, with which he had daily skirmishes with him in the streets; and acquired a great reputation of courage and generosity, for being the first of all the Romans who had ever bought gladiators for the defence of the republic.

This obstruction given to Cicero's return by an obstinate and desperate faction, made the senate only the more resolute to effect it: they passed a second vote, therefore, that no other business should be done till it was carried; and to prevent all further tumults, and insults upon the magistrates, ordered the consuls to summon all the people of Italy, who wished well to the state, to come to the assistance and defence of Cicero¹. This gave new captant. Senect rusticulus, non incatus, - mulionem penulam arripuit, cum qua primum Romanum ad omnia venit: memoria se corbe contexti: cum quærentem eum Numerium, alii Quinctium, gemini nominis errore servatus est, atque hoc scitis omnes; usque adeo hominem in periculo fuisse, quoad scitum sit, Sextium vivere. Quod nisi esset patefactum paulo citius, quem vellem, &c. Meministis tamen, Judices, corporibus civium Theria compleri, cloacas referri, e foro spongia effingi sanguinem. - Lapidationes persepe vidimus; non ita sæpe, ut videretur tamen sæpe gladios; eadem vero tantam, tamque acervos corporum extractos, nisi forte illo Cinnamo atque Octaviano die, quæ unquam in foro vidit? - Pro Sext. 36, 37, 38.

¹ Cum qui eodem Nympharum incendio, ut memoriam publicæ remotionis, tabulis publicis impressam, extinguerent. - Pro Mil. 27; Parad. 4; De Haruspic. Resp. 27.

² Gladiatores - comprehensos, in senatum introducti, confessi, in vincula conjecti à Milone, emissi à Serrano. - Pro Sext. 38.

³ Rem tibi consul, prætor, tribunus plebis nova novi generis edicta proponunt: ne reus adsit, ne citetur. - Pro Sext. 41.

⁴ Sed homini summo Miloni nostro nuper fuit, quod gladiatoribus emptis respublicæ causæ, quæ salutem nostram committatur, omnes P. Clodii comatus furoribus compuncti. - De Offic. li. 17.

⁵ Itaque postea nihil vos civibus, nihil sociis, nihil rebus responditis. - Post Red. in Sen. 3.

⁶ Quis mihi præcelsiores accidero potuit, quam quod illo adversante vos decuravistis, ut cuncti ex omni Italia, qui spirits to the honest citizens, and drew a vast concourse to Rome from all parts of Italy, where there was not a corporate town of any note which did not testify its respect to Cicero by some public act or monument. "Pompey was at Capua, acting as chief magistrate of his new colony; where he presided in person at their making a decree to Cicero's honour, and took the trouble likewise of visiting all the other colonies and chief towns in those parts," to appoint them a day of general rendezvous at Rome, to assist at the promulgation of the law¹.

Lentulus at the same time was entertaining the city with shows and stage plays, in order to keep the people in good humour, whom he had called from their private affairs in the country to attend the public business. The shows were exhibited in Pompey's theatre, while the senate, for the convenience of being near them, was held in the adjoining temple of Honour and Virtue, built by Marius out of the Cimbric spoils, and called for that reason Marius's Monument: here, according to Cicero's dream, a decree now passed in proper form for his restoration; when, "under the joint influence of those deities, honour (he says) was done to virtue; and the monument of Marius, the preserver of the empire, gave safety to his countryman, the defender of it²."

The news of this decree no sooner reached the neighbouring theatre, than the whole assembly expressed their satisfaction by claps and applauses, which they renewed upon the entrance of every senator; but when the consul Lentulus took his place, they all rose up, and, with acclamations, stretched-out hands, and tears of joy, publicly testified their thanks to him. But when Clodius ventured to show himself, they were hardly restrained from doing him violence, throwing out reproaches, threats and curses upon him: so that in the shows of gladiators, which he could not bear to be deprived of, he durst not go to his seat in the common and open manner, but used to start up into it at once from some obscure passage under the benches, which on that account was jocosely called "the Appian way," where he was no sooner espied, than so "general a hiss ensued, that it disturbed the gladiators, and frightened their very horses. From these significations (says Cicero) he might learn the difference between the genuine citizens of Rome, and those packed assemblies of the people where he used to domineer; and that the men who lord it in such assemblies, are the real aversion of the city; while those who dare not show their heads in them, are received with all demonstrations of honour by the whole people³."

rempublicam salvam vellent, ad me unum - restituendum, et defendendum ventrent? - Post Red. in Sen. 9.

¹ In una mea causa factum est, ut literis consularibus ex S. C. cuncta ex Italia, omnes, qui rempublicam salvam vellent, convocarentur. - Pro Sext. 60.

² Qui in colonia nuper constituta, cum ipse gereret magistratum, vim et crudelitatem privilegii auctoritate honestissimorum hominum, et publicis literis consignavit: princepsque Italie totius presidium ad meam salutem impiorandam putavit. - Post Red. in Sen. 11.

³ Hic municipia, coloniasque addit: hic Italiam totius auxilium imploravit. - Pro Domo, 12.

⁴ Cum in templo Honoris et Virtutis, honos habitus esset virtuti; Caiusque Marci, conservatoris hujus imperii, monumentum, municipi ejus et respublicæ defensori eodem ad salutem præbuisset. - Pro Sext. 64; ii. 56.

⁵ Audite S. C. ore ipsi, atque abeunti senatui plausus est

When the decree passed, the famed tragedian, Æsopus, who acted, as Cicero says, the same good part in the republic that he did upon the stage, was performing the part of Telamon, banished from his country, in one of Accius's plays, where, by the emphasis of his voice, and the change of a word or two in some of the lines, he contrived to turn the thoughts of the audience on Cicero. "What he! who always stood up for the republic! who, in doubtful times, spared neither life nor fortunes—the greatest friend in the greatest danger—of such parts and talents—O father—I saw his houses and rich furniture all in flames—O ungrateful Greeks, inconstant people; forgetful of services!—to see such a man banished; driven from his country; and suffer him to continue so?"—At each of which sentences there was no end of clapping.—In another tragedy of the same poet, called Brutus, when instead of Brutus he pronounced Tullius, who established the liberty of his citizens, the people were so affected, that they called for it again a thousand times. This was the constant practice through the whole time of his exile: there was not a passage in any play, which could possibly be applied to his case, but the whole audience presently caught it up, and by their claps and applauses loudly signified their zeal and good wishes for him^a.

Though a decree was regularly obtained for Cicero's return, Clodius had the courage and address still to hinder its passing into a law: he took all occasions of haranguing the people against it; and when he had filled the forum with his mercenaries, "used to demand of them aloud, contrary to the custom of Rome, whether they would have Cicero restored or not; upon which his emissaries raising a sort of dead cry in the negative, he laid hold of it, as the voice of the Roman people, and declared the proposal to be rejected^b." But ab universis datus: deinde, cum senatoribus singula spectatum e senatu redeuntibus: cum vero ipse, qui ludos faciebat, consul aessedit: stantes, et manibus pascis gratias agentes, et lacrymantes gaudio, suam erga me benevolentiam ac misericordiam declaraverunt: at cum ille furibundus venisset, vix se populus Romanus tenuit.—Pro Sext. 55. Is, cum quotidie gladiatores spectaret, nunquam est conspectus, cum veniret: emergebat subito, cum sub tabulas subreperat—itaque illa via latebrosa, qua ille spectatum veniebat, Appia jam vocabatur: qui tamen quo tempore conspectus erat, non modo gladiatores, sed equi ipsi gladiatorum repentinis sibilis extimescebant. Videtisne igitur, quantum inter populum Romanum, et concionem intersit? Dominos concionum omni odio populi notari? Quibus autem consistere in operarum concionibus non liceat, eos omni populi Romani significatione decorari?—Pro Sext. 56.

^a Recenti nuncio de illo S. C. ad ludos, scenamque perlato, summus artifex, et mehercule semper partium in republica tanquam in scena, optimatum, flets et recenti lætitia et misto dolore ac desiderio mei—summi enim poetæ ingenuum non solum arte sua sed etiam dolore exprimebat. Quid enim? qui rempublicam certo animo adjuverit, statuerit, steterit cum Attilio—re dubia nec dubitavit viam offerre, nec capiti perpercerit.—summum amicum summo in bello—summo ingenio præditum—O Pater—hec omnia vidi inflammari—O ingratisque Argivi, imanes Græci, immemores beneficii!—exulare sinistis, sistis pelli, pulsus patimini—que significatio fuerit omnium, que declaratio voluntatis ab universo populo Romano?

Nominatim sum appellatus in Bruto, Tullius, qui libertatem civibus stabiliverat. Milles revocatum est.—Pro Sext. 56, 57, 58.

^b Ille tribunus plebis qui de mo—non majorum suorum,

the senate, ashamed to see their authority eluded, when the whole city was on their side, solved to take such measures in the support of their decrees, that it should not be possible to defeat them. Lentulus therefore summoned into the Capitol, on the twenty-fifth of May, Pompey began the debate, and renewed the recalling Cicero; and in a grave and eloquent speech which he had prepared in writing delivered from his notes, gave him the honor of having saved his country^c. All the leaders of the senate spoke after him to the same effect, but the consul Metellus, notwithstanding promises, had been acting hitherto a double part, and was all along the chief encourager and supporter of Clodius. When Servilius therefore rose as person of the first dignity, who had been so with a triumph and the censorship, he addressed himself to his kinsman Metellus; and, "calmly from the dead all the family of the Metelli before him the glorious acts of his ancestor the conduct and unhappy fate of his brother in a manner so moving, that Metellus could not stand any longer against the force of the speech the authority of the speaker, but with tears eyes gave himself up to Servilius, and professed future services to Cicero"—in which he was very sincere, and from this moment assisted his colleague in promoting Cicero's restoration that in a very full house of four hundred and sixteen senators, when all the magistrates were present, the decree passed, without one dissenting voice, but Clodius's,^d which gave occasion to him to write a particular letter of thanks to Metellus as he had done once before upon his first restoration for him^e.

Some may be apt to wonder why the two tribunes who were Cicero's enemies still as much as did not persevere to inhibit the decree, since a negative of a single tribune had an indisputable force to stop all proceedings; but when that tribune was wholly arbitrary and factious, contrary to the apparent interest and general inclination of the citizens, if the tribune could not be prevailed upon by gentle means to recal it, the senate was obliged to enter into a debate upon the merit of it, and proceed to some extraordinary resolution of decision.

sed Græculorum instituto, concionem interrogare: velletne me redire: et cum erat reclamatum se mercenariorum vocibus; populum Romanum negabat.—Pro Sext. 59.

^c Idem ille consul cum illa incredibilis multitudo esset, et pene Italia ipse venisset, vos frequentissimum Capitolium convocavit.—(Post Red. in Sen. 10.) Cuius, qui tripartitas oras terrarum oras atque regiones triumphis huius Imperio adiunctas notavit, de sententia dicta, mihi uni testimonium patrie condidit.—Ibid. 61.

^d Qu. Metellus, et inimicus et frater inimici per vestram voluntatem, omnia privata odia deposuit: quod Servilius—et auctoritatis et orationis sue divina gravitate ad sui generis, communisque sanguinis virtutesque revocavit, ut haberet in consilio et frater inferis—et omnes Metellos, prestantissimos civis extitit non modo salutis defensor,—verum etiam ad dignitatis mores. Quo quidem die, cum vos coram senatu essetis, magistratus autem hi omnes adesse sensit unus.—Post Red. in Sen. 10.

^e Collaorismavit vir egregius ac vere Metellus, tot se P. Servilio dicenti etiam tum tradidit. Nec illam gravitatem, plenam antiquitatis, diutius potest tenere.—Pro Sext. 62.

^f Ep. Fam. v.

the author of such an opposition an enemy to his country, and answerable for all the mischief that was likely to ensue, or of ordering the consuls to take care that the republic received no detriment; which votes were thought to justify any methods, how violent soever, of removing either the obstruction or the author of it, who seldom cared to expose himself to the rage of an inflamed city, headed by the consuls and the senate, and to assert his prerogative at the peril of his life.

This in effect was the case at present; when the usual Lentulus assembled the senate again the next day to concert some effectual method for preventing all further opposition, and getting the decree enacted into a law: but before they met, he called the people likewise to the rostra, where he, and all the principal senators in their turns, requested to them the substance of what they had said before in the senate, in order to prepare them for the reception of the law. Pompey particularly exerted himself in extolling the praises of Cicero, declaring "that the republic owed its preservation to him, and that their common safety was involved in his;" exhorting them "to defend and support the decree of the senate, the quiet of the city, and the fortunes of a man who had deserved so well of them; that this was the general voice of the senate, of the knights, of all Italy; and, lastly, that it was his own earnest and special request to them, which he not only desired, but implored them to grant." When the senate afterwards met, they proceeded to several new and vigorous votes to facilitate the success of the law: first, "That no magistrate should presume to take the auspices, so as to disturb the assembly of the people, when Cicero's cause was to come before them; and that if any one attempted it, he should be treated as a public enemy."

Secondly, "That, if through any violence or obstruction, the law was not suffered to pass within the five next legal days of assembly, Cicero should then be at liberty to return, without any farther authority."

Thirdly, "That public thanks should be given to all the people of Italy who came to Rome for Cicero's defence, and that they should be desired to come again, on the day when the suffrages of the people were to be taken."

Fourthly, "That thanks should be given likewise to all the states and cities which had received and entertained Cicero; and that the care of his person should be recommended to all foreign nations in alliance with them; and that the Roman generals, and all who had command abroad, should be ordered to protect his life and safety."

¹ Quorum principes ad rogandos et ad cohortandos vos fuit Cn. Pompeius—primum vos docuit, melis consiliis republicam esse servatam, causamque meam cum communi salute conjunxit; hortatusque est, ut auctoritatem senatus, statum civitatis, fortunas civis bene meriti defenderet: tum in perorando posuit, vos rogari a senatu, neque ab equitibus, rogari ab Italia cuncta: denique ipse ad extremum pro mea vos salute non rogavi solum, verum etiam obsecravi.—Post Red. ad Quir. 7.

² Quod est postidie decretum in curia—ne quis de curia arceret: ne quis moram ullam afferret; si quis aliter fecisset, eum plane everterem republice fore.—

³ Adhuc, si diebus quinque quibus agi de me potuisset, non essem actum, redirem in patriam omni auctoritate recuperata.

⁴ Cicini, qui ex tota Italia salutis mee causam convenerant,

One cannot help pausing a while to reflect on the great idea which these facts imprint of the character and dignity of Cicero; to see so vast an empire in such a ferment on his account as to postpone all their concerns and interests, for many months successively, to the safety of a single senator¹, who had no other means of exciting the zeal or engaging the affections of his citizens but the genuine force of his personal virtues, and the merit of his eminent services: as if the republic itself could not stand without him, but must fall into ruins, if he, the main pillar of it, was removed, whilst the greatest monarchs on earth, who had any affairs with the people of Rome, were looking on to expect the event, unable to procure any answer or regard to what they were soliciting, till this affair was decided. Ptolemy, the king of Egypt, was particularly affected by it, who, being driven out of his kingdom, came to Rome about this time to beg help and protection against his rebellious subjects; but though he was lodged in Pompey's house, it was not possible for him to get an audience till Cicero's cause was at an end.

The law, now prepared for his restoration, was to be offered to the suffrage of the centuries: this was the most solemn and honourable way of transacting any public business where the best and gravest part of the city had the chief influence, and where a decree of the senate was previously necessary to make the act valid; but in the present case there seem to have been four or five several decrees, provided at different times, which had all been frustrated by the intrigues of Clodius and his friends till these last votes proved decisive and effectual². Cicero's resolution upon them was, "to wait till the law should be proposed to the people; and, if by the artifices of his enemies it should then be obstructed, to come away directly upon the authority of the senate, and rather hazard his life than bear the loss of his country any longer³." But the vigour of the late debates had so discouraged the chiefs of the faction, that they left Clodius single in the opposition. Metellus dropped him, and his brother Appius was desirous to be quiet⁴; yet it was above two months still from the last decree before Cicero's friends could bring the affair to a general vote, which they effected at last on the fourth of August.

There had never been known so numerous and solemn an assembly of the Roman people as this—all Italy was drawn together on the occasion; it was reckoned a kind of sin to be absent, and neither age nor infirmity was thought a sufficient agerentur gratis: atque iidem ad res redeuntes, ut venient, rogarentur.

Quem enim unquam senatus civem, nisi me, nationibus exteris commendavit? cuius unquam propter salutem, nisi meam, senatus publice oculis populi Romani gratias egit? De me uno P. C. decreverunt, ut qui provincias cum imperio obtinerent, qui quaestores legatique essent, saltem et vitam meam custodirent.—Pro Sext. 60, 61.

¹ Nihil vos civibus, nihil oculis, nihil regibus respondistis. Nihil iudices sententia, nihil populus suffragia, nihil hic ordo auctoritate declaravit: mutum forum, elinguent curiam, tacitam et fractam civitatem videbat.—Post Red. in Sen. 3.

² Vid. Pro Sext. 60, et Notas Manutii ad 61.

³ Mihi in animo est legum latationem expectare, et si obtrechabitur, aut auctoritate senatus, et potius vita quam patria carebo.—Ad Att. lib. 96.

⁴ Redii cum maxima dignitate, fratre tuo altero consule reducente, altero pretore potente.—Pro Domo, 33.

excuse for not lending a helping hand to the restoration of Cicero. All the magistrates exerted themselves in recommending the law, excepting Appius and the two tribunes, who durst not venture however to oppose it. The meeting was held in the Field of Mars, for the more convenient reception of so great a multitude, where the senators divided among themselves the task of presiding in the several centuries and seeing the poll fairly taken. The result was, that Cicero was recalled from exile by the unanimous suffrage of all the centuries, and to the infinite joy of the whole city^a.

Clodius however had the hardiness not only to appear, but to speak in this assembly against the law, but nobody regarded or heard a word that he said. He now found the difference mentioned above between a free convention of the Roman people and those mercenary assemblies where a few desperate citizens, headed by slaves and gladiators, used to carry all before them. "Where now," says Cicero, "were those tyrants of the forum, those hangers of the mob, those disposers of kingdoms?" This was one of the last genuine acts of free Rome, one of the last efforts of public liberty, exerting itself to do honour to its patron and defender; for the union of the triumvirate had already given it a dangerous wound, and their dissention, which not long after ensued, entirely destroyed it.

But it gave some damp to the joy of this glorious day that Cicero's son-in-law Piso happened to die not long before it, to the extreme grief of the family, without reaping the fruits of his piety, and sharing the pleasure and benefit of Cicero's return. His praises however will be as immortal as Cicero's writings, from whose repeated character of him we learn "that for parts, probity, virtue, modesty, and for every accomplishment of a fine gentleman and fine speaker, he scarce left his equal behind him among all the young nobles of that age^b."

Cicero had resolved to come home in virtue of the senate's decree, whether the law had passed or not; but perceiving from the accounts of all his friends, that it could not be defeated any longer, he embarked for Italy on the fourth of August, the very day on which it was enacted, and landed the next at Brundisium, where he found his daughter Tullia already arrived to receive him. The day happened to be the annual festival of the foundation of the town, as well as of the dedication of the temple of Safety at Rome, and the likewise of Tullia: as if Providence had thrice these circumstances together to enhance and solemnity of his landing, which was celebrated by the people with the most profuse expressions of mirth and gaiety. Cicero took up his abode again with his old host Lenius Flaccus, who entertained him so honourably in his distant person of great learning as well as generosity he received the welcome news in four days of Rome, that the law was actually ratified by the people with an incredible zeal and unanimity all the centuries^b. This obliged him to put off his journey in all haste, and take leave of the Romans, who, by all the offices of private duty, as public decrees, endeavoured to testify their respect for him. The fame of his landing and progress towards the city drew infinite multitudes from all parts to see him as he passed, and to congratulate him on his return; "so that that road was but one continued street from Brundisium to Rome, lined on both sides with crowds of women, and children; nor was there a prætorian town or colony through Italy, which did not erect him statues or public honours, and deputation of their principal members to pay him their compliments; that it was rather less the truth, as Plutarch says, what Cicero tells us, that all Italy brought him back upon their shoulders^c. But that one day, says he, was an immortality, when on my approach towards the city the senate came out to receive me, followed the whole body of the citizens, as if Rome had left its foundations, and marched forth to embrace its preserver^d."

As soon as he entered the gates he saw the steps of all the temples, porticoes, and the tops of houses covered with people, who hailed him with a universal acclamation as he went forward towards the Capitol, where fresh multitudes were expecting his arrival; yet in the midst of this joy he could not help grieving," he says.

^b Pridie Non. Sextil. Dyrrhachio sum profectus ipso die quo lex est lata de nobis. Brundisium venit ibi mihi Tulliola mea presto fuit, natali suo ipso casu idem natalis erat Brundisinae colonie; et tunc salutis. Quæ res animadversa a multitudine, Brundisiorum gratulatione celebrata est. Ante sextum Id. Sext. cognovi, literis Quinti fratris, studio omnium ætatis atque ordinum, incredibili cursu Italiam, legem comitis centuriatis esse perlatam. Ad Att. iv. 1.

Cumque me domus eadem optimorum et doctissimorum, Lenii Flacci, et patris et fratris ejus suscepisset, quæ proximo anno moriens recuperaret periculo præsidioque defenderat.—Pro Sext. 63.

^c Mens quidem reductus is fuit, ut a Brundisium Romam agmen perpetuum totius Italie viderem. enim regio fuit illa, neque præfectura, neque municipium aut colonia, ex qua non publico ad me venerint gratulantes. Quid dicam adventus meos? Quid effusiones hominum oppidis? Quid concursus ex agris patrum familiis conjugibus ac liberis? &c.—In Pison. 22.

Italia cuncta pæne sola humeris reportavit.—Pro in Sen. 15.

Itinere toto urbes Italie festos dies agere adventum videbatur. Vis multitudinis legatorum undique celebrabantur.—Pro Sext. 63.

^d Unus ille dies mihi quidem instar immortalitatis—cum senatum egressum vidi, populumque Romanum universum, cum mihi ipse Roma, propo convulsa Italia, ad complectendum conservatorem suum perveniret.—In Pison. 22.

^a Quo die quis civis fuit, qui non nefas esse putaret, quacunq; aut ætate aut valetudine esset, non se de salute mea sententiam ferre?—Post Red. in Sen. 11.

Nemo sibi nec valetudinis excusationem nec senectutis satis justam putavit.—Pro Sext. 52.

De me cum omnes magistratus promulgassent, præter unum prætorem, a quo non erat postulandum, fratrem inimici mei, præterque duos de lapide emptos tribunos plebis—nullis comitis unquam multitudinem hominum tantam, neque splendidiorem fuisse.—Vos rogatores, vos distributores, vos custodes fuisse tabularum.—In Pison. 15.

^b Piao ille gener meus, cui pietatis suæ fructum, neque ex me, neque a populo Romano ferre licuit.—Pro Sext. 31. Studio autem neminem nec industria majore cognovi; quamquam ne ingenio quidem qui præstitit, facile dixerim, C. Pisoni, genero meo. Nullum illi tempus vacabat, aut a forensi dictione, aut a commentatione domestica, aut a scribendo aut a cogitando. Itaque tantos processus faciebatur, ut evolare non excurrere videbatur, &c.—illa de illo majora dici possunt. Nam nec continentia, nec pietate, nec ullo genere virtutis, quenquam ejusdem ætatis cum illo conferendum puto.—Brut. pp. 397, 398.

himself, "to reflect that a city so grateful to the deliverer of its liberty had been so miserably enslaved and oppressed." The capitol was the proper seat of these, as it were, of the majesty of the empire, where stood the most magnificent fabric of Rome, the temple of Jupiter, or of that god whom they styled the greatest and the best¹, to whose shrine all who entered the city in pomp or triumph used always to make their first visit. Cicero, therefore, before he had saluted his wife and family, was obliged to discharge himself here of his vows and thanks for his safe return; where, in compliance with the popular superstition, he paid his devotion also to that tutelary Minerva, whom, at his quitting Rome, he had placed in the temple of her father. From this office of religion he was conducted by the same company, and with the same accompaniments, to his brother's house, where this great procession ended; which, from one end of the city to the other, was so splendid and triumphant, that he had reason, he says, to fear, lest people should imagine that he himself had contrived his flight for the sake of so glorious a restoration².

SECTION VI.

Cicero's return was, what he himself truly calls it, the beginning of a new life to him³, which was to be governed by new maxims and a new kind of policy, yet so as not to forfeit his old character. He had been made to feel in what hands the weight of power lay, and what little dependence was to be placed on the help and support of his aristocratic friends. Pompey had served him on this important occasion very sincerely, and with the concurrence also of Caesar, so as to make it a point of gratitude as well as prudence to be more obedient of them than he had hitherto been. The senate, on the other hand, with the magistrates and the honest of all ranks, were zealous in his cause; and the consul Lentulus above all seemed to make it the sole end and glory of his administration⁴. This uncommon consent of opposite parties in promoting his restoration drew upon him a variety of obligations which must needs often clash and interfere with each other, and which it was his part still to manage so as to make them consistent with his honour, his safety, his private and his public duty: these were to be the springs and motives of his new life—the hinges on which his future conduct was to turn—and to do justice severally to them all, and assign to each its proper weight and measure of influence, required his utmost skill and address⁵.

The day after his arrival, on the fifth of September, the consuls summoned the senate to give him an opportunity of paying his thanks to them in public for their late services, where, after a general profession of his obligations to them all, he made his particular acknowledgments to each magistrate by name—to the consuls, the tribunes, the prætors; he addressed himself to the tribunes before the prætors, not for the dignity of their office, for in that they were inferior, but for their greater authority in making laws, and consequently their greater merit in carrying his law into effect. The number of his private friends was too great to make it possible for him to enumerate or thank them all; so that he confined himself to the magistrates, with exception only to Pompey⁶, whom, for the eminence of his character, though at present only a private man, he took care to distinguish by a personal address and compliment. But as Lentulus was the first in office, and had served him with the greatest affection, so he gives him the first share of his praise, and in the overflowing of his gratitude styles him the parent and the god of his life and fortunes⁷. The next day he paid his thanks likewise to the people in a speech from the rostra, where he dwelt chiefly on the same topics which he had used in the senate, celebrating the particular merits and services of his principal friends, especially of Pompey, whom he declares to be the greatest man for virtue, wisdom, glory, who was then living, or had lived, or ever would live, and that he owed more to him on this occasion than it was even lawful almost for one man to owe to another⁸.

Both these speeches are still extant, and a passage or two from each will illustrate the temper and disposition in which he returned. In speaking to the senate, after a particular recital of the services of his friends, he adds—"As I have a pleasure in enumerating these, so I willingly pass over in silence what others wickedly acted against

¹ Sed quia sæpe concurrit, propter aliquorum de me meritum inter ipso contentiones, ut eodem tempore in omnes vereræ ne vix possem gratias videri. Sed ego hoo meis ponderibus examinabo, non solum quid cuique debeam, sed etiam quid cuiusque intersit, et quid a me cuiusque tempus poscat.—Pro Flancio, 32.

² Cum perpaucis nominatim gratias egissem, quod omnes enumerari nullo modo possem, socius autem esset quenquam præteriri.—Ibid. 30.

³ Hodierno autem die nominatim a me magistratibus statim gratias esse agendas, et de privatis uni, qui pro salute meo municipia, coloniasque adlisset.—Post Red. in Sen. 12.

⁴ Princeps P. Lentulus, parens ac deus nostræ vitæ, fortune, &c.—Ibid. 4. It was a kind of maxim among the ancients; that to do good to a mortal, was to be a god to a mortal. Deus est mortali, juvare mortalem. [Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 7.] Thus Cicero, as he calls Lentulus here his god, so on other occasions gives the same appellation to Plato, Deus ille nostræ Platonis—[Ad Att. iv. 16.] to express the highest sense of the benefits received from them.

⁵ Cn. Pompeius, vir omnium qui sunt, fuerunt, erunt, princeps virtute, sapientia, ac gloria.—Huc ego homini, Quirites, tantum debeo, quantum hominem homini debere vix fas est.—Post Red. ad Quir. 7.

¹ Inter a porta, in Capitolium ascensus, domum reditus meo clamor, ut summa in lætitia illud dolorem, civitatem tam prout, tam miseram atque oppressam fuisse.—Pro Sext. 63.

² Quædam in Capitolino, quem propter beneficia, populus Romanus Optimum, propter vim, Maximum, nominavit.—Pro Leone, 37.

³ Et tunc mihi consecrata illa vis non modo non perperanda, sed etiam emenda fuisse videatur.—Pro Leone, 32.

⁴ Altera vitæ quedam initium orditur. [Ad Att. iv. 1.] In another place he calls his restoration to his former dignity, restitutio, [Ad Att. vi. 6.] or a new birth; stated borrowed probably from the Pythagorean school, and applied afterwards by the sacred writers to the renovation of our nature by baptism, as well as our restoration to life after death in the general resurrection.—Matt. xix. 29; 2d Th. 1.

⁵ Hoc specimen virtutis, hoc indicium animi, hoc lumen consilii sui fore putavit, et me mihi, si meis, si reipublice reddidisset.—Post Red. in Sen. 4.

me. It is not my present business to remember injuries, which, if it were in my power to revenge, I should choose to forget; my life shall be applied to other purposes—to repay the good offices of those who have deserved it of me; to hold fast the friendships which have been tried as it were in the fire; to wage war with declared enemies; to pardon my timorous, nor yet expose my treacherous friends; and to balance the misery of my exile by the dignity of my returns." To the people he observes, "that there were four sorts of enemies who concurred to oppress him—the first, who, out of hatred to the republic, were mortal enemies to him for having saved it; the second, who, under a false pretence of friendship, infamously betrayed him; the third, who, through their inability to obtain what he had acquired, were envious of his dignity; the fourth, who, though by office they ought to have been the guardians of the republic, bartered away his safety, the peace of the city, and the dignity of the empire, which were committed to their trust. I will take my revenge, says he, on each of them, agreeably to the different manner of their provocation, on the bad citizens, by defending the republic strenuously; on my perfidious friends, by never trusting them again; on the envious, by continuing my steady pursuit of virtue and glory; on those merchants of provinces, by calling them home to give an account of their administration: but I am more solicitous how to acquit myself of my obligations to you for your great services, than to resent the injuries and cruelties of my enemies; for it is much easier to revenge an injury than to repay a kindness, and much less trouble to get the better of bad men than to equal the good¹."

This affair being happily over, the senate had leisure again to attend to public business; and there was now a case before them of a very urgent nature, which required a present remedy,—an unusual scarcity of corn and provisions in the city, which had been greatly increased by the late concourse of people from all parts of Italy on Cicero's account, and was now felt very severely by the poorer citizens. They had borne it with much patience while Cicero's return was in agitation; comforting themselves with a notion, that if he was once restored plenty would be restored with him; but finding the one at last effected without the other, they began to grow clamorous, and unable to endure their hunger any longer.

Clodius could not let slip so fair an opportunity of exciting some new disturbance, and creating fresh trouble to Cicero, by charging the calamity to his score: for this end he employed a number of young fellows to run all night about the streets making a lamentable outcry for bread, and calling upon Cicero to relieve them from the famine to which he had reduced them; as if he had got some hidden store or magazine of corn secreted from common use¹. He sent his mob also to the theatre in which the prætor Cæcilius, Cicero's particular friend, was exhibiting the Apollinarian where they raised such a terror, that they drove the whole company out of it: then, in the tumultuous manner, they marched to the house of Concord, whither Metellus had summoned the senate; but happening to meet with Metellus the way, they presently attacked him with stones, with some of which they wounded the consul himself, who, for the greater security, immediately adjourned the senate into the temple of Vesta. They were led on by two desperate ruffian usual commanders, M. Lollius and M. Scaurus, the first of whom had in Clodius's tribunate undertaken the task of killing Pompey, the other had been captain of the guard to Catiline, and was probably of his family²: but Clodius, encouraged by this hopeful beginning, put himself at the head in person, and pursued the senate into the capitol, in order to disturb their debates, and prevent their providing any relief for the people, and above all to excite the meaner sort to violence against Cicero. But he soon found to his great disappointment, that Cicero was too strong in the affections of the city to be hurried so soon: for the people themselves saw the design, and were so provoked at it that they turned universally against him and drove him out of the field with all his mercenaries; whereupon Cicero was not present in the city, and they called out upon him by name with cries and would not be quieted till he came in person to undertake their cause, and propose some expedient for their relief. He had kept his house for several days, and resolved to do so till he saw the tumult; but when he understood that the people was repulsed, and that his presence was now required by the consuls, the senate, and the people, he came to the senate-house in the midst of their debates, and being presently asked for his opinion, proposed that Pompey should be entrusted to undertake the province of restoring plenty to the city, and, to enable him to execute it with effect, should be invested with an absolute power to search the public stores and corn-rents of the provinces through all the provinces. The motion was accepted, and a vote immediately passed that the senate should be prepared for that purpose and on behalf of the people³. All the consular senators were except Messala and Afranius: they pretended

¹ Cum homines ad theatrum primum, deinde ad concourriscentem impulsi Clodii.—Ad Att. iv. 1.

² Concursum est ad templum Concordiæ factum, illuc vocante Metello—Qui sunt homines a Q. Metello palam nominati, a quibus ille se lapidibus tum, etiam percutum esse dixit.—Quis est iste? Qui te tribuno plebis.—Cn. Pompeium interfectum deposcent.—Quis est Sergius? Armiger Catilinæ, tui corporis, signifer seditionis—his atque hujusmodi, cum tu in annonæ caritate in consules, in senatibus impetui comparares.—Pro Domo, 5.

³ Ego vero domi me tenui, quandoque turbulenti populus fuit—cum servos tuos ad raptinam, ad bonorum paratos—armatos etiam in Capitolium tecum venisti—solum me domi mansisse—postquam cum mihi tum est, populum Romanum in Capitolium—conministros autem scelerum tuorum portaveris, amissis gladiis, partim ereptis diffugisse; veni non sine ullis copiis, ac manu, verum etiam cum amicis.—Ibid. 3.

Ego denique, a populo Romano universo, qui Capitolium convenerat, cum illo die minus veni nominatim in senatum vocabar. Veni expectatus.

¹ Post Red. in Sen. 2.

² Post Red. ad Quir. 9.

³ Qui facultate oblata, ad imperitorum animos incitandos, renovatorum to illa funesta latrocinia ob annonæ causam putaverit.—Pro Domo, 5.

Quid? puerorum illa concursio nocturna? num a te ipso instituta me frumentum flagitabant? Quasi vero ego aut rei frumentariæ præfuissem, aut compressum aliquod frumentum tenerem.—Ibid. 6.

is afraid of the mob; but the real cause was their unwillingness to concur in granting this commission to Pompey. The consuls carried the decree with them into the rostra, and read it publicly to the people, who, on the mention of Cicero's name, in which it was drawn, gave a universal shout of applause; upon which, at the desire of all the magistrates, Cicero made a speech to them, setting forth the reasons and necessity of the decree, and giving them the comfort of a speedy relief from the vigilance and authority of Pompey. The senate, however, of the consular senators gave a handle to reflect upon the act, as not free and mild, but extorted by fear, and without the interposition of the principal members; but the very next day, in a fuller house, when all those senators were present, and a motion was made to revoke the decree, it was unanimously rejected; and the senate were ordered to draw up a law conformable to it, by which the whole administration of the senate and provisions of the republic was to be granted to Pompey for five years, with a power of choosing fifteen lieutenants to assist him in it.

This furnished Clodius with fresh matter of abuse upon Cicero: he charged him with ingratitude and the desertion of the senate, which had always been firm to him, in order to pay his court to a man who had betrayed him; and that he was as silly as not to know his own strength and credit in the city, and how able he was to maintain his authority without the help of Pompey. But Cicero defended himself by saying, "that they must not expect to play the same game upon him now that he was restored, with which they had abused him before, by raising jealousies between him and Pompey; that he had smarted for it too severely already, to be caught again in the same trap; that in decreeing this commission to Pompey, he had discharged both his private obligations to his friend and his public duty to the state; that those who grudged all extraordinary power to Pompey, must grudge the victories, the triumphs, the accession of dominion and revenue, which their former grants of this sort had procured to the senate; that the success of those showed what they were to expect from this."

But what authority soever this law conferred on Pompey, his creatures were not yet satisfied with it; so that Messius, one of the tribunes, proposed another, to give him the additional power of raising what money, fleets and armies he thought fit, with a greater command through all the provinces than their proper governors had in each. Cicero's law seemed modest in comparison of Messius's. Pompey pretended to be content with the first, whilst all his dependants were pushing for the last; they expected that Cicero would come over to them, but he continued silent, nor would stir a step farther,—for his affairs were still in such a state as obliged him to act with caution, and to manage both the senate and the men of power: the conclusion was, that Cicero's law was received by all parties, and Pompey named him for his first lieutenant, declaring that he should consider him as a second self, and act nothing without his advice. Cicero accepted the employment, on condition that he might be at liberty to use or resign it at pleasure, as he found it convenient to his affairs; but he soon after quitted it to his brother, and chose to continue in the city, where he had the pleasure to see the end of his law effectually answered; for the credit of Pompey's name immediately reduced the price of victuals in the markets, and his vigour and diligence in prosecuting the affair soon established a general plenty.

Cicero was restored to his former dignity, but not to his former fortunes; nor was any satisfaction yet made to him for the ruin of his houses and estates: a full restitution indeed had been decreed, but was reserved to his return; which came now before the senate to be considered and settled by public authority, where it met still with great obstruction. The chief difficulty was about his Palatine house, which he valued above all the rest, and which Clodius for that reason had contrived to alienate, as he hoped, irretrievably, by demolishing the fabric, and dedicating a temple upon the area to the goddess Liberty; where, to make his work the more complete, he pulled down also the adjoining portico of Catulus, that he might build it up anew of the same order with his temple, and by blending the public with private property, and consecrating the whole to religion, might make it impossible to separate or restore any part to Cicero,—since a consecration, legally performed, made the thing consecrated unapplicable ever after to any private use.

This portico was built, as has been said, on the spot where Fulvius Flaccus formerly lived, whose house was publicly demolished for the reason of —data merces est erroris mei magna, ut me non solum pigeat stultitia mea, sed etiam pudeat.—Pro Domo, 11.

Cn. Pompeio—maxima terra marique bella extra ordinem esse commissa: quarum rerum si quoniam perirent, eum victorie populi Romani necesse esset perire.—Ibid. 8.

Legem consules conscripserunt—alteram Messius, qua omnis pecunia dat potestatem, et adjuncti classem et exercitum, et majus imperium in provinciis, quam sit eorum, qui eas obtinent. Illa nostra lex consularis nunc modesta videtur, hæc Messii non ferenda. Pompeius illam velle se dicit; familiares hanc. Consulares duces Favonio fremunt, nos tacemus; et eo magis quod de domo nostra nihil adhuc pontifices responderunt.

Ille legatos quindecim cum postularet, me principem nominavit, et ad omnia me alterum se fore dixit.—Ad Att. iv. 1.

Ego me a Pompeio legari ita sum passus, ut nulla re impedire, quod ne, si vellem, mihi esset integrum.—Ibid. 2.

in senectute dicta, rogatus sum sententiam; dixi reipublice suberimam, mihi necessariam.—Pro Domo, 7.

Factum est B. C. in meam sententiam, ut cum Pompeio pinger, ut cum rum conscriperet, lexque ferretur.—Ad Att. iv. 1.

in cum abessent consules, quod tuto se negarent posse sententiam dicere, prout Messianum et Afranium.—Ibid. Quo B. C. restitute, cum continuo more hoc insensu et pro plebiscito, meo nomine recitando dedisset, habui consensum.—Ibid.

Al senem liberum senatus judicium propter metum sen fecit.—Pro Domo, 4.

Patricie senatus frequens, et omnes consules nihil Pompeio postulanti negarunt.—Ad Att. iv. 1.

Cum omnes adessent, scriptum est referri de inducendo B. C. ab universo senatu reclamatum est.—Pro Domo, 4.

Tunc se ille, inquit, quo senatus carere non potuit?—proponitur, senatus auctoritatem restitutum putabamus?—Ibid. 2.

Sancti quantum auctoritate valeat, quas res gesserit, quo dignitate sit restitutus. Cur ornatus eam a quo desertus est?—Ibid. 11.

Dilectum homines hactenus machinis sperare me restitutum posse habebatur, quibus antea stantem percolerunt its master; and it was Clodius's design to join Cicero's to it under the same denomination, as the perpetual memorial of a disgrace and punishment inflicted by the people⁶. When he had finished the portico, therefore, and annexed his temple to it, which took up but a small part, scarce a tenth, of Cicero's house, he left the rest of the area void, in order to plant a grove or walks of pleasure upon it, as had been usual in such cases; where, as it has been observed, he was prosecuting a particular interest, as well as indulging his malice in obstructing the restitution of it to Cicero.

The affair was to be determined by the college of priests, who were the judges in all cases relating to religion; for the senate could only make a provisional decree, that if the priests discharged the ground from the service of religion, then the consuls should take an estimate of the damage, and make a contract for rebuilding the whole at the public charge, so as to restore it to Cicero in the condition in which he left it⁷. The priests, therefore, of all orders, were called together on the last of September to hear this cause, which Cicero pleaded in person before them: they were men of the first dignity and families in the republic; and there never was, as Cicero tells us, so full an appearance of them in any cause since the foundation of the city: he reckons up nineteen by name,—a great part of whom were of consular rank⁸. His first care, before he entered into the merits of the question, was to remove the prejudices which his enemies had been labouring to instil, on the account of his late conduct in favour of Pompey, by explaining the motives and showing the necessity of it; contriving at the same time to turn the odium on the other side, by running over the history of Clodius's tribunate, and painting all its violences in the most lively colours; but the question on which the cause singly turned was about the efficacy of the pretended consecration of the house and the dedication of the temple. To show the nullity, therefore, of this act, he endeavours to overthrow the very foundation of it, "and prove Clodius's tribunate to be originally null and void, from the invalidity of his adoption, on which it was entirely grounded:" he shows, "that the sole end of adoption which the laws acknowledged was to supply the want of children, by borrowing them as it were from other families; that it was an essential condition of it that he who adopted had no children of his own, nor was in condition to have any; that the parties concerned were obliged to appear before the priests to signify their consent, the cause of the adoption, the circumstances of the families interested in it, and the nature of their religious rites; that the priests might judge of the whole, and see that there was no fraud or deceit in it, nor any dishonour to any family or person concerned. That nothing of all this had been observed in the case of Clodius. That the adopter was not full twenty years old when he adopted a senator who was old enough to be his father: that he had occasion to adopt, since he had a wife and and would probably have more, which necessarily disinherited by this adoption, real: that Clodius had no other view the pretence of an adoption, to make himself a tribune, in order to overturn the act itself which confirmed the adoption null and illegal, being transacted while he observed the auspices, which was contrary to express law, and huddled over in three days, when it ought to have been put to three market days successively, at the nine days each⁹: that if the adoption was and illegal, as it certainly was, the tribune needs be so too, which was entirely built but granting the tribunate after all to be cause some eminent men would have it as an act made afterwards for his banishment possibly be considered as a law, but as a law only, made against a particular person, and sacred laws and the laws of the twelve tribes utterly prohibited: that it was contrary to the very constitution of the republic to put a citizen, either in body or goods, till he was accused in proper form, and condemned by competent judges: that private laws to inflict penalties on single persons without a legal trial, were cruel and oppressive and nothing better than proscriptions, things not to be endured in their city¹⁰. In entering upon the question of his house, he says, "that the whole effect of his restoration depended upon it; that if it was not given him, but suffered to remain a monument of to his enemy, of grief and calamity to his country, he could not consider it as a restoration, but as a perpetual punishment: that his house stood as a view of the whole people; and if it remained in its present state, he should be removed to some other place, and could not endure to live in that city in which he must see trophies erected both against himself and the republic: the house of Sp. Melius, (says he) affected a tyranny, was levelled; and by the law of Æquimelium, given to the place, the people confirmed the equity of his punishment: the house of Sp. Cassius was overturned also for the same reason, and a temple raised upon it to Tellus: M. Manlius's house was confiscated and levelled; and the temple to the memory of his treason, the still called Vaccus's meadows: M. Manlius, after he had repulsed the Gauls from the capitol, not content with the glory of that was adjudged to him as a reward; so his house was demolished where you now see the groves planted. Must I, therefore, suffer punishment which our ancestors inflicted on wicked and traitorous citizens? posterity may consider me, not as the offender, but the author and captain of the conspiracy. When he comes to speak to the dedication of the temple, he observes, "that the goddess Liberty, the temple was dedicated, was the known and celebrated strumpet, which Appian broog

⁶ Ut domus M. Tullii Ciceronis cum domo Fulvii Flacci ad memoriam penus publicae constituta conjuncta esse videatur.—Pro Domo, 38.

⁷ Qui si sustulerint religionem, aream proclaram habebimus: superficem consules ex S. C. aestimabunt.—Ad Att. liv. 1.

⁸ Nego unquam post sacra constituta, quorum eadem est antiquitas, quae ipsius urbis, illa de re, ne de capite quidem Virginum Vestalium, tam frequens collegium judicasse.—De Harusp. Resp. 6, 7.

⁹ Pro Domo, 13, 14, 15, 16.

¹⁰ Ibid. 17.—In privis homines leges ferri nolo est enim privilegium: quo quid est injustius?—Ibid. 19.

¹¹ Pro Domo, 37, 38.

Greece for the ornament of his sedileship; and upon dropping the thoughts of that magistracy, gave to his brother Clodius to be advanced into a city^a: that the ceremony was performed without any licence or judgment obtained from the college of priests, by the single ministry of a raw young man, the brother-in-law of Clodius, who had been a priest but a few days before,—a mere novice in his business, and forced into the service^b: but all had been transacted regularly and in due form, that it could not possibly have any force, as being contrary to the standing laws of the republic: for there was an old tribunitian law made by Q. Fabius, which prohibited the consecration of houses, lands, or altars, without the express consent of the people; which was not obtained nor was pretended in the present case^c: that great regard had always been paid to this law in several instances of the gravest kind: that Q. Marcius, the censor, erected a statue of Concord in a public part of the city, which C. Cassius afterwards, when censor, removed into the senate-house, and consulted the college of priests whether he might not dedicate the statue and the house also itself to Concord; upon which M. Æmilius, the high-priest, gave answer, in the name of the college, that unless the people had deputed him by name, he could not act in it by their authority, they were of opinion that he could not rightly dedicate them^d: that Læmia also, a vestal virgin, dedicated an altar and little temple under the sacred rock; upon which S. Julius, the prætor, by order of the senate, consulted the college of priests; for whom P. Æmilius, the high-priest, gave answer, that what he had dedicated in a public place, without the order of the people, could not be considered consecrated: so that the senate enjoined the prætor that he desecrated, and to efface whatever had been inscribed upon it. After all this, it was to no purpose, he tells them, to mention what he had proposed to speak to in the last place, that the consecration was not performed with any of the usual words and rites which such a function required, but by the ignorant young man before-mentioned, without the help of his colleagues, his wife, or any to prompt him; especially when he, who directed him, that impure enemy of religion, who often acted the woman among men, as well as the man among women, huddled the whole ceremony in a blundering precipitate manner, faltering and confounded in mind, voice, and speech, often recalling himself, doubting, hesitating, and performing everything the contrary to what the sacred books prescribed: it is strange (says he), that in an act so mad and villainous, his audaciousness could not get the better of his fears; for what pirate, though ever so barbarous, after he had been plundering temples, when pricked by a dream or scruple of religion, came to consecrate some altar on a desert shore, was not terrified in his mind on being told to appease that deity by his prayers whom he had provoked by his sacrilege? In what house, then, think you, must this man needs be, the plunderer of all temples, houses, and the whole city, when for the expiation of so many impieties he was wickedly consecrating one single altar?^e”

Then, after a solemn invocation and appeal “to all the gods who peculiarly favoured and protected that city, to bear witness to the integrity of his zeal and love to the republic,” and that “in all his labours and struggles he had constantly preferred the public benefit to his own, he commits the justice of his cause to the judgment of the venerable bench.”

He was particularly pleased with the composition of this speech, which he published immediately; and says upon it, that if ever he made any figure in speaking, his indignation and the sense of his injuries had inspired him with new force and spirit in this cause^f. The sentence of the priests turned wholly on what Cicero had alleged about the force of the Papirian law; viz. that if he, who performed the office of consecration, had not been specially authorised and personally appointed to it by the people, then the area in question might, without any scruple of religion, be restored to Cicero. This, though it seemed somewhat evasive, was sufficient for Cicero's purpose; and his friends congratulated him upon it, as upon a clear victory; while Clodius interpreted it still in favour of himself, and being produced into the rostra by his brother Appius, acquainted the people, that the priests had given judgment for him, but that Cicero was preparing to recover possession by force, and exhorted them therefore to follow him and Appius in the defence of their liberties. But his speech made no impression on the audience; some wondered at his impudence, others laughed at his folly, and Cicero resolved not to trouble himself or the people about it, till the consuls, by a decree of the senate, had contracted for rebuilding the portico of Catulus^g.

The senate met the next day, in a full house, to put an end to this affair; when Marcellinus, one of the consuls elect, being called upon to speak first, addressed himself to the priests, and desired them to give an account of the grounds and meaning of their sentence: upon which Lucullus, in the name of the rest, declared, that the priests were indeed the judges of religion, but the senate of the law; that they therefore had determined only what related to the point of religion, and left it to the senate to determine whether any obstacle remained in point of law: all the other priests spoke largely after him in favour of Cicero's cause: when Clodius rose afterwards to speak, he endeavoured to waste the time so as to hinder their coming to any resolution that day; but after he had been speaking for three hours successively, the assembly grew so impatient, and made such a noise and

^f Acta res est accurate a nobis; et si unquam in dicendo fulmus aliquid, aut etiam si unquam altus fulmus, tam profecto dolor et magnitudo vim quamdam nobis diendi dedit. Itaque oratio juventuti nostræ debere non potest. —Ad Att. iv. 2.

^g Cum pontifices decreverint, ita, si neque populi jussu, neque plebis scitu, is qui se dedicasse diceret, nominatim ei rei præfectus esset; neque populi jussu, neque plebis scitu id facere jussus esset, videri posse sine religione eam partem aree mihi restitit. Mihi facta statim est gratulatio: nemo enim dubitat, quin domus nobis esset adjudicata. Tum subito ille in concionem ascendit, quam Appius ei dedit: nunciat jam populo, pontifices secundum se decrevisse; me autem vi conari in possessionem venire: hortatur, ut se et Appium sequantur, et eam libertatem ut defendant. Hic cum etiam illi infami partem admirarentur, partim irriterent hominis amentiam. —Ad Am. iv. 2.

^a Pro Domo, 43.

^b Ibid. 45.

^c Ibid. 48.

^d Ibid. 51, 53.

^e Ibid. 54, 55.

hissing, that he was forced to give over: yet when they were going to pass a decree, in the words of Marcellinus, Serranus put his negative upon it: this raised a universal indignation; and a fresh debate began, at the motion of the two consuls, on the merit of the tribune's intercession; when, after many warm speeches, they came to the following vote; that it was the resolution of the senate, that Cicero's house should be restored to him, and Catulus's portico rebuilt, as it had been before; and that this vote should be defended by all the magistrates; and if any violence or obstruction was offered to it, that the senate would look upon it as offered by him who had interposed his negative. This staggered Serranus, and the late farce was played over again; his father threw himself at his feet, to beg him to desist; he desired a night's time; which at first was refused, but on Cicero's request granted; and the next day he revoked his negative, and without farther opposition suffered the senate to pass a decree, that Cicero's damage should be made good to him, and his houses rebuilt at the public charge¹.

The consuls began presently to put the decree in execution; and having contracted for the rebuilding Catulus's portico, set men to work upon clearing the ground, and demolishing what had been built by Clodius: but as to Cicero's buildings, it was agreed to take an estimate of his damage, and pay the amount of it to himself, to be laid out according to his own fancy: in which his Palatine house was valued at sixteen thousand pounds; his Tusculan at four thousand; his Formian only at two thousand. This was a very deficient and shameful valuation, which all the world cried out upon; for the Palatine house had cost him not long before near twice that sum: but Cicero would not give himself any trouble about it, or make any exceptions, which gave the consuls a handle to throw the blame upon his own modesty, for not remonstrating against it, and seeming to be satisfied with what was awarded: but the true reason was, as he himself declares, that those who had clipped his wings, had no mind to let them grow again; and though they had been his advocates when absent, began now to be secretly angry, and openly envious of him when present¹.

But as he was never covetous, this affair gave him no great uneasiness; though, through the late ruin of his fortunes, he was now in such want of money, that he resolved to expose his Tusculan villa to sale; but soon changed his mind and built it up again, with much more magnificence than before; and for the beauty of its situation and neighbourhood to the city, took more pleasure in it ever after than in any other of his country-seats. But he had some domestic grievances about this time, which touched him more nearly; and which, as he signifies obscurely to Atticus, were of too delicate a nature to be explained by: they arose chiefly from the petulant humour of his wife, which began to give him frequent of chagrin; and by a series of repetitions confirmed in him that settled which ended at last in a divorce.

As he was now restored to the possession of his dignity and fortunes, so he was destroyed all the public monuments of his grace; nor to suffer the law of his exile together with the other acts of Clodius's tribunate up in the Capitol, engraved, as usual, on brass: watching therefore the opportunity of Clodius's absence, he went to the Capitol with a strong body of his friends, and taking them down, conveyed them to his own house: occasioned a sharp contest in the senate between him and Clodius about the validity of the act, and drew Cato also into the debate; who for the sake of his Cyprian commission, though obliged to defend their legality against the act, which created some little coldness between them, and gave no small pleasure to the common people of them both¹.

But Cicero's chief concern at present was to support his former authority in the province, and provide for his future safety; as well as to guard against the malice of declared enemies as the envy of pretended friends, which he perceived to be up against him: he had thoughts of going in for the censorship; or of procuring some honorary lieutenantships which gave a pre-eminence to private senators; with intent to make a progress through Italy, or a kind of pilgrimage to all the temples, groves, and places, on pretence of a vow made in Italy. This would give him an opportunity of himself everywhere in a light which attracts the affection of the multitude, by a pious regard to the favourite superstitions and local religions of the country; as the great country, still pay their court to them by visiting the shrines and altars of the gods which are most in vogue: he mentions this project to Atticus, as designed to be executed in the spring, resolving in the meanwhile to check the good inclination of the people towards him, by keeping himself perpetually in the vicinity of the city².

Catulus's portico and Cicero's house were again apace, and carried up almost to the top when Clodius, without any warning, with a band of armed men, who demolished the portico, and the workmen out of Cicero's ground, and the stones and rubbish of the place began to pull down Quintus's house, with whom Cicero then lived, and at last set fire to it; so that the two brothers with their families, were forced to save themselves by a hasty flight. Milo had already been killed by Clodius for his former violence, and if possible, to bring him to justice: Cicero

¹ Ad Att. iv. 2.

² Nobis superciliosum sedulum consules de consilii sententia sustinuerunt H. & vires; contra valde illiberaliter: Tusculanum villam quingentis milibus; Formianum ducentis quingentis milibus; quam estimatio non modo ab optimo quoque et etiam a plebe reprehenditur. Dicis, quid tibi casus fuit? Dicunt illi quidem pudorem meum, quod neque negarim, neque vehementius postularim. Sed non est id; nam hoc quidem etiam profuerit. Verum idem, mi Pompei, idem inquam illi, qui mihi penam inciderunt, volunt eandem renasci.—Ibid.

¹ Tusculanum proscipit: suburbano non facit. Cetera, que me sollicitant, superius depreca sunt. a fratre et filia.—Ad Att. iv. 2.

² Plutarch. in Clod. & Dio, p. 190.

³ Ut aulis re impediretur, quod ne si vellem, integrum, aut si comitia censem proximo essent, petere possem, aut votivam legationem summi omnium suorum, facerem.—Ad Att. iv. 2.

the other hand, was suing for the sedition, to secure himself, for one year more at least, from any prosecution: he was sure of being condemned if he was brought to trial, so that whatever mischief he did in the mean time was all clear gain, and could not make his cause the worse": he therefore gave a free course to his natural fury; was perpetually scouring the streets with his libellaries, and threatening fire and sword to the city itself, if an assembly was not called for the election of sediles. In this humour, about a week after his last outrage, on the eleventh of November, he happened to meet with Cicero in the sacred street, and suddenly assaulted him with stones, clubs, and such words: Cicero was not prepared for the encounter, and took refuge in the vestibule of the house; where his attendants rallying in his defence, beat off the assailants, and could easily have killed their leader, but that Cicero was willing, to care by diet, rather than surgery. The following Clodius attacked Milo's house, with fire in hand and lighted flambeaus, with intent to burn it: but Milo was never unprovided for him; and Q. Flaccus, sallying out with a strong band of stout fellows, killed several of them, and would have killed Clodius too, if he had not hid himself in the inner apartments of Milo's house, which he made use of on this occasion as his fortress*.

On the senate met, on the fourteenth, to take these matters into consideration; Clodius did not think to appear there; but Sylla came, to clear himself probably from the suspicion of encouraging these violences, on account of the freedom he had taken with his house†. Many severe laws were made, and vigorous counsels proposed; Marcellinus's opinion was, that Clodius should be impeached anew for these last outrages; but that no election of sediles should be suffered till he was brought to a trial: Milo declared, that he would be continued in office, the consuls should make no election; for he would be at the auspices every day on which an assembly was to be held; but Metellus contrived to waste his day in speaking, so that they were forced to pass without making any decree. Milo was as usual to his word, and, having gathered a superior force, took care to obstruct the election; though the consul Metellus employed all his power and authority to elude his vigilance, and procure an assembly at another place; calling it to one place and holding it at another, sometimes in the field of Mars, sometimes in the forum; but Milo was ever beforehand with him; and, keeping a constant guard in the field from midnight to noon, was always at hand to inhibit his proceedings, by obnouncing, as it was called, or declaring, that he was taking the auspices on that day; so that the three brothers were baffled and disappointed, though they were perpetually haranguing and labouring to inflame the people against those who interrupted their assemblies and right of electing; where Metellus's speeches were turbulent, Appius's rash, Clodius's furious. Cicero, who gives this account to Atticus, was of opinion, that there would be no election; and that Clodius would be brought to trial, if he was not first killed by Milo; which was likely to be his fate: "Milo (says he) makes no scruple to own it; being not deterred by my misfortune, and having no envious or perfidious counsellors about him, nor any lazy nobles to discourage him: it is commonly given out by the other side, that what he does, is all done by my advice; but they little know how much conduct, as well as courage, there is in this hero‡."

Young Lentulus, the son of the consul, was, by the interest of his father and the recommendation of his noble birth, chosen into the college of augurs this summer, though not yet seventeen years old; having but just changed his puerile for the manly gown: Cicero was invited to the inauguration feast, where by eating too freely of some vegetables, which happened to please his palate, he was seized with a violent pain of the bowels, and diarrhoea; of which he sends the following account to his friend Gallus.

Cicero to Gallus.

"After I had been labouring for ten days, with a cruel disorder in my bowels, yet could not convince those who wanted me at the bar that I was ill because I had no fever, I ran away to Tusculum; having kept so strict a fast for two days before, that I did not taste so much as water: being worn out therefore with illness and fasting, I wanted rather to see you, than imagined that you expected a visit from me: for my part, I am afraid, I confess, of all distempers; but especially of those for which the Stoics abuse your Epicurus, when he complains of the strangury and dysentery;

¶ Egregius Marcellinus, omnes acres; Metellus calumnia dicendi tempus eximit: conciones turbulente Metelli, temerarie Appii, furiosissime Clodii; hæc tamen summa, nisi Milo in Campum obnunciasset, comitia futura.—Comitia fore non arbitror: reum Publium, nisi ante oculos erit, fore a Milone puto. Si se inter viam obtulerit, occisum iri ab ipso Milone video. Non dubitat facere; pro se fert; cæsum illum nostrum non extimescit, &c.

¶ Mæo consilio omnia illi fieri querebantur, ignari quantum in illo heros esset animi, quantum etiam consilii.—Ad Att. iv. 3.

N.B.—From these facts it appears, that what is said above, of Clodius's repealing the Ælian and Fustian laws, and prohibiting the magistrates from obstructing the assemblies of the people, is to be understood only in a partial sense, and that his new law extended no farther than to hinder the magistrates from dissolving an assembly after it was actually convened and had entered upon business; for it was still unlawful, we see, to convene an assembly while the magistrate was in the act of observing the heavens.

¶ Cui superior annus idem et virilem patris et prætextam populi judicio togam dederit.—Pro Sext. 69; id. Dio, l. xxxix. p. 99.

¶ Armatis hominibus ante diem iii. Non. Novemb. facti sunt fabri de aera nostra, disturbata porticus Cæsar ad theatrum perne pervenerat. Quinti fratris cum primo fracto coniecto lapidum, ex aera nostra, hujusmodi Clodii inflammata, inspectante urbe, coniectis sunt.—Videtur, ut omnes quos vult palam occiderit, ut eam causam difficiliorum, quam adhuc sit, in se retineret.—Ad Att. iv. 3.

¶ Ante diem tertium Id. Novemb. cum sacra via descenderet, interitus est me cum suis. Clamor, lapides, fustes, &c.; hæc inprovisum omnia. Dioclesimus in vestibulum introivit: qui erant mecum facile operas aditu præstiterunt. Ipse occidi potuit; sed ego dicta curare coepi, chirurgie tradet.—Miloni domum pridie Id. excipere et incendere ita conatus est, ut palam hora quinta ad meo hunc, eductis gladiis, alios cum accensis suis adduxerit. Ipse domum P. Syllæ pro consule ad me impugnationem suscepit, &c.—Ad Att. iv. 3.

¶ Syllæ in comitiis postidie Idus, domi Clodii.—Ibid.

the one of which they take to be the effect of glut-tony; the other of a more scandalous intemper-ance. I was apprehensive indeed of a dysentery; but seem to have found benefit, either from the change of air, or the relaxation of my mind, or the remission of the disease itself: but that you may not be surprised how this should happen, and what I have been doing to bring it upon me; the sumptuary law, which seems to introduce a sim-plicity of diet, did me all this mischief. For since our men of taste are grown so fond of covering their tables with the productions of the earth which are excepted by the law, they have found a way of dressing mushrooms and all other vegetables so palatably, that nothing can be more delicious: I happened to fall upon these at Lentulus's augural supper, and was taken with so violent a flux, that this is the first day on which it has begun to give me any ease. Thus I, who used to command myself so easily in oysters and lampreys, was caught with beet and mallows; but I shall be more cautious for the future: you however, who must have heard of my illness from Anicius, for he saw me in a fit of vomiting, had a just reason, not only for sending, but for coming yourself to see me. I think to stay here till I recruit myself; for I have lost both my strength and my flesh; but if I once get rid of my distemper, it will be easy, I hope, to recover the rest.*

King Ptolemy left Rome about this time, after he had distributed immense sums among the great, to purchase his restoration by a Roman army. The people of Egypt had sent deputies also after him, to plead their cause before the senate, and to explain the reasons of their expelling him; but the king contrived to get them all assassinated on the road, before they reached the city. This piece of villany, and the notion of his having bribed all the magistrates, had raised so general an aversion to him among the people, that he found it advis-able to quit the city and leave the management of his interest to his agents. The consul Lentulus, who had obtained the province of Cilicia and Cyprus, whither he was preparing to set forward, was very desirous to be charged with the com-mission of replacing him on his throne; for which he had already procured a vote of the senate: the opportunity of a command, almost in sight of Egypt, made him generally thought to have the best pretensions to that charge; and he was assured of Cicero's warm assistance in soliciting the con-firmation of it.

In this situation of affairs, the new tribunes entered into office: C. Cato, of the same family with his namesake Marcus, was one of the number; a bold, turbulent man, of no temper or prudence, yet a tolerable speaker, and generally on the better side in politics. Before he had borne any public

* Ep. Fam. vii. 26.

N.B. Pliny says, that the colica, by which he is sup-posed to mean the colic, was not known at Rome till the reign of Tiberius: but the case described in this letter seems to come so very near to it, that he must be under-stood, rather of the name, than of the thing; as the learned Dr. Le Clerc has observed in his History of Medicine.—Plin. l. xxvi. 1; Le Clerc, Hist. par. ii. l. 4. sect. ii. c. 4.

The mention likewise of the δυσουπνία ῥέθη, or the strangury of Epictetus, and the censure which the Stoics passed upon it, would make one apt to suspect, that some disorders of a venereal kind were not unknown to the ancients.

office, he attempted to impeach Gabinius and corruption; but not being able to audience of the prætors, he had the har-mount the rostra, which was never allow-private citizen, and, in a speech to the declared Pompey dictator: but his pre-had like to have cost him dear; for it ra-an indignation in the audience, that he b-difficulty to escape with his life[†]. He his present magistracy by declaring loadl-king Ptolemy, and all who favoured his-cially Lentulus; whom he supposed to some private engagement with him, and reason was determined to baffle all their s-

Lupus likewise, one of his colleagues, at the senate, and raised an expectation of common proposal from him; it was inde-extraordinary nature; to revise and an-famed act of Caesar's consulship, for the of the Campanian lands: he spoke long-upon it, and was heard with much attenti-great praises to Cicero, with severe reflex-Cæsar, and expostulations with Pompey, now abroad in the execution of his late-sion; in the conclusion he told them, would not demand the opinions of the p-senators, because he had no mind to exp-to the resentment and animosity of any; the ill humour, which he remembered, w-act first passed, and the favour with whic-now heard, he could easily collect the sen-house. Upon which Marcellinus said, must not conclude from their silence eit-they liked or disliked: that for his own he might answer too he believed for the chose to say nothing on the subject at pre-cause he thought that the cause of the Ca-lands ought not to be brought upon the Pompey's absence.

This affair being dropped, Racilius, ano-bune, rose up and renewed the debate abou-impeachment of Clodius, and called upon-linus, the consul elect, to give his opinion-who after inveighing against all the viol-Clodius, proposed that, in the first place, ment of judges should be made for the tr-after that, the election of ædiles; and if-attempted to hinder the trial, that he deemed a public enemy. The other cons-Philippus, was of the same mind; but the Cato and Cassius spoke against it, and proceeding to an election before any step-a trial. When Cicero was called upon to he ran through the whole series of Clodi-travagances, as if he had been accusing him-at the bar, to the great satisfaction of-sembly: Antistius the tribune seconded l-declared that no business should be don-the trial; and when the house was going-sally into that opinion, Clodius began to with intent to waste the rest of the day, w-slaves and followers without, who had se-steps and avenues of the senate, raised so-noise of a sudden, in abusing some of time, that the senate broke up in no small hurry, and with fresh indignation at this new insult*.

[†] Ut Cato, adolescens nullius consilii,—vix vi-goret; quod cum Gabinius de ambitu vellet; neque prætores diebus aliquot adiri posset, v-tatem sui facerent, in concionem adscendit, et Po-privatus dictatorem appellavit. Propius nihil est quam ut occideretur.—Ep. ad Quint. Frat. l. 2.

There was no more business done through the remaining part of December, which was taken up chiefly with holy days. Lentulus and Metellus, whose consulship expired with the year, set forward for their several governments; the one for Cilicia, the other for Spain: Lentulus committed the whole direction of his affairs to Cicero; and Metellus, unwilling to leave him his enemy, made up all matters with him before his departure, and wrote an affectionate letter to him afterwards from Spain; in which he acknowledges his services, and intimates, that he had given up his brother Clodius in exchange for his friendship†.

Cicero's first concern, on the opening of the new year, was to get the commission, for restoring king Ptolemy, confirmed to Lentulus; which came now under deliberation: the tribune, Cato, was fierce against restoring him at all, with the greatest part of the senate on his side; when taking occasion to consult the Sibylline books on the subject of some late prodigies, he chanced to find in them certain verses, forewarning the Roman people not to replace an exiled king of Egypt with an army. This was so pat to his purpose, that he could be no doubt of its being forged; but he called up the guardians of the books into the senate, to testify the passage to be genuine; where he publicly read and explained to the people: it was laid also before the senate, who greedily received it; and after a grave debate on this scruple of religion, came to a resolution, that it seemed dangerous to the republic, that the king should be restored by a multitude‡. It cannot be imagined that they laid any real stress on this admonition of the sibyl, for there was not a man either in or out of the house who did not take it for a fiction: it was a fair pretext for defeating a project, which was generally disliked: they were unwilling to signify any man's ambition, of visiting the rich king of Egypt, at the head of an army; and imagined, that without an army, no man would be disposed about going thither at all*.

On this point being settled, the next question was, in what manner the king should be restored: three opinions were proposed; Crassus moved, that three ambassadors, chosen from those who had the public command, should be sent on the business; which did not exclude Pompey: Bibulus proposed that three private senators; and Volcatius, that Pompey alone, should be charged with it: but Cicero, Hortensius, and Lucullus urged, that Lentulus, to whom the senate had already decreed it, and who could execute it with most convenience, should restore him without an army. The two first opinions were soon overruled, and the struggle lay between Lentulus and Pompey. Cicero, though he had some reason to complain of Lentulus since his return, particularly for the contemptible valuation of his houses, yet for the great part which he had borne in restoring him, was very desirous to show his gratitude, and resolved to support him with all his authority: Pompey, who had obligations also to Lentulus, acted the same part towards him which he had done before towards Cicero; by his own conduct and professions he seemed to have Lentulus's interest at heart; yet by the conduct of all his friends, seemed desirous to procure the employment for himself; while the king's agents and creditors, fancying that their business would be served the most effectually by Pompey, began openly to solicit, and even to bribe for him*. But the senate, through Cicero's influence, stood generally inclined to Lentulus; and after a debate, which ended in his favour, Cicero, who had been the manager of it, happening to sup with Pompey that evening, took occasion to press him with much freedom not to suffer his name to be used in this competition; nor give a handle to his enemies for reproaching him with the desertion of a friend, as well as an ambition of engrossing all power to himself. Pompey seemed touched with the remonstrance, and professed to have no other thought but of serving Lentulus, while his dependants still acted so as to convince everybody that he could not be sincere†.

When Lentulus's pretensions seemed to be in a hopeful way, C. Cato took a new and effectual method to disappoint them, by proposing a law to the people for taking away his government and recalling him home. This stroke surprised every-

* Crassus tres legatos decernit, nec excludit Pompeium: censeat enim etiam ex his, qui cum imperio sunt. M. Bibulus tres legatos ex his, qui privati sunt. Huius assentiantur reliqui consules, præter Servillum, qui omnino reduci negat oportere, et Volcatium, qui decernit Pompeio.—

Hortensii et mea et Luculli sententia.—Ex illo S. C. quod te referente factum est, tibi decernit, ut reducas regem.—

Regis causas si qui sunt qui velint, qui pauci sunt, omnes rem ad Pompeium deferri volunt.—Ep. Fam. l. 1.

Reliqui cum esset in senatu contentio, Lentulus an Pompeius reduceret, obtinere causam Lentulus videbatur.—In ea re Pompeius quid vellet non despicio: familiares ejus quid cupiant, omnes vident. Creditores vero regis aperte pecunias suppeditant contra Lentulum. Sine dubio res remota a Lentulo videtur, cum magno meo dolore: quamquam multa fecit, quare si fas esset, jure et succensere possemus.—Ad Quint. Frat. li. 2.

† Ego eo die casu apud Pompeium cœnavi: nactusque tempus hoc magis idoneum, quam unquam antea post tuum discessum, in enim dies honestissimus nobis fuerat in senatu, ita cum eo illo locutus, ut mihi viderer animum hominis ab omni alia cogitatione ad tuam dignitatem tuendam traducere: quem ego ipsum cum audio, prorsus cum libero omni suspitione cupiditatis: cum autem ejus familiares, omnium ordinum video, perpercio, id quod jam omnibus est apertum, totam rem istam jampridem a certis hominibus, non invito rege ipso.—Ease corruptam.—Ep. Fam. l. 2.

† Tum Clodius rogatus diem dicendo eximere cepit: unde quo opere repente a Gramocastis et gradibus claudens ante magnam sustulerunt, opinor in Q. Sextillum quendam Milonis incitavit: eo metu injecto repente quaestio omnium discessimus.—Ad Quint. Frat.

† Identitatem commutata persona, te mihi fratris loco habeo.—Ep. Fam. v. 3.

† Romanæ religionis cultum, non religionem sed maleficia, et illius regis largitionis invidia comprobatur.—Ep. Fam. l. 1.

† Pompei Alexandrino factum est S. C. cum multitudine ad reduci, periculorum reipublica videri.—Ad Quint. Frat. li. 2.

† Hæc tamen opinio est populi Romani, a tuis invidia ejus detractantibus nomen inductum Actæ religionis, ut tunc ut te impedirent, quam ut neque, propter hanc cupiditatem, Alexandriam vellet ire.—Ep. Fam.

body; the senate condemned it as factious; and Lentulus' son changed his habit upon it, in order to move the citizens, and hinder their offering such an affront to his father. The tribune Caninius proposed another law at the same time for sending Pompey to Egypt: but this pleased no better than the other; and the consuls contrived, that neither of them should be brought to the suffrage of the people*. These new contests gave a fresh interruption to Ptolemy's cause; in which Cicero's resolution was, if the commission could not be obtained for Lentulus, to prevent its being granted at least to Pompey, and save themselves the disgrace of being baffled by a competitor⁴: but the senate was grown so sick of the whole affair, that they resolved to leave the king to shift for himself, without interposing at all in his restoration; and so the matter hung; whilst other affairs more interesting were daily rising up at home, and engaging the attention of the city.

The election of ædiles, which had been industriously postponed through all the last summer, could not easily be kept off any longer: the city was impatient for its magistrates; and especially for the plays and shows with which they used to entertain them; and several also of the new tribunes being zealous for an election, it was held at last on the twentieth of January; when Clodius was chosen ædile, without any opposition; so that Cicero began once more to put himself upon his guard, from the certain expectation of a furious ædileship⁵.

It may justly seem strange, how a man so profligate and criminal as Clodius, whose life was a perpetual insult on all laws divine and human, could be suffered not only to live without punishment, but to obtain all the honours of a free city in their proper course; and it would be natural to suspect, that we had been deceived in our accounts of him, by taking them from his enemies, did we not find them too firmly supported by facts to be called in question: but a little attention to the particular character of the man, as well as of the times in which he lived, will enable us to solve the difficulty. First, the splendour of his family, which had borne a principal share in all the triumphs of the republic from the very foundation of its liberty, was of great force to protect him in all his extravagances: those who know anything of Rome, know what a strong impression this single circumstance of illustrious nobility would necessarily make upon the people; Cicero calls the nobles of this class, pretors and consuls elect from their cradles, by a kind of hereditary right; whose very names were sufficient to advance them to all the dignities of the state⁶. Secondly, his personal qualities were peculiarly adapted to him to all the meaner sort: his bold wit; his talent at haranguing; his prof and his being the first of his family pursued popular measures against the ancestors, who were all stern assertors of aristocratical power. Thirdly, the contrast factions, who had each their ends in him, contributed principally to his triumph, willingly permitted and encouraged his violences: to make them not only the less odious, but even in controlling the fury of such an incoherence though it was often turned against them, they chose to bear it, and dissembled its repelling it, rather than destroy the game by playing their game for them, and by turning the republic into confusion, throwing it into their hands: the senate, on the other chief apprehensions were from the thought, that the rashness of Clodius some use to perplex their measures, the people against them on proper occasions humoured their spleen at least, to insult Pompey to his face. Less he envied Cicero, and desired to lessen his private cherishment an enemy, who his force to drive him from the administration: this accidental concurrence of stances, peculiar to the man and to the thing that preserved Clodius, who could never have been endured in a regular state of the city.

By his obtaining the ædileship, the turned between him and Milo: the one with the authority of a magistrate; the other a private man: the one freed from the apprehension of judge and a trial; the other to all that danger from the power of him and it was not Clodius's custom, to advantage against an enemy, so that caused Milo of the same crime of which he accused him; of public violence and laws, in maintaining a band of glad terror of the city. Milo made his accusation on the second of February, Pompey, Crassus, and Cicero appeared. M. Marcellus, though Clodius's the ædileship, spoke for him at Cicero and the whole passed quietly and finished him on that day. The second heard pointed on the ninth; when Pompey pleaded his cause, but no sooner stood than Clodius's mob began to exert themselves and by a continual clamour of reproaches, endeavoured to hinder him on, or at least from being heard: but

* Nos cum maximo consilio, studio, labore, gratia, de causa regia nitremur, subito exorta est nefaria Catonis promulgatio, quæ studia nostra impediret, et animos a minore cura ad summum timorem traduceret.—Ep. Fam. i. 5.

Suspicio per vim rogationem Caninium perlatum.—Ad Quint. ii. 2.

⁴ Sed vereor ne aut eripiat nobis causa regia, aut deseratur.—Sed si res coget, est quiddam tertium, quod non mihi displicebat; ut neque jacere regem pateremur, nec nobis repugnantibus, ad eum deferri, ad quem prope jam delatum videtur.—Ne, si quid non obtinuerimus, repulsi esse videamur.—Ep. Fam. i. 5.

⁵ Sed omnia sunt tardiora propter furiosæ ædilitatis expectationem.—Ad Quint. ii. 2.

⁶ Non idem mihi licet, quod illis, qui nobili genere nati sunt, quibus omnia populi Romani beneficia deferuntur.—In Verr. v. 70.

Erat nobilitas ipsa, blanda conciliatrix. Omnes semper boni nobilitati favent. Sert. 9.

⁷ Videtis igitur hominem per seipsum afflictum ac jacentem, perniciosæ optima excitari.—Ne a republica reipublicæ post restiterunt: etiam, ne causam dicere: etiam: etiam in sinu atque in delictis vtri viperam illam venenatam ac pestiferam runt? Quo tandem decepti munere? esse qui in concione detrahat de Pompei Reip. 24.

too firm, to be so baffled; and spoke for near three hours, with a presence of mind, which commanded silence in spite of their attempts. When Clodius rose up to answer him, Milo's party, in their turn, so disturbed and confounded him, that he was not able to speak a word; while a number of epigrams and lampoons upon him and his sister were thrown about, and publicly rehearsed among the multitude below, so as to make him quite furious: till recollecting himself a little, and finding it impossible to proceed in his speech, he demanded aloud of his hearers, who it was that attempted to starve them by famine? To which they presently cried out, Pompey: he then asked, who it was that desired to be sent to Egypt? They all echoed, Pompey: but when he asked, who it was that they themselves had a mind to send? they answered, Crassus: for the old jealousy was now breaking out again between him and Pompey; and though he appeared that day on Milo's side, yet he was not, as Cicero says, a real well-wisher to him.

These warm proceedings among the chiefs brought on a fray below among their partisans; the Clodians began the attack, but were repulsed by the Pompeians; and Clodius himself driven out of the rostra. Cicero, when he saw the affair proceed to blows, thought it high time to retreat and make the best of his way towards home: but no great harm was done, for Pompey, having cleared the forum of his enemies, presently drew off his forces, to prevent any farther mischief or scandal from his side^b.

The senate was presently summoned, to provide some remedy for these disorders; where Pompey, who had drawn upon himself a fresh envy from his behaviour in the Egyptian affair, was severely rebuked by Bibulus, Curio, Favonius, and others; who chose to be absent, since he must either have offended Pompey, by saying nothing for him, or the honest party, by defending him. The same debate was carried on for several days; in which Pompey was treated very roughly by the tribune, Cato; who inveighed against him with great bitterness, and laid open his perfidy to Cicero, to whom he paid the highest compliments, and was heard with much attention by all Pompey's adherents.

^a Ad diem iiii. Non. Febr. Milo affuit. Et Pompeius provocatus venit. Dixit Marcellus a me rogatus. Honestos clamorem. Productus dies est in iiii. Id. Febr.—A. D. iiii. Id. Milo affuit. Dixit Pompeius, sive voluit. Nam ut censuerit, opere Clodianum clamorem sustulerunt: idque impetritus oratione contigit, non modo ut acclamatione, sed et convicio et maledictis impeditur. Qui ut peroraret, nam in eo sane fortis fuit, non est deterritus, dixit Pompeius, atque interdum etiam silentio, cum auctoritate peroravit; sed ut peroravit, surrexit Clodius: ei tantus honor a nostris, placuerat enim referre gratiam, ut quippe mones, neque lingua, neque ore constiteret.—Cum quippe maledicta, tum versus etiam obscenissimi in Clodium et Clodianum disicerent. Ille furens et exangulis interprecibus suis in clamore ipso, quis esset, qui plebem sine necaret? Respondebant opere, Pompeius. Quis Alexandriam ire cuperet? Respondebant, Pompeius. Quis ire vallet? Respondebat, Crassum. Is aderat cum Miloni animo non amico.—

^b Sane fere nonne, quasi signo dato, Clodiani nostros congrederentur? Exarsit dolor, urgere illi ut loco nos moverent. Factus est a nostris impetus, fuga operarum. Difusus de rostris Clodius. Ac nos quoque tum fugimus, de quibus in turba.—Senatus vocatus in curiam, Pompeius cum.—Ad Quint. Fr. II. 3

Pompey answered him with an unusual vehemence; and reflecting openly on Crassus, as the author of these affronts, declared, that he would guard his life with more care than Scipio Africanus did when Carbo murdered him.—These warm expressions seemed to open a prospect of some great agitation likely to ensue: Pompey consulted with Cicero on the proper means of his security; and acquainted him with his apprehensions of a design against his life; that Cato was privately supported, and Clodius furnished with money by Crassus; and both of them encouraged by Curio, Bibulus, and the rest, who envied him; that it was necessary for him to look to himself, since the meaner people were wholly alienated, the nobility and senate generally disaffected, and the youth corrupted. Cicero readily consented to join forces with him, and to summon their clients and friends from all parts of Italy: for though he had no mind to fight his battles in the senate, he was desirous to defend his person from all violence, especially against Crassus, whom he never loved: they resolved likewise to oppose with united strength all the attempts of Clodius and Cato, against Lentulus and Milo^c. Clodius, on the other hand, was not less busy in mustering his friends against the next hearing of Milo's cause: but as his strength was much inferior to that of his adversary, so he had no expectation of getting him condemned, nor any other view but to tease and harass him^d: for after two hearings, the affair was put off by several adjournments to the beginning of May; from which time we find no farther mention of it.

The consul Marcellinus, who drew his colleague, Philippus, along with him, was a resolute opposer of the triumvirate, as well as of all the violences of the other magistrates: for which reason he resolved to suffer no assemblies of the people, except such as were necessary for the elections into the annual offices: his view was, to prevent Cato's law for recalling Lentulus, and the monstrous things, as Cicero calls them, which some were attempting at this time in favour of Cæsar. Cicero gives him the character of one of the best consuls that he had ever known, and blames him only in one thing, for treating Pompey on all occasions too rudely; which made Cicero often absent himself from the senate, to avoid taking part either on the one side

^c Neque ego in senatum, ne aut de tantis rebus tacerem, aut in Pompeio defendendo, nam is carpebatur a Bibulo, Curione, Favonio, Servilio filio, animos bonorum offenderem. Res in posterum diem dilata est.—Eo die nihil perfectum.—Ad diem ii. Id.—Cato est vehementer in Pompeium invectus et eum oratione perpetua tanquam reum accusavit. De me multa me invito, cum mea summa laude dixit. Cum illius in me perfidiam increpavit, auditus est magno silentio malevolorum. Respondit ei vehementer Pompeius, Crassumque descripsit; dixitque aperte, se munitionem ad custodiendam vitam suam fore, quam Africanus fuisset, quem C. Carbo interemisisset. Itaque magni mihi res moveri videbantur. Nam Pompeius hæc intelligit, necumque communicat insidias vite sue fieri: C. Catonem a Crasso sustentari; Clodio pecuniam suppeditari: utrumque et ab eo et a Curione, Bibulo, ceterisque suis obtreptatoribus confirmari: vehementer esse providendum ne opprimatur, concionario illo populo, a se prope alienato, nobilitate inimico, non equo senatu, juventute improba; itaque se comparat, homines ex agris arceant. Operas autem suas Clodius confirmat. Manus ad Quirinalia paratur. In eo multo sumus superiores, &c.—Ad Quint. II. 3 or the other¹. For the support therefore of his dignity and interest in the city, he resumed his old task of pleading causes; which was always popular and reputable, and in which he was sure to find full employment. His first cause was the defence of L. Bestia, on the tenth of February, who, after the disgrace of a repulse from the praetorship in the last election, was accused of bribery and corruption in his suit for it; and, notwithstanding the authority and eloquence of his advocate, was convicted and banished. He was a man extremely corrupt, turbulent, and seditious; had always been an enemy to Cicero; and supposed to be deeply engaged in Catiline's plot; and is one instance of the truth of what Cicero says, that he was often forced, against his will, to defend certain persons, who had not deserved it of him, by the intercession of those who had².

^d Vid. Dio, p. 99.

Cæsar, who was now in the career of his victories in Gaul, sent a request to the senate, that money might be decreed to him for the payment of his army; with a power of choosing ten lieutenants, for the better management of the war, and the conquered provinces; and that his command should be prolonged for five years more. The demand was thought very exorbitant; and it seemed strange, that after all his boasted conquests, he should not be able to maintain his army without money from home at a time when the treasury was greatly exhausted; and the renewal of a commission, obtained at first by violence and against the authority of the senate, was of hard digestion. But Cæsar's interest prevailed, and Cicero himself was the promoter of it, and procured a decree to his satisfaction; yet not without disgusting the old patriots, who stood firm to their maxim of opposing all extraordinary grants: but Cicero alleged the extraordinary services of Cæsar; and that the course of his victories ought not to be checked by the want of necessary supplies, while he was so gloriously extending the bounds of the empire, and conquering nations whose names had never been heard before at Rome: and though it were possible for him to maintain his troops without their help by the spoils of the enemy, yet those spoils ought to be reserved for the splendour of his triumph, which it was not just to defraud by their unseasonable parsimony³.

He might think it imprudent perhaps at this time,

¹ Consul est egregius Lentulus, non impediende collega: sic inquam bonus, ut meliorem non viderim. Dies comitiales exemti omnes.—Sic legibus perniciosissimis obestit, maxime Catonis.—Nunc igitur Catonem Lentulus a legibus removit, et eos, qui de Cæsare monstra promulgant.—Marcellinus autem hoc uno mihi minus satisfaciunt, quod cum nimis asperum tractat, quanquam id sensu non invito facit: quo ego me libentius a curia, et ab omni parte republicam subtraham.—Ad Quint. 36.

² A. D. III. Id. dixi pro Bestia de ambitu apud prætorem Cn. Domitium, in foro medio, maximo conventu.—Ad Quint. II. 3.

Cogor nonnunquam homines non optime de me meritos, rogatu eorum qui bene meriti sunt, defendere.—Ep. Fam. VII. 1; vid. Philip. xi. 5; Sallust. Bell. Cat. 17, 43; Plutar. in Cic.

³ Illum enim arbitrabar etiam sine hoc subsidio pecunie retinere exercitum præda ante parat, et bellum conficere posset: sed decus illud et ornamentum triumphi minuendum nostra parsimonia non putavi.—

Et quas regiones, quasque gentes nobis nobis antea literæ, nulla vox, nulla fama notas fecerat, hæc nostra imperator, nosterque exercitus, et populi Romani arma peragraverunt.—De Prov. Consul. xi. 13.

to call Cæsar home from an unfinished war, stop the progress of his arms in the very height of his success; yet the real motive of his conduct seems to have flowed, not so much from the nature of the cause, as a regard to the condition of times, and his own circumstances. For in private letters he owns, "that the malevolent envy of the aristocratical chiefs had almost driven him from his old principles; and though not so as to make him forget his dignity, yet so as to take a proper care of his safety; both which might easily be consistent: if there was any faith or regard in the consular senators: but they had made these matters so ill, that those who were superior to them in power, were become superior too in enmity; so as to be able to carry in the senate, they could not have carried even with the power without violence: that he had learnt from experience, what he could not learn so well from Cæsar, that as no regard was to be had to our safety, so out a regard also to our dignity, so the consideration of dignity ought not to exclude the care of safety⁴." In another letter he says, "that the state and form of the government was quite changed, and what he had proposed to himself as the end of all his toils, a dignity and liberty of acting, voting, was quite lost and gone; that there was nothing left, but either meanly to assent to the will of those who governed all; or weakly to oppose them, without doing any good: that he had dropped these all thoughts of that old consular gravity and character of a resolute senator, and resolved to conform himself to Pompey's will; that his great effort to Pompey made him begin to think all things which were useful to him; and he comforted himself with reflecting, that the greatness of his obligations would make all the world excuse him in defending what Pompey liked, or at least for opposing it: or else, what of all things he desired, if his friendship with Pompey would permit him, for retiring from public business, giving himself wholly up to his books⁵."

But he was now engaged in a cause, in which was warmly and specially interested, the defence of P. Sextius, the late tribune. Clodius, who

⁴ Quorum malevolentissimis obsecrationibus nos de veteri illa nostra, diuturnaque sententia prope jam depulsi: non nos quidem ut nostræ dignitatis sibi obliti, sed ut habeamus rationem aliquandam etiam mihi. Poterat utrumque præclare, si esset fides, et gravi hominibus consularibus.—

Nam qui plus opibus, armis, potentia valent, præter tantum mihi videntur stultitia et inconstantia in consiliis, ut etiam auctoritate jam plus valeret.—Ipse, literis omnibus a pueritia deditus, experiendo tam maxime, quam discendo cognovi.—neque salutis ne rationem habendam nobis esse sine dignitate, neque de tali sine salute.—Ep. Fam. I. 7.

Pompeium enim animi inductio et mehercule amor Pompeium apud me valet, ut, quæ illi utilis sunt, et illi vult, ea mihi omnia jam et recta et vera videantur. Me quidem illa res consolatur, quod ego in sum, cum maxime concedant omnes, ut vel ea defendam, quæ si petui vellet, vel taceream, vel etiam, id quod mihi maxime lubet, ad nostram me studia referam literarum: quod factum faciam, si mihi per ejusdem amicitiam licebit.—

Quæ enim proposita fuerant nobis, cum et honoratissimè, et laboribus maximis perfuncti omnes dignitas in sententiis discedis, libertas in rebus capessenda; ea sublata tota: sed nec mihi magis, quæ omnibus. Nam aut assentiendum est nulla cum gravi paucis, aut frustra dissentiendum.—Ibid. 8.

Cicero's friends no respite, having himself undertaken Milo, assigned the prosecution of Sextius to one of his confidants, M. Tullius Albinovanus, who accused him of public violence or breach of peace in his tribunate*. Sextius had been a true friend to Cicero in his distress; and borne a great part in his restoration; but as in cases of eminent service, conferred jointly by many, every one is apt to claim the first merit, and expect the first share of praise; so Sextius, naturally morose, fancying himself neglected or not sufficiently requited by Cicero, had behaved very churlishly towards him since his return: but Cicero, who was never forgetful of past kindnesses, instead of resenting his perverseness, having heard that Sextius was indisposed, went in person to his house, and cured him of all his jealousies, by freely offering his assistance and patronage in pleading his cause†.

This was a disappointment to the prosecutors; who flattered themselves that Cicero was so much degraded, that he would not be persuaded to plead for him; but he entered into the cause with a hearty inclination, and made it, as in effect it really was, his own‡. In his speech, which is still extant, after laying open the history of his exile, and the vestiges of his own conduct through the whole progress of it, he shows, "that the only ground of prosecuting Sextius was, his faithful adherence to him, or rather to the republic; that by condemning Sextius, they would in effect condemn him, whom all the orders of the city had declared to be unjustly expelled, by the very same men who were now attempting to expel Sextius: that it was a banter and ridicule on justice itself, to accuse a man of violence, who had been left for dead upon the spot by the violence of those who accused him; and whose only crime it was, that he would not suffer himself to be quite killed, but presumed to guard his life against their future attempts." In short, he managed the cause so well, that Sextius was acquitted, and in a manner the most honourable, by the unanimous suffrages of all the judges; and with a universal applause of Cicero's humanity and gratitude§.

Pompey attended this trial as a friend to Sextius; while Caesar's creature, Vatinius, appeared not only as an adversary but a witness against him: which gave Cicero an opportunity of lashing him, as Sextius particularly desired, with all the keenness of his railery, to the great diversion of the audience; for instead of interrogating him in the ordinary way about the facts deposed in the trial, he contrived to tame him with a perpetual series of questions, which revived and exposed the iniquity of his factious tribunate, and the whole course of his profligate life, from his first appearance in public; and, in spite of all his impudence, quite daunted and confounded him. Vatinius however made some feeble effort to defend himself, and rally Cicero in his turn; and among other things, reproached him with the baseness of changing sides, and becoming Caesar's friend on account of the fortunate state of his affairs: to which Cicero briskly replied, though Pompey himself stood by, that he still preferred the condition of Bibulus's consulship, which Vatinius thought abject and miserable, to the victories and triumphs of all men whatsoever. This speech against Vatinius is still remaining, under the title of the Interrogation; and is nothing else but what Cicero himself calls it, a perpetual invective on the magistracy of Vatinius, and the conduct of those who supported him¶.

In the beginning of April, the senate granted the sum of three hundred thousand pounds to Pompey, to be laid out in purchasing corn for the use of the city; where there was still a great scarcity, and as great at the same time of money: so that the moving a point so tender could not fail of raising some ill-humour in the assembly; when Cicero, whose old spirit seems to have revived in him from his late success in Sextius's cause, surprised them by proposing, that in the present inability of the treasury to purchase the Campanian lands, which by Caesar's act were to be divided to the people, the act itself should be reconsidered, and a day appointed for that deliberation: the motion was received with a universal joy, and a kind of tumultuary acclamation: the enemies of the triumvirate were extremely pleased with it, in hopes that it would make a breach between Cicero and Pompey; but it served only for a proof, of what Cicero himself observes, that it is very hard for a man to depart from his old sentiments in politics when they are right and just*.

Pompey, whose nature was singularly reserved, expressed no uneasiness upon it, nor took any notice of it to Cicero, though they met and supped together familiarly as they used to do: but he set forward soon after towards Africa, in order to provide corn; and intending to call at Sardinia, proposed to embark at Pisa or Leghorn, that he might have an interview with Caesar, who was now at Luca, the utmost limit of his Gallic government. He found Caesar exceedingly out of humour with Cicero; for Crassus had already been with him at Ravenna, and greatly incensed him by his account of Cicero's late motion; which he complained of

* Vatinius, a quo palam oppugnabatur, arbitrari nostro coincidimus, diis hominibusque placentibus.—Quid queris? Homo petulans, et audeat Vatinius valde perturbatus, debilitatusque disceat.—Ad Quint. li. 4.

Ego sedente Pompeio, cum ut laudaret P. Sextium introisset in urbem, dixissetque testis Vatinius, me fortuna et felicitate C. Caesaris commotum, illi amicum esse coepisse; dixi, me eam Bibuli fortunam, quam ille afflictam putaret, omnium triumphis victoriisque anteferre.—Tota vero interrogatio mea nihil habuit, nisi reprehensionem illius tribunatus: in quo omnia dicta sunt libertate, animoque maximo.—Ep. Fam. i. 9.

¶ Pompeio pecunia decreta in rem frumentariam ad H. 8. cccc. sed eodem die vehementer actum de agro Campano, clamore senatus prope condonali. Acriorem causam inopia pecunie faciebat, et annonæ caritæ.—Ad Quint. li. 5.

Nonis April. mihi est senatus assensus, ut de agro Campano, idibus Malis, frequenti senatu referretur. Num potui magis in arcem illius causæ invadere.—Ep. Fam. i. 9.

* Qui cum omnibus salutis meæ defensoribus bellum mihi esse gerendum iudicaverunt.—Pro Sext. 2.

† Is erat ager: domum, ut debuimus, ad eum statim venimus; etque nos totos tradidimus: Idque fecimus præter hominum opinionem, qui nos et jure succensere putabant, ut humanissimi gratissimique et ipsi et omnibus volebatur: itaque faciemus.—Ad Quint. li. 3.

‡ P. Sextius est reus non suo sed meo nomine, &c.—Pro Sext. 12.

§ Sextius noster absolutus est, a. d. ii. Id. Mart. et quod vehementer interfuit republicæ, nullam videri in ejusmodi causa dimensionem esse, omnibus sententiis absolutum.—Sextio nos in eo judicio consecutos esse, ut omnem præstet iudicemus. Nam in defendendo homine nervæ simulatissime satisfecimus.—Ad Quint. li. 4.

so heavily, that Pompey promised to use all his authority to induce Cicero to drop the pursuit of it; and for that purpose sent away an express to Rome to entreat him not to proceed any farther in it till his return; and when he came afterwards to Sardinia, where his lieutenant Q. Cicero then resided, he entered immediately into an expostulation with him about it, "recounting all his services to his brother, and that everything which he had done for him was done with Caesar's consent; and reminding him of a former conversation between themselves concerning Caesar's acts, and what Quintus himself had undertaken for his brother on that head; and as he then made himself answerable for him, so he was now obliged to call him to the performance of those engagements: in short, he begged of him to press his brother to support and defend Caesar's interests and dignity, or if he could not persuade him to that, to engage him at least not to act against them?"

This remonstrance from Pompey, enforced by his brother Quintus, staggered Cicero's resolution, and made him enter into a fresh deliberation with himself about the measures of his conduct; where, after casting up the sum of all his thoughts, and weighing every circumstance which concerned either his own or the public interest, he determined at last to drop the affair rather than expose himself again, in his present situation, to the animosity of Pompey and Caesar, for which he makes the following apology to his friend Lentulus:—"that those who professed the same principles and were embarked in the same cause with him, were perpetually envying and thwarting him, and more disgusted by the splendour of his life than pleased with anything which he did for the public service; that their only pleasure, and what they could not even dissemble while he was acting with them, was to see him disoblige Pompey and make Caesar his enemy, when they at the same time were continually caressing Clodius before his face, on purpose to mortify him: that if the government indeed had fallen into wicked and desperate hands, neither hopes nor fears nor gratitude itself could have prevailed with him to join with them; but when Pompey held the chief sway, who had acquired it by the most illustrious merit, whose dignity he had always favoured from his first setting out in the world, and from whom he had received the greatest obligations, and who at that very time made his enemy the common enemy of them both, he had no reason to apprehend the charge of inconstancy if on some occasions he voted and acted a little differently from what he used to do, in complaisance to such a friend: that his union with Pompey necessarily included Caesar, with whom both and his brother had a friendship also of long standing, which they were invited to renew in manner of civilities and good offices freely on Caesar's part: that, after Caesar's great exertions and victories, the republic itself seemed to propose and forbid him to quarrel with such a man; that when he stood in need of their assistance, his brother had engaged his word for him to Pompey and Pompey to Caesar, and he thought himself obliged to make good those engagements?"

7 Hoc S. C. in sententiam meam facto, Pompeius, cum mihi nihil ostendisset se esse offensum, in Sardiniam et in Africam profectus est, eoque itinere Lucam ad Cæsarem venit. Ibi multa de mea sententia questus est Cæsar, quippe qui etiam Ravennæ Crassum ante vidisset, ab eoque in me esset incensus. Sane moleste Pompeium id ferro constabat: quod ego, cum audissem ex illis, maxime ex fratre meo cognovi; quem cum in Sardinia paucis post diebus, quam Luca discesserat, convenissem. Te, inquit, ipsum cupio: nihil opportunius potuit accidere: nisi cum Marco fratre diligenter egeris, dependendum tibi est, quod mihi pro illo oppondisti: quid multa? Questus est gravior: sua merita commemoravit: quid egisset amplissime de actis Cæsaris cum meo fratre, quidque sibi is de me receperet, in memoriam redegit: eoque quæ de mea salute egisset, voluntate Cæsaris egisse, ipsum meum fratrem testatur est.—Ep. Fam. i. 9.

This was the general state of his political behaviour: he had a much larger view and comprehensive knowledge both of men and than the other chiefs of the aristocracy, B. Marcellinus, Cato, Favonius, &c., whose stings had ruined their cause, and brought them their present subjection, by alienating Pompey from the equestrian order from the senate. They considered Cicero's management of the triumvir as a mean submission to illegal power, which were always opposing and irritating, though so unseasonably; whereas Cicero thought it to give over fighting when the forces were equal, and that the more patiently they submitted to the dominion of their new masters, the more temperately they would use it; being persuaded that Pompey at least, who was the head of the party, had no designs against the public liberty, and were provoked and driven to it by the per opposition of his enemies. These were the grounds of that complaisance which he generally paid to him, for the sake both of his private and the public quiet; in consequence of which when the appointed day came for considering the case of the Campanian lands, the debate dropped of course, when it was understood that Cicero was the mover of it, was absent and had changed his mind, though it was not, as he intimates, without a struggle in his own breast that he submitted to this step, which was likely to draw upon him the imputation of levity^c.

8 Qui cum illa sentirent in republica quæ ego æque ac semperque sentissem; me tamen non satisfacere Pompei Cæsaremque inimicissimum mihi futurum, gaude aiebant: hoc mihi dolendum, sed illud multo magis, inimicum meum.—Sic amplexabantur.—Sic me pro oculabantur.—Ego si ab improbis et perditis civibus publicam temeri videbam.—Non modo præmiis, sed periculis quidem ullis compulsus.—Ad eorum causam adjungerem, ne si summa quidem eorum in me non constarent. Cum autem in republica Cn. Pompeius ceperet esse—meumque inimicum unum in civitate habere inimicum, non putavi famam inconstantie mihi periculi, si quibuscumque in sententia paulum me intransigens, meamque voluntatem ad summi viri, de optimo meriti dignitatem aggregassem, &c. Gravi autem me in hac mente impulit, et Pompeii fides, et de me Cæsari dederat, et fratris mei, quam Pompeius Ep. Fam. i. 9.

9 Neque, ut ego arbitror, errarent, si cum parces esse possent, pugnare desiderarent.—

Commotata tota ratio est senatus, judiciorum, rei publicæ. Otium nobis exoptandum est: quod si potentior rerum, præstituri videntur, si quidem hoc patientius eorum potentiam ferre poterint. Dignitatem quidem illam consularem fortis et constantis sensui nihil est, quod cogitemus. Amica est culpa eorum, et senatu et ordine conjunctissimum, et hominem claudum abalienant.—Ibid. 8.

b Ep. Fam. i. 9.

c Quod idibus et postidie fuerat dictum, de sero

His daughter Tullia, having now lived a widow about a year, was married to a second husband, Perus Craspedes, and the wedding feast held at Cicero's house on the sixth of April. We find very little said of the character or condition of this Craspedes; but by Cicero's care in making the match, the fortune which he paid, and the compensation of his friends upon it, he appears to have been a nobleman of principal rank and dignity¹. Atticus also, who was about a year younger than Cicero, was married this spring to Filia, and invited him to the wedding². As to his domestic affairs, his chief care at present was about rebuilding three of his houses which were demolished in his exile, and repairing the rest, with that also of his brother, out of which they were driven in the last attack of Clodius: by the hints which he gives of them, they all seem to have been very magnificent, and built under the direction of the best architects. Clodius gave no farther interruption to them, being forced to quit the pursuit of Cicero in order to watch the motions of a more dangerous enemy, Milo. Cicero, however, was not without a share of uneasiness within his own walls; his brother's wife and his own neither speed well with each other nor their own husbands. Quintus was displeased at her husband's staying so long abroad, and Cicero's not disposed to make her the happier for staying at home. His nephew also, young Quintus, a perverse youth, spoiled by a mother's indulgence, added somewhat to his trouble; for he was now charged with the care of his education in the father's absence, and had him taught under his own eye by Tyrannio, a Greek master, who, with several other learned men of that country, was entertained in his house³.

King Ptolemy's affair was no more talked of; Pompey had other business upon his hands, and was so ruffled by the tribune Cato and the consul Murellinus, that he laid aside all thoughts of it for himself, and wished to serve Lentulus in it. The senate had passed a vote against restoring him at all, but one of the tribunes inhibited them from proceeding to a decree, and a former decree was actually subsisting in favour of Lentulus. Cicero, therefore, after a consultation with Pompey, sent him their joint and last advice: "that by his command of a province so near to Egypt, as he was the best judge of what he was able to do, so if he found himself master of the thing and was assured of success, he might leave the king at Ptolemais, or some other neighbouring city, and proceed without him to Alexandria, where, if by the influence of his fleet and troops he could appease the public dissensions, and persuade the inhabitants to receive their king peaceably, he might then carry him home, and so restore him according to the first decree; yet without a multitude, as our religious men (says he) tell us, the sibyl has enjoined; that it was the opinion, however, of them both, that people would judge of the fact by the event. If he was certain, therefore, of carrying his point, he should not defer it; if doubtful, should not undertake it: for as the world would applaud him if he effected it with ease, so a miscarriage might be fatal on account of the late vote of the senate, and the scruple about religions⁴." But Lentulus, wisely judging the affair too hazardous for one of his dignity and fortunes, left it to a man of more desperate character, Gabinus, who ruined himself soon after by embarking in it.

The tribune Cato, who was perpetually inveighing against keeping gladiators, like so many standing armies to the terror of the citizens, had lately bought a band of them, but finding himself unable to maintain them was contriving to part with them again without noise or scandal. Milo got notice of it, and privately employed a person, not one of his own friends, to buy them; and when they were purchased, Racilius, another tribune, taking the matter upon himself, and pretending that they were bought for him, published a proclamation that Cato's family of gladiators was to be sold by auction, which gave no small diversion to the city⁵.

Milo's trial being put off to the fifth of May, Cicero took the benefit of a short vacation to make an excursion into the country and visit his estates and villas in different parts of Italy. He spent five days at Arpinum, whence he proceeded to his other houses at Pompeii and Cumæ; and stopped a while, on his return, at Antium, where he had lately rebuilt his house, and was now disposing and ordering his library by the direction of Tyrannio, the remains of which, he says, were more considerable than he expected from the late ruin. Atticus lent him two of his librarians to assist his own in taking catalogues, and placing the books in order; which he calls the infusion of a soul into the body non sciam iri, non est actum. In hac causa mihi aqua haeret.—Ad Quint. ii. 3.

§ Te perspicere posse, qui Ciliciam Cyprumque teneas, quid efficere et quid consequi possis, et, si res facultatem habitura videatur, ut Alexandriam atque Ægyptum tenere possis, esse et tunc et nostri Imperii dignitas, Ptolemais, aut aliquo propinquo loco rege collocato, tecum classe, atque exercitu proficisci Alexandriam: ut cum eam pace, presidiique firmaris, Ptolemeus redeat in regnum: ita fore, ut per te restituantur, quemadmodum senatus iussit censuit; et sine multitudine reductus, quemadmodum homines religiosi sibyllæ placere dixerunt. Sed hæc sententia sic et illi et nobis probabatur, ut ex eventu homines de tuo consilio existimaturos videremus.—Nos quidem hoc sentimus; si exploratum tibi sit, posse te regni illius potiri; non esse cunctandum: si dubium, non esse conandum, &c.—Ep. Fam. i. 7.

¶ Ille vindex gladiatorum et bestiarum emerat.—bestiarum.—Hos alere non poterat. Itaque vix tenebat. Sensit Milo, dedit quoddam non familiaris negotium, qui sine suspitione emerat eam familiam a Catone: quæ simulatque abducta est, Racilius rem patefecit, eoque homines sibi emptos esse dixit—et tabulam proscriptæ, se familiam Catonianam venditurum. In eam tabulam magni risus conquebantur.—Ad Quint. ii. 6.

De nostra Tullia—opero nos cum Craspede confectasse.

Quid mihi de filia et de Craspede gratularis.—Speroque de opo hanc conjunctionem nobis voluptati fore.—Epist. Fam. i. 7.

Vitellius Craspedes præcipit.—Ad Att. iv. 5.

Præd. id. hæc scripsi ante locum. Eo die apud Pompeium in ejus nuptiis eram cenanturus.—Ad Quint. ii. 3.

Domus istiusque nostram edificatorem struere. (Ibid.)

Longitum redemptorem cohortatus sum. Fidem mihi fecerat, se velle nobis placere. Domus erit egregia.

—Ibid. 6.

Quintus tuus, puer optimus, eruditur egregie. Hoc me magis animaverat, quod Tyrannio docet apud me.

—Ibid. 4.

A.D. vii. Id. Apr. sponsalia Craspedi præbui. Huic curavi puer optimus, Quintus tuus, quod perleverit comatus fuerat, defuit.—Multum in mecum sermonem habuit et perhæmantem de discordiis mulierum nostrarum.—Pompeius intemum etiam de te quæstæ est.—Ibid. 6.

of his house¹. During this tour, his old enemy Gabinus, the proconsul of Syria, having gained some advantage in Judea against Aristobulus, who had been dethroned by Pompey, and on that account was raising troubles in the country, sent public letters to the senate to give an account of his victory, and to beg the decree of a thanksgiving for it. His friends took the opportunity of moving the affair in Cicero's absence, from whose authority they apprehended some obstruction; but the senate, in a full house, slighted his letters and rejected his suit: an affront which had never been offered before to any proconsul. Cicero was infinitely delighted with it, calls the resolution divine, and was doubly pleased for its being the free and genuine judgment of the senate, without any struggle or influence on his part; and reproaching Gabinus with it afterwards, says that by this act the senate had declared that they could not believe that he, whom they had always known to be a traitor at home, could ever do anything abroad that was useful to the republic².

Many prodigies were reported to have happened about this time in the neighbourhood of Rome: horrible noises under ground, with clashing of arms; and on the Alban hill a little shrine of Juno, which stood on a table facing the east, turned suddenly of itself towards the north. These terrors alarmed the city, and the senate consulted the haruspices, who were the public diviners or prophets of the state, skilled in all the Tuscan discipline of interpreting portentous events, who gave the following answer in writing,—that supplications must be made to Jupiter, Saturn, Neptune, and the other gods; that the solemn shows and plays had been negligently exhibited and polluted; sacred and religious places made profane; ambassadors killed, contrary to right and law; faith and oaths disregarded; ancient and hidden sacrifices carelessly performed and profaned;—that the gods gave this warning, lest, by the discord and dissension of the better sort, dangers and destruction should fall upon the senate and the chiefs of the city, by which means the provinces would fall under the power of a single person, their armies be beaten, great loss ensue, and honours be heaped on the unworthy and disgraced³.

One may observe from this answer, that the diviners were under the direction of those who endeavoured to apply the influence of religion to the cure of their civil disorders: each party interpreted it according to their own views. Cicero took a handle from it of venting his spleen against Cicero; and calling the people together that purpose, attempted to persuade them the divine admonition was designed particularly for him; and that the article of the sacred augurs places referred to the case of his house, after a solemn consecration to religion, was derided again profane; charging all the displeasure of the gods to Cicero's account, who affected thing less than a tyranny, and the oppression their liberties⁴.

Cicero made a reply to Clodius the next day the senate, where, after a short and general tive upon his prodigiate life, "he leaves him as a devoted victim to Milo, who seemed given to them by heaven for the extinction of a plague, as Scipio was for the destruction of the Carthaginians. He declares the prodigy to be one of the most extraordinary which had ever been reported to the senate; but laughs at the absurdity of applying any part of it to him, since his house he proves at large, was more solemnly consecrated from any service or relation to religion than any other house in Rome, by the judgment of the priests, the senate, and all the orders of the city. Then running through the several articles of the answer, he shows them "all to tally so with the notorious acts and impieties of Clodius's life, that they could not possibly be applied to anything else. That as to the sports, said to be illicitly performed and polluted, it clearly denoted the pollution of the Megalensian play, the venerable and religious of all other shows, Clodius himself, as ædile, exhibited in his house the Mother of the gods; where, when the senators and citizens were seated to partake of the diversions, and the usual proclamation was made to command all slaves to retire, a vast number of them, gathered from all parts of the city in the order of Clodius, forced their way upon the stage to the great terror of the assembly; where mischief and bloodshed would have ensued, if consul Marcellinus, by his firmness and presence of mind, had not quieted the tumult. Another representation of the same plays, the senate encouraged again by Clodius, were so audacious and successful in a second irruption, that they drove the whole company out of the theatre, and possessed it entirely to themselves". That the profanation of sacred and religious places could not be interpreted of anything so aptly as what Clodius and his friends had done; for in the house of Q. Seius, which he had built after murdering the owner, there was a chapel of the gods, which he had lately demolished. The Piso had destroyed a celebrated chapel of Isis, where all that neighbourhood, and some even of the senate, used annually to perform their sacrifices. That Serranus also had thrown down a burnt, and profaned several consecrated churches and raised other buildings upon them". That the ambassadors killed contrary to law and though it was commonly interpreted of those at Alexandria, yet other ambassadors had been murdered, whose death was no less offensive to the gods: as Theodosius, killed with the privy permission of Clodius; and Plator, by the order

¹ Offendit designationem Tyrannionis mirificam in librorum meorum bibliotheca; quorum reliquie multo meliores sunt, quam putaram. Etiam vellem mihi mittas de tuis librariis duos aliquos, quibus Tyrannio utatur glutinatoribus, et ad cætera administris.—Ad Att. iv. 4.

Postea vero quam Tyrannio mihi libros disposuit, mens addita videtur meis sedibus: qua quidem in re, mirifica opera Dionysii et Menophili tui fuit.—Ibid. 8.

² Id. Malis senatus frequens divinus fuit in supplicatione Gabinio deneganda. Adjurat Prociulus hoc nemini accidisse. Foris valde plauditur. Mihi cum sua sponte jucundum, cum jucundis, quod me absente, est enim eiuxpivis judicium, sine oppugnatione, sine gratia nostra.—Ad Quint. ii. 8; iv. 5.

Hoc statuit senatus, cum frequens supplicationem Gabinio denegavit.—A proditore, atque eo, quem presentem hostem reipublicæ cognosset, bene reipublicam geri non potuisset.—De Prov. Consul. 6.

³ Vid. Argum. Manutii in Orat. de Harusp. Respons.—Dio, l. xxxix. p. 100.

⁴ Dio, l. xxxix. p. 100.

⁵ Ibid. 10, 11, 12, 13.

⁶ De Harusp. Respons.

⁷ Ibid. 14, 15.

FIG. 4. As to the violation of faith and oaths, that it related evidently to those judges who had absolved Clodius, as being one of the most memorable and flagrant perjuries which Rome had ever known: that the answer itself suggested this interpretation, when it subjoined, that ancient and sacred sacrifices were polluted; which could refer to nothing so properly as to the rites of the Bona Dea, which were the most ancient and the most secret of any in the city; celebrated with incredible secrecy to that goddess, whose name it was not lawful for men to know, and with ceremonies which no man ever pried into but Clodius¹. Then, as to the warning given by the gods, of dangers likely to ensue from the dissensions of the principal citizens; that there was no man so particularly active in promoting those dissensions as Clodius, who was perpetually inflaming one side or the other;—now pursuing popular, now aristocratical measures; at one time a favourite of the triumvirate, at another of the senate; whose credit was wholly supported by their quarrels and animosities.² He exhorts them, therefore, in the conclusion, “to beware of falling into those miseries of which the gods so evidently forewarned them; and to take care especially that the form of the republic was not altered, since all civil contests between great and powerful citizens must necessarily end either in a universal destruction, or a tyranny of the conqueror: that the state was now in so tottering a condition, that nothing could preserve it but their concord: that there was no hope of its being better while Clodius remained unpunished; and but one degree left of being worse, by being wholly ruined and enslaved: for the prevention of which the gods had given them this remarkable admonition; as they were not to believe, what was sometimes represented on the stage, that any god ever descended from heaven to converse familiarly with man, but that these extraordinary sounds and agitations of the world, the air, the elements, were the only voice and speech which heaven made use of: that these admonished them of their danger, and pointed out the remedy; and that the gods, by denoting so freely the way of their safety, had shown how easy it would be to pacify them by satisfying only their own animosities and discords among themselves.”

About the middle of the summer, and before the time of choosing new consuls, which was commonly in August, the senate began to deliberate on the provinces which were to be assigned to them at the expiration of their office. The consular provinces, about which the debate singly turned, were the two Gauls which Cæsar now held, Macedonia which P. S. and Syria which Gabinus, possessed. All who spoke before Cicero, excepting Servilius, were for taking one or both the Gauls from Cæsar, which was what the senate generally desired; but when it came to Cicero's turn, he gladly laid hold on the occasion to revenge himself on Piso and Gabinus, and exerted all his authority to get them recalled, with some marks of disgrace, and their governments assigned to the succeeding consuls: but as for Cæsar, his opinion was, that his command should be continued to him till he had finished the war which he was carrying on with such success, and settled the conquered countries.

This gave no small offence; and the consul Philippus could not forbear interrupting and reminding him, that he had more reason to be angry with Cæsar than with Gabinus himself, since Cæsar was the author and raiser of all that storm which had oppressed him. But Cicero replied, that, in this vote, he was not pursuing his private resentment, but the public good, which had reconciled him to Cæsar; and that he could not be an enemy to one who was deserving so well of his country; that a year or two more would complete his conquests, and reduce all Gaul to a state of peaceful subjection: that the cause was widely different between Cæsar and the other two; that Cæsar's administration was beneficial, prosperous, glorious to the republic; theirs scandalous, ignominious, hurtful to their subjects, and contemptible to their enemies. In short, he managed the debate so, that the senate came fully into his sentiments, and decreed the revocation of Piso and Gabinus³.

He was now likewise engaged in pleading two considerable causes at the bar; the one in defence of Cornelius Balbus, the other of M. Cælius. Balbus was a native of Gades, in Spain, of a splendid family in that city, who, for his fidelity and services to the Roman generals in that province, and especially in the Sertorian war, had the freedom of Rome conferred upon him by Pompey, in virtue of a law which authorised him to grant it to as many as he thought proper. But Pompey's act was now called in question as originally null and invalid, on a pretence that the city of Gades was not within the terms of that alliance and relation to Rome which rendered its citizens capable of that privilege. Pompey and Crassus were his advocates, and, at their desire, Cicero also, who had the third place or post of honour assigned to him, to give the finishing hand to the cause⁴. The prosecution was projected not so much out of enmity to Balbus as to his patrons, Pompey and Cæsar, by whose favour he had acquired great wealth and power; being at this time general of the artillery to Cæsar, and the principal manager or steward of all his affairs. The judges gave sentence for him, and confirmed his right to the city; from which foundation he was raised afterwards by Augustus to the consulate itself. His nephew also, young Balbus, who was made free with him at the same time, obtained the honour of a triumph for his victories over the Garamantes; and, as Pliny tells us, they were the only instances of foreigners and adopted citizens who had ever advanced themselves to either of those honours in Rome^a.

¹ Itaque ego idem, qui nunc consulibus tis, qui designati erunt, Syriam, Macedoniamque decerno.—Quod si essent illi optimi viri, tamen ego mea sententia C. Cæsari nondum succedendum putarem. Qua de re dicam, Patres Conscripti, quod sentio, atque illam interpellationem familiarissimi mei, qua paulo ante interrupta est oratio mea, non pertimescam. Negat me vir optimus inimiciorum debere esse Gabinio, quam Cæsari; omnem enim illam tempestatem, cui cesserim, Cæsare impulsore atque adiutore esse excitatam. Cui si primum sic respondeam, me communis utilitatis habere rationem, non doloris mei.—Hic me meus in rempublicam animus priusquam ac pereunus, cum C. Cæsare reducti, reconciliati, restituit in gratiam. Quod volent denique homines existimare, nemini ego possum esse bene de republica merenti non amicus.—Vid. Orat. De Provin. Cons. 8, 9, &c.

² Quo mihi difficilior est hio extremus perorandi locus.—Sed mos est gerendus, non modo Cornelio, cuius ego voluntati in ejus periculis nullo modo deesse possum; sed etiam Cn. Pompeio.—Pro Balbo, 1, 2, &c.

Cælius, whom he next defended, was a young gentleman of equestrian rank, of great parts and accomplishments, trained under the discipline of Cicero himself; to whose care he was committed by his father upon his first introduction into the forum. Before he was of age to hold any magistracy, he had distinguished himself by two public impeachments; the one of C. Antonius, Cicero's colleague in the consulship, for conspiring against the state; the other of L. Atratinus, for bribery and corruption. Atratinus' son was now revenging his father's quarrel, and accused Cælius of public violence, for being concerned in the assassination of Dio, the chief of the Alexandrian embassy, and of an attempt to poison Clodia, the sister of Clodius: he had been this lady's gallant, whose resentment for her favours, slighted by him, was the real source of all his trouble. In this speech, Cicero treats the character and gallantries of Clodia, her commerce with Cælius, and the gaieties and licentiousness of youth, with such a vivacity of wit and humour, that makes it one of the most entertaining which he has left to us. Cælius, who was truly a libertine, lived on the Palatine Hill, in a house which he hired of Clodius; and among the other proofs of his extravagance, it was objected, that a young man in no public employment should take a separate house from his father, at the yearly rent of two hundred and fifty pounds. To which Cicero replied, that Clodius, he perceived, had a mind to sell his house, by setting the value of it so high; whereas, in truth, it was but a little paltry dwelling, of small rent, scarce above eighty pounds per annum^b. Cælius was acquitted; and ever after professed the highest regard for Cicero, with whom he held a correspondence of letters, which will give us occasion to speak more of him in the sequel of the history.

Cicero seems to have composed a little poem about this time, in compliment to Cæsar; and excuses his not sending it to Atticus, "because Cæsar pressed to have it, and he had reserved no copy; though, to confess the truth, (he says,) he found it very difficult to digest the meanness of recanting his old principles. But adieu (says he) to all right, true, honest counsels: it is incredible what perfidy there is in those who want to be leaders, and who really would be so, if there was any faith in them. I felt what they were, to my cost, when I was drawn in, deserted, and betrayed by them: I resolved still to act on with them in all things, but found them the same as before: till, by your advice, I came at last to a better mind. You will tell me, that you advised me indeed to act, but not to write; 'tis true; but I was willing to put myself under a necessity of adhering to my new alliance, and preclude the possibility of returning to those who, instead of pining for me, as they ought, never cease envying me. Since those who have no power will not love my business is to acquire the love of those who have: you will say, I wish that you had done long ago; I know you wished it; and I was as ass for not minding you."

In this year also, Cicero wrote that celebrated letter to Lucceius, in which he prefaces his attempt the history of his transactions. Lucceius was a man of eminent learning and abilities; he had just finished the history of the Italian civil wars; with intent to carry it through his own times, and, in the general fiction, to include, as he had promised, a partial account of Cicero's acts: but Cicero, who was pleased with his style and manner of writing, laboured to engage him, in this letter, to postpone the design of his continued history, and directly on that separate period, "from the beginning of his consulship to his restoration; comprehending Catiline's conspiracy and his own escape." He observes, "that this short interval was distinguished with such a variety of incidents, unexpected turns of fortune, as furnished the richest materials both to the skill of the writer and the entertainment of the reader: that when the author's attention was confined to a single select subject, he was more capable of adorning and displaying his talents, than in the wide diffusive field of general history. But if he did not think the facts themselves worth the pains of adorning, that he would yet allow so much to friendship, to affection, and even to that which he had so laudably disclaimed in his faces, as not to confine himself scrupulously to the strict laws of history and the rules of truth.

If he would undertake it, he would supply with some rough memoirs, or commentaries the foundation of his work; if not, that he himself should be forced to do what many had done before him, write his own life—a task liable to exceptions and difficulties: where a man necessarily be restrained by modesty on the one hand, or partiality on the other; either from ingratulating or praising himself so much as he deserves."

This letter is constantly alleged as a proof of Cicero's vanity, and excessive love of praise; we must consider it as written, not by a philosopher.

^a Urgebat ab eo, ad quem misit, et non habebam plar. Quid? etiam, (dudum circumrodo, quod deveri est) subterfugio mihi videbatur παλαίωδια; sed vix recta, vera, honesta consilia. Non est credibile, quod perfidia in istis principibus, ut volunt esse, et ut esse quicquam haberent fidei. Senseram, noram, et relicti, projectus ab his: tamen hoc erat in animo, ut illis in republica consentirem. Idem erant, qui fu-Vix aliquando to auctore respivi. Dico, ea te morque facerem, non etiam ut scriberem. Ego memihi necessitatem volui imponere hujus novæ cos-tionis, ne qua mihi liceret labi ad illos, qui etiam tu-misereri mei debent, non desinunt invidere. Sed modici fuimus ὀρθότατοι, ut scripsi—Sed quomodo nihil possunt, si me amare nolunt, demus opera-m, qui possunt, diligamur. Dico, vellem jampr-Scio te voluisse, et me adinam germanum fuisse.—A.
iv. 5.

Scribis poema ab eo nostrum probari.—Ad Quint.

^b Ep. Fam. 12.

^a Fuit et Balbus Cornelius major consul—Primus externorum, atque etiam in oceanis gentium usus illo honore.
—Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 43.

Garama caput Garamantum: omnia armis Romanis superata, et a Cornelio Balbo triumphata, omni omnium externo curru et Quiritium jure donato: quippe Gadibus nato civitas Romana cum Balbo majore patrum data est.
—Ibid. v. 5.

^b Sumptus unius generis objectus est, habitationis:
triginta millibus dixisset cum habitare. Nunc demum intelligo P. Clodii insulam esse venalem, cujus hic in edi-culis habitat, decem, ut opinor, millibus.—Pro Cælio, 7.

ple, but a statesman, conscious of the greatest services to his country, for which he had been barbarously treated; and, on that account, the more eager to have them represented in an advantageous light, and impatient to taste some part of that glory when living, which he was sure to reap from them when dead: and as to the passage which gives the offence, where he presses his friend to exceed even the bounds of truth in his praises, it is urged only, we say, conditionally, and upon an absurd or impossible supposition, that Lucceius did not think the acts themselves really laudable, or worth praising: but whatever exceptions there may be to the morality, there can be none to the elegance and composition of the letter, which is filled with a variety of beautiful sentiments, illustrated by examples drawn from a perfect knowledge of history; and that it is justly ranked among the capital pieces of the epistolary kind which remain to us from antiquity. Cicero had employed more than ordinary pains upon it, and was pleased with his success in it: for he mentions it to Atticus with no small satisfaction, and wished him to get a copy of it from their friend Lucceius. The effect of it was, that Lucceius undertook what Cicero desired, and probably made some progress in it, since Cicero sent him the memoirs which he promised; and Lucceius lived many years after in an uninterrupted friendship with him, though neither this nor any other of his writings had the fortune to be preserved to succeeding ages*.

With people's eyes and inclinations began now to turn towards Caesar, who by the eclat of his victories seemed to rival the fame of Pompey himself, and by his address and generosity gained ground upon him daily in authority and influence in public affairs. He spent the winter at Luca, whither a great concourse of all ranks resorted to him from Rome. Here Pompey and Crassus were again his friends by him; and a project formed that they should jointly seize the consulship for the next year, though they had not declared themselves candidates within the usual time. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a professed enemy, was one of the competitors; who, thinking himself sure of success, did not forbear bragging, that he would effect, when consul, what he could not do when prætor, to undo Caesar's acts, and recal him from his government^b; which made them resolve at all hazards to defeat him. What greatly favoured their design was the obstinacy of the tribune C. Cato, who, to revenge himself on Marcellinus, for not suffering him to hold any assemblies of the people, for promulgating his laws, would not suffer his consuls to hold any, for the choice of the tribunes^c. The triumvirate supported him in his resolution till the year expired, and the government fell into an interregnum; when by faction and violence, and the terror of troops, poured into the city, they extorted the consulship out of the hands of Domitius, and secured it to themselves^d. This made Pompey generally odious, who, in all this height of greatness, could not defend himself from the perpetual raileries and insults of his adversaries, which yet he bore with singular temper and patience. Marcellinus was constantly alarming the city with the danger of his power; and, as he was haranguing one day on that subject, being encouraged by a general acclamation of the people, "Cry out, citizens," says he, "cry out while you may, for it will not be long in your power to do so with safety^e." Cn. Piso also, a young nobleman, who had impeached Manilius Crispus, a man of prætorian rank and notoriously guilty, being provoked by Pompey's protection of him, turned his attack against Pompey himself, and charged him with many crimes against the state; being asked, therefore, by Pompey, why he did not choose to impeach him rather than the criminal, he replied briskly, that if he would give bail to stand a trial, without raising a civil war, he would soon bring him before his judges^f.

During the continuance of these tumults, occasioned by the election of the new consuls, Cicero retired into the country, where he staid to the beginning of May, much out of humour, and disgusted both with the republic and himself. Atticus's constant advice to him was, to consult his safety and interest, by uniting himself with the men of power; and they, on their part, were as constantly inviting him to it, by all possible assurances of their affection: but in his answers to Atticus he observes, "that their two cases were very different; that Atticus, having no peculiar character, suffered no peculiar indignity, nothing but what was common to all the citizens; whereas his own condition was such, that if he spoke what he ought to do, he should be looked upon as a madman; if what was useful only to himself, as a slave; if nothing at all, as quite oppressed and subdued; that his uneasiness was the greater, because he could not show it without being thought ungrateful.—Shall I withdraw myself then (says he) from business, and retire to the port of ease? That will not be allowed to me. Shall I follow these leaders to the wars, and after having refused to command, submit to be commanded? I will do so, for I see that it is your advice, and wish that I had always followed it: or shall I resume my post, and enter again into affairs? I cannot persuade myself to that, but begin to think Philoxenus in the right, who chose to be carried back to prison, rather than commend the tyrant's verses. This is what I am now meditating, to declare my dislike at least of what they are doing^g."

Such were the agitations of his mind at this

* Elysiensium, Lucceio quam mihi—fao ut ab eo sumas: cum bella est: eumque ut adpropere adhorteris, et, cum mihi se ita facturum rescripsit, agas gratias.—Ad Att. iv. 6.

^b Lucceio liberum nostrum dabis.—Ibid. 11.

^c Ibid. cum L. Domitius consulatus candidatus palam clamaret, consulens se effecturum, quod prætor nequissime, impetransque ei exercitus. Crassum Pompeiumque in eam provinciam suam Lucam extractos compulsi, subterfundi Domitii causam alterum consulatum petere.

Idem. J. Cæs. 24.

^d Consul dies comitiales exemit omnes.—C. Cato comitiales est, comitia haberi non solum, et ubi cum populo agendi dies essent exempti.—Ad Quint. ii. 6.

^e Quid enim hoc miseris, quam eum, qui tot annos, quod habet, designatus consul fuerit, consulens fieri non posse? &c.—Ad Att. iv. 8; vide Dio, p. 103.

^f Acclamato, inquit, Quirites, acclamato, dum licet: Jam enim vobis impune facere non licebit.—Val. Max. vi. 2.

^g Da, inquit, prædes reipublice te, si postulatus fueris, civile bellum non excitaturum; etiam de tuo prius, quam de Manilii capite, in concilium judices mittam.—Ibid.

^h Tu quidem, et ei se natura πολιτικός, tamen nullam time, as he frequently signifies in his letters: he was now at one of his villas on the delightful shore of Baize, the chief place of resort and pleasure for the great and rich; Pompey came thither in April, and no sooner arrived than he sent him his compliments, and spent his whole time with him: they had much discourse on public affairs, in which Pompey expressed great uneasiness, and owned himself dissatisfied with his own part in them; but Cicero, in his account of the conversation, intimates some suspicion of his sincerity^b. In the midst of this company and diversion, Cicero's entertainment was in his studies; for he never resided anywhere without securing to himself the use of a good library: here he had the command of Faustus's, the son of Sylla, and son-in-law of Pompey, one of the best collections of Italy, gathered from the spoils of Greece, and especially of Athens, from which Sylla brought away many thousand volumes. He had nobody in the house with him but Dionysius, a learned Greek slave, whom Atticus had made free, and who was entrusted with the instruction of the two young Ciceros, the son and the nephew: with this companion he was devouring books, since the wretched state of the public had deprived him, as he tells us, of all other pleasures. "I had much rather," says he to Atticus, "be sitting on your little bench under Aristotle's picture, than in the curule chairs of our great ones; or taking a turn with you in your walks, than with him whom it must, I see, be my fate to walk with: as for the success of that walk, let fortune look to it, or some god, if there be any, who takes care of us!" He mentions in the same letter a current report at Puteoli, that king Ptolemy was restored; and desires to know what account they had of it at Rome: the report was very true, for Gabinius, tempted by Ptolemy's gold, habes propriam servitutem: communi frueris nomine. Ego vero, qui, si loquor de republica quod oportet, inaneus, si quod opus est, servus existimor, si taceo, oppressus et captus; quo dolore esse debeo? quo sum scilicet hoc etiam acriore, quod ne dolere quidem possum, ut non ingratus videar. Quid si cessare libeat et in otii portum confugere? Nequiquam. Immo etiam in bellum et in castra: ergo erimus ὁπλοῖς, qui τὰ τοιαῦτα esse nolumus? Sic faciendum est: tibi enim ipsi, cui utinam semper paratissim, sic video placere. Reliqui est, Σφόδραν ἔλαχες, ταύταν κόσμει; non mehercule possum: et Philoxeno ignosco, qui reduci in carcerem maluit. Veruntamen id ipsum mecum in his locis commentor, ut ista improbem.—Ad Att. iv. 6.

The story of Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse, and Philoxenus the poet, is told by Diodorus Siculus, lib. xv. p. 331.

^a Pompeius in Cumanum Parilibus venit: misit ad me statim qui salutem nuntiaret: ad eum postridie mane vadebam.—Ad Att. iv. 10.

Nos hic cum Pompeio fulimus: sane sibi displicens; ut loquebatur, sic est enim in hoc homine dicendum.—In nos suavissimè effusus; venit etiam ad me in Cumanum a se.—Ibid. 9.

^b Ego hic pascor bibliotheca Fansti. Fortasse tu putas hic rebus Puteolanis et Lucrinensibus. Ne ista quidem desunt. Sed mehercule a ceteris oblectationibus deserer et voluptatibus propter rempublicam, sic literis sustentor et recreor; maloque in illa tua sedecula, quam habes sub imagine Aristotelis, sedere, quam in istorum sella curuli, tecumque apud te ambulare, quam cum eo, quocum video esse ambulandum. Sed de illa ambulatione fors videret, aut si qui est, qui curet deus.—Ibid. 10.

Nos hic voramus literas cum homine mirifico, ita mehercule sentio, Dionysio.—Ibid. 11.

and the plunder of Egypt, and encouraging as some write, by Pompey himself, under replace him on the throne with his Syrian which he executed with a high hand, destruction of all the king's enemies, defiance of the authority of the senate, direction of the sibyl: this made a great Rome, and irritated the people to such a that they resolved to make him feel their dis for it very severely at his return^b.

His colleague Piso came home the fir his nearer government of Macedonia, after glorious administration of a province, wh consular senator had ever returned but to a For though, on the account of some trifling tage in the field, he had procured himself saluted emperor by his army, yet the occas so contemptible, that he durst not send an upon it to the senate; but after oppress subjects, plundering the allies, and losing part of his troops against the neighbouring rians, who invaded and laid waste the cou ran away in disguise from a mutiny of the whom he disbanded at last without the When he arrived at Rome, he stripped hi of their laurel, and entered the city obscui ignominiously, without any other attendas his own retinue". On his first appear public, trusting to the authority of his son Caesar, he had the hardness to attack Cic complain to the senate of his injurious tr of him: but when he began to reproach hi the disgrace of his exile, the whole assembl rupted him by a loud and general cl Among other things with which he up Cicero, he told him that it was not any what he had done, but the vanity of what said, which had driven him into exile; and single verse of his,

Cedant arma togæ, concedat laurea lingus was the cause of all his calamity, by pr Pompey to make him feel, how much the p the general was superior to that of the or put him in mind also, that it was mean anerous to exert his spleen only against suc he had reason to condemn, without da meddle with those who had more power, an his resentment was more due^c. But it h

^a Vid. Dio, l. xxxix. p. 116, &c.

^b Ex qua aliquot pretorio Imperio, consulari nemo rediit, qui incolumis fuerit, qui non triumphum in Pison. 16.

Ut ex ea provincia, quæ fuit ex omnibus una triumphalis, nullas sit ad senatum literas mittes —Nuntius ad senatum missus est nullus.—Ibid. 11.

Mitto de amicis maxima parte exercitus.—Ibid. Dyrrachium ut venit decedens, obsecrans est al militibus—Quibus cum juratus affirmasset, se, q rentur, postero die persoluturum; domum se inde nocte intempesta crepidatus, veste servili consoendit.—Ibid. 38.

^c Sic iste—Macedonicus imperator in urbem ut ut nullus negotiatoris obscurosimi redditus unquam deserit.—Ibid. 23.

Cum tu—detractam e crucientis fascibus lauream tam Equillinam abieceris.—Ibid. 30.

^a Tunc ausus es meum diocesum illum—male contumelie loco ponere? Quo quidem tempore Patres Conscripti, fructum immortalis vestri in ris—qui non admurmuratione, sed voce et clamore hominis—petulantiam fregisti.—Ibid. 14.

^b Non ulla tibi, inquit, invidia nocuit, sed vera better for him to have stifled his complaints, and suffered Cicero to be quiet; who, exasperated by his imprudent attack, made a reply to him upon the spot in an invective speech, the severest perhaps that was ever spoken by any man, on the person, the parts, the whole life and conduct of Piso; which, as long as the Roman name subsists, must deliver down a most detestable character of him to all posterity. As to the verse with which he was urged, he ridicules the absurdity of Piso's application of it, and tells him, "that he had contrived a very extraordinary punishment for poor poets, if they were to be banished for every bad line: that he was a critic of a new kind, not an Aristarchus, but a grammatical Phalaris; who, instead of expunging the verse, was for destroying the author: that the verse itself could not imply any affront to any man whatsoever; that he was in error, and did not know his letters, to imagine, that by the gown he meant his own gown, or by arms, the arms of any particular general; and not to see, that he was speaking only in the poetical style; and as the one was the emblem of peace, the other of war, that he could mean nothing else, but that the tumults and dangers with which the city had been threatened, must now give way to peace and tranquillity: that he might have stuck a nail indeed in explaining the latter part of the verse, if Piso himself had not helped him out; but, by trampling his own laurel under foot at the gates of Rome, had declared how much he thought it inferior to every other kind of honour—that as for Pompey, it was silly to think, that the volumes which he had written in his leisure, one silly verse should make him at last his enemy: but that, in truth, he never was his enemy; and if, on a certain occasion, he had shown any ill-will towards him, it was all owing to the sickness and malice of such as Piso, who were continually infusing jealousies and suspicions into him, and they had removed from his confidence all who could either him or the republic."

About this time the theatre, which Pompey had built at his own charge for the use and ornament of the city, was solemnly opened and dedicated: it was celebrated by the ancients for its grandeur and magnificence: the plan was taken from the theatre of Mytilene, but greatly enlarged, so as to accommodate forty thousand people. It was surrounded by a portico, to shelter the company from weather, and had a curia or senate-house in it.

Non tunc ductus illos excitavit—Tunc dicis, inquit, quod non notam apponas ad malum verum, et potius armis prosequere.—Quid nunc te, aine, litteras? Non dixi hanc togam, qua sum amictus, nec illam, acutum et gladium imperatoris: sed quod pacis et otii, toga; contra autem arma, tumultus non illi, merore postquam locutus, hoc intelligi volui, bellum et tumultum paci atque otio concessurum—in altero—ut tui tui expediret. Nam cum tu—detractam e meo facibus laurum ad portam Esquilinam abieceris, non modo ampliusdum, sed etiam minime laudi meo concessurum.—Vis Pompeium illo versu inimicum esse factum—Primo nomen compensabit cum uno verbo tot mea volumina laudum suarum? Vestre laudes, vestre criminationes insidiarum mearum—effugiet et ego excideret.—Ibid. 30, 31.

annexed to it, with a basilica also, or grand hall, proper for the sittings of judges, or any other public business; which were all finished at Pompey's cost, and adorned with a great number of images, formed by the ablest masters, of men and women, famed for something very remarkable or prodigious in their lives and characters¹. Atticus undertook the care of placing all these statues, for which Pompey charged Cicero with his thanks to him²: but what made this fabric the more surprising and splendid, was a beautiful temple, erected at one end of it, to Venus the conqueress, and so contrived that the seats of the theatre might serve as stairs to the temple. This was designed, it is said, to avoid the reproach of making so vast an expense for the mere use of luxury, the temple being so placed that those who came to the shows might seem to come to worship the goddess³.

At the solemnity of this dedication, Pompey entertained the people with the most magnificent shows which had ever been exhibited in Rome: in the theatre were stage plays, prizes of music, wrestling, and all kinds of bodily exercises: in the circus, horse-races and huntings of wild beasts for five days successively, in which five hundred lions were killed, and, on the last day, twenty elephants, whose lamentable howling, when mortally wounded, raised such a commiseration in the multitude, from a vulgar notion of their great sense and love to man, that it destroyed the whole diversion of the show, and drew curses on Pompey himself for being the author of so much cruelty⁴. So true it is, what Cicero observes of this kind of prodigality, that there is no real dignity or lasting honour in it; that it satiates while it pleases, and is forgotten as soon as it is over⁵. It gives us, however, a genuine idea of the wealth and grandeur of these principal subjects of Rome, who, from their private revenues, could raise such noble buildings, and provide such shows, from the several quarters of

¹ Pompeius Magnus in ornamentis theatri mirabiles fama posuit imagines; ob id diligentius magnorum artificum ingenio elaboratas: inter quas legitur Eutyche, a viginti liberis rogo illata, enixa triginta partus; Alcippe, Elephantum.—Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 3.

² Tibi etiam gratias agebat, quod signa componenda suscepisses.—Ad Att. iv. 9.

³ Quum Pompeius, inquit, aedem Victoriae dedicaturus esset, cuius gradus vicem theatri essent, &c.—Aul. Gell. x. 1; Tertull. De Spectaculis.

Dion Cassius mentions it, as a tradition that he had met with, that this theatre was not really built by Pompey, but by his freedman, Demetrius, who had made himself richer than his master, by attending him in his wars; and to take off the envy of raising so vast an estate, laid out a considerable part of it upon the theatre, and gave the honour of it to Pompey.—Dio. p. 107; Seneca De Tranq. Anim. c. 8.

⁴ Magnificentissima vero Pompeli nostri munera in secundo consulatu.—De Off. ii. 16.

Pompey quoque altero consulatu, dedicatione templi Veneris Victricis, pugnare in circo viginti elephantis.—Amisae fugae poe misericordiam vulgi inenarrabili habitu querentes supplicare, quadam sese lamentatione complorantes, tanto populi dolore, ut oblitus imperatoris—frens universus consurgeret, diraque Pompeio, quas ille mox luit, penas imprecaretur.—Plin. l. viii. 7; Dio, l. xxxix. p. 107; Plutarch. in Pomp.

⁵ In his infinitis—sumptibus, nihil nos magnopere mirari: cum nec necessitati subveniatur, nec dignitas augeatur: ipsaque illa delectatio multitudinis sit ad breve exiguumque tempus—in quo tamen ipso una cum satietate memoria quoque moriatur voluptatis.—De Off. ii. 16.

the world, which no monarch on earth is now able to exhibit.

Cicero, contrary to his custom, was present at these shows, out of compliment to Pompey, and gives a particular account of them to his friend M. Marius, who could not be drawn by them from his books and retreat in the country. "The old actors (says he) who had left the stage came on to it again in honour to Pompey, but, for the sake of their own honour, ought rather to have staid away: our friend Æsopus appeared to be quite sunk and worn out, so that all people seemed willing to grant him his quietus; for, in attempting to raise his voice, where he had occasion to swear, his speech faltered and failed him.—In the other plays, the vast apparatus, and crowded machinery, which raised the admiration of the mob, spoiled the entertainment: six hundred mules, infinite treasures of plate, troops of horse and foot fighting on the stage.—The huntings, indeed, were magnificent; but what pleasure to a man of taste, to see a poor weak fellow torn to pieces by a fierce beast, or a noble beast struck dead with a spear? The last day's show of elephants, instead of delight, raised a general compassion, and an opinion of some relation between that animal and man: but lest you should think me wholly happy, in these days of diversion, I have almost burst myself in the defence of your friend Gallus Caninius: if the city would be as kind to me as they are to Æsopus, I would willingly quit the stage, to live with you, and such as you, in a polite and liberal ease."

The city continued, for a great part of this summer, without its annual magistrates: for the elections, which had been postponed from the last year, were still kept off by the consuls, till they could settle them to their minds, and secure them to their own creatures; which they effected at last, except in the case of two tribunes, who slipped into the office against their will: but the most remarkable repulse was of M. Cato from the prætorship, which was given to Vatinius, from the best citizen to the worst. Cato, upon his return from the Cyprian voyage, was complimented by the senate for that service with the offer of the prætorship in an extraordinary manner⁷. But he declined the compliment, thinking it more agreeable to his character to obtain it in the ordinary way, by the free choice of the people: but when the election came on, in which he was thought sure of success, Pompey broke up the assembly, on pretence of somewhat inauspicious in the heavens, and by intrigue and management got Vatinius declared prætor, who had been repulsed the year before with disgrace, from the ædileship⁸: but this being carried by force of money, and likely to produce an impeachment of Vatinius, Afranius moved for a decree, that the prætors should not be questioned for bribery after their election, which passed against the general humour of the senate, with an exception only of sixty days, in which they were to be considered as private men. The pretence for the decree was, that so much of the year being the whole would pass without any prætors if a liberty of impeaching was allowed: at present, says Cicero, they have given the choice to Cato; and, being masters of all, resolve the world shall know it⁹.

Cicero's Palatine house, and the adjoining of Catulus, were now finished; and as he brother were the curators likewise of the temple of *Tellus*¹⁰, so they seem to have added some inscriptions for these buildings in and memory of themselves; but since no inscriptions could be set up unless by public authority, they were apprehensive of an opposition Clodius. Cicero mentioned the case to F who promised his assistance, but advised talk also with Crassus, which he took occasion as he attended him home one day for the senate. Crassus readily undertook the affair, told him that Clodius had a point to carry for himself by Pompey's help and his; and that it would not oppose Clodius, he was persuaded Clodius would not disturb him, to which consented. Clodius's business was to one of those free or honorary lieutenantancies, might go with a public character to Byzantium and king Brogitarus, to gather the money they owed him for past services. "As it is a money matter," says Cicero, "I shall not say myself about it, whether I gain my own or not, though Pompey and Crassus have undertaken it." But he seems to have obtained what he desired, since, besides the inscriptions, he mentions a statue also of his brother which he had actually erected at the temple of *Tellus*¹¹.

Trebonius, one of the tribunes in the interim of the triumvirate, published a law for the assignment of provinces to the consuls for the term of years—to Pompey Spain and Africa, to C Syria and the Parthian war, with a power of what forces they thought fit; and that a commission should be renewed also for five years more. The law was opposed by the general assembly of the senate, and, above all, by Cato, Favonius two of the tribunes, C. Ateius Capito, and Filius Gallus. But the superior force of the law and the other tribunes prevailed, and cleared the forum by violence of all their opponents.

The law now sooner passed than Crassus

⁷ A. D. in Id. *Ma*li S. C. factum est de ambitu in sententiam.—Sed magno cum gemitu senatus. (non sunt persecuti eorum sententias: qui Afranius essent assensu addiderunt, ut prætores ita crearet dies i. x. privati essent. Eo die Catonem plane repulsi. Quid multa? Tement omnia, idque ita omnes in volunt.—Ad Quint. li. 9.

⁸ Quod ædes Telluris est curationis mem.—De Responsa. 14.

⁹ Multa nocte cum Vibullio veni ad Pompeium. que ego egissem de istis operibus et inscriptioni mihi benigne respondit.—Cum Crasso se dixit loqui mihi que, ut idem facerem suavis. Crassum ex senatu domum reduxi: suscepit rem, dixit, quod Clodius hoc tempore cuperet se, et per Pompeium consequi. Putare se, si ego cum non impedirem, per adipisci sine contentione quod vellem, &c.—Ad li. 9.

Reddita est mihi pervetus epistola—in qua Telluris, et de porticu Catuli me admones. Fit ut diligenter. Ad Telluriam etiam tuam statuas h. Ibid. li. 1.

⁷ Ep. Fam. vii. 1.

⁸ Cujus ministerii gratia senatus relationem interponi jubebat, ut prætoris comitibus extra ordinem ratio ejus haberetur. Sed ipse id fieri passus non est.—Val. Max. li. 1; Plutarch. in Caton.

⁹ Proxima demeritis suffragia—quoniam quem honorem Caton negaverunt, Vatinius dare coacti sunt.—Val. Max. vii. 5; Plutarch. in Pomp.

to prepare for his Eastern expedition, and was in such haste to set forward that he left Rome above six months before the expiration of his consulship. in eagerness to involve the republic in a desperate war, for which the Parthians had given no pretext, as generally detested by the city. The tribune Ateius declared it impious, and prohibited by all the auspices, and denounced direful imprecations against it; but finding Crassus determined to march in defiance of all religion, he waited for him at the gates of the city, and, having dressed up a little altar, stood ready with a fire and sacrifice to devote him to destruction⁴. Ateius was afterwards driven out of the senate by Appian, when he was accused, for falsifying the auspices on this occasion; at the miserable fate of Crassus supported the words of them, and confirmed the vulgar opinion of the inevitable force of those ancient rites in avenging down the divine vengeance on all who were doomed to condemn them⁵. Appian was one of the augurs, and the only one of the college who maintained the truth of their auguries and the reality of divination, for which he was laughed at by the rest, who charged him also with an absurdity in the reason which he subscribed for his censure upon Ateius, viz. that he had falsified the auspices, had brought a great calamity on the Roman people; as if the auspices, they said, were false, they could not possibly have any effect, or be the cause of that calamity⁶. But though they were undoubtedly forged, it is certain however that they had a real influence on the overthrow of Crassus; for the terror of them had deeply possessed the minds of the soldiers, and made them turn everything which they saw or heard to an omen of their ruin; so that when the enemy appeared in sight they were struck with such a panic that they had no courage or spirit enough left to make a tolerable resistance.

Crassus was desirous before he left Rome to be reconciled to Cicero. They had never been real friends, but generally opposite in party; and Crassus's early engagements with Pompey kept him at a distance from Crassus. Their coldness was still increased on account of Catiline's plot, of which Crassus was strongly suspected, and charged Cicero with being the author of that conspiracy; they carried it however on both sides with much decency, out of regard to Crassus's name, Publius, a professed admirer and disciple of Cicero, till an accidental debate in the senate blew out their secret grudge into an open quarrel. The debate was upon Gabinus, whom Crassus undertook to defend, with many severe reflections upon Cicero, who replied with no less acrimony, and gave vent to that old resentment of Crassus's many injuries which had been gathering, he says, several years, but lain dormant so long that he took it to be extinguished, till, from this accident, it burst

⁴ De Div. l. xxxix. p. 109; Plutarch. in Crass.

⁵ De Crasso quid acciderit, videremus, dirarum obnuntiatio neglecta.—De Divin. l. 16.

⁶ Scilicet enim multorum annorum memoria, non decem tantum augurii, sed divinandum tenuit disciplinam: quem solentem college tui, eumque tum Pisidan, tum Soranum augures esse dicebant. Quibus nulla videbatur in augurio res suspensa.—Ibid. 47.

⁷ In quo Apples, bonus augur—non satis acriter—civem arguit, Ateium, censor notavit, quod ementitum auspicium interpretatus.—Quæ et falsa fuisse nullam adferre potestatem calamitatis.—Ibid. 16.

out into a flame. The quarrel gave great joy to the chiefs of the senate, who highly applauded Cicero, in hopes to embroil him with the triumvirate. But Pompey laboured hard to make it up, and Cæsar also by letter expressed his uneasiness upon it, and begged it of Cicero as a favour to be reconciled with Crassus; so that he could not hold out against an intercession so powerful, and so well enforced by his affection to young Crassus. Their reconciliation was confirmed by mutual professions of a sincere friendship for the future; and Crassus, to give a public testimony of it to the city, invited himself, just before his departure, to sup with Cicero, who entertained him in the gardens of his son-in-law, Crassipes⁷. These gardens were upon the banks of the Tiber, and seem to have been famous for their beauty and situation⁸, and are the only proof which we meet with of the splendid fortunes and condition of Crassipes.

Cicero spent a great part of the summer in the country, in study and retreat; pleased, he says, that he was out of the way of those squabbles where he must either have defended what he did not approve, or deserted the man whom he ought not to forsake⁹. In this retirement he put the last hand to his piece on the Complete Orator, which he sent to Atticus, and promises also to send to Lentulus, telling him that he had intermitted his old task of orations, and betaken himself to the milder and gentler studies, in which he had finished to his satisfaction three books, by way of dialogue, on the subject of the Orator, in Aristotle's manner, which would be of use to his son, young Lentulus, being drawn, not in the ordinary way of the schools and the dry method of precepts, but comprehending all that the ancients, and especially Aristotle and Isocrates, had taught on the institution of an orator¹⁰.

The three books contain as many dialogues, upon the character and idea of the perfect orator. The principal speakers were P. Crassus and M. Antonius, persons of the first dignity in the republic, and the greatest masters of eloquence which Rome had then known; they were near forty years older than Cicero, and the first Romans who could pretend to dispute the prize of oratory with the

⁷ Repentinam ejus Gabini defensionem—Si sine ulla mea contumelia suscepisset, tulissim: sed cum me disputantem, non lacestantem læsisset, exarsit non solum presentis, credo, iracundia (nam ea tam vehementes fortasse non fuisset) sed cum inclusum illud odium multarum ejus in me injuriarum, quod ego effudisse me omne arbitrabar, relictum tamen in faciente me fuisset, omne repente apparuit—Cumque Pompeius ita contendisset, ut nihil unquam magis, ut cum Crasso redirem in gratiam; Cæsarque per litteras maxima se molestia ex illa contentione affectum ostenderet: habui non tempus solum meorum rationem, sed etiam naturæ. Crassusque, ut quasi testata populo Romano esset nostra gratia, pene a meis laribus in provinciam est profectus. Nam cum mihi condixisset, cœnavit apud me in mei generi Crassipidis hortis.—Ep. Fam. l. 9.

⁸ Ad Quint. ill. 7; Ad Att. iv. 12.

⁹ Ego affuisse me in altercationibus, quas in senatu factas audio, fero non moleste; nam aut defendissem quod non placeret, aut defuissem cui non oporteret.—Ad Att. iv. 13.

¹⁰ Scripsi etiam, (nam ab orationibus dijunxto me fere, refereoque ad manusiores musas,) scripsi igitur Aristoteleo more, quemadmodum quidem volui, tres libros in disputatione et dialogo de oratore, quos arbitror Lentulo tuo non fore inutilis. Abhorrent enim a communibus præceptis: ac omnem antiquorum, et Aristotelem et Isocrateam rationem oratoriam complectuntur.—Ep. Fam. l. 9.

Greeks, and who carried the Latin tongue to a degree of perfection which left little or no room for any further improvement¹. The disputation was undertaken at the desire and for the instruction of two young orators of great hopes, C. Cotta and P. Sulpicius, who were then beginning to flourish at the bar. Cicero himself was not present at it, but being informed by Cotta of the principal heads and general argument of the whole, supplied the rest from his own invention, agreeably to the different style and manner which those great men were known to pursue; and with design to do honour to the memory of them both, but especially of Crassus, who had been the director of his early studies, and to whom he assigns the defence of that notion which he himself always entertained of the character of a consummate speaker².

Atticus was exceedingly pleased with this treatise, and commended it to the skies, but objected to the propriety of dismissing Scævola from the disputation after he had once been introduced into the first dialogue. Cicero defends himself by the example of their god Plato, as he calls him, in his book on Government, where the scene, being laid in the house of an old gentleman, Cephalus, the old man, after bearing a part in the first conversation, excuses himself that he must go to prayers, and returns no more; Plato not thinking it suitable to the character of his age to be detained in the company through so long a discourse; that, with greater reason, therefore, he had used the same caution in the case of Scævola, since it was not decent to suppose a person of his dignity, extreme age, and infirm health, spending several days successively in another man's house: that the first day's dialogue related to his particular profession, but the other two turned chiefly on the rules and precepts of the art, where it was not proper for one of Scævola's temper and character to assist only as a hearer³. This admirable work remains entire, a standing monument of Cicero's parts and abilities, which, while it exhibits to us the idea of a perfect orator, and marks out the way by which Cicero formed himself to that character, it explains the reason likewise why nobody

¹ Crassus—quatuor et triginta tum habebat annos, totidemque annis mihi ætate præstabat—Triennio ipso minor quam Antonius, quod idcirco posui, ut dicendi latine prima maturitas qua ætate extitisset, posset notari; et intelligeretur, jam ad summum pene casum deductam, ut eo nihil ferre quisquam addere posset, nisi qui a philosophia, a jure civili, ab historia fuisset instructior.—Brut. 276.

Nunc ad Antonium, Crassumque pervenimus. Nam ego sic existimo hos oratores fuisse maximos: et in his primum cum Græcorum gloria latine dicendi copiam æquatam.—Ibid. 280.

² Nos enim, qui ipsi sermoni non interfusimus, et quibus C. Cotta tantummodo locos ac sententias hujus disputationis tradidisset, quo in genere orationis utrumque oratorem cognoveramus, id ipsum sumus in eorum sermone adumbrare conati.—De Orat. iii. 4.

Ut ei, (Crasso) et si nequaquam parem illius ingenio, at pro nostro tamen studio meritam gratiam debitamque referamus.—Ibid.

³ Quod in his libris, quos laudas, personam desideras Scævola. Non eam temere dimovi, sed feci idem, quod in Academici dens ille noster, Plato. Cum in Piræum Socrates venisset ad Cephalum, locupletem et festivum senem, quoad primus ille sermo habebatur adest in disputando senex, &c.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

has since equalled him, or ever will, till it found again united, what will hardly be found in any man, the same industry and the same

Cicero returned to Rome about the 11th of November, to assist at Milo's wedding, which was celebrated at the house of Fausta, a rich and noble lady, the daughter of Sylla the dictator⁴, with whom, as some say, he found Sallust the historian in bed; after, and had him soundly lashed before he missed him. The consuls, Pompey and Crassus, having reaped all the fruit which they had produced from the consulship, of securing to themselves the provinces which they wanted, were not concerned about the choice of their successors that after postponing the election to the next year, they gave way at last to their friends. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, being content to be joined with him their friend Appius (Pulcher).

As soon as the new year came on, Cicero's enemies began to attack him in the senate, and design was to revoke his consulship, or abridge it at least of the first year, making war upon the Parthians. Cicero exerted himself so strenuously in his defence that he baffled all attempts, after a warm contest, to secure the consuls themselves and the consular senators. He gave Crassus an account of the debate in which he tells him that he had given not only to his friends and family, but to the city, of the sincerity of his reconciliation, and assures him of his resolution to serve him in his pains, advice, authority, interest, in every great or small, which concerned himself, his clients, and bids him look upon that league of amity which on his part should be mutually observed⁵.

The month of February being generally set apart in giving audience to foreign princes and ambassadors, Antiochus, king of Comagene, a tributary on the banks of the Euphrates, preferred his petition to the senate for some new honour or privilege, which was commonly decreed to princes in alliance with the republic: but Cicero, being rallying humour, made the petition so ridiculous that the house rejected it; and, at his motion, served likewise out of his jurisdiction on principal towns, Zeugma, in which was the bridge and passage over the Euphrates. In his consulship, he had granted to this king the honour of the prætexta, or the robe of the magistrates, which was always disagreeable to nobility, who did not care to see these princes put upon the same rank with them; so that Cicero, calling out upon the nobles for you," says he, "who refused the prætexta to the king of Bostra, "suffer this Comagenian to wear purple!" But this disappointment was mortifying to the king than it was to the nobles, whose best perquisites were drawn from the tributes, which were always repaid by presents: so that Appius, who had been lately elected to Cicero, and paid a particular court at this time, applied to him by Atticus and their common friends to suffer the petitions of this sort to pass quietly, nor destroy the usual harvest of the month, and make it quite barren to him*.

⁴ Ad Att. iv. 13; v. 8.

⁵ Has litteras velim existimes fœderis habituras non epistolæ; meque ea, quæ tibi promitto ac sanctissime casu observaturum.—Ep. Fam. v. 8.

⁶ Ep. Fam. xv. 1, 3, 4.

Cicero made an excursion this spring to visit his several seats and estates in the country; and, in his Cuman villa, began a treatise on politics, or on the best state of a city, and the duties of a citizen: he calls it "a great and laborious work, yet worthy of his pains if he could succeed in it; if not, I shall throw it (says he) into that sea which is now before me, and attempt something else, since it is impossible for me to be idle." It was drawn up in the form of a dialogue, in which the greatest persons of the old republic were introduced, debating on the origin and best constitution of government; Scipio, Lælius, Philus, Manilius, &c. The whole was to be distributed into nine books, each of them the subject of one day's disputation. When he had finished the two first, they were read in his Tusculan villa to some of his friends; where Sallust, who was one of the company, advised him to change his plan, and take the subject in his own person, as Aristotle had done before him; alleging, that the introduction of those ancients, instead of adding gravity, gave an air of romance to the argument, which would have the greater weight when delivered from himself, as being the work not of a little talent, or contemplative theorist, but of a consistent senator and statesman, conversant in the greatest affairs, and writing what his own practice and the experience of many years had taught him to be true. These reasons seemed very plausible, and made him think of altering his scheme; especially since, by throwing the scene so far back, he precluded himself from touching on those important revolutions of the republic which were later than the period to which he confined himself: after some deliberation, being unwilling to throw away the two books already finished, with which he was much pleased, he resolved to stick to the old plan, and as he had preferred it from the first, for the sake of avoiding offence, so he altered it without any other alteration than that reducing the number of books from nine to six, in which form they were afterwards published, and survived him for several ages, though now unfortunately lost†.

* De Comageno rege, quod rem totam discusseram, mihi perire et per Pomponium blanditur Appius. Videt enim, me genere dicendi utar in cæteris, Februarium sterilem iterum. Eumque laud Jocoos satis: neque solum illud illud opprobrium, quod erat positum in Euphrate, Zeug-scribam illa, quæ dixeram πολλὰ, epistolum sane parum et operosum: sed et ex sententiâ successerit, bene et opera posita; sin minus, in illud ipsum mare dejiciamus, quod scribentes spectamus; aggrediamur alia, quæ quiescere non possumus.—Ibid. 14.
† et præterea togam ejus pretextam, quam erat apud Cæsare consul, magno hominum risu cavillatus. Non autem homines nobiles, qui Bostrenum pretextam non servabat, Comagenum feretis?—Multa dixi in hocdem regem, quibus totus est explosus. Quo genere amovetur Appius totum me amplexatur.—Ad Quint. li. 3.

Sunt quoque, quam institui, de republica disputationem in officii personam et Philii et Lælii et Manilii contuli, etiam, quod te non fugit, magnam complexus sum etiam, et plurimi otii, quod ego maxime egeo.—Ad li. 16.

¶ Ferre autem in novem et dies et libros distributus de

From the fragments of this work, which still remain, it appears to have been a noble performance, and one of his capital pieces, where all the important questions in politics and morality were discussed with the greatest elegance and accuracy—of the origin of society, the nature of law and obligation, the eternal difference of right and wrong, of justice being the only good policy or foundation either of public or private prosperity; so that he calls his six books so many pledges given to the public for the integrity of his conduct*. The younger Scipio was the principal speaker of the dialogue, whose part it was to assert the excellence of the Roman constitution, preferably to that of all other states†; who, in the sixth book, under the fiction of a dream, which is still preserved to us, takes occasion to inculcate the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and a future state, in a manner so lively and entertaining that it has been the standing pattern ever since to the wits of succeeding ages, for attempting the same method of instilling moral lessons in the form of dreams or visions.

He was now drawn at last into a particular intimacy and correspondence of letters with Cæsar, who had long been endeavouring to engage him to his friendship, and with that view had invited his brother, Quintus, to be one of his lieutenants in Gaul, where Quintus, to pay his court the better to his general, joined heartily in pressing his brother to a union with him, instead of adhering so obstinately to Pompey, who, as he tells him, was neither so sincere nor so generous a friend as Cæsar‡. Cicero did not dislike the advice, and expressed a readiness to comply with it, of which Balbus gave an intimation to Cæsar, with a letter also inclosed from Cicero himself; but the packet happening to fall into water, the letters were all destroyed except a scrap or two of Balbus's, to which Cæsar returned answer:—"I perceive that you had written somewhat about Cicero, which I could not make out; but, as far as I can guess, it was something rather to be wished than hoped for."§ optimo statu civitatis et de optimo cive.—Hi libri, cum in Tusculano mihi legeretur, audiente Sallustio, admonitus sum ab illo, multo majore auctoritate illis de rebus dici posse, si ipse loqueretur de republica; præsertim cum essem, non Heracides Ponticus, sed consularis, et is, qui in maximis versatus in republicis rebus essem: quæ tam antiquis hominibus attribuerem, ea visum iri ficta esse.—Commovit me, et eo magis, quod maximos motus nostræ civitatis attingere non poteram, quod erant inferiores, quam illorum ætas qui loquebantur. Ego autem id ipsum tum eram secutus, ne in nostræ tempora incurrens offenderem quempiam.—Ad Quint. li. 5.

This will solve that variation which we find in his own account of this work, in different parts of his writings: and why Fannius, who in some places is declared to be a speaker in it, [Ad Att. li. 16; Ad Quint. li. 5.] is denied to be so in others; being dropped when the number of books was contracted.

¶ Cum sex libris, tanquam prædibus me ipsum obtrinxerim, quos tibi tam valde probari gaudeo.—Ad Att. vi. 1.

¶ An censes, cum in illis de republica libris persuaderi videatur Africanus, omnium rerum publicarum nostram veterem illam fuisse optimam.—De Leg. li. 10; ibid. li. 6, 9.

¶ De Pompeio assentior tibi, vel tu potius mihi, nam, ut scis, jam pridem istum canto Cæsarem.—Ad Quint. li. 13.

¶ Ille scripsit ad Balbum, faeculum illum epistolæ, in quo fuerat et mea et Balbi, totum sibi aqua madidum esse: ut ne illud quidem sciat, meam fuisse aliquam epis-

But Cicero sent another copy of the same letter, which came safe to his hands, written, as he says, in the familiar style, yet without departing from his dignity. Cæsar answered him with all imaginable kindness, and the offer of everything in which his power could serve him, telling him how agreeable his brother's company was to him by the revival of their old affection; and since he was now removed to such a distance from him, he would take care that in their mutual want of each other, he should have cause at least to rejoice that his brother was with him, rather than any one else. He thanks him also for sending the lawyer Trebatius to him, and says upon it jocosely, that there was not a man before in his army who knew how to draw a recognizance. Cicero, in his account of this letter to his brother, says—"It is kind in you, and like a brother, to press me to this friendship, though I am running that way apace myself, and shall do, what often happens to travellers, who, rising later than they intended, yet by quickening their speed come sooner to their journey's end than if they had set out earlier; so I, who have overslept myself in my observance of this man, though you were frequently rousing me, will correct my past laziness by mending my pace for the future." But as to his seeking any advantage or personal benefit from this alliance, "believe me," says he, "you who know me, I have from him already what I most value, the assurance of his affection, which I prefer to all the great things that he offers me." In another letter he says,—"I lay no great stress on his promises, want no further honours, nor desire any new glory, and wish nothing more but the continuance of his esteem—yet live still in such a course of ambition and fatigue as if I were expecting what I do not really desire."

But though he made no use of Cæsar's generosity for himself, yet he used it freely for his friends: for besides his brother, who was Cæsar's lieutenant, and Trebatius, who was his lawyer; he procured an eminent post for Orfius, and a regiment for Curtius; yet Cæsar was chiding him all the while for his reservedness in asking^c. His recommendation. Sed ex Balbi epistola pauca verba intellexerat, ad quæ rescriptis his verbis:—De Cicerone video te quiddam scripsisse, quod ego non intellexi; quantum autem conjectura consequar, id erat hujusmodi, ut magis optandum, quam sperandum putarem.—Ad Quint. li. 12.

^a Cum Cæsaris literis, referitis omni officio, diligentia, suavitatē—Quarum initium est, quam suavis ei tuus adventus fuerit, et recordatio veteris amoris; deinde se effecturum, ut ego in medio dolore ac desiderio tui, te, cum a me abessem, potissimum secum esse letarer.—Trebatium quod ad se miserum, per se et humaniter etiam gratias mihi agit: negat enim in tanta multitudine eorum, qui una essent, quempiam fuisse, qui vadimonium concipere posset.—

Quare facis tu quidem fratres, quod me hortaris, sed mehercule currentem nunc quidem, ut omnia mea studia in letum unum conferam, &c.

^b Sed mihi orede, quem nesci, quod in istis rebus ego plurimum aestimo, jam habeo:—deinde Cæsar's tantum in me amorem, quem omnibus his honoribus, quos me a se expectare vult, antepono.—Ad Quint. li. 12.

^c Promissis his, quæ ostendit, non valde pendeo: nec honores sitio, nec desidero gloriam: magisque ejus voluntatis perpetuitatem, quam promissorum exitum expecto. Vivo tamen in ea ambitione et labore, tanquam id, quod non postulo, expectem.—Ibid. lii. 5.

^d M. Curtio tribunatum ab eo petivi.—Ibid. li. 12; Ep. Fam. vii. 5.

De tribunatu—mihi ipse Cæsar nominatim Curtio para-mentary letter of Trebatius, will show what a share he possessed at this time of confidence, and with what an affectionate used to recommend his friends.

"Cicero to Cæsar emperor:

"See, how I have persuaded myself to you as a second self; not only in what aff my own interest, but in what concerns my I had resolved, whithersoever I went ab carry C. Trebatius along with me, that I bring him home adorned with the fruits care and kindness: but since Pompey's Rome has been longer than I expected, own irresolution, to which you are no s will either wholly hinder, or at least ret going abroad at all; see, what I have tak myself: I began presently to resolve, that T should expect the same things from you w had been hoping for from me: nor did I him with less frankness of your good will used to do of my own: but a wonderful fell out, both as a testimony of my opinion pledge of your humanity; for while I was of this very Trebatius at my house with ou Balbus, your letter was delivered to me; in of which you said, 'As to M. Orfius, who recommended to me, I will make him ev of Gaul, or lieutenant to Lepta; send me therefore, if you please, whom I may prefere lifted up our hands, both I and Balbus; the o was so pat, that it seemed not to be acc but divine. I send you therefore Trebatiu send him so, as at first indeed I designe own accord, but now also by your invi embrace him, my dear Cæsar, with all you courtesy; and whatever you could be ind do for my friends, out of your regard to me it all singly upon him. I will be answer the man; not in my former style, which yo rallied, when I wrote to you about Milo, the true Roman phrase which men of sen that there is not an honest, worthier, m man living: I must add, what makes the part of his character, that he has a singular and perfect knowledge of the civil law. I him, neither a regiment nor government, a certain piece of preferment; I ask you violence and generosity; yet am not again adorning him, whenever you shall think with those trappings also of glory: in a deliver the whole man to you, from my h we say, into yours, illustrious for victo faith. But I am more importunate than I be to you; yet I know you will excuse it care of your health, and continue to love you now do."

Trebatius was of a lazy, indolent, s temper; a lover of books and good co eagerly fond of the pleasures of Rome; and out of his element in a camp: and because through the infinite hurry of his affairs, c presently admit him to his familiarity, and him so soon as he expected, he was tired drudgery of attending him, and impatient home again. Under these circumstances, the series of letters to him from Cicero, written a tum esse rescripti, neque in rogando veras objurgavit.—Ad Quint. lii. 1.

^d Ep. Fam. vii. 5.

with the disinterested affection of a friend, but the solicitude even of a parent, employing all the arts of education, as well of the grave as of the luscious kind, to hinder him from ruining his hopes and fortunes by his own imprudence. He laughs at his childish hankering after the city; bids him reflect on the end for which he went abroad, and pursue it with constancy; observes, from the Medea of Euripides, that many had served themselves and the public well at a distance from their country; whilst others, by spending their lives at home, had lived and died ingloriously; of which number," says he, "you would have been one, if we had not thrust you out; and since I am now acting Medea, take this other lesson from me, that he who is not wise for himself, is wise to no purpose." He rallies his impatience, or rather "imprudence," as if he had carried a bond, not a letter to Cæsar, and thought that he had nothing to do but to take his money and return home; not recollecting, that even those who followed King Ptolemy with bonds to Alexandria, had not yet brought back a penny of money¹. You write me word," says he, "that Cæsar now consults you; I had rather hear that he consults your interest². Let me die, if I do not believe, such is your vanity, that you had rather be consulted than enriched by him³." By these raileries and perpetual admonitions: he made Trebatius ashamed of his softness, and content to stay with Cæsar, by whose favour and generosity he was cured at last of all his uneasiness; and having here laid the foundation of his fortunes, flourished afterwards in the court of Augustus, with the character of the most learned lawyer of that age⁴.

Cæsar was now upon his second expedition into Britain; which raised much talk and expectation at Rome, and gave Cicero no small concern for the safety of his brother, who, as one of Cæsar's incursions, was to bear a considerable part in it⁵. But the accounts which he received from the place soon eased him of his apprehensions, by informing him, that there was nothing either to fear or to hope from the attempt; no danger from the people, no spoils from the country⁶. In a letter

¹ Tu modo ineptias istas et desideria urbis et urbanitatis depone: et quo consilio profectus es, id assiduitate et veritate consequere.—

² Nam multi suam rem bene gessere et poplicam, patria procal.

³ Multi, quæ domi ætatem agerent, propterea sunt impudati.

⁴ Quo in numero tu certe fuisses, nisi te extraxissemus—et quando Medæam agere cepit, illud semper memento, quæ ipse ubi sapientie professus non quit, nequiquam sapit.—Ep. Fam. vii. 6.

⁵ Subimpudens videbæro; tanquam enim syngrapham ad imperatorem, non epistolam attulisses, sic, pecunia soluta, domum redire properabas. Nec tibi in mentem veniebat, eos ipso, qui cum syngraphis venissent Alexandriam, summum adhuc nullum auferre potuisse.—Ibid. 7.

⁶ Censui quidem te a Cæsare scribis; sed ego tibi ab illo censui vellem.—Ibid. 11.

⁷ Moxar, ni, quæ tua gloria est, puto te malle a Cæsare censui, quam laudari.—Ibid. 13.

⁸ —nisi quid tu, docte Trebati, dissimulas.—Rom. Nat. u. l. 79.

⁹ Ex Quinti fratris literis suspicor jam eum esse in Britannia: suspensio animo expecto quid egat.—Ad Att. vi. 13.

¹⁰ Juremachi mihi tuæ de Britannia literæ! Timebam to Atticus, "we are in suspense," says he, "about the British war: it is certain, that the access of the island is strongly fortified; and it is known also already that there is not a grain of silver in it, nor anything else but slaves: of whom you will scarce expect any, I dare say, skilled in music or letters⁸." In another to Trebatius; "I hear that there is not either any gold or silver in the island: if so, you have nothing to do but to take one of their chariots, and fly back to us⁹."

From their raileries of this kind on the barbarity and misery of our island, one cannot help reflecting on the surprising fate and revolutions of kingdoms: how Rome, once the mistress of the world, the seat of arts, empire and glory, now lies sunk in sloth, ignorance and poverty; enslaved to the most cruel as well as to the most contemptible of tyrants, superstition and religious imposture: while this remote country, anciently the jest and contempt of the polite Romans, is become the happy seat of liberty, plenty, and letters; flourishing in all the arts and refinements of civil life: yet running perhaps the same course which Rome itself had run before it; from virtuous industry to wealth; from wealth to luxury; from luxury to an impatience of discipline and corruption of morals; till by a total degeneracy and loss of virtue, being grown ripe for destruction, it falls a prey at last to some hardy oppressor, and, with the loss of liberty, losing everything else that is valuable, sinks gradually again into its original barbarism.

Cicero taking it for granted that Trebatius followed Cæsar into Britain, begins to joke with him upon the wonderful figure that a British lawyer would make at Rome; and, as it was his profession to guard other people's safety, bids him beware that he himself was not caught by the British charioteers¹⁰. But Trebatius, it seems, knew how to take care of himself without Cicero's advice; and when Cæsar passed over to Britain, chose to stay behind in Gaul: this gave a fresh handle for railery; and Cicero congratulates him "upon being arrived at last into a country where he was thought to know something; that if he had gone over also to Britain, there would not have been a man in all that great island wiser than himself."—He observes, "that he was much more cautious in military than in civil contests; and wonders, that being such a lover of swimming, he could not be persuaded to swim in the ocean; and when he could not be kept away from every show of gladiators at Rome, had not the curiosity to see the British charioteers:" he rejoices however, after all, that he did not go; "since they should not now oceannum, timebam litus insule. Reliqua non equidem contemno.—Ad Quint. l. 16.

De Britannicis rebus cognovi ex tuis literis, nihil esse nec quod metuamus, nec quod gaudeamus.—Ibid. iii. 1.

⁸ Britannici belli exitus expectatur. Constat enim aditus insule munitos esse misticis molibus. Etiam illud jam cognitum est, neque argenti scrupulum esse ullum in illa insula, neque ullam spem prædæ, nisi ex mancipiis; ex quibus nullo puto te literis, aut musicis eruditoe expectare.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

⁹ In Britannia nihil esse audio neque auri neque argenti. Id si ita est, cessum aliquid suadeo capias, et ad nos quam primum recurras.—Ep. Fam. vii. 7.

¹⁰ Mira enim persona induci potest Britannici juris consulti.—Ep. Fam. vii. 11.

Tu, qui ceteris cavere didicisti, in Britannia ne ab eedantibus decipiaris caveto.—Ibid. 6.

be troubled with the impertinence of his British stories".

Quintus Cicero, who had a genius for poetry, was projecting the plan of a poem upon their British expedition, and begged his brother's assistance in it: Cicero approved the design, and observed upon it, that the nature and situation of places so strange, the manners of the people, their battles with them, and the general himself Caesar, were excellent subjects for poetry; but as to his assistance, it was sending owls to Athens: that Quintus, who had finished four tragedies in sixteen days, could not want either help or fame in that way, after his Electra and the *Troades*¹. In other letters he answers more seriously; that it was impossible to conceive how much he wanted leisure for versifying: that to write verses required an ease and cheerfulness of mind which the times had taken from him; and that his poetical flame was quite extinguished by the sad prospect of things before them².

He had sent Caesar his Greek poem, in three books, on the history of his consulship; and Caesar's judgment upon it was, that the beginning of it was as good as anything which he had ever seen in that language, but that the following lines, to a certain place, were not equal in accuracy and spirit. Cicero desires therefore to know of his brother, what Caesar really thought of the whole;

† Est, quod gaudeas, te in ista loca venisse, ubi aliquid sapere viderere: quod si in Britanniam quoque profectus esses, profecto nemo in illa tanta insula te peritior fuisset. — Sed tu in re militari multo es cautior quam in advocatibus: qui neque in oceano na'are voluisti, homo studioissimus natandi, neque spectare caedarios, quem antea ne andabatam quidem defraudare poteramus. — Ep. Fam. vii. 10.

In Britanniam te profectum non esse gaudeo, quod et labore caruisti, et ego te de illis rebus non audiam. — Ibid. 17.

The little here given of Trebatius's love of swimming, adds a new light and beauty to that passage of Horace, where the poet introduces him, advising, to swim thrice cross the Tiber, to cure the want of sleep; the advice, it seems, being peculiarly agreeable to his own practice and character.

ter uncti

Transamato Tiberim, somno quibus est opus alto.

Sat. ii. l. 8.

† Te vero ὀρθότατον scribendi egregiam habere video. Quos tu situs, quas naturas rerum et locorum, quos mores, quas gentes, quas pugnas, quem vero ipsum imperatorem habes? Ego te libenter, ut rogas, quibus rebus vis, adjuvabo, et tibi versus, quos rogas, γαλῦκα εἰς Ἀθήνας mittam. — Ad Quint. ii. 16.

Quatuor tragedias, cum xvi diebus absolvisse scribas, tu quidquam ab alio mutuaris? et κλέος queris, cum Electram et Troadem scripseris? — Ibid. iii. 6.

N.B. — These four tragedies, said to be written in sixteen days, cannot be supposed to have been original productions, but translations from some of the Greek poets, of which Quintus was a great master; finished by him in haste for the entertainment of the camp: for the word Troadem in the text, the name of one of them, should most probably be Troades, the title of one of Euripides's plays; as the Electra also was.

† Quod mo de faciendis versibus rogas, incredibile est, mi frater, quantum egoam tempore. — Facerem tamen tu possem, sed — opus est ad poema quadam animi alacritate, quam plane mihi tempora eripiunt. — Ibid. iii. 5.

De versibus — deest mihi opera, quæ: non modo tempus, sed etiam animus ab omni cura vacuum desiderat: sed abest etiam ἐνθουσιασμός — &c. — Ibid. 4.

whether the matter or the style displeased and begs that he would tell him the truth since whether Caesar liked it or not, he says, be a jot the less pleased with. He began however another poem, at his earnest request, to be addressed to C after some progress was so dissatisfied with he tore it³: yet Quintus still urging, saying, that he had acquainted Caesar with the design, he was obliged to resume it, and finished an epic poem in honour of Caesar he promises to send as soon as he could a proper conveyance, that it might not be as Quintus's tragedy of Erigone was from Gaul; the only thing, says he, he had not found a safe passage since Caesar that province⁴.

While Cicero was expressing no small faction at the measures which his presence obliged him to pursue, Caesar was doing in his power to make him easy: he took brother with as much kindness as if Cicero had been his general; gave him the choice winter-quarters, and the legion which he liked⁵: and Clodius happening to write from Rome, he showed the letter to Quintus and declared that he would not answer it. Quintus civilly pressed him not to put affront upon Clodius for their sakes⁶: in all his hurry in Britain, he sent frequently to Cicero in his own hand of his progress, and at the instant of quitting Britain wrote to him from the very shore, of the movement of the troops, and his having taken and imposed a tribute: and lest he surprised at having no letters at the hands of his brother, he acquaints him, that he was then at a distance from him, and take the benefit of that express: Cicero received these letters at Rome in less than a month, and takes notice of one of them arrived on the twentieth day; a despatch that of our present couriers by the post⁷.

* Sed heus tu, celari video a te, quomodo frater, de nostris versibus Caesar? Nam prius legisse scripsit ad me ante: et prima sic, ut Græcæ quidem meliora legisse; reliqua ad quæ βαθυμώτερα. Hoc enim utitur verbo. Dic enim aut res eum aut χαρὰ κρήνη non delectat: quod vercare. Ego enim ne pilo quidem minus. — Ad Quint. ii. 16.

† Poema ad Caesarem, quod composueram, in iii. l. s. 4.

‡ Quod me institutum ad illum poema jubet etiam distentus tum opera, tum animo sum non quoniam ex epistola, quam ad te misera, Caesar me aliquod esse exoritur; revertar ad — Ibid. 8.

Quod me hortaris, ut absolvam, habeo absolvi mihi quidem uti videtur, fratres ad Caesarem, locupletem tabellarium, ne accidat quod Erigoni soli, Cesare Imperatore, iter ex Gallia tutum. — Ibid. 9.

§ Quintum meum — Dii boni! quemadmodum honore, dignitate, gratia? Non secus ac si imperator. Hibernam legionem eligendi commodum, ut ad me scribit. — Ad Att. iv. l. 18.

¶ In qua primum est de Clodii ad Caesarem quo Caesaris consilium proba, quod tibi potentius veniam non dedit, ut ulum ad illam librum rescriberet. — Ad Quint. iii. l. s. 4.

‡ Ab Quinto fratre et a Cesare accepti a

As to the news of the city this summer, Cicero tells his brother, "that there were some hopes of an election of magistrates, but these uncertain; some suspicion of a dictator, yet that not more certain; a great calm in the forum; but of a city, named to be quieted rather by the effects of age than of concord: that his own conduct, as well in public as in private, was just what Quintus had wished, softer than the tip of his ear; and his style in the senate such as pleased others rather than himself.

Such ills does wretched war and discord breed, that bribery was never carried so high as at this time, by the consular candidates, Memmius, Domitius, Scaurus, Messala: that they were all alike; in eminence in any; for money levelled the dignity of them all: that above eighty thousand pounds were promised to the first tribe; and money grown scarce by this profusion of it, that interest was now from four to eight per cent."

Memmius and Cn. Domitius, who joined their efforts, made a strange sort of contract with the people, which was drawn up in writing, and put in proper form by many of their friends on both sides; by which "the consuls obliged themselves to serve them with all their power in the ensuing election; and they on their part undertook, when elected, to procure for the consuls the provinces they desired; and gave a bond of 3000*l*. to provide three augurs who should certify that they were present at making a law granting them those provinces, when no such law had ever been made; and two consular senators, who should affirm, that they were present likewise passing a decree of the senate, for furnishing some provinces with arms and money, when the senate had never been consulted about it."

Britannia, confecta Britannia, obeldibus acceptis, nulla impetrata tamen pecunia, datas a littoribus Britanniae, proximo a. d. vi. Kal. Octob. exercitum Britannia peribant.—Ad Att. iv. 17.

Britannia Caesar ad me Kal. Sept. dedit litteras; quas accipere a. d. iv. Kal. Octob. satis commodas de Britannia rebus: quibus, ne admirem, quod a te nullas accepisse scribit se sine te fuisse, cum ad mare accessisset.—

Idem. lli. l. a. 7.

Quam hanc jam epistolam complicarem, tabellariis a vobis periret a. d. xi. Kal. Sept. vicesimo die.—Ibid. lli. l. a. 5.
Res Romanae sic se habebant. Erat nonnulla spes dictaturae, sed incerta: erat aliqua suspicio dictaturae, sed quidem certa: summum otium forense; sed senectutis magis civitatis, quam adulescentis. Sententia nostra in senatu ejusmodi, magis ut alii nobis assensum, quam nosmet ipsi.—

Ταῦτά οἱ ἄλλῃ μὲν πόλεμος ἐξαρτίζεται.

Eumf. Supplices.

Quibus rebus immanis, nunquam par fuit.—Ad Quint. li. 15.

Supervene me nunc in Campum. Ardet ambitus: σῆμα μὲν ἴδιον; sanus ex triente Idib. Quint. factum erat σῆμα. ἔργον in nullo est, pecunia omnium dignitatem sequit.—Ad Att. iv. 15.

Consules flagrant infamia, quod C. Memmius candidum pacemque in senatu recitavit, cum ipse et suus socius Domitius cum consulibus fecissent, uti ambo in quodraginta consulibus darent, si essent ipsi consules, nisi tres a se dedissent, qui se adfuisse dicerent, cum lex curiae ferretur, quae lata non esset; et duo consulibus se dicerent in ornanda provinciis consularibus consulibus effuisse, cum omnino no senatus quidem fuisset. Hae pacis non verbis sed nominibus et perscriptionibus; hinc tabulis cum esse facta diceretur, prolata a Memmius, who was strongly supported by Caesar, finding some reason to dislike his bargain, resolved to break it, and, by Pompey's advice, gave an account of it to the senate. Pompey was pleased with the opportunity of mortifying the consul Domitius; and willing likewise to take some revenge on Appius, who, though his near relation, did not enter so fully as he expected into his measures^d: but Caesar was much out of humour at this step^e; as it was likely to raise great scandal in the city, and strengthen the interest of those who were endeavouring to restrain that infamous corruption, which was the main instrument of advancing his power. Appius never changed countenance, nor lost any credit by the discovery; but his colleague Domitius, who affected the character of a patriot, was extremely discomposed; and Memmius, now grown desperate, resolved to promote the general disorder and the creation of a dictator^f.

Quintus sent his brother word from Gaul, that it was reported there, that he was present at this contract: but Cicero assures him that it was false, and that the bargain was of such a nature, as Memmius had opened it to the senate, that no honest man could have been present at it^g. The senate was highly incensed; and to check the insolence of the parties concerned, passed a decree, that their conduct should be inquired into by what they called a private, or silent judgment; where the sentence was not to be declared till after the election, yet so as to make void the election of those who should be found guilty: this they resolved to execute with rigour, and made an allotment of judges for that purpose: but some of the tribunes were prevailed with to interpose their negative, on pretence of hindering all inquisitions not specially authorised by the people^h.

This detestable bargain of forging laws and decrees at pleasure, in which so many of the first rank were concerned, either as principals or witnesses, is alleged by an ingenious French writer as a flagrant instance of libertinism which hastened the destruction of Romeⁱ. So far are "private vices" from being "public benefits," that this great republic, of all others the most free and flourishing, owed the loss of its liberty to nothing else but a general defection of its citizens, from the probity c Memmius Caesaris omnes opes confirmant.—Ibid. 15.

Memmius est nominibus inductus, auctore Pompelo.—Ad Att. iv. 18.

d.

e Dio, xxxix. p. 118.

f Ut qui jam intelligebamus enunciationem illam Memmius valde Caesaris displicere.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

g Hic Appius erat idem; nihil sane iacture. Corruerat alter, et plane, inquam, Jacobat. Memmius autem—plane refrigerat, et eo magis nunc cogitare dictaturam, tum favere iustitiae et omnium rerum licentiae.—Ibid. 18.

h Quod scribis te audisse, in candidatorum consularium coitione me interfuisse, id falsum est. Ejusmodi enim pactioes in ista coitione factae sunt, quas postea Memmius patefecit, ut nemo bonus interesse debuerit.—Ad Quint. lli. l. a. 5.

i At senatus decrevit ut tacitum iudicium ante comitia fieret.—Magnus timor candidatorum. Sed quidam iudices—tribunos plebis appellarunt, ne in iuseu populi iudicarent. Res cedit, comitia dilata ex senatusconsulto: dum lex de tacito iudicio ferretur. Venit legi dea. Terentius intercessit.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

j Considérations sur les Causes de la Grandeur, &c. des Romains, chap. x.

and discipline of their ancestors. Cicero often foretells their approaching ruin from this very cause; and when he bewails the wretchedness of the times, usually joins the wretchedness of their morals as the genuine source of it^k.

But lest these corrupt candidates should escape without punishment, they were all publicly impeached by different prosecutors, and the city was now in a great ferment about them, since, as Cicero says, either the men or the laws must necessarily perish: yet they will all, says he, be acquitted; for trials are now managed so corruptly, that no man will ever be condemned for the future unless for murder^l. But Q. Scævola, one of the tribunes, took a more effectual way to mortify them, by resolving to hinder any election of consuls during his magistracy; in which he persevered, and by his authority dissolved all the assemblies, convened for that purpose^m. The tribunician candidates however were remarkably modest this year: for they made an agreement among themselves, which they all confirmed by an oath, "that in prosecuting their several interests, they would submit their conduct to the judgment of Cato, and deposit four thousand pounds apiece in his hands, to be forfeited by those whom he should condemn of any irregular practice. If the election proves free," says Cicero, "as it is thought it will, Cato alone can do more than all the laws and all the judgesⁿ."

A great part of this year was taken up in public trials: Suffenas and C. Cato, who had been tribunes two years before, were tried in the beginning of July for violence and breach of peace in their magistracy, and both acquitted: but Proclilius, one of their colleagues, "was condemned for killing a citizen in his own house: whence we are to collect," says Cicero, "that our Areopagites value neither bribery, nor elections, nor interregnums, nor attempts against the state, nor the whole republic, a rush: we must not murder a man indeed in his own house, though that perhaps might be done moderately, since twenty-two acquitted Proclilius when twenty-eight condemned him^o." Clodius was the accuser in these impeachments:

^k His præsertim moribus atque temporibus, quibus ita prolapsa respublica est, ut omnium opibus refrenanda, ac coercenda sit.—De Divin. li. 2.

^l Qui sit rempublicam afflictam et oppressam miseris temporibus, ac perditis moribus, in veterem dignitatem et libertatem vindicaturus.—Ep. Fam. li. 5.

^m De ambitu postulati sunt omnes, qui consulatum petant—Magno res in motu est. Propterea quod aut hominum aut legum interitus ostenditur.—Ad Quint. lii. 2.

ⁿ Sed omnes absolventur, nec posthac quisquam damnabitur, nisi qui hominem occiderit.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

^o Comitiorum quotidie singuli dies tolluntur obnuntiationibus, magna voluntate bonorum.—Ad Quint. lii. 3.

Obnuntiationibus per Scævolam interpositis, singulis diebus.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

^p Tribunitii candidati jurarunt se arbitrio Catonis petitu-ros: apud eum H. S. quingena deposuerunt; ut qui a Catone damnatus esset, id perderet, et competitoribus tribueretur—Si comitia, ut putantur, gratuita fuerint, plus unus Cato potuerit, quam omnes quidem iudices.—Ibid. 15; Ad Quint. li. 15.

^q III. Non. Quint. Suffenas et Cato absoluti: Proclilius condemnatus. Ex quo intellectum est, τρις ἀπειρωταίρας, ambitum, comitia, interregnum, maiestatem, totam denique rempublicam, flocci non facere. Debemus patrem familias domi suæ occidere nolle, neque tamen id ipsum which made Cato, as soon as he was acquitted, a reconciliation with Cicero and Milo^p. It was Cicero's business to reject the friendship of an active and popular senator; and Milo had occasion for his service in his approaching suit for consulship. But though Cicero had no concern in these trials, he was continually employed in others through the rest of the summer: "I never," says he, "more busy in trials than in the worst season of the year, and the greatest heats that we have ever known, there passes a day in which I do not defend some person." Besides his clients in the city, he had many towns and colonies under his patronage, and sometimes wanted his help abroad, as the correction of Reate did now, to plead for them in the consul Appius, and ten commissioners, in controversy with their neighbours of Inter about draining the lake Velinus into the river to the damage of their grounds. He returned from this cause in the midst of the Apollin shows; and to relieve himself from the fatigue of his journey went directly to the theatre, where he was received by a universal clap: in the account of which to Atticus he adds, "but this you are to take notice of, and I am a fool indeed for mentioning it^q."

He now also defended Messius, one of the lieutenants, who came from Gaul on purpose to take his trial: then Drusus, accused of perjury in betraying a cause, which he had undertaken to defend; of which he was acquitted by a majority of only four voices: after that Vatinus the last year's prætor, and Æmilius Scaurus, of the consular candidates, accused of plundering the province of Sardinia^r; and about the same time likewise his old friend Cn. Plancius, who had entertained him so generously in his exile, and who was now chosen ædile, was accused by a disappointed competitor, M. Laterensis, of bribery and corruption. All these were acquitted, but the grounds for them are lost, except that for Plancius; who remains a perpetual monument of Cicero's gratitude: for Plancius having obtained the tribunate from the people, as the reward of his fidelity to Cicero, did not behave himself in that post the same affection to him as before, but seems to have slighted him; while several of his colleagues, and especially Racilius, were excluded all their power in the defence of his person and fortune. Nam absoluerunt xxii; condemnarunt xxi. Ad Att. iv. 15.

^r Is tamen et tecum et cum Milone in gratiam rediit. Ibid. 16.

^s Sic enim habeto nunquam me a causis et iudiciis trictorem fuisse, atque id anni tempore gravissimum calorem maximis.—Ad Quint. li. 16.

^t Diem scito esse nullum, quo non dico pro reo.—Ibid. 3.

^u Reatini me ad sua Τέμνη duxerunt, ut æque casum contra Interamnates—Rediit Romanæ—Vixit spectaculum; primum magno et æquabili plausu, hoc ne curaris; ego ineptus qui scripserim.—Ad Att. iv. 15.

^v Messius defendebatur a nobis, e legatione revocatus. Deinde me expedit ad Drisum, inde ad Saurum.—Ibid.

^w Drusus erat de prævaricatione absolutus, in sententia quatuor sententiis—Eodem die post meridiem Vatinus ad eam defensurus; ea res facillime—Scauri iudicium steterat exercere, cui nos non deerimus.—Ad Quint. li. 16.

^x Scaurum beneficio defensionis valde obligavi.—Ibid. 1. s. 7.

dignity'. Yet Cicero freely undertook his cause, and as if no coldness had intervened, displayed the merit of his services in the most pathetic and affecting manner; and rescued him from the hands of a powerful accuser, and his own particular friend. "Drusus's trial was held in the morning; from which, after going home to write a few letters, he was obliged to return to Vatinius's in the afternoon:" which gives us a specimen of the busy in which he generally lived, and of the little time which he had to spend upon his private affairs, or his studies; and though he was now carrying on several great works of the learned kind, "yet he had no other leisure (he tells us) for meditating and composing, but when he was taking a few turns in his gardens, for the exercise of his body, and refreshment of his voice." Vatinius had been one of his fiercest enemies; was in a perpetual opposition to him in politics; and, like Metellus mentioned above, a seditious, profligate, abandoned libertine; so that the defence of him gave a plausible handle for some censure upon Cicero: but his engagements with Pompey, and especially his new friendship with Cæsar, made it necessary to embrace all Cæsar's friends; among whom Vatinius was most warmly recommended to him.

Gabinus being recalled, as has been said, from his government, returned to Rome about the end of September: he bragged everywhere on his journey, that he was going to the demand of a triumph; and to carry on that farce, continued a while without the gates; till perceiving how useless he was to all within, he stole privately into the city by night, to avoid the disgrace of being shamed by the populace. There were three different impeachments provided against him: the first, for treasonable practices against the state; the second, for the plunder of his province; the third for bribery and corruption; and so many persons offered themselves to be prosecutors, that there was a contest among them before the prætor, how to adjust their several claims. The first indictment fell to L. Lentulus, who accused him the day after he entered the city, "that, in defiance of religion and the decree of the senate, he had anointed the king of Egypt with an army, leaving his own province naked, and open to the incursion of enemies, who had made great devastations in it." Cicero, who had received from Gabinus all the provocation which one man could receive from another, had the pleasure to see his insolent adversary at his feet; and was prepared to give him such a reception as he deserved: but Gabinus durst not venture to show his head for the first ten days, till he was obliged to come to the senate, in order to give them an account, according to custom, of the state of his province and the troops which he had left in it: as soon as he had told his story he was going to retire, but the consuls detained him to answer to a complaint brought against him by the publicans, or farmers of the revenues, who were attending at the door to make it good. This drew on a debate, in which Gabinus was so urged and teased on all sides, but especially by Cicero, that trembling with passion, and unable to contain himself, he called Cicero a banished man: upon which (says Cicero, in a letter to his brother) "nothing ever happened more honourable to me: the whole senate left their seats to a man, and with a general clamour ran up to his very face; while the publicans also were equally fierce and clamorous against him, and the whole company behaved just as you yourself would have done."

Cicero had been deliberating for some time, whether he should not accuse Gabinus himself; but out of regard to Pompey was content to appear only as a witness against him; and when the trial was over, gives the following account of it to his brother.

"Gabinus is acquitted: nothing was ever so stupid as his accuser Lentulus; nothing so sordid as the bench: yet if Pompey had not taken incredible pains, and the rumour of a dictatorship had not infused some apprehensions, he could not have held up his head even against Lentulus: since with such an accuser, and such judges, of the seventy-two who sat upon him, thirty-two condemned him. The sentence is so infamous, that he seems likely to fall in the other trials; especially that of plunder: but there's no republic, no senate, no justice, no dignity in any of us: what can I say more of the judges? There were but two of them of prætorian rank, Domitius Calvinus, who acquitted him so forwardly that all the world might see it; and Cato, who, as soon as the votes were declared, ran officiously from the bench to carry the first news to Pompey. Some say, and particularly Sallust, that I ought to have accused him: but should I risk my credit with such judges? What a figure should I have made, if he had escaped from me! but there were other things which influenced me: Pompey would have considered it as a struggle, not about Gabinus's safety, but his own dignity: it must have made a breach between us: we should have been matched like a pair of gladiators; as Pacidianus, with Æserninus the Samnite; he would probably have bit off one of my ears, or been reconciled at least with Clodius—for after all the pains which I had taken to serve him; when I owed nothing to him, he every thing to me; yet he would not bear my differing from him in public affairs, to say no worse

"Interim ipso decimo die, quo ipsum oportebat hostium numerum et militum renuciare, in re hæsit, summa in frequentia: cum vellet exire, a consulis retentus est; introducti publicani. Homo undique actus, cum a me maxime vulneraretur, non tulit, et me trementi voce exulem appellavit. Hic, o dii, nihil unquam honorificentius nobis accidit. Consurxit senatus cum clamore ad unum, sic ut ad corpus ejus accederet. Pari clamore atque impetu publicani. Quid queris? Omnes, tanquam si tu esses, ita fuerunt.—Ad Quint. iii. 2.

"Ego tamen me teneo ab accusando vix mehercule. Sed tamen teneo, vel quod nolo cum Pompeio pugnare; satis est, quod instat de Milone.—Ibid. iii. 2.

¹ Negas tributum Plancii quoquam attulisse adjuvanti dignitati meæ. Atque hoc loco, quod verissime heere potest. L. Rutilius divina in me merita commemoras, &c.—Pro Plancio, 32.

² Ita quicquid conficere aut cogito in ambulationis fere tempore confecto.—Ad Quint. iii. 3.

³ Ad urbem accessit a. d. xii. Kal. Oct. nihil turpius, in desertis.—Ad Quint. iii. 1. sec. 5.

⁴ Cum Gabinus, quæcumque veniebat, triumphum se petere dixisset, subitoque bonus imperator noctu in somnum, hostium plene, invasisset.—Ibid. 2.

⁵ Gabinium tres adhuc factiones postulavit: &c.—Ibid. 3.

⁶ Cum hee scriberem ante lucem, apud Catonem erat discursio in Gabinium futura, inter Memmiam, et T. Antonium, et C. et L. Antonios.—Ibid. 2.

of it; and when he was less powerful than he is at present, showed what power he had against me in my flourishing condition; why should I now, when I have lost even all desire of power; when the republic certainly has none; when he alone has all; choose him of all men to contend with? for that must have been the case: I cannot think that you would have advised me to it. Sallust says, that I ought to have done either the one or the other; and, in compliment to Pompey, have defended him; who begged it of me indeed very earnestly.—A special friend this Sallust! to wish me to involve myself either in a dangerous enmity, or perpetual infamy. I am delighted with my middle way; and when I had given my testimony faithfully and religiously, was pleased to hear Gabinus say, that if it should be permitted to him to continue in the city, he would make it his business to give me satisfaction; nor did he so much as interrogate me—^b.” He gives the same account of this trial to his other friends; “how Lentulus acted his part so ill, that people were persuaded that he prevaricated—and that Gabinus’s escape was owing to the indefatigable industry of Pompey, and the corruption of the bench.”

About the time of this trial there happened a terrible inundation of the Tiber, which did much damage at Rome: many houses and shops were carried away by it, and the fine gardens of Cicero’s son-in-law, Crassipes, demolished. It was all charged to the abolition of Gabinus, after his daring violation of religion, and contempt of the Sibyl’s books: Cicero applies to it the following passage of Homer^c.

As when in autumn Jove his fury pours,
And earth is loaden with incessant showers;
When guilty mortals break the eternal laws,
And judges bribed betray the righteous cause,
From their deep beds he bids the rivers rise,
And opens all the flood-gates of the skies.

POPE, II. xvi. 468.

But Gabinus’s danger was not yet over: he was to be tried a second time, for the plunder of his province; where C. Memmius, one of the tribunes, was his accuser, and M. Cato his judge, with whom he was not likely to find any favour: Pompey pressed Cicero to defend him, and would not admit of any excuse; and Gabinus’s humble behaviour in the late trial was intended to make way for Pompey’s solicitation. Cicero stood firm for a long time: “Pompey (says he) labours hard with me, but has yet made no impression, nor, if I retain a grain of liberty, ever will^d.”

Oh! ere that dire disgrace shall blast my fame, O’erwhelm me earth — II. iv. 218.

^b Ad Quint. iii. 4.

^c Quomodo ergo absolutus?—Accusatorum incredibilis infamia, id est L. Lentuli, quem fremunt omnes prevaricatorum; deinde Pompeii mira contentio, iudicium sordens.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

^d Rome, et maxime Appia ad Martis, mira proluvia. Craspedis ambulatio ablata, horti, tabernæ plurimæ. Magna via aque usque ad piscinam publicam. Viget illud Homeri—Cedit enim in abolitionem Gabinii.—Ad Quint. iii. 7.

^e Pompeius a me valde contendit de reditu in gratiam, sed adhuc nihil profecit: nec si ullam partem libertatis tenebo, proficet.—Ad Quint. iii. 1. a. 6.

De Gabinio nihil fuit faciendum iocorum, &c. τότε μοι χάρεις.—II. iv. 218.

but Pompey’s incessant importunity, by Caesar’s earnest request, made it vain to any longer; and forced him, against his judgment, his resolution, and his dignity, to defend Gab at a time when his defence at last proved service to him; for he was found guilty and condemned of course to a perpetual banishment. It is probable that Cicero’s oration was published, but as it was his custom to keep minutes or rough draught of all his pleadings, what he called his Commentaries, which extant many ages after his death; so St. has preserved from them a small fragment of speech; which seems to be a part of the defence that he found himself obliged to make wherein he observes, “that when Pompey’s authority had once reconciled him to Gab, was no longer in his power to avoid defence for it was ever my persuasion (says he) friendships should be maintained with a scrupulous exactness: but especially those which have been renewed from a quarrel: for in friendship that have suffered no interruption, a failure is easily excused by a plea of inadvertence; the worst of negligence; whereas, if after reconciliation any new offence be given, it never for negligent, but wilful; and is not only imprudence, but to perdition.”

The proconsul Lentulus, who resided in Cilicia, having had an account from R. Cicero’s change of conduct, and his de Vatinio, wrote a sort of expostulatory letter to him to know the reasons of it; telling him he had heard of his reconciliation with C. Appius, for which he did not blame him; at a loss how to account for his new friendship with Crassus; and above all what it was, that had induced him to defend Vatinio. This gave to that long and elaborate answer from already referred to, written before Gabinus which would otherwise have made his more difficult, in which he lays open the and progress of his whole behaviour from of his exile.—“As to the case of Vatinio (says), as soon as he was chosen prætor, warmly opposed him in favour of Cato, prevailed with me to be reconciled to him; Caesar afterwards took surprising pains to defend him; to which I consented, for then doing what, as I told the court at the Parasite, in the Eunuch, advised his Patron—“Whenever she talks of Phædrus, so I beg to judge, that since certain persons of distinction, to whom I was much obliged, were of my enemy, and affected to caress him in the senate before my face with all the familiarity; and since they had their Public me jealousy, I might be allowed to have him also to tease them with in my turn—as to his general conduct, he makes this defence: “that the union and firmness honest, which subsisted when Lentulus confirmed (says he) by my consulship, and by yours, is now quite broken and destroyed: those who ought to have supported it, looked upon as patriots; for which re^f Quod fecisse M. Tullium commentariis ipsis—Quint. x. 7.

^g Vide Fragment. Orationum.

maxims and measures of all wise citizens, in which I always wish to be ranked, ought to be taught too: for it is a precept of Plato, whose authority has the greatest weight with me, to command in public affairs, as far as we can persuade citizens, but not to offer violence, either to our parent or our country.—If I was quite free from all engagements, I should act therefore as I now do: should not think it prudent to contend with so great a power; nor, if it could be effected, distinguish it in our present circumstances; nor mix it always in one mind, when the things ourselves and the sentiments of the honest are mixed; since a perpetual adherence to the same measures has never been approved by those who know best how to govern states: but as in sailing, is the business of art to be directed by the sailor, and foolish to persevere with danger in the course in which we set out, rather than, by changing it, to arrive with safety, though later, than we intended; so to us who manage public affairs the chief end proposed being dignity with quiet, our business is not to be always sailing at the same thing. Wherefore if all things, I said, were wholly free to me, I should be the same man that I now am: but when I am invited to this conduct on the one side by kindnesses, and even to it on the other by injuries, I easily suffer myself to vote and act what I take to be useful both to myself and the republic; and I do it the more freely, as well on the account of my brother's being Caesar's lieutenant, as that there is not the least thing which I have ever said or done for him, but what he has repaid with such eminent gratitude, as persuades me that he takes himself to be obliged to me; so that I have as much use of his power and interest, which you know to be the greatest, as if they were my own: nor could I have been defeated the designs of my domestic enemies, if to those forces which I have always been master of, I had not joined the favour of the men of power. Had you been here to advise me, I am persuaded that I should have followed the same measures: for I know your good-nature and moderation; I know your heart, not only that it is friendly to me, but void of all malevolence to others: great and noble, open and sincere," &c.^b He often defends himself on other occasions by the same allusion to the art of sailing: "I cannot make it inconstancy (says he) to change and moderate our opinion, like the course of a ship, by the weather of the republic; this is what I have learned, have observed, have read; what the sages of former ages have delivered, of the wisest of all most eminent citizens, both in this and all other cities; that the same maxims are not always pursued by the same men; but such, whatever they be, which the state of the republic, the situation of the times, the occasions of public business, require: this is what I am now doing and will always do—"^c

The trial of C. Rabirius Postumus, a person of equestrian rank, was an appendix to that of Gabinius. It was one of the articles against Gabinius, that he had received about two millions for restoring king Ptolemy; yet all his estate which was to be found was not sufficient to answer the damages in which he was condemned; nor could he give any security for the rest: in this case, the method was, to demand the deficiency from those through whose hands the management of his money affairs had passed, and who were supposed to have been sharers in the spoil: this was charged upon Rabirius; and that he had advised Gabinius to undertake the restoration of the king, and accompanied him in it, and was employed to solicit the payment of the money, and lived at Alexandria for that purpose, in the king's service, as the public receiver of his taxes, and wearing the pallium or habit of the country.

Cicero urged in defence of Rabirius, "that he had borne no part in that transaction; but that his whole crime, or rather folly, was, that he had lent the king great sums of money for his support at Rome; and ventured to trust a prince who, as all the world then thought, was going to be restored by the authority of the Roman people: that the necessity of going to Egypt for the recovery of that debt was the source of all his misery, where he was forced to take whatever the king would give or impose: that it was his misfortune to be obliged to commit himself to the power of an arbitrary monarch: that nothing could be more mad than for a Roman knight, and citizen of a republic of all others the most free, to go to any place where he must needs be a slave to the will of another; that all who ever did so, as Plato and the wisest had sometimes done too hastily, always suffered for it. This was the case of Rabirius: necessity carried him to Alexandria; his whole fortunes were at stake^d; which he was so far from improving by his traffic with that king, that he was ill treated by him, imprisoned, threatened with death, and glad to run away at last with the loss of all: and at that very time, it was wholly owing to Caesar's generosity and regard to the merit and misfortunes of an old friend, that he was enabled to support his former rank and equestrian dignity."^e Gabinius's trial had so near a relation to this, and was so often referred to in it, that the prosecutors could not omit so fair an opportunity of rallying Cicero for the part which he had acted in it. Memmius observed, that the deputies of Alexandria had the same reason for appearing for Gabinius which Cicero had for defending him—the command of a master. "No, Memmius," replied Cicero, "my reason for defending him was a reconciliation with him; for I am not ashamed to own that my quarrels are mortal, my friendships immortal. And if you imagine that I undertook that cause for fear of Pompey, you neither know Pompey nor me; for Pompey would neither desire it of me against my will, nor would I, after I had preserved the liberty of my citizens, ever give up my own."^f concordiæ postulare, esse defendendas. Quod ego et facio, et semper faciam.—Pro Plancio, 30.

^b Pro Rabir. 8, 9.

^c Ibid. 15.

^d Ait etiam meus familiaris, eandem causam Alexandrinis fuisse, cur laudarent Gabinium, quæ mihi fuit, cur eundem defenderem. Mihi, C. Memmi, causam defendendi Gabinii fuit reconciliatio gratiæ. Neque vero me penitet, mortales inimicitias sempiternas amicitias habere. Nam

^a Pro Fam. l. 9.

^b Prope enim inconstantis puto, sententiam, tanquam scripturam atque cursum ex reipublice tempestate mutari. Ego vero hæc didici, hæc vidi, hæc scriptæ legi: et de sapientissimis et clarissimis viris, et in hac republica et in aliis civitatibus monumenta nobis et literæ præsentant: non semper eandem sententiam ad hunc, sed præsertim reipublice status, inclinatio temporum, ratio Valerius Maximus reckons Cicero's defence of Gabinius and Vatinius among the great and laudable examples of humanity which the Roman history furnished: as it is nobler, he says, to conquer injuries with benefits, than to repay them in kind with an obstinacy of hatred*. This turn is agreeable to the design of that writer, whose view it seems to be, in the collection of his stories, to give us rather what is strange than true; and to dress up facts as it were into fables, for the sake of drawing a moral from them: for whatever Cicero himself might say for it in the flourishing style of an oration, it is certain that he knew and felt it to be what it really was, an indignity and dishonour to him, which he was forced to submit to by the iniquity of the times and his engagements with Pompey and Cæsar; as he often laments to his friends, in a very passionate strain: "I am afflicted," says he, "my dearest brother; I am afflicted, that there is no republic, no justice in trials; that this season of my life, which ought to flourish in the authority of the senatorian character, is either wasted in the drudgery of the bar, or relieved only by domestic studies; that what I have ever been fond of from a boy,

In every virtuous act and glorious strife
To shine the first and best—is wholly lost and gone; that my enemies are partly not opposed, partly even defended by me; and neither what I love nor what I hate left free to me."

While Cæsar was engaged in the British expedition, his daughter Julia, Pompey's wife, died in child-bed at Rome, after she was delivered of a son, which died also soon after her. Her loss was not more lamented by the husband and father, who both of them tenderly loved her, than by all their common friends and well-wishers to the public peace; who considered it as a source of fresh disturbance to the state, from the ambitious views and clashing interests of the two chiefs, whom the life of one so dear, and the relation of son and father, seemed hitherto to have united by the ties both of duty and affection[†]. Cæsar is said to have borne the news of her death with an uncommon firmness[‡]: it is certain that she had lived long enough et me invitum putas, no Cn. Pompeii animum offenderem, defendisse causam, et illum et me vehementer ignoras. Neque enim Pompeius me sua causa quidquam facere voluisset invitum; neque ego, cui omnium civium libertas carissima fuisset, meam projecissem.—Pro C. Rabir. Post. 12.

* Sed huiusce generis humanitas etiam in M. Cicerone precipua apparuit, &c.—Val. Max. iv. 2.

† Angor, mi suavisimo frater, angor, nullam esse rempublicam, nulla judicia, nostrumque hoc tempus ætatis, quod in illa senatoria auctoritate florere debebat, aut forensi labore jactari, aut domesticis literis sustentari. Illud vero quod a puero adamaram, Αἰὲν ἀριστεύειν, καὶ ἀνέροχον ἐμμεναι ἔβλην.

II. §. 208.

totum occidisse; inimicos a me partim non oppugnatos; partim etiam esse defensores; meum non modo animum, sed ne odium quidem esse liberum.—Ad Quint. iii. 5.

‡ Cum medium jam, ex invidia potentie male coherens inter Cn. Pompeium et C. Cæsarem, concordie pignus, Julia uxor Magni decessit.—Filius quoque parvus, Julia natus, intra breve spatium oblit.—Vell. Pat. ii. 47; Val. Max. iv. 6.

† Cæsar—cum audivit decessisse filiam—inter tertium diem imperatoria oblit munera.—Senec. Consol. ad Helv. p. 116.

to serve all the ends which he proposed from alliance, and to procure for him everything Pompey's power could give: for while Pompey was forgetful of his honour and interest, was spent his time ingloriously at home, in the caresses of a young wife and the delights of Italy, and, as had been only Cæsar's agent, was continually creating fresh honours, troops, and money to Cæsar was pursuing the direct road to emulating his legions in all the toils and discipline of a bloody war; himself always at their head mating them by his courage, and rewarding them by his bounty; till, from a great and wide province, having raised money enough to co and an army able to conquer all who could oppose him, he seemed to want nothing for the execution of his vast designs but a pretext to break with Pompey; which, as all wise men foresaw, was not long to be wanted, when Julia, the cement of their union, was removed. For though the triumph of the triumvirate had given a dangerous blow to the liberty of Rome, yet the jealousies and separate interests of the chiefs obliged them to maintain with some decency, and to extend it but beyond the forms of the constitution: but never that league should happen to be dissolved which had made them already too great for the subjects, the next contest of course must be for dominion, and the single mastery of the empire.

On the second of November, C. Pontinius triumphed over the Allobroges: he had been present when Cicero was consul; and at the end of his magistracy obtained the government of that province of Gaul which, having been tampering with the line in his conspiracy, broke out soon afterwards into open rebellion, but was reduced by the victory of this general. For this service he demanded a triumph, but met with great opposition, which surmounted with incredible patience; for he persevered in his suit for five years successively, residing all that while, according to custom, in the suburbs of the city, till he gained his point at length by a kind of violence. Cicero was his friend, continued in Rome on purpose to assist him; the consul Appian served him with all his power, but Cato protested that Pontinius should never triumph while he lived: "Though this," says Cicero like many of his other threats, will end at last in nothing." But the prætor Galba, who had been lieutenant, having procured by stratagem an assembly of the people in his favour, he entered the city in a triumphal chariot, where he was so rudely received and opposed in his passage through the streets, he was forced to make his way with his sword the slaughter of many of his adversaries[†].

In the end of the year, Cicero consented to the removal of Pompey's lieutenants in Spain, which began to think convenient to the present state of his affairs, and resolved to set forward for that province about the middle of January: but seemed to give some umbrage to Cæsar, who, by the help of Quintus, hoped to disengage him gradually from Pompey, and to attach him to himself; and with that view had begged of him in his letters sometime at Rome, for the sake of serving himself with his authority in all affairs which he had occasion to transact there; so that, out of regard probably to Cæsar's uneasiness, Cicero soon changed his mind, and resigned his lieutenantcy: to which he seems to allude in a letter to his brother, where he says, "that he had no second thoughts in what was concerned Cæsar; that he would make good engagements to him; and being entered into his friendship with judgment, was now attached to him in perfection."

* Ea re non longius, quam vellem, quod Pontinius triumphum volebam adesse: etenim erit necesse negotiari, &c.—Ad Quint. iii. 5.

† Pontinius vult a. d. iv. Non. Novemb. triumphare. Huius obviavit Cato et Servilius prætores aperte, et Mucius tribunus.—Sed erit cum Pontinio Appianus Cato tamen affirmat, se vivo illum non triumphare: sed putat, aut multa ejusdem, ad nihil recedendum.—Ad Att. 16; Dio, xxxix. p. 120.

‡ Sed heus tu, scripseramne tibi me esse legatum!

He was employed, at Cæsar's desire, along with Quintus, in settling the plan of a most expensive and magnificent work which Cæsar was going to execute at Rome out of the spoils of Gaul; a new town, with many grand buildings annexed to it; and the area of which alone they had contracted to give to the several owners about five hundred thousand pounds; or, as Suetonius computes, near twice that sum*. Cicero calls it a glorious piece of work; and says, that the partitions, or inclosures of the Campus Martius, in which the tribes used to vote, were all to be made new of marble, in a roof likewise of the same, and a stately portico carried round the whole, of a mile in circuit; which a public hall or town-house was to be joined to. While this building was going forward, C. Æmilius Paullus was employed in raising another, not much inferior to it, at his own expense: it he repaired and beautified an ancient basilica of the old forum, and built at the same time a new one with Phrygian columns, which was called after his own name; and is frequently mentioned by the later writers as a fabric of wonderful magnificence, supposed to have cost him three hundred thousand sesterces†.

The new tribunes pursued the measures of their predecessors, and would not suffer an election of consuls; so that when the new year came on, sc. 54. on, the republic wanted its proper head. In this case, the administration fell into the hands of an interrex, a provisional magistrate, who must necessarily be a patrician, and chosen by the body of patricians, called toge-ato: et extra urbem quidem fore, ex Id. Jan. visum est. Id est: ut mibi ad multa quadrare.—Ad Att. iv. 18.

* Quod mibi tempus, Romæ presentim, ut iste me rogat, inveni, vacuum ostenditur?—Ad Quint. ii. 15.

† Ego vero nullas deurêpas oporriðas; habere possum et Cæsaris rebus—Videor id iudicio facere. Jam enim dico: et tamen amore sum innoxius.—Ad Quint. iii. 1.

‡ Forum de manubus inchoavit; cuius aræ super H. S. milia constitit.—Suet. J. Cæs. 26.

§ Inque Cæsaris amici (me dico et Oppium, dirumparis illud in monumentum illud, quod tu tollere laudibus solebas, ut forum laxarem, et usque ad Libertatis atrium applicarem, consumimus H. S. sexcenties: cum privatum poterat transigi minore pecunia. Efficiemus rem nostram. Nam in Campo Martio septa tribus milia marmorea sumus, et tecta facturi, etque cingemus stipes portici, ut mille passuum conficiatur. Simul adimpler hunc operi, villa etiam publica.—Ad Att. iv. 16.

¶ Paulus in medio foro basilicam jam pene texuit, sed antiquis columnis: illam autem, quam locavit, hic magnificentissimam. Nihil gratius illo monumento, nihil rutilius.—Ibid.

ther for that purpose by the senate*. His power, however, was but short-lived, being transferred every five days from one interrex to another, till an election of consuls could be obtained; but the tribunes, whose authority was absolute while there were no consuls to control them, continued fierce against any election at all: some were for reviving the ancient dignity of military tribunes; but that being unpopular, a more plausible scheme was taken up and openly avowed, of declaring Pompey dictator. This gave great apprehensions to the city, for the memory of Sylla's dictatorship; and was vigorously opposed by all the chiefs of the senate, and especially by Cato. Pompey chose to keep himself out of sight, and retired into the country to avoid the suspicion of affecting it.—"The rumour of a dictatorship," says Cicero, "is disagreeable to the honest; but the other things which they talk of are more so to me: the whole affair is dreaded, but flags. Pompey flatly disclaims it, though he never denied it to me before: the tribune Hirrus will probably be the promotor. Good gods! how silly and fond of himself without a rival! At Pompey's request, I have deterred Crassus Junianus, who pays great regard to me, from meddling with it. It is hard to know whether Pompey really desires it or not; but if Hirrus stir in it, he will not convince us that he is averse to it." In another letter: "Nothing is yet done as to the dictatorship: Pompey is still absent; Appius in a great bustle; Hirrus preparing to propose it; but several are named as ready to interpose their negative. The people do not trouble their heads about it; the chiefs are against it; I keep myself quiet." Cicero's friend, Milo, was irresolute how to act on this occasion; he was forming an interest for the consulship; and if he declared against a dictatorship, was afraid of making Pompey his enemy; or if he should not help the opponents, that it would be carried by force: in both which cases, his own pretensions were sure to be disappointed; he was inclined therefore to join in the opposition, but so far only as to repel any violence‡.

The tribunes in the mean time were growing every day more and more insolent, and engrossing all power to themselves; till Q. Pompeius Rufus, the grandson of Sylla, and the most factious espouser of a dictatorship was, by a resolute decree of the senate, committed to prison: and Pompey himself, upon his return to the city, finding the greater and better part utterly averse to his dictatorship, yielded at last, after an interregnum of six months, that Cn. Domitius Calvinus, and M. Me-

* Vide Ascon. argument. in Milon.

† Rumor dictatoris injucundus bonis: mibi etiam magis quæ loquuntur. Sed tota res et timetur et refrigerat. Pompeius plane se negat velle: antea ipse mibi non negabat. Hirrus auctor fore videtur. O dii, quam ineptus, et quam se amans sine rivali! Crassus Junianus, hominem mibi deditum, per me deterruit. Valit, nolit, scire difficile est. Hirro tamen agente, nolle se non probabit.—Ad Quint. iii. 8.

‡ De dictatore tamen actum nihil est. Pompeius abest: Appius miset: Hirrus parat: multi intercessores numerantur: populus non curat: principes nolunt: ego quiesco.—Ibid. 9.

§ Hoc horret Milo—et si ille dictator factus sit, pene diffidit. Intercessorem dictaturæ si juverit manu et præsidio suo Pompeium metuit inimicum; si non juverit, timet, ne per vim perferatur.—Ibid. 8.

sala, should be declared consuls*. These were agreeable likewise to Cæsar: Cicero had particularly recommended Messala to him; of whom he says, in a letter to his brother, "As to your reckoning Messala and Calvinus sure consuls, you agree with what we think here; for I will be answerable to Cæsar for Messala†."

But after all this bustle about a dictator, there seems to have been no great reason for being much afraid of it at this time; for the republic was in so great a disorder that nothing less than the dictatorial power could reduce it to a tolerable state: some good of that kind might reasonably be expected from Pompey, without the fear of any great harm, while there was so sure a check upon him as Cæsar; who, upon any exorbitant use of that power, would have had the senate and all the better sort on his side, by the specious pretence of asserting the public liberty. Cicero, therefore, judged rightly in thinking that there were other things which might be apprehended, and seemed likely to happen, that, in their present situation, were of more dangerous consequence than a dictatorship.

There had scarce been so long an interregnum in Rome since the expulsion of their kings; during which all public business, and especially all judicial proceedings, were wholly interrupted: which explains a jocose passage in one of Cicero's letters to Trebatius: "If you had not already," says he, "been absent from Rome, you would certainly have run away now; for what business is there for a lawyer in so many interregnums? I advise all my clients, if sued in any action, to move every interrex twice for more time: do not you think that I have learned the law of you to good purposes?"

He now began a correspondence of letters with Curio, a young senator of distinguished birth and parts; who, upon his first entrance into the forum, had been committed to his care, and was at this time quaestor in Asia. He was possessed of a large and splendid fortune by the late death of his father; so that Cicero, who knew his high spirit and ambition, and that he was formed to do much good or hurt to his country, was desirous to engage him early in the interests of the republic, and, by instilling great and generous sentiments, to inflame him with a love of true glory. Curio had sent orders to his agents at Rome to proclaim a show of gladiators in honour of his deceased father; but Cicero stopped the declaration of it for a while, in hopes to dissuade him from so great and fruitless an expense‡. He foresaw that nothing was more likely to corrupt his virtue than the ruin of his fortunes; or to make him a dangerous citizen, than gality, to which he was naturally inclined which Cicero for that reason was the most serious to check at his first setting out: but endeavours were to no purpose: Curio resolved give the show of gladiators; and by a copious profusion of his money, answerable to this, after he had acted the patriot for some with credit and applause, was reduced at last to the necessity of selling himself to Cæsar.

There is but little of politics in these besides some general complaints of the desperate state of the republic: in one of after reckoning up the various subjects of epistolary writing, "Shall I joke with you then," says he to my letters? On my conscience, there is citizen, I believe, who can laugh in these times shall I write something serious? But what Cicero write seriously to Curio, unless it be republic? where my case at present is such. have no inclination to write what I do not think. In another, after putting him in mind of the dible expectation which was entertained of Rome, "Not that I am afraid (says he) the virtue should not come up to the opinion of public, but rather that you find nothing caring for at your return, all things are so and oppressed: but I question whether it be decent to say so much.—It is your part, however whether you retain any hopes, or quite despond, adorn yourself with all those accomplishments which can qualify a citizen, in wretched times profligate morals, to restore the republic ancient dignity§."

The first news from abroad after the inauguration of the consuls, was of the miserable death of Cæsar and his son Publius, with the total destruction of his army by the Parthians. This was one of the greatest blows that Rome had ever received from a foreign enemy, and for which it was ever meditating revenge: the Roman writers generally imputed it to Crassus's contempt of the gods, as some Christians have since charged it as a sacrilegious violation of the temple of Jerusalem which he is said to have plundered of two millions both of them with equal superstition pretend to unfold the counsels of heaven, and to fathom depths which are declared to be unsearchable. The chief and immediate concern which they felt on this occasion, was for the detriment the republic had suffered, and the danger to it was exposed, by the loss of so great an officer; yet the principal mischief lay in what they did at first regard, and seemed rather to rejoice in the loss of Crassus himself. For after the de-

* Vide Dio, xl. p. 141.

† Messalam quod certum consulem cum Domitio numeratis, nihil a nostra opinione dissentitis. Ego Messalam Cæsari prestabo.—Ad Quint. iii. 8.

‡ Nisi ante Roma profectus esses, nunc eam certe relinqueres. Quis enim tot interregna jurisdictionum desiderat? Ego omnibus, unde petitur, hoc consilium dederim, ut a singulis interregibus binas advocaciones postulent. Satissime tibi videor ab te jus civile didicisse?—Ep. Fam. vii. 11.

§ Rupte studium non deficit declarandorum munerum tuo nomine: sed nec mihi placuit, nec cuiquam tuorum, quidquam te absente fieri, quod tibi, cum videres, non esset integrum, &c.—Ep. Fam. ii. 3.

¶ Jocerne tecum per litteras? civem mehercule non esse, qui temporibus his ridere possit. An gravior scribam? Quid est quod possit graviter a Cicerone ad Curionem, nisi de republica? Atque in hoc genere mea causa est, ut neque ea, quæ non sentio, velis bene.—Ibid. 4.

‡ Non quo verear ne tua virtus opinioni hominum respondeat: sed mehercule, ne cum veneris, non jam quod cures: ita sunt omnia debilitata jam per extincta, &c.—Ibid. 5.

¶ M. Crasso quid acciderit, videmus dirarum oblatione neglecta.—De Dio, i. 16.

¶ Being for his impious sacrilege at Jerusalem destined to destruction, God did cast imprecations at his councils, for the leading him thither.—Friedl. Connect. part ii. p. 362.

tain, Crassus's authority was the only means left of curbing the power of Pompey and the ambition of Cæsar; being ready always to support the weaker against the encroachments of the stronger, and keep them both within the bounds of a decent respect to the laws; but this check being now taken away, and the power of the empire thrown, as a kind of prize, between two, it gave a new turn to their several pretensions, and created a fresh competition for the larger share, which, as the event afterwards showed, must necessarily end in the subversion of the whole.

Publius Crassus, who perished with his father in his fatal expedition, was a youth of an amiable character; educated with the strictest care, and secretly instructed in all the liberal studies, he had a ready wit and easy language; was grave without arrogance, modest without negligence, furnished with all the accomplishments proper to a principal citizen and leader of the republic: by the force of his own judgment he had devoted himself very early to the observance and imitation of Cicero, whom he perpetually attended and surrounded with a kind of filial piety. Cicero considered a mutual affection for him, and observing his eager thirst of glory, was constantly instilling to him the true notion of it, and exhorting him to pursue that sure path to it which his ancestors had left beaten and traced out to him, through the gradual ascent of civil honours. But by serving under Cæsar in the Gallic wars, he had learnt, as it appeared, a shorter way to fame and power than that Cicero had been inculcating; and having glorified himself in a campaign or two as a soldier, was in too much haste to be a general, when Cæsar sent him at the head of a thousand men to the assistance of his father in the Parthian war. Here the vigour of his youth and courage led him on so far in the pursuit of an enemy, that his chief art of conquest consisted in flying, that he had no way left to escape but what his high spirit disdained, by the desertion of his troops and precipitate flight; so that finding himself opposed with numbers, cruelly wounded, and in danger of falling alive into the hands of the Parthians, he chose to die by the sword of his armour-bearer. "Thus, while he aspired," as Cicero says, "to the fame of another Cyrus or Alexander, he was short of that glory which many of his predecessors had reaped from a succession of honours conferred by their country as the reward of their virtues."

By the death of young Crassus, a place became vacant in the college of augurs, for which Cicero desired himself a candidate: nor was any one so ready as to appear against him, except Hirrus, the son of Crassus, who, trusting to the popularity of his office and Pompey's favour, had the vanity to pretend to it; but a competition so unequal furnished matter of raillery only to Cicero, who was chosen without any difficulty or struggle with the unanimous approbation of the whole body^a. This college, from the last regulation of it by Sylla, consisted of fifteen, who were all persons of the first distinction in Rome. It was a priesthood for life, of a character indelible, which no crime or forfeiture could efface. The priests of all kinds were originally chosen by their colleges, till Domitius, a tribune, about fifty years before, transferred the choice of them to the people, whose authority was held to be supreme in sacred as well as civil affairs^b. This act was reversed by Sylla, and the ancient right restored to the colleges; but Labienus, when tribune in Cicero's consulship, recalled the law of Domitius, to facilitate Cæsar's advancement to the high-priesthood. It was necessary, however, that every candidate should be nominated to the people by two augurs, who gave a solemn testimony, upon oath, of his dignity and fitness for the office: this was done in Cicero's case by Pompey and Hortensius, the two most eminent members of the college; and after the election, he was installed with all the usual formalities by Hortensius^c.

As in the last year, so in this; the factions of the city prevented the choice of consuls: the candidates, T. Annius Milo, Q. Metellus Scipio, and P. Plautius Hypsæus, pushed on their several interests with such open violence and bribery, as if the consulship was to be carried only by money or arms^d. Clodius was putting in at the same time for the prætorship, and employing all his credit and interest to disappoint Milo, by whose obtaining the consulship he was sure to be eclipsed and controlled in the exercise of his subordinate magistracy^e. Pompey was wholly averse to Milo, who did not pay him that court which he expected, but seemed to affect an independency, and to trust to his own strength; while the other two competitors were wholly at his devotion. Hypsæus had been his quæstor, and always his creature; and he designed to make Scipio his father-in-law, by marrying his daughter Cornelia, a lady of celebrated accomplishments, the widow of young Crassus.

Cicero, on the other hand, served Milo to the utmost of his power, and ardently wished his success: this he owed to Milo's constant attachment to him, which, at all hazards, he now resolved to repay. The affair, however, was likely to give him much trouble, as well from the difficulty of the opposition as from Milo's own conduct and unbounded prodigality, which threatened the ruin of all his fortunes. In a letter to his brother, who was still with Cæsar, he says, "Nothing can be more wretched than these men and these times:

^a Hoc magis sum Publio deditus, quod me quamquam a patria semper, tamen hoc tempore maxime, sicut alterum ducem et observatorem et diligit.—Ep. Fam. v. 8.

^b Crassum ex omni nobilitate adolescentem dilexi tantum, &c.—Ibid. xiii. 16.

^c Pub. P. Crasso, cum initio ætatis ad amicitiam se meam dedisset, sepe egisse me arbitror, cum eum vehementer et horretur, ut eam laudem viam rectissimam esse doceret, ut majoris ejus et tritum reliquisset. Erat enim cum meo optime, tum plane perfectæque eruditus. Inque et ingenium satis acre, et orationis non inelegans fuit: præterque sine arrogantia gravis esse videbatur, ut in seipso verè conditus, &c.—Vide Brut. p. 407; it. Plutarch. in Crasso.

^d Quomodo Hirrum putas auguratum tui competitorum.—Ep. Fam. viii. 3.

^e Atque hoc idem de cæteris sacerdotibus Cn. Domitius tribunus plebis tulit, &c.—De Leg. Ag. ii. 7.

^f Quo enim tempore me augurum a toto collegio expetitum Cn. Pompeius et Q. Hortensius nominaverunt; neque enim licebat a pluribus nominari.—Phil. ii. 2.

^g Cooptatum me ab eo in collegium recordabar, in quo juratus judicium dignitatis meæ fecerat: et inauguratum ab eodem, ex quo, augurum institutus in parentis eum loco colere debebam.—Brut. init.

^h Plutarch. in Cæton.

ⁱ Occurreret ei, mancam ac debilem præturam suam futuram consule Milone—Pro Milone, 9.

and one friend, but with a much greater retinue, and among them some gladiators. The servants on both sides began presently to insult each other, when Clodius, turning briskly to some of Milo's men who were nearest to him, and threatening them with his usual fierceness, received a wound in the shoulder from one of the gladiators; and after receiving several more in the general fray, which finally ensued, finding his life in danger, was forced to fly for shelter into a neighbouring tavern. He, heated by this success, and the thoughts of revenge, and reflecting that he had already done enough to give his enemy a great advantage against him, if he was left alive to pursue it, resolved, whatever was the consequence, to have the pleasure of destroying him; and so ordered the house to be burned, and Clodius to be dragged out and murdered. The master of the tavern was likewise killed, and eleven of Clodius's servants, while the rest saved themselves by flight: so that Clodius's body lay in the road where it fell, till S. Tediun, a doctor, happening to come by, took it up into his house, and brought it with him to Rome; where it lay exposed in that condition, all covered with blood and wounds, to the view of the populace, who flock about it in crowds to lament the miserable fate of their leader. The next day, the mob, headed by Clodius, a kinsman of the deceased, and one of the chief incendiaries, carried the body naked, so as the wounds might be seen, into the forum, and laid it in the rostra; where the three tribunes, his enemies, were prepared to harangue upon it, and to use the lamentable occasion, by which they induced their mercenaries to such a height of rage, that, snatching up the body, they ran away with it into the senate-house, and tearing up the benches, tables, and everything combustible, dressed a funeral-pile upon the spot, and, together with the body, burnt the house itself, with a basilica also, a public hall adjoining, called the Porcian; and in the same fit of madness proceeded to storm the house of Milo, and of M. Lepidus, the interrex, who were repelled in both attacks with some loss. These extravagancies raised great indignation in the city, and gave a turn in favour of Milo, who, relying upon himself as undone, was meditating flight before but a voluntary exile; but now taking courage, he ventured to appear in public, and was introduced into the rostra by Caelius, where he made his defence to the people; and, to mitigate their resentment, distributed through all the tribes above three pounds a man to every poor citizen. All his pains and expense were to little purpose; for the three tribunes employed all the arts of party and faction to keep up the ill humour of the populace; and what was more fatal, Pompey could not be brought into any measures of accommodating the matter; so that the tumult still increasing, the senate passed a decree, that the interrex, assisted by the tribunes and Pompey, should take care that the republic received no detriment; and that Pompey, in particular, should raise a body of troops for the common security, which he presently drew together from all parts of Italy. In this confusion, the rumour of a dictator was again industriously revived, and gave a fresh alarm to the senate; who, to avoid the greater evil, resolved presently to create Pompey the single consul: so that the interrex, Servius Sulpicius, declared his election accordingly, after an interregnum of near two months².

Pompey applied himself immediately to calm the public disorders, and published several new laws prepared by him for that purpose. One of them was to appoint a special commission to inquire into Clodius's death, the burning of the senate-house, and the attack on M. Lepidus,—and to appoint an extraordinary judge, of consular rank, to preside in it: a second was against bribery and corruption in elections, with the infliction of new and severer penalties. By these laws the method of trials was altered and the length of them limited: three days were allowed for the examination of witnesses, and the fourth for the sentence; on which the accuser was to have two hours only to enforce the charge, the criminal three for his defence³: which regulation Tacitus seems to consider as the first step towards the ruin of the Roman eloquence, by imposing restraints as it were upon its free and ancient course⁴. Caelius opposed his negative to these laws, as being rather privileges than laws, and provided particularly against Milo; but he was soon obliged to withdraw it, upon Pompey's declaring that he would support them by force of arms. The three tribunes all the while were perpetually haranguing and terrifying the city with forged stories of magazines of arms prepared by Milo for massacring his enemies and burning the city, and produced their creatures in the rostra to vouch the truth of them to the people. They charged him particularly with a design against Pompey's life, and brought one Licinius, a killer of the victims for sacrifice, to declare that Milo's servants had confessed it to him in their cups, and then endeavoured to kill him lest he should discover it; and to make his story the more credible, showed a slight wound in his side, made by himself, which he affirmed to have been given by the stroke of a gladiator. Pompey himself confirmed this fact, and laid an account of it before the senate; and, by doubling his guard, affected to intimate a real apprehension of danger⁵. Nor were they less industrious to raise a clamour against Cicero; and in order to deter him from pleading Milo's cause, threatened him also with trials and prosecutions, giving it out everywhere that Clodius was killed indeed by the hand of Milo, but by the advice and contrivance of a greater man⁶. Yet such was his

² Vide Dio, ibid.; et Acon. Argum.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Primus tertio consulatu Cn. Pompeius astrinxit, imposuitque veluti frenos eloquentiæ, &c.—Dialog. de Orator. 38.

⁵ Audiendus Popa Licinius, nescio qui de Circo maximo, servus Milonis apud se ebrios factos confesos esse, de interficiendo Cn. Pompeio conjurasse—de amicorum sententia rem deferat ad senatum.—Pro Milone, 24.

⁶ Scitlis, Judices, fuisset, qui in hac rogatione suadenda dicerent, Milonis manu cadem esse factam, consilio vero constancy to his friend, says Asconius, that neither the loss of popular favour, nor Pompey's suspicions, nor his own danger, nor the terror of arms, could divert him from the resolution of undertaking Milo's defence^c.

Quoniam re vera, fuerat pugna fortuita.—Quintil.

Clodius—ἦν τοῦ φόρου τελευτήσας αὐτοῦ, καὶ τραυματίας, εἰ περιγίγνοιτο, ἀπεθῆσθαι.—Dio, 43.

Quæ, ut cognovit vulneratum Clodium, cum sibi periculum illud etiam, vivo eo, futurum intelligeret, oculos suos magnam solatium esset habiturus, etiam ad sublimem penam exact, extirpata tabernam fuisse.—Ita Clodius hanc extraxit eest, multaque vulneribus confectus, &c.—Ascon. Argum. in Milone.

But it was Pompey's influence and authority which ruined Milo^d. He was the only man in Rome who had the power either to bring him to a trial or to get him condemned: not that he was concerned for Clodius's death, or the manner of it, but pleased rather that the republic was freed at any rate from so pestilent a demagogue; yet he resolved to take the benefit of the occasion for getting rid of Milo too, from whose ambition and high spirit he had cause to apprehend no less trouble. He would not listen therefore to any overtures which were made to him by Milo's friends; and when Milo offered to drop his suit for the consulship, if that would satisfy him, he answered that he would not concern himself with any man's suing or desisting, nor give any obstruction to the power and inclination of the Roman people. He attended the trial in person with a strong guard, to preserve peace and prevent any violence from either side. There were many clear and positive proofs produced against Milo, though some of them were supposed to be forged: among the rest, the vestal virgins deposed that a woman unknown came to them in Milo's name to discharge a vow said to be made by him on the account of Clodius's death^e.

When the examination was over, Munatius Plancus called the people together and exhorted them to appear in a full body the next day, when judgment was to be given, and to declare their sentiments in so public a manner that the criminal might not be suffered to escape; which Cicero reflects upon in the defence as an insult on the liberty of the bench^f. Early in the morning, on the eleventh of April, the shops were all shut and the whole city gathered into the forum, where the avenues were possessed by Pompey's soldiers, and he himself seated in a conspicuous part to overlook the whole proceeding, and hinder all disturbance. The accusers were, young Appius, the nephew of Clodius, M. Antonius, and P. Valerius,—who, according to the new law, employed two hours in supporting their indictment. Cicero was the only advocate on Milo's side; but as soon as he rose up to speak he was received with so rude a clamour by the Clodians, that he was much discomposed and daunted at his first setting out, yet recovered spirit enough to go through his speech of three hours, which was taken down in writing and published as it was delivered, though the copy of it now extant is supposed to have been retouched and corrected by him afterwards, for a present to Milo in his exile^g.

majoris alienus: videlicet me latronem et sitorum abjecti homines describent. —Pro Milone, 18.

^c Tanta tamen constantia ac fides fuit Ciceronis, ut non populi se alienatione, non Cn. Pompeii suspicionibus, non periculi futuri metu, —non armis, quæ palam in Milonem sumpta erant, deterri potuerit a defensione ejus. —Ascon. Argum. in Milonem.

^d Milonem reum non magis invidia facti, quam Pompeii damnavit voluntas. —Vell. Pat. II. 47.

^e Ascon. Argum. in Milonem.

^f Ut intelligatis contra hesternam illam concionem licere vobis, quod sentatis, libere judicare. —Pro Milone, 26; Ascon. Argum.

^g Cicero, cum inciperet dicere, acceptus est acclamatione

In the council of Milo's friends, several were of opinion that he should defend himself by availing the death of Clodius to be an act of public benefit but Cicero thought that defence too desperate it would disgust the grave, by opening so good a door to licence, and offend the powerful, less precedent should be extended to themselves. young Brutus was not so cautious; who, oration which he composed and published in wards in vindication of Milo, maintained the law of Clodius to be right and just, and of great service to the republic^h. It was notorious, that on sides they had often threatened death to each Clodius especially had declared several times to the senate and the people, that Milo ought to be killed; and that, if the consulship could be taken from him, his life could: and when Favus asked him once what hopes he could have playing his mad pranks while Milo was living replied, that in three or four days at most he would live no more; which was spoken just three before the fatal rencounter, and attested by niusⁱ. Since Milo then was charged with the contriver of their meeting and the aggressor, and several testimonies were produced to purpose, Cicero chose to risk the cause or issue, in hopes to persuade, what seemed to most probable, that Clodius actually lay in wait for Milo, and contrived the time and place; and Milo's part was but a necessary act of self-defence. This appeared plausible, from the nature of the equipage and the circumstances in which they for though Milo's company was the more numerous yet it was much more encumbered and unfit for engagement than his adversary's; he himself in a chariot with his wife and all her women with him, while Clodius with his followers was on horseback, as if prepared and equipped for fighting^k. He did not preclude himself however from the other plea, which he often takes occasion to insinuate, that if Milo had really designed to kill Clodius, he would have done so with honours instead of punishment, for cutting off a desperate and dangerous an enemy to the state and liberty of Rome^l.

Clodianorum—itaque non ea, quæ solitus erat com dicit. Manet autem illa quoque excepta ejus orationis. Ascon. Argum.

^h Cum quibusdam placuisset, ita defendi crimen, fieri Clodium pro republica fuisse, quam formam M. Antonius secutus est in ea oratione, quam pro Milone composuisset, quamvis non egisset, Clodionem id non placuisse. Ibid.

ⁱ Etenim palam dictitabat, consulatum Miloni esse posse, vitam posse. Significavit hoc sæpe in senatu in concione. Quinetiam Favonius, querenti ex eo: spe fureret, Milone vivo? Respondit, triduo illi summum quadrius periturum. —Pro Milone, 9.

Post diem tertium gesta res est, quam dixerat Milo. Ibid.

^k Interim cum sciret Clodius—Iter solenne—necesse Miloni esse Lanuvium—Roma ipse profectus primum ante eum fundum, quod re intellectum est, in Miloni collocaret—Milo autem cum in senatu fuisset, quoad senatus dimissus est, domum venit, ubi vestimenta mutavit: paulisper, dum se uxor, ut parat, commoratus est—obviam fit ei Clodius expellens equo, nulla rheda, nullis impedimentis, nullis comitibus, sine uxore, quod nunquam fere; cum illi dicitur, (Milo) cum uxore in rheda veheretur perterritus magno ei impedito ei muliebri ac delicato ancillæ puerorum comitatu. —Pro Milone, 10; it. 21.

^l Quamobrem si cruentum gladium tunc clamant

In this speech for Milo, after he had shown the folly of paying such a regard to the idle rumours and forgeries of his enemies as to give them the credit of an examination, he touches Pompey's conduct and pretended fears with a fine and masterly railery; and from a kind of prophetic foresight of what might one day happen, addresses himself to him in a very pathetic manner.—“I could not but applaud (says he) the wonderful diligence of Pompey in these inquiries: but to tell you freely what I think, those who are charged with the care of the whole republic are forced to know many things which they would condemn if they were at liberty to do it. He could not refuse an audience to that paltry fellow Licinius, who gave the information about Milo's servants. I was sent for among the first of those friends by whose advice he laid it before the senate, and was, I own, of no small consternation to see the guardian both of the and my country under so great an apprehension; yet I could not help wondering that such credit was given to a butcher, such regard to a drunken slave, and how the wound in the man's side, which seemed to be the prick only of a needle, could be taken for the stroke of a gladiator. But Pompey was showing his caution rather than his fear; and disposed to be suspicious of everything, he might have reason to fear nothing. There is a rumour also that Caesar's house was attacked several hours in the night: the neighbours, though in so public a place, heard nothing at all of the affair was thought fit to be inquired into. I can never suspect a man of Pompey's eminent sense of being timorous, nor yet think any man so great in one who has taken upon himself the defence of the whole republic. A senator, sitting in a full house, affirmed lately in the very time. Milo stripped himself presently in the most sacred temple, that, since his life and name would not give him credit, the thing itself should speak for him, which was found to be false and forged. But if after all Milo must still be cleared, it is no longer the affair of Clodius but of suspicions, Pompey, which we dread: your suspicions, I say, and speak it so, that you may hear me. If those suspicions stick so close to them they are never to be removed, if Italy must be free from new levies nor the city from ruin without Milo's destruction, he would not care, such is his nature and his principles, to submit to his country and submit to a voluntary exile; but at taking leave he would call upon thee, O great one! as he now does, to consider how uncertain and variable the condition of life is; how mutable and inconstant a thing fortune; what treachery there is in friends; what dissimulation suited to times and circumstances; what cowardice in our dangers, even of those who are dearest to us. There will, therefore, be a time, and the day will certainly come, when you, with safety still I hope to your friends, though changed perhaps by some turn of common times, which, as experience shows, Adeste, quæso, atque audite cives: P. Clodium est: ejus furor, quæ nulla jam legibus, nullis circumstantiis potestatem, hoc ferro, atque hac dextra vestra repulsi, &c.—Vos tanti sceleris ultorem et tanti honoribus nullis affectis, sed etiam ad supplicium petimus!—Pro Milone, 28, &c.

will often happen to us all, may want the affection of the friendliest, the fidelity of the worthiest, the courage of the bravest man living,” &c.^m

Of one-and-fifty judges who sat upon Milo, thirteen only acquitted and thirty-eight condemned him. The votes were usually given by ballot; but Cato, who absolved him, chose to give his vote openly; and “if he had done it earlier (says Velleius), would have drawn others after him; since all were convinced that he who was killed was of all who had ever lived the most pernicious enemy to his country and to all good men.”ⁿ Milo went into exile at Marseilles a few days after his condemnation: his debts were so great that he was glad to retire the sooner from the importunity of his creditors, for whose satisfaction his whole estate was sold by public auction. Here Cicero still continued his care for him, and in concert with Milo's friends, ordered one of his wife's freedmen, Philotimus, to assist at the sale, and to purchase the greatest part of the effects, in order to dispose of them afterwards to the best advantage for the benefit of Milo and his wife Fausta, if anything could be saved for them. But his intended service was not so well relished by Milo as he expected, for Philotimus was suspected of playing the knave and secreting part of the effects to his own use; which gave Cicero great uneasiness, so that he pressed Atticus and Cælius to inquire into the matter very narrowly, and oblige Philotimus “to give satisfaction to Milo's friends, and to see especially that his own reputation did not suffer by the management of his servant.”^o Through this whole struggle about Milo, Pompey treated Cicero with great humanity: he assigned him a “guard at the trial, forgave all his labours for his friend, though in opposition to himself; and so far from resenting what he did, would not suffer other people's resentments to hurt him.”^p

The next trial before the same tribunal, and for the same crime, was of M. Scauricius, one of Milo's confidants, charged with being the ringleader in storming the house and killing Clodius. He was defended also by Cicero, and acquitted only by one vote: but being accused a second time on the same account, though for a different fact, and again defended by Cicero, he was acquitted by a great majority. But Sex. Clodius, the captain of the ⁿ M. Cato palam lata absolutæ sententia, quam si maturius tulisset, non defuissent, qui sequerentur exemplum, probarentque eum civem occisum, quo nemo perniciosior reipublice neque bonis inimicior vixerat.—Vell. Pat. II. 47.

^m Pro Milone, 24, 25, 26.

^o Consilium meum hoc fuerat, primum ut in potestate nostra res esset, ne illum malus emptor et alienus mancipis, quæ permulta secum habet, spoliaret: deinde ut Fausta, cui cautum ille voluisset, ratum esset. Erat etiam illud, ut ipsi nos, si quid servari posset, quam facillime servaremus. Nunc rem totam perspicuas velim.—Si ille queritur.—Si idem Fausta vult, Philotimus, ut ego ei coram dixeram, mihi que ille receperat, ne sit invito Milone in bonis.—Ad Att. v. 8; it. vi. 4.

^p Quod ad Philotimi liberti officium et bona Milonis attinet, dedimus operam ut et Philotimus quam honestissime Miloni absentis, ejusque necessarii satis faceret, et secundum ejus fidem et sedulitatem existimatio tua conservaretur.—Ep. Fam. viii. 3.

^q Qua humanitate tulit contentiorem meam pro Milone, adversante interdum actionibus suis? Quo studio providit, ne quæ me illius temporis invidia attingeret? Cum me consilio, tum auctoritate, cum armis denique texit suis.—Ibid. III. 10.

other side, had not the luck to escape so well, but was condemned and banished with several others of that faction, to the great joy of the city, for burning the senate-house, and the other violence committed upon Clodius's death¹.

Pompey no sooner published his new law against bribery, than the late consular candidates Scipio and Hypseus were severally impeached upon it, and being both of them notoriously guilty, were in great danger of being condemned: but Pompey, calling the body of the judges together, begged it of them as a favour, that, out of the great number of state criminals, they would remit Scipio to him; whom, after he had rescued from this prosecution, he declared his colleague in the consulship for the last five months of the year, having first made him his father-in-law, by marrying his daughter Cornelia. The other candidate, Hypseus, was left to the mercy of the law; and being likely to fare the worse for Scipio's escape, and to be made a sacrifice to the popular odium, he watched an opportunity of access to Pompey as he was coming out of his bath, and throwing himself at his feet, implored his protection: but though he had been his questor, and ever obsequious to his will, yet Pompey is said to have thrust him away with great haughtiness and inhumanity, telling him coldly that he would only spoil his supper by detaining him².

Before the end of the year, Cicero had some amends for the loss of his friend Milo, by the condemnation and banishment of two of the tribunes, the common enemies of them both, Q. Pompeius Rufus and T. Munatius Plancus Bursa, for the violence of their tribunate, and burning the senate-house. As soon as their office expired, Cælius accused the first, and Cicero himself the second; the only cause, excepting that of Verres, in which he ever acted the part of an accuser. But Bursa had deserved it, both for his public behaviour in his office, and his personal injuries to Cicero, who had defended and preserved him in a former trial. He depended on Pompey's saving him, and had no apprehension of danger, since Pompey undertook to plead his cause before judges of his own appointing; yet, by Cicero's vigour in managing the prosecution, he was condemned by a unanimous vote of the whole bench³. Cicero was highly pleased with this success, as he signifies in a letter to his friend Marius, which will explain the motives of his conduct in it.

"I know very well (says he) that you rejoice at Bursa's fate, but you congratulate me too coldly. You imagine, you tell me, that for the sordidness of the man I take the less pleasure in it; but believe me I have more joy from this sentence than from the death of my enemy; for in the first place

¹ Acon. Argum. in Milon.

² Cn. autem Pompeius quam insolenter? Qui balneo egressus, ante pedes suos prostratum Hypseum ambitus reum et nobilem virum et sibi amicum, jacentem reliquit, contumeliosa voce proculcatum. Nihil enim eum aliud agere, quam ut convivium suum moraretur, respondit.—Ille vero P. Scipionem, socerum suum, legibus noxium, quas ipse tulerat, in maxima quidem reorum et illustrium ruina, muneris loco a iudicibus deposcere.—Val. Max. ix. 5; It. Plutarch. in Pomp.

³ Plancum, qui omnibus sententiis maxime vestro plausu condemnatus.—Phil. vi. 4.

I love to pursue rather by a trial than it rather with the glory than the ruin of a fri it pleased me extremely to see so great nation of all honest men on my side ag incredible pains of one, the most emi powerful: and lastly, what you will scar possible, I hated this fellow worse than himself; for I had attacked the one, but the other; and Clodius, when the safet republic was risked upon my head, had s great in view, not indeed from his own but the help of those who could not main ground whilst I stood firm: but this silly of a gaiety of heart, chose me particular object of his invectives, and persuaded t envied me, that he would be always at the to insult me at any warning. Wherefore you to rejoice in good earnest; for it i victory which we have won. No citi ever stouter than those who condemn against so great a power of one by whom t were chosen judges,—which they would done if they had not made my cause and own. We are so distracted here by a m trials and new laws, that our daily prayer all intercalations, that we may see you possible⁴."

Soon after the death of Clodius, Cicero have written his treatise on laws⁵, after th of Plato, whom of all writers he most imitate; for as Plato, after he had a government in general, drew up a bot adapted to that particular form of it wh been delineating; so Cicero chose to c political sentiments in the same method translating Plato, but imitating his max explanation of them. This work being then as a supplement or second volume t upon the republic, was distributed pr that other was, into six books; for we some quotations among the ancients fourth and fifth, though there are but remaining, and those in some places. In the first of these he lays open the or and the source of obligation, which i from the universal nature of things, or plains it, from the consummate reason the Supreme God⁶. In the other two gives a body of laws conformable to his and idea of a well-ordered city⁷: first, t relate to religion and the worship of secondly, those which prescribe the powers of the several magistrates from peculiar form of each government is de

⁴ Ep. Fam. vii. 2.

⁵ De L.

⁶ Sed ut vir doctissimus fecit Plato, atque alimus philosophorum omnium, qui princeps conscripsit, idemque separatim de legibus c, credo esse faciendum.—De Legib. ii. 6.

⁷ Hanc igitur video sapientissimorum fuisse legem neque hominum ingenii excogetatam aliquid esse populorum, sed eternum qui universum mundum regeret, imperandi p sapientia. Ita principem legem illam et ultim esse dicebant, omnia ratione aut cogentia aut —Quamobrem lex vera atque princeps —rai summi Jovis.—Ibid. ii. 4.

⁸ Nos autem quoniam—que de optima re tiremus, in sex libris ante diximus, acconano tempore leges ad illam, quæm probamus, civi —Ibid. iii. 2.

These laws are generally taken from the old constitution or custom of Rome^a, with some little variation and temperment, contrived to obviate the disorders to which that republic was liable, and to give it a stronger turn towards the aristocratical side^b. In the other books which are lost, he had treated, as he tells us, of the particular rights and privileges of the Roman people^c.

Pompey was preparing an inscription this summer for the front of the new temple which he had lately built to Venus the Conquerress, containing, of course, the recital of all his titles; but in drawing it up, a question happened to be started about the manner of expressing his third consulship, whether it should be by Consul Tertium or Tertio. This was referred to the principal critics of Rome, who could not, it seems, agree about it; some of them contending for the one, some for the other; so that Pompey left it to Cicero to decide the matter, and to inscribe what he thought the best. But Cicero being unwilling to give judgment on either side, when there were great authorities on both, and Varro among them, advised Pompey to abbreviate the word in question and order TERT. only to be inscribed, which fully declared the thing without determining the dispute. From this fact we may observe how nicely exact they were in this age, in preserving a propriety of language in their public monuments and inscriptions^d.

Among the other acts of Pompey in this third consulship, there was a new law against bribery devised to strengthen the old ones that were already subsisting against it, "by disqualifying all future consuls and prætors from holding any province till five years after the expiration of their magistracies:" for this was thought likely to give a check to the eagerness of suing and bribing for these great offices, when the chief fruit and merit of them was removed to such a distance^e.

Before the law passed, Pompey took care to provide an exception for himself, "and to get the government of Spain continued to him for five years longer, with an appointment of money for the payment of his troops;" and lest this should be an offence to Cæsar, if something also of an extraordinary kind was not provided for him, he passed a law to dispense with Cæsar's absence in going for the consulship, of which Cæsar at that time seemed very desirous. Cælius was the proposer of this law, engaged to it by Cicero, at the request of Pompey and Cæsar^f, and it was passed with the concurrence of all the tribunes, though not without difficulty and obstruction from the senate; but this unusual favour, instead of benefiting Cæsar, served only, as Suetonius says, to raise his hopes and demands still higher^g.

Quid si quis forte a me hodie rogabuntur, que non sint meastra republie nec fuerint, tamen erunt fere in more optimorum, qui tum, ut lex, valebat.—De Legib. li. 10.

Nihil habui; anne non multum, quod putarem notandum in legibus.—Ibid. li. 5. c Ibid. lii. 30.

This story is told by Tiro, a favourite slave and freedman of Cicero, in a letter preserved by Aul. Gell. x. 1.

^a De Orat. p. 148.

^b Regibus ab ipso Ravennae de Cælio tribuno plebis; ab ipso autem? Bætanæ a Cæcio nostro.—Ad Att. vii. 1.

^c Ego cum tribuni plebis—ut absentis sibi—petitio omnium committatur deorum.—Quod ut adeptus est, altiora et maiora et spæ plenius, nullam largitione, aut officio in quæquam gentem publice privatisque omisit.—Suet. J. Cæc. 26.

By Pompey's law just mentioned, it was provided that, for a supply of governors for the interval "of five years, in which the consuls and prætors were disqualified, the senators of consular and prætorian rank who had never held any foreign command, should divide the vacant provinces among themselves by lot;" in consequence of which Cicero, who was obliged to take his chance with the rest, obtained the government of Cilicia, now in the hands of Appius, the late consul. This province included also Pisidia, Pamphilia, and three dioceses, as they were called, or districts of Asia, together with the island of Cyprus, for the guard of all which "a standing army was kept up of two legions, or about twelve thousand foot, with two thousand six hundred horse^h;" and thus one of those provincial governments, which were withheld from others by law, to correct their inordinate passion for them, was, contrary to his will and expectation, obtruded at last upon Cicero, whose business it had been through life to avoid themⁱ.

The city began now to feel the unhappy effects both of Julia's and Crassus's death, from the mutual apprehensions and jealousies which discovered themselves more and more every day between Pompey and Cæsar. The senate was generally in Pompey's interest, and trusting to the name and authority of so great a leader, were determined to humble the pride and ambition of Cæsar by recalling him from his government; whilst Cæsar, on the other hand, trusting to the strength of his troops, resolved to keep possession of it in defiance of all their votes; and by drawing a part of his forces into the Italic or Cisalpine Gaul, so as to be ready at any warning to support his pretensions, began to alarm all Italy with the melancholy prospect of an approaching civil war; and this was the situation of affairs when Cicero set forward towards his government of Cilicia.

SECTION VII

THIS year opens to us a new scene in Cicero's life, and presents him in a character which he had never before sustained, of the governor of a province and general of an army. These preferments were, of all others, the most ardently desired by the great for the advantages which they afforded both of acquiring power and amassing wealth; for their command, though accountable to the Roman people, was absolute and uncontrollable in the province, where they kept up the state and pride of sovereign princes, and had all the neighbouring kings paying a court to them, and attending their orders. If their genius was turned to arms, and fond of martial glory, they could never want a pretext for war, since it was easy to drive the subjects into rebellion, or the adjoining nations to acts of hostility by their oppressions and injuries, till from the destruction of a number of innocent people they had acquired the title of emperor, and with it the ⁱ Cum et contra voluntatem meam et præter opinionem accidisset, ut mihi cum imperio in provinciam profectus necesse esset.—Ep. Fam. lii. 2.

^h Ad Att. v. 15.

pretension to a triumph, without which scarce any proconsul was ever known to return from a remote and frontier province*. Their opportunities of raising money were as immense as their power, and bounded only by their own appetites; the appointments from the treasury for their equipage, plate, and necessary furniture, amounted, as it appears from some instances, to near a hundred and fifty thousand pounds^b; and besides the revenues of kingdoms and pay of armies, of which they had the arbitrary management, they could exact what contributions they pleased, not only from the cities of their own jurisdiction, but from all the states and princes around them, who were under the protection of Rome. But while their primary care was to enrich themselves, they carried out with them always a band of hungry friends and dependants as their lieutenants, tribunes, prefects, with a crew of freedmen and favourite slaves, who were all likewise to be enriched by the spoils of the province, and the sale of their master's favours. Hence flowed all those accusations and trials for the plunder of the subjects of which we read so much in the Roman writers; for as few or none of the proconsuls behaved themselves with that exact justice as to leave no room for complaint, so the factions of the city and the quarrels of families subsisting from former impeachments, generally excited some or other to revenge the affront in kind by undertaking the cause of an injured province, and dressing up an impeachment against their enemy.

But whatever benefit or glory this government seemed to offer, it had no charms for Cicero: the thing itself was disagreeable to his temper^c, nor worthy of those talents which were formed to sit at the helm and shine in the administration of the whole republic; so that he considered it only as an honourable exile or a burden imposed by his country to which his duty obliged him to submit. His first care, therefore, was to provide that this command might not be prolonged to him beyond the usual term of a year, which was frequently

* While the ancient discipline of the republic subsisted, no general could pretend to a triumph who had not enlarged the bounds of the empire by his conquests, and killed at least five thousand enemies in battle, without any considerable loss of his own soldiers. This was expressly enacted by an old law: in support of which a second was afterwards provided, that made it penal for any of their triumphant commanders to give a false account of the number of slain, either on the enemy's side or their own; and obliged them, upon their entrance into the city, to take an oath before the questors or public treasurers, that the accounts which they had sent to the senate, of each number, were true. [Val. Max. li. 6.] But these laws had long been neglected and treated as obsolete, and the honour of a triumph usually granted, by intrigue and faction, to every general of any credit, who had gained some little advantage against pirates or fugitives, or repelled the incursions of the wild barbarians, who bordered upon the distant provinces.

^b Nonne H.S. centies et octogies—quasi vasarii nomine—ex aerario tibi attributum, Rome in quaestui reliquisti?—In Pison. 35.

^c Totum negotium non est dignum viribus nostris. qui majora onera in republica sustinere et possim et solem.—Ep. Fam. li. 11.

O rem minime aptam meis moribus, &c.—Ad Att. v. 10. Sed est incredibile, quam me negotii tædeat, non habet satis magnum campum ille tibi non ignotus cursus animi mei.—Ibid. 15.

done when the necessities of the province character of the man, the intrigues of parties, the hurry of other business at home, left the governor neither leisure nor inclination to think of the governor; and this was the more likely to happen at present, through the scarcity of tribunes who were now left capable by the lateness of succeeding him. Before his departure, therefore, he solicited all his friends not to suffer a mortification to fall upon him, and after he was gone, scarce wrote a single letter to Rome urging the same request in the most pressing manner. In his first to Atticus, within three days from parting—"Do not imagine," says he, "that I am any other consolation in this great trouble than the hopes that it will not be continued beyond a year. Many who judge of me by others do take me to be in earnest; but you, who know me, will use all your diligence, especially where the affair is to come on."^d

He left the city about the first of May, attended by his brother and their two sons, for Quintus had quitted his commission under Caesar in order to accompany him into Cilicia in the same capacity as his lieutenant. Atticus had desired him, before he left Italy, to admonish his brother to more complaisance and affection to his wife, who had been complaining to him of her husband's peevishness and churlish carriage. lest Cicero should forget it, he put him in mind again by a letter to him on the road, that since the family were to be together in the country, this occasion of his going abroad he would permit Quintus to leave his wife at least in good humour at their parting, in relation to which Cicero sent him the following account of what passed.

"When I arrived at Arpinum, and my brother was come to me, our first and chief discourse was on you, which gave me an opportunity of speaking upon the affair of your sister, which you and I had talked over together at Tusculum. I saw anything so mild and moderate as my brother was, without giving the least hint of his ever having had any real cause of offence from her. The morning we left Arpinum, and that day being festival, Quintus was obliged to spend it at Arpinum, where I dined with him, but went on the next day towards Aquinum. You know this villa of mine as soon as we came thither, Quintus said to me, wife, in the civillest terms, Do you, Pompey, invite the women, and I will send to them (nothing, as far as I saw, could be said more obligingly, either in his words or manner) which she replied, so as we all might hear it, but a stranger here myself; referring, I guess, to my brother's having sent Statius before us to the dinner; upon which, See, says my brother, what I am forced to hear every day. You will say, was no great matter. Yes, it was great enough to give me much concern; and to see my brother so absurdly and fiercely both in her words and looks; but I dissembled my uneasiness. When we sat down to dinner, she would not come down with us; and when Quintus sent her some things from the table, she sent them all back short, nothing could be milder than my brother, or ruder than your sister; yet I omit many particulars which gave more trouble to me than to Quintus himself. I went away to Aquinum; he staid at Arcanum: but when he came to me early the next morning he told me that she refused to be with him that night, and at their parting continued in the same humour in which I had seen her. In a word, you may let her know from me that, in my opinion, the fault was all on her side that day. I have been longer, perhaps, than was necessary in my narrative, to let you see that there is occasion also on your part for advice and admonition."

^d Noli putare mihi ullam consolationem esse iungentis molestias, nisi quod spero non longiorem fore. Hoc me ita velle multi non credunt ex consuetudine aliorum. Tu, qui sola, omnem diligentiam adhibebis; scilicet, cum id agi debebit.—Ep. Fam. li. 2.

One cannot help observing from this little incident what is confirmed by innumerable instances in the Roman story, that the freedom of a divorce, which was indulged without restraint at Rome, to the caprice of either party, gave no advantage of comfort to the matrimonial state, but, on the contrary, seems to have encouraged rather a mutual perverseness and obstinacy; since, upon any little dissent or obstruction given to their follies, the expedient of a change was ready always to flatter them with the hopes of better success in another bid; for there never was an age or country where there was so profligate a contempt and violation of the nuptial bond, or so much lewdness and incontinency in the great of both sexes, as at this time in Rome.

Cicero spent a few days as he passed forward at the Cuman villa, near Baiae, where there was such a sort of company to him that he had, he says, a kind of little Rome about him. Hortensius, among the rest, though much out of health, to pay his compliments, and wish him a good voyage, and at taking leave, when he asked what commands he had for him in his absence, Cicero charged of him only to use all his authority to keep his government from being prolonged to him. In sixteen days from Rome he arrived at Brundisium, where he had promised to make a halt to Pompey, who was taking the benefit of that soft air for the recovery of his health at one of his villas in those parts, and had invited and pressed Cicero to spend some days with him upon his journey. They proposed great satisfaction on both sides from this interview, for the opportunity of conferring together with all freedom on the present state of the republic, which was to be their subject; though Cicero expected also to get some returns of the military kind from this renowned commander. He promised Atticus an account of this conference, but the particulars being too delicate to be communicated by letter, he acquainted him only in general that he found Pompey an excellent citizen, and provided for all events which might possibly be apprehended^s.

^a Ad Att. v. 1.

^b In Cumano cum essem, venit ad me, quod mihi porro fecit, noster Hortensius: cui, deprecanti mea mandata, cetera universe mandavi; illud propter, ne in hoc, quantum esset in ipso, prorogari nobis provinciam. Habuimus in Cumano quasi pusillam Romam: ubi erat in his locis multitudo.—Ibid. 2.

^c Nos Tarenti, quos cum Pompeio διαλόγους de republica habebamus ad te perscribimus.—Ibid. 5.

^d Tarentum venit a. d. xv. Kal. Jun. quod Pontinium praeteritum expectare, commodissimum duxi id eos—cum Pompeio commorare: eoque magis, quod ei gratum esse id videbam, qui etiam a me petierit, ut secum et apud se

After three days' stay with Pompey he proceeded to Brundisium, where he was detained for twelve days by a slight indisposition, and the expectation of his principal officers, particularly of his lieutenant Pontinius, an experienced leader, the same who had triumphed over the Allobroges, and on whose skill he chiefly depended in his martial affairs. From Brundisium he sailed to Actium, on the fifteenth of June, whence partly by sea and partly by land he arrived at Athens on the twenty-sixth^a. Here he lodged in the house of Aristus, the principal professor of the Academy, and his brother not far from him, with Xeno, another celebrated philosopher of Epicurus' school. They spent their time here very agreeably; at home, in philosophical disquisitions; abroad in viewing the buildings and antiquities of the place, with which Cicero was much delighted. There were several other men of learning, both Greeks and Romans, of the party; especially Gallus Caninius, and Patro, an eminent Epicurean, and intimate friend of Atticus^b.

There lived at this time in exile at Athens C. Memmius, banished upon a conviction of bribery in his suit for the consulship, who, the day before Cicero's arrival, happened to go away to Mitylene. The figure which he had borne in Rome gave him great authority in Athens, and the council of Areopagus had granted him a piece of ground to build upon where Epicurus formerly lived, and where there still remained the old ruins of his walls. But this grant had given great offence to the whole body of the Epicureans, to see the remains of their master in danger of being destroyed. They had written to Cicero at Rome, to beg him to intercede with Memmius to consent to a revocation of it; and now at Athens, Xeno and Patro renewed their instances, and prevailed with him to write about it in the most effectual manner; for though Memmius had laid aside his design of building, the Areopagites would not recall their decree without his leave^c. Cicero's letter is drawn with much art and accuracy; he laughs at the trifling zeal of these philosophers for the old rubbish and paltry ruins of their founder, yet earnestly presses Memmius to indulge them in a prejudice contracted through weakness, not wickedness; and though he professes an utter dislike of their philosophy, yet he recommends them, as honest, agreeable, friendly men, for whom he entertained the highest esteem^d. From this letter one may observe, esseum quotidie: quod concessi libenter multos, anim ejus preclaros de republica sermones accipiam: instruat etiam consiliis idoneis ad hoc nostrum negotium.—Ad Attic. v. 6.

Ego, cum triduum cum Pompeio et apud Pompeium fuissem, proficiscor Brundisium.—Civem illum egregium relinquebam, et ad hanc, quae timebatur, propulsanda peratissimum.—Ibid. 7.

^b Ibid. 8, 9.

^c Valde me Athenae delectarunt: urbs dumtaxat, et urbis ornamentum, et hominum amores in te, et in nos quaedam benevolentia; sed multum et philosophia—quid est, est in Aristotele apud quem eram, nam Xenonem tuum—Quinto concesseram.—Ibid. 10; Ep. Fam. ii. 8. xiii. 1.

^d Visum est Xenoni, et post, ipsi Patroni, me ad Memmiam profectum esse,—non enim dubitabat Xeno, quin ab Areopagitis invito Memmio impetrari non posset. Memmiam autem edificandi consilium abjecisset, sed erat Patroni iratus, itaque scripsi ad eum accurate.—Ibid. 11.

^e Ep. Fam. xiii. 1.

that the greatest difference in philosophy made no difference of friendship among the great of these times. There was not a more declared enemy to Epicurus's doctrine than Cicero; he thought it destructive of morality and pernicious to society, but he charged this consequence to the principles, not the professors of them, with many of whom he held the strictest intimacy, and found them to be worthy, virtuous, generous friends, and lovers of their country. There is a jocular letter to Trebatius, when he was with Cæsar in Gaul, upon his turning Epicurean, which will help to confirm this reflection.

Cicero to Trebatius.

"I was wondering why you had given over writing to me, till Pansa informed me that you were turned Epicurean. O rare camp! what would you have done if I had sent you to Tarentum instead of Samarobriæ? I began to think the worse of you ever since you made my friend Seius your pattern. But with what face will you now pretend to practise the law, when you are to do everything for your own interest, and not for your client's? and what will become of that old form and test of fidelity, As true men ought to act truly, with one another? What law will you allege for the distribution of common right, when nothing can be common with those who measure all things by their pleasure? With what face can you swear by Jupiter, when Jupiter, you know, can never be angry with any man? And what will become of your people of Ulubræ; since you do not allow a wise man to meddle with politics? Wherefore if you are really gone off from us, I am sorry for it; but if it be convenient to pay this compliment to Pansa, I forgive you; on condition, however, that you write me word what you are doing, and what you would have me do for you here." The change of principles in Trebatius, though equivalent in effect to a change of religion with us, made no alteration in Cicero's affection for him. This was the dictate of reason to the best and wisest of the heathens; and may serve to expose the rashness of those zealots who, with the light of a most divine and benevolent religion, are perpetually insulting and persecuting their fellow Christians for differences of opinion, which for the most part are merely speculative, and without any influence on life, or the good and happiness of civil society.

After ten days spent at Athens, where Pontinius at last joined him, Cicero set sail towards Asia. Upon leaving Italy, he had charged his friend Cælius with the task of sending him the news of Rome, which Cælius performed very punctually, in a series of letters, which make a valuable part in the collection of his familiar epistles: they are polite and entertaining; full of wit and spirit; yet not flowing with that easy turn and elegance of expression which we always find in Cicero's. The first of them, with Cicero's answer, will give us a specimen of the rest.

M. Cælius to M. Cicero.

"According to my promise at parting to send you an account of all the news of the town, I have provided one to collect it for you so punctually, that I am afraid lest you should think my diligence at last too minute: but I know how you are, and how agreeable it is to all abroad to be informed of everything that at home, though ever so trifling. I beg however, not to condemn me of arrogantly deputed another to this task: since, as I now am, and as lazy as you know me writing, it would be the greatest pleasure to be employed in anything that revives the remembrance of you: but the packet itself which sent will I imagine readily excuse me: leisure would it require, not only to travel but to attend even to the contents of it? I all the decrees of the senate, edicts, plays, if the sample does not please you, pray know it, that I may not give you trouble to my cost. If anything important happens to the republic above the reach of these hackneyed I will send you an account of it myself; manner it was transacted; what speculations raised upon it; what effects apprehended; sent there is no great expectation of anything to those rumours which were so warm of assembling the colonies beyond the Po came to Rome I heard not a syllable about Marcellus too, because he has not yet a motion for a successor to the two Gauls, it off as he told me himself to the first has revived the same talk concerning him was stirring when we were at Rome together you say Pompey, as you designed to do, I me word in what temper you found his conversation he had with you; what inclinations showed: for he is apt to think one thing another, yet has not wit enough to consider he really means. As for Cæsar, there are ugly reports about him, but propagated in whispers: some say, that he has lost all which I take indeed to be true: others, seventh legion has been beaten; and that self is besieged by the Bellovaci, and cut the rest of his army. There is nothing yet nor are these uncertain stories publicly told but among the few whom you know, told by way of secrets: Domitius never mentions without clapping his hand to his mouth. twenty-first of May, the mob under the name about a report (may it fall on their own which was warmly propagated through the whole city, that you were killed road by Q. Pompeius: but I, who knew then at Bauli, and in such a starving that I could not help pitying him, being turned pilot for his bread, was not concerned; and wished only that, if any real threatened you, we might be quit for your friend Plancus Bursa is at Ravenna; he has had a large donative from Cæsar; yet easy, nor well provided. Your government are applauded by all people."

M. T. Cicero, proconsul, to M. Cælius.

"How! was it this, think you, that you wish; to send me the matches of the adjournments of causes; and Chrestus's letter; and what nobody dares mention when at Rome? see how much I ascribe to my judgment; nor indeed without reason."

have never yet met with a better head for politics ; I would not have you write what passes every day in public, though ever so important, unless it happen to affect myself: others will write it; many bring accounts of it; and fame itself convey a great part to me: I expect from you neither the past nor the present; but as from one who sees a great way before him, the future only; that when I have before me in your letters the plan of the republic, I may be able to judge what a sort of edifice it will be. Nor have I hitherto indeed any cause to complain of you: for nothing has yet happened which you could foresee better than any of us; especially myself, who spent several days with Pompey in conversing on nothing else but the republic; which it is neither possible nor proper for me to explain by letter: take this only from me; that Pompey is an excellent citizen, prepared both with courage and counsel for all events which may be foreseen: wherefore, give yourself up to him; believe me, he will embrace you; for he holds the same opinion with us of good and bad citizens. After I had been ten days at Athens, where our friend Gallus Caninius was much with me, I left it on the sixth of July, when I sent you this letter: as I earnestly recommend all my affairs to you, so nothing more particularly than that the time of my provincial command be not prolonged; this is everything to me; which, when and how, and by whom it is to be managed, you will be the best able to contrive. Adieu*.

I landed at Ephesus on the twenty-second of July, after a slow but safe passage of fifteen days; the tediousness of which was agreeably relieved by stopping on the way at several of the islands of the Ægean sea, of which he sends a kind of journal to you¹. Many deputations from the cities of Asia and a great concourse of people came to meet me as far as Samos; but a much greater still was waiting his landing at Ephesus: the Greeks had eagerly from all parts to see a man so celebrated through the empire for the fame of his eloquence and eloquence; so that all his boastings, he merrily says, of many years past, were now brought to the test². After reposing himself for a few days at Ephesus, he marched forward to his province; and on the last of July, arrived at Sardis, one of the capital cities of his jurisdiction. From this moment the date of his command commenced, which he bids Atticus give notice of, that he might know how to compute the precise extent of his annual term³.

It was Cicero's resolution, in this provincial command, to practise those admirable rules which he had drawn up formerly for his brother; and in an employment wholly tedious and disagreeable to him to derive fresh glory upon his character, preserving the innocence and integrity of his administration, as a pattern of governing to all succeeding provincials. It had always been the custom, when any governors went abroad to their provinces, that the countries through which they passed should defray all the charges of their journey: but Cicero no sooner set his foot on foreign ground than he forbade all expense whatsoever, public or private, to be made either upon himself or any of his company; which raised a great admiration of him in all the cities of Greece⁴. In Asia he did the same, not suffering his officers to accept what was due to them even by law, forage and wood for firing, nor anything else but mere house-room, with four beds; which he remitted also, as oft as it was practicable, and obliged them to lodge in their tents; and by his example and constant exhortations brought his lieutenants, tribunes, and præfects, so fully into his measures, that they all concurred with him, he says, wonderfully, in a jealous concern for his honour⁵.

Being desirous to put himself at the head of his army before the season of action was over, he spent but little time in visiting the cities of his jurisdiction, reserving the winter months for settling the civil affairs of the province⁶. He went, therefore, to the camp at Iconium, in Lycania, about the twenty-fourth of August; where he had no sooner reviewed the troops than he received an account from Antiochus, king of Comagene, which was confirmed from the other princes of those parts, that the Parthians had passed the Euphrates with a mighty force, in order to invade the Roman territory under the conduct of Pacorus, the king's son. Upon this news, he marched towards Cilicia, to secure his province from the inroads of the enemy, or any commotions within; but as all access to it was difficult except on the side of Cappadocia, an open country, and not well provided, he took his route through that kingdom, and encamped in that part of it which bordered upon Cilicia, near to the town of Cybistra, at the foot of mount Taurus. His army, as it is said above, consisted of about twelve thousand foot, and two thousand six hundred horse, besides the auxiliary troops of the neighbouring states, and especially of Deiotarus, king of Galatia, the most faithful ally of Rome, and Cicero's particular friend; whose whole forces he could depend upon at any warning⁷.

* Ego—quotidie meditator, præcipio meis; faciam denique ut summa modestia et summa abstinentia munus hoc extraordinarium traducamus.—Ep. Fam. II. 9.

Adhuc sumptus nec in me aut publice aut privatim, nec in quemquam oculum. Nihil accipitur lege Julia, nihil ab hospite, persuasum est omnibus meis servandum esse famæ meæ. Belle adhuc. Hoc animadversum Græcorum laudo et multo sermone celebratur.—Ibid. 10.

Nos adhuc iter per Græciam summa cum admiratione fecimus.—Ibid. 11.

¹ Levantur miseræ civitates, quod nullus sit sumptus in nos, neque in legatos, neque in questorem, neque in quemquam. Scito, non modo nos fœnum, aut quod lege Julia dari solet, non accipere, sed ne ligna quidem, nec præter quatuor lectos, et tectum, quemquam accipere quidquam: multis locis ne tectum quidem, et in tabernaculo manere plerumque.—Ad Att. v. 16.

Ut nullus terentius insumatur in quemquam; id fit etiam et legatorum et tribunorum et præfectorum diligentia. Nam omnes mirifice συμφλοδοῦσιν gloriæ meæ.—Ibid. 17.

² Erat mihi in animo recta proficisci ad exercitum, ætivos menses reliquos rei militari dare, hibernos jurisdictioni.—Ibid. 14.

³ In castra veni a. d. vii. Kal. Sept. a. d. iii. exercitum

* Ep. Fam. II. 9.

¹ Ephesum venimus a. d. xi. Kal. Sext.—Ad Att. v. 13; Ibid. 12.

² De concursu legationum, privatorum, et de incredibili solitudine, quæ mihi jam Sami, sed mirabillem in modum erat, præsto fuit, aut te audisse puto—ex quo te intelligo sermo acio multorum annorum ostentationes meas in te nunquam esse adductas.—Ibid. 13.

³ Leodiceam venit prid. Kal. Sextiles. Ex hoc die clarum meo meritis.—Ibid. 10.

While he lay in this camp, he had an opportunity of executing a special commission with which he was charged by the senate, to take Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, under his particular protection, and provide for the security of his person and government; in honour of whom the senate had decreed, what they had never done before to any foreign prince, that his safety was of great concern to the senate and people of Rome. His father had been killed by the treachery of his subjects, and a conspiracy of the same kind was apprehended against the son: Cicero, therefore, in a council of his officers, gave the king an account of the decrees of the senate, and that in consequence of it he was then ready to assist him with his troops and authority in any measures that should be concerted for the safety and quiet of his kingdom. The king, after great professions of his thanks and duty to the senate for the honour of their decree, and to Cicero himself for his care in the execution of it, said, that he knew no occasion for giving him any particular trouble at that time; nor had any suspicion of any design against his life or crown: upon which Cicero, after congratulating him upon the tranquillity of his affairs, advised him, however, to remember his father's fate, and, from the admonition of the senate, to be particularly vigilant in the care of his person, and so they parted. But the next morning the king returned early to the camp, attended by his brother and counsellors, and with many tears implored the protection of Cicero, and the benefit of the senate's decree; declaring, "that he had received undoubted intelligence of a plot, which those who were privy to it durst not venture to discover till Cicero's arrival in the country, but trusting to his authority, had now given full information of it; and that his brother, who was present and ready to confirm what he said, had been solicited to enter into it by the offer of the crown: he begged, therefore, that some of Cicero's troops might be left with him for his better guard and defence." Cicero told him, "that under the present alarm of the Parthian war, he could not possibly lend him any part of his army; that since the conspiracy was detected, his own forces would be sufficient for preventing the effects of it; that he should learn to act the king, by showing a proper concern for his own life, and exert his regal power in punishing the authors of the plot, and pardoning all the rest; that he need not apprehend any farther danger, when his people were acquainted with the senate's decree, and saw a Roman army so near to them, and ready to put it in execution;" and having thus encouraged and comforted the king, he marched towards Cilicia, and gave an account of this accident, and of the motions of the Parthians, in two public letters to the consuls and the senate: he added a private letter also to Cato, who was a particular favourer and lustravi. Ex his castris cum graves de Parthis nunciis venirent, perrexi in Ciliciam, per Cappadociæ partem eun, quæ Antiochi attingit—

Regis Antiochi Comageni legati primi mihi nuntiabant Parthorum magnas copias Euphratem transire cepisse.—Cum exercitum in Ciliciam ducerem—mihi literæ rediditæ sunt a Tarcondimoto, qui fidelissimus socius trans Taurum populi Romani existimatur. Paucorum Orodis regis Parthorum filium, cum permagno equitatu transisse Euphratem, &c.—Ep. Fam. xv. 1.

Eodem die ab Jamblichio, Phylarcho Arabum—literæ de eisdem rebus, &c.

patron of Ariobarzanes, in which he informs "that he had not only secured the king's from any attempt, but had taken care that he should reign for the future with honour and authority, by restoring to his favour and service his counsellors, whom Cato had recommended who had been disgraced by the intrigues of the court; and by obliging a turbulent young prince, Bellona, who was the head of the malcontents, the next in power to the king himself, to quit the country?"

This king Ariobarzanes seems to have been poor even to a proverb:—

Mancipis locuples egit æris Cappadocum rex.
Hos. Ep.

for he had been miserably squeezed and drained by the Roman generals and governors, to whom he owed vast sums, either actually borrowed or pretended to be paid for particular services. It was a common practice with the great of Rome to lend money at an exorbitant interest to the provinces dependent on the empire, which was a useful piece of policy to both sides; princes, for the opportunity of engaging the interests of the most powerful men of the republic; and the Romans, for the sake of a kind of honourable pension; to the Romans the convenience of placing their money was sure to bring the greatest return of profit. The ordinary interest of these provincial loans was six per cent. by the month, with interest upon this was the lowest, but in extraordinary and hazardous cases, it was frequently four times as much. Pompey received monthly, from the king, above six thousand pounds sterling, yet was short of his full interest. Brutus lent him a very large sum, and earnestly solicited Cicero to procure the payment of it, with arrears of interest: but Pompey's agents pressing, and the king so needy, that though he solicited Brutus's affair very heartily, he had no hopes of getting anything for him: when Ariobarzanes came, therefore, to offer him the same of money, which he had usually made to other governors, he generously refused it, and sired only, that instead of giving it to him, he be paid to Brutus: but the poor prince was distressed that he excused himself, by the necessity which he was under, of satisfying some other pressing demands; so that Cicero gives a count of his negotiation, in a long letter to who had warmly recommended Brutus's interest to him.

"I come now (says he) to Brutus, where your authority I embraced with inclination began even to love: but—what am I going to do? I recal myself, lest I offend you—do not think I ever entered into anything more willingly than to do more pains than in what he recommended. He gave me a memorial of the particular you had talked over with me before: I will give you your instructions exactly. In the first place, pressed Ariobarzanes to give that money to which he promised to me. As long as he continued with me, all things looked well: he was afterwards teased by six hundred of Pompey's agents, and Pompey, for other reasons, more with him than all the world besides, especially when it is imagined that he is to in the Parthian war. They now pay Pompey thirty-three Attic talents per month out of the taxes, though this falls short of a month's interest; but our friend Cæsar takes it calmly, and is content to abate somewhat of the interest without pressing for the principal. As for others, he neither does nor can pay any man; for he has no treasury, no revenues; he raises taxes by Appius's method of capitation, but these are scarce sufficient for Pompey's monthly pay. Two or three of the king's friends are very rich, but they hold their wealth as closely as either you or I. I do not forbear, however, to ask, urge, and chide him by letters. King Deiotarus also told me that he had sent people to him on purpose to solicit for Brutus, but they brought him word back that he had really no money; which I take indeed to be the case, that nothing is more drained than his kingdom, nothing surer than the king's."

But Brutus had recommended another affair of the same nature to Cicero, which gave him much less trouble. The city of Salamis in Cyprus used to two of his friends, as he pretended, Lucius and M. Titinius, above twenty thousand talents sterling upon bond at a most extravagant interest; and he begged of Cicero to take their interests and concerns under his special protection. Appius, who was Brutus's father-in-law, had pressed everything which was asked to Scaptius; prefecture in Cyprus, with some troops of horse, which he miserably harassed the poor Salamisians in order to force them to comply with his unreasonable demands; for he shut up their whole senate in the council-room till five of them were starved to death with hunger. Brutus laboured to place him in the same degree of favour with Cicero; but Cicero being informed of this violence at Ephesus by a deputation from Salamis, made it the first act of his government to recall the troops from Cyprus, and put an end to Scaptius's prefecture, having laid it down for a rule to grant no command to any man who was concerned in trade or negotiating money in the province. To give satisfaction, however, to Brutus, he enjoined the Salamisians to pay off Scaptius's bond, which they were ready to do according to the tenor of his edict, by which he had ordered that no bonds in the province should carry above one per cent. by the month. Scaptius refused to take the money on these terms, insisting on four per cent. as the condition of his bond expressed, which by compulsion almost doubled the principal sum; while the Salamisians, as they protested to Cicero, could not have paid the original debt if they had not been enabled to do it by his help, and out of his own hands that he had remitted to them, which amounted to somewhat more than Scaptius's legal demand^b. This extortion raised Cicero's indignation,—and

^a Ad Att. vi. l.

^b Fuit enim prefectus Appio, et quidem habuerat equos equitum, quibus inclusum in curia senatum Salamis obsederat, ut fame senatores quinque morerentur. Ibid.

^c Hæc ego, quo die tetigi provinciam, cum mihi Cyprici legati Ephesum obviam venissent, literas misi, ut equites Salamis statim decederent.—Ad Att. vi. l.

^d Confessum, ut solverent centesimas—at Scaptius quæstus precebat.—Ibid.

^e Res nec modo non recusare, sed etiam dicere, se a sequebatur. Quod enim prætori dare consuevit, quoniam se non accepit, se a me quodam modo dare; atque notwithstanding the repeated instances of Brutus and Atticus, he was determined to overrule it; though Brutus, in order to move him the more effectually, thought proper to confess what he had all along dissembled, that the debt was really his own, and Scaptius only his agent in it^c. This surprised Cicero still more, and though he had a warm inclination to oblige Brutus, yet he could not consent to so flagrant an injustice, but makes frequent and heavy complaints of it in his letters to Atticus. "You have now (says he in one of them), the ground of my conduct; if Brutus does not approve it I see no reason why we should love him, but I am sure it will be approved by his uncle Cato^d." In another, "If Brutus thinks that I ought to allow him four per cent. when by edict I have decreed but one through all the province, and that to the satisfaction of the keenest usurers; if he complains that I denied a prefecture to one concerned in trade which I denied for that reason to your friend Lenius, and to Sex. Statius, though Torquatus solicited for the one and Pompey himself for the other, yet without disgusting either of them; if he takes it ill that I recalled the troops of horse out of Cyprus, I shall be sorry indeed that he has any occasion to be angry with me, but much more not to find him the man that I took him to be. I would have you to know, however, that I have not forgot what you intimated to me in several of your letters, that if I brought back nothing else from the province but Brutus's friendship, that would be enough: let it be so since you will have it so,—yet it must always be with this exception, as far as it can be done without my committing any wrong^e." In a third, "How, my dear Atticus! you who applaud my integrity and good conduct, and are vexed sometimes you say that you are not with me,—how can such a thing, as Ennius says, come out of your mouth to desire me to grant troops to Scaptius for the sake of extorting money? Could you, if you were with me, suffer me to do it if I would? If I really had done such a thing, with what face could I ever read again or touch those books of mine with which you are so much pleased?" He tells him likewise in etiam minus esse aliquanto in Scaptii nomine, quam in vœtigali prætorio.—Ad Att. v. 21.

^c Atque hoc tempore ipso impingit mihi epistolam Scaptius Bruti, rem illam suo periculo esse: quod nec mihi unquam Brutus dixerat nec tibi.—Ibid.

^d Nunquam ex illo audivi illam pecuniam esse suam.—Ibid.

^e Habes meam causam: quæ si Bruto non probatur, nescio cur illum amemus: sed avunculo ejus certe probabitur.—Ibid. v. 21.

^f Si Brutus putabit me quaternas centesimas oportuisse decernere, qui in tota provincia singulas observarem, itaque edixissem, idque etiam acerbissimis feneratoribus probaretur; si prefecturam negotiorum denegatam queretur, quod ego Torquato nostro in tuo Lenio, Pompeio ipsi in S. Statio negavi, et illis probavi; si equites deductos moleste feret; accipiam equidem dolorem, mihi illum irasci, sed multo majorem, non esse eum talem, qualem putassem.—Sed plane te intelligere volui, mihi non exdisse illud, quod tu ad me quibusdam literis scripsisses, si nihil aliud de hac provincia nisi illius benevolentiam deportassem, mihi id satis esse. Sit sane, quoniam ita tu vis sed tamen cum eo credo, quod sine peccato meo fiat.—Ibid.

^g Ain't tandem Attice, laudator integritatis et elegantie nostræ? ausus es hoc ex ore tuo, inquit Ennius, ut equites Scaptio ad pecuniam cogendam darem, me rogare? an tu, confidence, that all Brutus's letters to him, even when he was asking favours, were unmannerly, churlish, and arrogant, without regarding either what or to whom he was writing; "and if he continued in that humour, you may love him alone, (says he) if you please, you shall have no rival of me; but he will come I believe to a better mind." But to show after all what a real inclination he had to oblige him, he never left urging king Ariobarzanes till he had squeezed from him a hundred talents in part of Brutus's debt, or about twenty thousand pounds; the same sum probably which had been destined to Cicero himself¹.

While he lay encamped in Cappadocia expecting what way the Parthians would move, he received an account that they had taken a different route, and were advanced to Antioch in Syria, where they held C. Cassius blocked up, and that a detachment of them had actually penetrated into Cilicia, but were routed and cut off by those troops which were left to guard the country. Upon this he presently decamped, and, by great journeys over Mount Taurus, marched in all haste to possess himself of the passes of Amanus, a great and strong mountain lying between Syria and Cilicia, and the common boundary of them both. By this march, and the approach of his army to the neighbourhood of Syria, the Parthians being discouraged retired from Antioch, which gave Cassius an opportunity of falling upon them in their retreat and gaining a considerable advantage, in which one of their principal commanders, Osaces, was mortally wounded¹.

In the suspense of the Parthian war, which the late disgrace of Crassus had made terrible at Rome, Cicero's friends, who had no great opinion of his military talents, were in some pain for his safety and success; but now that he found himself engaged and pushed to the necessity of acting the general, he seems to have wanted neither the courage nor conduct of an experienced leader. In a letter to Atticus, dated from his camp,—"We are in great spirits (says he), and as our councils are good, have no distrust of an engagement; we are securely encamped, with plenty of provisions, and in sight almost of Cilicia; with a small army, indeed, but, as I have reason to believe, entirely well affected to me, which I shall double by accession of Deiotarus, who is upon the road join me. I have the allies more firmly attached to me than any governor ever had; they are wonderfully taken with my easiness and abstinence: we are making new levies of citizens and establishing magazines; if there be occasion for fighting we shall not decline it; if not, shall defend ourselves by the strength of our posts; wherefore be of good heart, for I see as much as if you were with the sympathy of your love for me²."

But the danger of the Parthians being over this season, Cicero resolved that his labour should not be lost and his army dismissed without tempting something of moment. The inhabitants of the mountains close to which he now lay a fierce untamed race of banditti or freebooters who had never submitted to the Roman power, lived in perpetual defiance of it, trusting to their forts and castles, which were supposed to be impregnable from the strength of their situation. He thought it, therefore, of no small importance the empire to reduce them to a state of subjection and in order to conceal his design and take them unprovided, he drew off his forces on pretence marching to the distant parts of Cilicia; but as a day's journey stopped short, and having refreshed his army and left his baggage behind, turned back again in the night with the utmost celerity, and reached Amanus before day on the thirteenth of October. He divided his troops among his five lieutenants, and himself, accompanied by his brother, led up one part of them, and so coming upon the natives by surprise, they easily killed or made them all prisoners. They took six strong forts and burned many more; but the capital of the mountain, Erana, made a brave resistance, and held out from break of day to four in the afternoon. Upon this success Cicero was saluted emperor, and sat down again at the foot of the hills, where he spent five days in demolishing the other strongholds and wasting the lands of these mountaineers. In this place his troops were lodged in the same camp which Alexander the Great had formerly used when he beat Darius at Issus, and where there remained three altars as the monument of victory, which bore his name to that day; a circumstance which furnished matter for some pleasantry in his letters to his friends at Rome si mecum essem, qui scribis morderi te interdum quod non simul sis, paterere me id facere, si vellem?—ot ego audebo legere unquam, aut attingere eos libros, quos tu dilaudas? si tale quid fecero?—Ad Att. vi. 2.

¹ Ad me etiam, cum rogat aliquid, contumaciter, arrogant, ἀκροασις solet scribere—Ibid. vi. 1.

Omnino (soli enim sumus) nullas unquam ad me litteras misit Brutus—in quibus non esset arrogans, ἀκροασις aliquid—in quo tamen ille mihi risum magis quam stomachum movere solet. Sed plane parum cogitat, quid scribat, aut ad quem—Ibid. vi. 3.

² Brutus tui causa, ut sepe ad te scripsi, feci omnia—Ariobarzanes non in Pompeium prolixior per ipsum, quam per me in Brutum—pro ratione pecunie liberius est Brutus tractatus, quam Pompeius. Bruto curata hoc anno talenda circiter c. Pompelo in sex mensibus promissa cc.—Ibid.

¹ Itaque confestim iter in Ciliciam feci per Tauri pylas. Tarsum veni ad diem vii. Non. Oct. inde ad Amanum contendi, qui Syriam a Cilicia in aquarum divortio dividitur—rumore adventus nostri, et Cassio, qui Antiochia tenebatur, animus accessit, et Parthis timor injectus est. Itaque eos cedentes ab oppido Cassius insecutus rem bene gessit. Qua in fuga magna auctoritate Osaces, dux Parthorum, vulnus accepit, eoque interit paucis post diebus.—Ad Att. vi. 20.

² Ad Att. vi. 18.

¹ Qui mons erat hostium plenus sempiternorum. a. d. m. Id. Oct. magnum numerum hostium occidis. Castella munitissima, nocturno Pontinil adventu, nocturno cepimus, incendimus. Imperatores appellati sumus. Castra paucos dies habuimus, ac ipsa, quae coeli Darium habuerat apud Issum Alexander, imperator paulo melior, quam aut tu aut ego. Ibi dies quin morati, direpto et vastato Amanu, inde discessimus.—Att. vi. 20.

Expedito exercitu ita noctu iter feci, ut ad xii. Id. cum lucisceret, in Amanum accederem, distributis cohortibus et auxiliis, cum aliis Quintus frater legatus mecum simul, aliis C. Pontinius legatus, reliquis M. A. neius, et M. Tullius legati praesent: plerosque necantes, antea oppressimus—Erana autem, quae fuit non longe instar, sed urbs, quod erat Amani caput—acriter et repugnantibus, Pontinio illam partem Amani teneat antelucano tempore usque ad horam diei decimam, meae multitudinis hostium occidis, cepimus, castellaque capta: complura incendimus. His rebus ita gestis, cum in radicibus Amani habuimus apud aras Alexandri quidriduum: et in reliquiis Amani delenda, agrisque vastis

From Amanus he led his army to another part of the highlands the most disaffected to the Roman name, possessed by a stout and free people, who had never been subject even to the kings of that country. Their chief town was called Pindenissum, situated on a steep and craggy hill, strongly fortified by nature and art, and provided with everything necessary for defence. It was the constant refuge of all deserters and the harbour of foreign enemies, and at that very time was expecting and prepared to receive the Parthians. Cicero, resolving, therefore, to chastise their insolence and bring them under the Roman yoke, laid siege to it in form; and though he pushed it on with all imaginable vigour, and a continual battery of his engines, yet it cost him above six weeks to reduce it to the necessity of surrendering at discretion. The inhabitants were sold for slaves; and when Cicero was writing the account from his tribunal, he had already raised about a hundred thousand pounds by that sale: all the other plunder, excepting the horses, was given to the soldiers. In his letter upon it to Atticus, "the Pindenissians," says he, "surrendered to me on the Saturnalia, after a siege of seven and forty days. 'But what the plague,' you will say, 'are these Pindenissians? I never heard of their name before.' How can I help that? Could I turn Cilicia into Ætolia or Macedonia? Take this, however, for certain, that no man could do more than I have done with such an army." &c. After this action, another neighbouring nation of the same spirit and fierceness, called Tiburani, terrified by the fate of Pindenissum, voluntarily submitted and gave hostages; so that Cicero sent his army into winter-quarters, under the command of his brother, into those parts of the province which were thought the most turbulent*.

While he was engaged in this expedition, Papirius Puteus, an eminent wit and Epicurean, with whom he had a particular intimacy and correspondence of frequent letters, sent him some military instructions in the way of raillery, to which Cicero answered in the same joocose manner:—"Your letter," says he, "has made me a complete commander. I was wholly ignorant before of your great skill in the art of war; but perceive that you have read Pyrrhus and Cæsar. Wherefore I intend to follow your precepts, and withal, to have some ships in readiness on the coast; for they deny that there can be any better defence against the Parthian horse. But, raillery apart, you little think what a general you have to deal with; for in this government I have reduced to practice what I had worn out before with reading, the whole Institution of Cyrus," &c. These martial exploits spread Cicero's fame into Syria, where Bibulus was just arrived to take upon him the command, but kept himself close within the gates of Antioch till the country was cleared of all the Parthians. His envy of Cicero's success and title of emperor made him impatient to purchase the same honour by the same service on the Syrian side of the mountain Amanus; but he had the misfortune to be repulsed in his attempt, with the entire loss of the first cohort and several officers of distinction, which Cicero calls an ugly blow both for the time and the effect of it†.

Though Cicero had obtained what he calls a just victory at Amanus, and in consequence of it the appellation of emperor which he assumed from this time, yet he sent no public account of it to Rome till after the affair of Pindenissum, an exploit of more éclat and importance, for which he expected the honour of a thanksgiving, and began to entertain hopes even of a triumph. His public letter is lost, but that loss is supplied by a particular narrative of the whole action in a private letter to Cato. The design of paying this compliment to Cato, was to engage his vote and concurrence to the decree of the "supplication;" and by the pains which he takes to obtain it, where he was sure of gaining his point without it, shows the high opinion which he had of Cato's authority, and how desirous he was to have the testimony of it on his side. But Cato was not to be moved from his purpose by compliments or motives of friendship. He was an enemy by principle to all decrees of this kind, and thought them bestowed too cheaply, and prostituted to occasions unworthy of them: so that when Cicero's letters came under deliberation, though he spoke with all imaginable honour and respect of Cicero, and highly extolled both his civil and military administration, yet he voted against the supplication,—which was decreed, however, without any other dissenting voice except that of Favonius, who loved always to mimic Cato, and of Hirrus, who had a personal quarrel with Cicero: yet when the vote was over, Cato himself assisted in drawing up the decree, and had his name inserted in it, which was the usual mark of a particular approbation of the thing and friendship to the person in whose favour it passed‡. But Cato's

* Ep. Fam. ix. 25.

† Erat in Syria nostrum nomen in gratia. Venit interim Bibulus. Credo voluit appellatione hæc inani nobis esse par. In eodem Amanus cepit laureolam in mustaceo querere. At ille cohortem primam totam perdidit—sane plagam odiosam acceperat tum re tum tempore.—Ad Att. v. 20.

‡ Nunc publice literas Romam mittere parabam. Uteriores erunt, quam si ex Amanus misissem.—Ibid.

Deinde de triumpho, quem video, nisi reipublice tempora impediunt, εὐχρίστον.—Ad Att. vii. 1.

El porro assensus est unus, familiaris meus Favonius; alter iratus Hirrus. Cato autem et scribendo affuit.—Ibid.

Res ipsa declarat, tibi illum honorem supplicationis jucundum fuisse, quod scribendo affuisti. Hæc enim sena-—Id tempus omne consummadus.—Ep. Fam. xv. 4; Ibid.

a. n. Conducit his rebus ad oppidum Eleutheroecilicum, Pindenissum, exercitum adduxi: quod cum esset altissimo et multissimo loco, ab illoque incoleretur, qui ne regibus quidem usquam parvissem: cum et fugitivos recipere, et Parthorum adventum acerrime expectarent: ad existimandum imperii pertinere arbitratum sum comprimere eorum audaciam—vallo et fossa circumdedit, sex castris, castrisque maximis scopis, aggere, vineis, turribus, propoli, usqueque tormentis multis, multis sagittariis, et labore meo—septimo quadragesimo die rem confeci.—Ep. Fam. xv. 4.

Qui quidam isti Pindenissæ? qui sunt? inquit: nomen novi usquequam. Quid ego faciam? potui Ciliciam, Ætoliam, aut Macedoniam reddere? hoc jam sic habeto, nec his exercitiis hic tanta negotia geri potuisse, &c.—Ad Att. v. 20.

Nepotius veniebat Saturnalibus tertiis, cum hæc scriberem in tribunalis, res erat ad H. S. cxxx.—Ibid.

* His erant finitimi parti acclere et audacia Tiburani: ab his Pindenissum capto, obides accepi, exercitum in hiberna dimisi. Quintum fratrem negotio præposui, ut in viols uti cepit aut malo pacatis exercitus collocaretur.—Ep. Fam. xv. 4.

answer to Cicero's letter will show the temper of the man and the grounds on which he acted on this occasion.

M. Cato to M. T. Cicero, Emperor.

"In compliance with what both the republic and our private friendship require of me, I rejoice that your virtue, innocence, diligence, approved in the greatest affairs, exerts itself everywhere with equal vigour,—at home in the gown, abroad in arms. I did all, therefore, that I could do, agreeably to my own judgment, when in my vote and speech I ascribed to your innocence and good conduct the defence of your province, the safety of the kingdom and person of Ariobarzanes, the recovery of the allies to their duty and affection to our empire. I am glad, however, that a supplication is decreed; if, where chance had no part, but the whole was owing to your consummate prudence and moderation, you are better pleased that we should hold ourselves indebted to the gods than to you. But if you think that a supplication will pave the way to a triumph, and for that reason choose that fortune should have the praise rather than yourself, yet a triumph does not always follow a supplication, and it is much more honourable than any triumph for the senate to decree that a province is preserved to the empire by the mildness and innocence of the general, rather than by the force of arms and the favour of the gods. This was the purpose of my vote; and I have now employed more words than it is my custom to do, that you might perceive what I chiefly wish to testify, how desirous I am to convince you that in regard to your glory I had a mind to do what I took to be the most honourable for you, yet rejoice to see that done which you are the most pleased with. Adieu, and still love me; and, agreeably to the course which you have begun, continue your integrity and diligence to the allies and the republic."

Cæsar was delighted to hear of Cato's stiffness, in hopes that it would create a coldness between him and Cicero; and in a congratulatory letter to Cicero, upon the success of his arms, and the supplication decreed to him, took care to aggravate the rudeness and ingratitude of Cato. Cicero himself was highly disgusted at it, especially when Cato soon afterwards voted a supplication to his son-in-law, Bibulus, who had done much less to deserve it. "Cato," says he, "was shamefully malicious; he gave me what I did not ask, a character of integrity, justice, clemency; but denied me what I did—yet this same man voted a supplication of twenty days to Bibulus: pardon me, if I cannot bear this usage." Yet as he had a good opinion of Cato in the main, and a farther suit to make to the senate, in the demand of a triumph, he chose to dissemble his resentment, and returned him a civil answer, to signify his satisfaction thanks for what he had thought fit to do*.

Cicero's campaign ended just so, as Cælius wished in one of his letters to him; with fight enough to give a claim to the laurel; yet without the risk of a battle with the Parthians¹. In these months of action, he sent away the young Ciceros, the son and nephew, to Deiotarus's court, under the conduct of the king's son, who came on purpose to invite them: were kept strictly to their books and exercises made great proficiency in both, though the king, as Cicero says, wanted the bit, the other spur: their tutor Dionysius attended them, a man of great learning and probity, but, as his young pupils complained, horribly passionate². Deiotarus himself was setting forward to join Cicero with all his forces, upon the first news of the Parthian irruption: he had with him thirty cohorts, of hundred men each, armed and disciplined after the Roman manner, with two thousand horse: but the Parthian alarm being over, Cicero sent couriers to meet him on the road, in order to prevent his marching to no purpose, so far from his own nation³: the old king, however, seems to have brought the children back again in person, for the opportunity of paying his compliments, and spending some time with his friend; for by what Cicero intimates, they appear to have had an interview.

The remaining part of Cicero's government employed in the civil affairs of the province: where his whole care was to ease the several cities and districts of that excessive load of debts, in which they were involved by the avarice and rapaciousness of former governors. He laid it down for the rule of his administration, not to suffer any money to be expended either upon himself or his office, and when one of his lieutenants, L. Tullius, passing through the country, exacted only forage and firing, which was due by law, and but once a day, and not, as all others had done before, from every town and village through which they passed, he was much out of humour, could not help complaining of it, as a stain to his government, since none of his people but he had taken even a single farthing. All the weak cities of the province used to pay to all their consuls large contributions for being exempted from furnishing winter-quarters to the army; Cæsar alone paid yearly on this single account two

* Ep. Fam. xv. 6.

* Ut optasti, ita est: velles enim, ais, tantummodo habere negotii quod esset ad laureolam satis. Poet. Lat. vi. 10: v.

† Ciceros nostros Deiotarus filius, qui rex a se appellatus est, secum in regnum. Dum in æstivum castrum, illum pueri locum esse bellissimum duximus. Ad Att. v. 17.

‡ Ciceroses pueri amant inter se, discunt, exercentur alter—frænis eget, alter calcaribus—Dionysius mihi dem in amoribus est. Pueros autem aiunt cum fore irasci. Sed homo nec doctior, nec sanctior fieri potest. Ibid. vi. 1.

§ Mihi tamen cum Deiotaro convenit, ut ille in castris esset cum omnibus suis copiis, habet autem hortos quadringenarias nostræ armaturæ triginta; equos duo milia.—Ibid.

¶ Deiotarus confestim, jam ad me venientem cum multis et firmo equitatu et pediatu et cum omnibus suis certiorum feci, non videri esse causam cur abesse a re. —Ep. Fam. xv. 4.

‡ Deiotarus mihi narravit, &c.—Ad Att. vi. 1, 2, 3.

tus consulta non ignoro ab amicis meis ejus, cujus de honore agitur, scribi solere.—Ep. Fam. xv. 6.

* Ep. Fam. xv. 5.

† Itaque Cæsar his literis, quibus mihi gratulatur, et omnia pollicetur, quo modo exultat Cato in me ingratis injuriis.—Ad Att. vii. 2.

‡ Aveo scire—Cato quid agat: qui quidem in me turpiter fuit malevolus. Dedit integritatis, justitiæ, clementiæ, fidelis testimonium, quod non quaerebam, quod postulabam, negavit—at hinc idem Bibulo dierum viginti. Ignosce mihi, non possum hæc ferre.—Ibid.

red talents, or about forty thousand pounds; but Cæsar remitted this whole tax to them, which has made a vast revenue; and applied all the ordinary perquisites of his office to the relief of the oppressed province; yet for all his services and liberality, which amazed the poor people, he would accept no honours, but what were merely verbal; refusing all expensive monuments, as statues, eagles, brazen horses, &c., which, by the flattery of his, used to be erected of course to all governors, though ever so corrupt and oppressive. While he was upon his visitation of the Asiatic districts, there happened to be a kind of famine in the country; yet wherever he came, he not only provided his family at his own expense, but prevailed with the merchants and dealers, who had any quantity of corn in their store-houses, to supply the people with it on easy terms^b; living himself, all the while, splendidly and hospitably, and keeping open table, not only for all the Roman officers, but the gentry of the province^c. In the following letter to Atticus, he gives him a summary view of his manner of governing:

"I see (says he) that you are much pleased with my moderation and abstinence; but you would be much more so, if you were with me, especially at Athens, where I did wonders at the sessions, which I have just held, for the affairs of the diocese, from the thirtieth of February to the first of May. Many cities are wholly freed from all their debts, many greatly eased; and all, by being allowed to govern themselves by their own laws, have recovered new life. There are two ways by which I have put them into a capacity of freeing, or easing themselves, at least of their debts. The one is, by suffering no expense at all to be made on the account of my government. When I am at all, I speak not hyperbolically; there is not so much as a farthing; it is incredible to what relief they have found from this single rule. The other is this: their own Greek magistrates had strangely abused and plundered them. I examined every one of them, who had borne any for ten years past; they all plainly confessed, without the ignominy of a public conviction, the restitution of the money which they had pillooted; so that the people, who had paid nothing to the farmers for the present lustrum, have now paid the arrears of the last, even without murmuring. This has placed me in high favour with the public."

Deve putes quicquam homines magis unquam esse liberos, quam nullum teruncum, me obtinente provincia, sanctus factum esse, nec in rempublicam nec in meorum morum, præterquam in L. Tullium, legatum. Quæque abstinentes (sed Julia lege transiens, semel in die, non ut alii solebant omnibus vicis) facit nulli excipiendus sit, cum teruncium nego sumtus facit. Preter eum accepti nemo. Has ordos a nostro Q. Cæsar accepimus.—Ad Att. v. 21.

Statuas, fana, τέρπειρα, prohibeo.—Ibid. Quæ pecunias dabant. Cyperi talenta Attica &c. Qua multa (non τρέφομαι sed verissime loquor) nummus non me obtinente erogabitur. Ob hæc beneficia, quibus præcipue, nullo honore mihi, nisi verborum, decerni. Statuas, fana, τέρπειρα, prohibeo.—Ibid. Quæ, quæ erat in hac mea Asia, mihi optanda fuerit. Quæque hic feci, nulla vi.—auctoritate et cohortatione, ut et Græci et cives Romani, qui frumentum præparant, magnam numerum populi pollicerentur.

^a Id. viam, ut maxime sumptus facio. Mirifice vivere hac instituto.—Ad Att. v. 13.

cans: a grateful set of men! you'll say; I have really found them such—the rest of my jurisdiction shall be managed with the same address, and create the same admiration of my clemency and easiness. There is no difficulty of access to me, as there is to all other provincial governors; no introduction by my chamberlain; I am always up before day, and walking in my hall with my doors open, as I used to do when a candidate at Rome: this is great and gracious here, though not at all troublesome to me, from my old habit and discipline," &c.^d

This method of governing gave no small umbrage to Appius, who considered it as a reproach upon himself, and sent several querulous letters to Cicero, because he had reversed some of his constitutions: "And no wonder," says Cicero, "that he is displeased with my manner, for what can be more unlike, than his administration and mine? under him the province was drained by expenses and exactions; under me, not a penny levied for public or private use. What shall I say of his præfects, attendants, lieutenants? of their plunders, rapines, injuries? whereas now, there is not a single family governed with such order, discipline, and modesty, as my province. This some of Appius's friends interpret ridiculously, as if I was taking pains to exalt my own character, in order to depress his; and doing all this, not for the sake of my own credit, but of his disgrace^e." But the truth was, that from the time of his reconciliation with Appius, he had a sincere desire to live on good terms with him, as well out of regard to the splendour of his birth and fortunes, as to his great alliances, for one of his daughters was married to Pompey's son, and another to Brutus^f; so that, though their principles and maxims were totally different, yet he took care to do every thing with the greatest professions of honour and respect towards Appius, even when he found it necessary to rescind his decrees; considering himself only, he says, as a second physician called in to a case of sickness, where he found it necessary to change the method of cure, and when the patient had been brought low by evacuations and blood-letting, to apply all kinds of lenitive and restoring medicines^g.

As soon as the government of Cilicia was allotted to him, he acquainted Appius with it by letter, begging of him that, as no man could succeed to it with a more friendly disposition than himself, so Appius would deliver up the province to him, in such a condition as one friend would expect to receive it from another^h; in answer to which Appius, ^d Ad Att. vi. 2.

^e Quid enim potest esse tam dissimile, quam illo Imperante, exhaustam esse sumptibus et jacturis provinciam, nobis eam obtinentibus, nummum nullum esse erogatum nec privatim nec publice, &c.—Ibid. vi. 1.

^f Ego Appium, ut tecum sæpe locutus sum, valde diligo. Meque ab eo diligi statim ceptum esse, ut simultatem deposuimus, sensi.—Jam me Pompeii totum esse acis: Brutum a me amari intelligis. Quid est causæ, cur mihi non in optatis est complexi hominem, florentem ætate, opibus, honoribus, ingenio, liberis, propinquis, affinibus, amicis.—Ep. Fam. ii. 13.

^g Ut si medicus, cum ægrotus alicui medico traditus sit, truci velit et medico, qui sibi succederit, at que ipse in curando constituerit mutet illa. Sic Appius, cum &c. ἀπαρτίζεις provinciam curarit, sanguinem miserit, &c.—Ad Att. vi. 1.

^h Cum causa voluntatem meam—accidisset, ut mihi cum imperio in provinciam ire necesse esset—hæc una having intimated some desire of an interview, Cicero took occasion to press it with much earnestness, as a thing of great service to them both; and, that it might not be defeated, gave him an account of all his stages and motions, and offered to regulate them in such a manner as to make the place of their meeting the most agreeable to Appius's convenience; but Appius being disgusted by the first edicts which Cicero published, resolved for that reason to disappoint him, and as Cicero advanced into the province, retired still to the remoter parts of it, and contrived to come upon him at last so suddenly, that Cicero had not warning enough given to go out and meet him, which Appius laid hold of as a fresh ground of complaint against Cicero's pride, for refusing that common piece of respect to him¹.

This provoked Cicero to expostulate with him with great spirit—"I was informed," says he, "by one of my apparitors, that you complained of me for not coming out to meet you; I despised you, it seems, so as nothing could be prouder. When your servant came to me near midnight and told me that you would be with me at Iconium before day, but could not say by which road, when there were two, I sent out your friend Varro by the one, and Q. Lepta, the commander of my artillery, by the other, with instructions to each of them to bring me timely notice of your approach, that I might come out in person to meet you. Lepta came running back presently in all haste to acquaint me that you had already passed by the camp, upon which I went directly to Iconium, where you know the rest. Did I then refuse to come out to you?—to Appius Claudius, to an emperor; then, according to ancient custom, and, above all, to my friend? I, who of all men am apt to do more in that way than becomes my dignity—but enough of this. The same man told me likewise, that you said 'What! Appius went out to meet Lentulus; Lentulus to Appius, but Cicero would not come out to Appius.' Can you then be guilty of such impertinence? A man, in my judgment of the greatest prudence, learning, experience, and I may add politeness too, which the Stoics rightly judge to be a virtue? Do you imagine, that your Appiuses and Lentuluses are of more weight with me than the ornaments of virtue? Before I had obtained those honours, which in the opinion of the world are thought to be the greatest, I never fondly admired those names of yours; I looked indeed upon those who had left them to you, as great men, but after I had acquired and borne the highest commands, so as to have nothing more to desire, either of honour or glory, I never indeed considered myself as your superior, but hoped that I was become your equal; nor did Pompey, whom I prefer to all men who ever lived, nor Lentulus, whom I prefer to myself, think otherwise. If you however are of a different opinion, it will do you no harm to read with some attention what Athenodorus says on this subject, that you consolatio occurrebat, quod neque tibi amior, quam ego sum, quisquam posset succedere, neque ego ab ullo provinciam accipere, qui mallet eam mihi quam maxime aptam explicatamque tradere, &c.—Ep. Fam. lli. 2.

¹ —ne libenter ad eam partem provincie primum ecess venturum, quo te maxime velle arbitrarer, &c.—Ibid. 5.

Appius noster, cum me adventare videt, profectus est Tarsum usque Laodicea.—Ad Att. v. 17.

may learn wherein true nobility consists. I return to the point: I desire you to look upon not only as your friend, but a most affect one; it shall be my care by all possible service to convince you that I am truly so, but if your mind to let people see that you are less concerned for my interests in my absence, than my pains deserved, I free you from that trouble.

For I have friends enough to serve and love
Both me and mine, and above all great Jove.

Il. 1

but if you are naturally querulous, you shall hinder my good offices and wishes for you that you will do, is to make me less solicitous you take them. I have written this with more my usual freedom, from the consciousness of duty and affection, which being contract choice and judgment, it will be in your power to preserve as long as you think proper. Adieu.

Cicero's letters to Appius make one book. Familiar Epistles, the greatest part of which the expostulatory kind, on the subject of the mutual jealousies and complaints. In this state of their friendship, an accident happened at Rome which had like to have put an end to it. Tullia, after parting from her husband Crassipes, as it is probably thought, was married in her father's absence to P. Cornelius Dolabella; several parties had been offered to her, and among them Tiberius Nero, who afterwards married Livilla. Augustus took away from him; Nero made proposals to Cicero in Cilicia, who referred him to the women, to whom he had left the management of that affair; but before those overtures reached them, they had made up the match with Dolabella being mightily taken with his complaisant and sequious address². He was a nobleman of a cian descent, and of great parts and politeness of a violent, daring, ambitious temper, was attached to Caesar, and by a life of pleasure and expense which the prudence of Tullia, it was thought would correct, greatly distressed in his fortune which made Cicero very uneasy, when he afterwards to know it³. Dolabella, at the time of this marriage, for which he made way also by the divorce of his first wife⁴, gave a proof of his surprising genius, by impeaching Appius Claud

² Ep. Fam. lli. 7.

³ What confirms this notion is, that Crassipes is to have been alive at this time, and under Cicero's pleasure: who mentions him as the only senator, I. Hirrus, to whom he did not think fit to write about affair of his supplication.—Ad Att. vii. 1.

⁴ Ego dum in provincia omnibus rebus Appium subito sum factus accusatoris ejus nocere—sed crede nihil minus putaram ego, qui de Ti. Nerone, qui B. egerat, certos homines ad mulieres miseram, qui B. venerat factis sponalibus. Sed hoc spero melius. Ileres quidem valde intelligi delectari obsequio et con adolescentis.—Ad Att. vi. 6.

⁵ Gener est suavis—quantum vis vel ingenti. vel l. nitatis; melis. Reliqua quæ nosci ferenda.—Ad Att.

Dolabellam a te gaudio primum laudari, deinde amari. Nam ea quæ speras Tullie mea prudentia temperari, scio cui tuæ epistolæ respondeant.—Ep. li. 15; vii. 13.

Hac oblectabar specula, Dolabellam meum fore mollestis, quas libertate sua contraxerat, liberum—viii. 16.

⁶ Illud mihi occurrit, quod inter postulacionem, I. minis delacionem uxor a Dolabella discessit.—Ibid. 5.

actions against the state, in his government of Sicily, and of bribery and corruption in his suit for the consulship. This put a great difficulty upon him, and made it natural to suspect, that he secretly favoured the impeachment, where the case was his son-in-law; but, in clearing himself of it to Appius, though he dissembled a little, scrupled in disclaiming any part or knowledge of the match, yet he was very sincere in professing himself an utter stranger to the impeachment, and was in truth greatly disturbed at it. But as, from the circumstance of his succeeding to Appius in government, he was of all men the most capable of serving or hurting him at the trial; so Pompey, who took great pains to screen Appius, was extremely desirous to engage him on their side, and had thoughts of sending one of his sons to him for that purpose; but Cicero saved them that trouble, by declaring early and openly for Appius, and promising everything from the province that he possibly be of service to him, which he thought himself obliged to do the more forwardly, to prevent any suspicion of treachery to his friend on the account of his new alliance: so that Appius, instead of declining a trial, contrived to bring it on as soon as he could; and with that view, having dropped his pretensions to a triumph, moved the city, and offered himself to his judges where his accuser was prepared for him, and was acquitted without any difficulty of both the impeachments.

A little time after his trial he was chosen censor, together with Piso, Cæsar's father-in-law, the man who bore that office during the freedom of the public. Claudius's law, mentioned above, which had greatly restrained the power of these magistrates, was repealed the last year by Scipio, the consul, and their ancient authority restored to them, which was now exercised with great rigour by Appianus, who, though really a libertine, and remarkable for indulging himself in all the luxury of the age, yet by an affectation of severity, hoped to improve his character, and pass for an admirer of the ancient discipline for which many of his ancestors had been celebrated. Cælius gives a pleasant account of him to Cicero: "Do you know, says he, that the censor Appianus is doing wonders amongst the statues and pictures, the number of our debts, and the payment of debts? He takes the account for soap or nitre, and thinks to scour himself clean with it; but he is mistaken—for he is labouring to wash out his stains, and clean his very veins and bowels, and lets us see the more intimately: run away to us by all the Gods, to laugh at these things. Drusus sits upon adultery, by the Scantinian law, Ap-Pompeius dicitur valde pro Appio laborare, ut etiam alterutrum de filiis ad te mitteretur.—Ep. Fam. viii. 14.

Hæc negotium autem et temeritatem nostri Dolæ deprecatores meo pro filius periculo præbeo.—Ibid.

Hæc mihi affinitate nunciata, non majore equitatis studio, sed acris, apertius, significantius dignitatem meam defendere—nam ut vetus nostra similitudo antea nuntiabat me, ut eavere non cui suspensionem fidei recompende gratie darem: sic affinitas novam curam affert me.—Ibid. lib. 12.

o Dio, p. 147.

o Peto Appium censorem hic ostenta facere? de signis et hæc de agri modo, et ære alieno acerrime agere? per-pius on statues and pictures." But this vain and unseasonable attempt at reformation, instead of doing any good, served only to alienate people from Pompey's cause, with whom Appius was strictly allied; whilst his colleague Piso, who foresaw that effect, chose to sit still and suffer him to disgrace the knights and senators at pleasure, which he did with great freedom, and among others turned Sallust, the historian, out of the senate, and was hardly restrained from putting the same affront upon Curio, which added still more friends and strength to Cæsar.

As to the public news of the year, the grand affair that engaged all people's thoughts, was the expectation of a breach between Cæsar and Pompey, which seemed now unavoidable, and in which all men were beginning to take part, and ranging themselves on the one side or the other. On Pompey's there was a great majority of the senate and the magistrates, with the better sort of all ranks: on Cæsar's all the criminal and obnoxious, all who had suffered punishment, or deserved it; the greatest part of the youth and the city mob; some of the popular tribunes, and all who were oppressed with debts; who had a leader fit for their purpose, daring, and well provided, and wanting nothing but a cause. This is Cicero's account; and Cælius's is much the same. "I see (says he) that Pompey will have the senate, and all who judge of things; Cæsar, all who live in fear and uneasiness; but there is no comparison between their armies." Cæsar had put an end to the Gallic war, and reduced the whole province to the Roman yoke; but though his commission was near expiring, he seemed to have no thoughts of giving it up, and returning to the condition of a private subject; he pretended that he could not possibly be safe, if he parted with his army, especially while Pompey held the province of Spain, prolonged to him for five years. The senate, in the meanwhile, in order to make him easy, had consented to let him take the consulship, without coming to sue for it in person; but when that did not satisfy him, the consul M. Marcellus, one of his fiercest enemies, moved them to abrogate his command directly, and appoint him a successor; and since the war was at an end, to oblige him to disband his troops, and to come likewise in person to sue for the consulship, nor to allow the freedom of the city to his colonies beyond the Po: this related particularly to a favourite colony which Cæsar, when consul, had settled at Comum, at the foot of suasum est ei, censuram lomentum aut nitrum esse. Errare mihi videtur. Nam sordes eluere vel, venas sibi omnes et viscera aperit. Curre per deos, et quam primum hæc risum veni. Legis Scantinie iudicium apud Drusum fieri. Appium de tabulis et signis agere.—Ep. Fam. viii. 14.

o Dio, xl. p. 160.

Hoc video, cum homine audacissimo, paratissimoque negotium esse: omnes damnatos, omnes ignominia affectos, omnes damnatione ignominiaque dignos illic facere. Omnem fere juventutem, omnem illam urbanam ac perditam plebem; tribunos valentes—omnes, qui ære alieno premantur—causam solam illa causa non habet, cæteris robur abundat.—Ad Att. vii. 3.

In hac discordia video, Cn. Pompeium senatum, quique res judicant, secum habiturum: ad Cæsarem omnes, qui cum timore aut mala spe vivant ad Cæsarem accessuros. Exercitum conferendum non esse.—Ep. Fam. viii. 14.

o Cæsari autem persuasum est, se salvum esse non posse, si ab exercitu recesserit. Fert illam tamen conditionem, ut ambo exercitus tradant.—Ibid.

the Alps, with the freedom of the city granted to it by the Vatinius law². All the other colonies on that side of the Po had before obtained from Pompey's father the rights of Latium, that is, the freedom of Rome to those who had borne an annual magistracy in them: but M. Marcellus, out of a singular enmity to Cæsar, would allow no such right to his colony of Comum; and having caught a certain Comensian magistrate who was acting the citizen at Rome, he ordered him to be seized, and publicly whipped, an indignity from which all citizens were exempted by law; bidding the man go and show those marks of his citizenship to Cæsar³. Cicero condemns this act as violent and unjust: "Marcellus (says he) behaved shamefully in the case of the Comensian; for if the man had never been a magistrate, he was yet of a colony beyond the Po, so that Pompey will not be less shocked at it than Cæsar himself."

The other consul, Serv. Sulpicius, was of a more candid and moderate temper; and being unwilling to give such a handle for a civil war, opposed and overruled the motions of his colleague by the help of some of the tribunes: nor was Pompey himself disposed to proceed so violently, or to break with Cæsar on that foot, but thought it more plausible to let his term run out, and his command expire of itself, and so throw upon him the odium of turning his arms against his country, if he should resolve to act against the senate and the laws. This counsel prevailed, after many warm contestations, in which the summer was chiefly spent, and a decree was offered on the last of September, "That the consuls elect, L. Paullus and C. Marcellus, should move the senate on the first of March, to settle the consular provinces; and if any magistrate should interpose to hinder the effect of their decrees, that he should be deemed an enemy to the republic; and if any one actually interposed, that this vote and resolution should be entered into the journals, to be considered some other time by the senate, and laid also before the people." But four of the tribunes gave their joint negative to this decree, C. Cælius, L. Vinicius, P. Cornelius, and C. Vibius Pansa. In the course of these debates, Pompey, who affected great moderation in whatever he said of Cæsar, was teased and urged on all sides to make an explicit declaration of his sentiments. When he called it unjust to determine anything about Cæsar's government before the first of March, the term prescribed to it by law, being asked, "What, if any one should then put a negative upon them?" he said, "there was no difference whether Cæsar refused to obey the decrees of the senate, or provided men to obstruct them." "What, (says another) if he should insist on being consul, and holding his province too?" "What," replied Pompey, "if my son should take a stick and cudgel me?"—"intimating the one to be as incredible and as impious also as the other."

² Sueton. J. Cæsa. 28; Strabo, v. 396.

³ Appian. ii. 443.

⁴ Marcellus fœde de Comensi: et si ille magistratum non gesserit, erat tamen transpadanus. Ita mihi videtur non minus stomachi nostro, ac Cæsari movisse.—Ad Att. v. 11.

⁵ Cum interrogaretur, si qui tum intercederent: dixit hoc nihil interesse, utrum C. Cæsar senatui dicto audiens futurus non esset, an pararet, qui senatum decernere non pateretur. Quid si, inquit alius, et consul esse et exercitum habere vellet? at ille quam clementer. Quid si filius meus fustem mihi impingere vellet?—Ep. Fam. viii. 8.

Cicero's friend Cælius obtained the ædile summer from his competitor Hirrus, the s had opposed Cicero in the augurate, a disappointment gave occasion to many between them in their letters^b. In this it being customary to procure wild beasts from different parts of the empire entertainment of the city, Cælius begged to supply him with panthers from Cilicia employ the Cybarites, a people of his famed for hunting, to catch them: "for it a reflection upon you (says he) when Curi panthers from that country, not to let many more." He recommends to him at time M. Feridius, a Roman knight, who estate in Cilicia, charged with some se quit-rent to the neighbouring cities, begs of him to get discharged, so as to lands free^c. He seems also to have de cero's consent to his levying certain cent upon the cities of his province, toward ing the expense of his shows at Rome rogative which the ædiles always claim sometimes practised; though it was denie by some governors, and particularly by Cicero in Asia, upon the advice of his t in answer to all which Cicero replied, was sorry to find that his actions were so the dark, that it was not yet known at R not a farthing had been exacted in his except for the payment of just debts; t neither fit for him to extort money, nor f to take it, if it were designed for him admonished him, who had undertaken t accusing others, to live himself with mo —and as to panthers, that it was not c with his character to impose the charge o them upon the poor people^d. But i would not break his rules for the s friend, yet he took care to provide pa him at his own expense; and says plea it, that the beasts made a sad complain him, and resolved to quit the country, snares were laid in his province for any o ture but themselves^e.

Curio likewise obtained the tribunate mer, which he sought with no other many imagined, than for the opportunit tifying Cæsar, against whom he had hit with great fierceness^f. But Cicero, who the temper and views of them both, h ^b Ep. Fam. ii. 9, 10; it. viii. 2, 3, 9.

^c Fere literis omnibus tibi de pantheris scribi tibi erit, Patsichum Curioni decem pantheras non multis partibus plures, &c.—Ep. Fam. vii. M. Feridius—tibi commendo. Agros, quos habent civitates, vult tuo beneficio, quod ti honestum factu est, immunes esse.—Ibid.

^d Ad Quint. l. 1, a. 9.

^e Rescripti, me moleste ferre, si ego in temet nec audiretur Rome, nullum in mea provinci nisi in es alienum erogari; douique meo nil pecuniam licere, nec illi capere; monique eu Att. vi. 1.

^f De pantheris, per eos, qui venari solent, dato meo diligenter: sed mira paucitas est: sunt, valde sunt queri, quod nihil cuiquam in mea provincia nisi tibi fiat.—Ep. Fam. ii. 11.

^g Sed ut spero et volo, et ut se fert ipse Cur senatum malet. Totus ut nunc est, hoc sca viii. 4.

would be to make up matters between them, took occasion to write a congratulatory letter to him upon this advancement, in which he exhorts him, with great gravity, "to consider into what a dangerous crisis his tribunate had fallen, not by chance but his own choice; what violence of the times, what variety of dangers hung over the republic, how uncertain the events of things were, how changeable men's minds, how much treachery and falsehood in human life—he begs of him, therefore, to beware of entering into any new counsels, but to persevere and defend what he himself thought right, and not suffer himself to be drawn away by the advice of others"—referring, without doubt, to Antony, the chief companion and corrupter of his youth: in the conclusion, he conjures him to employ his present power to hinder his promised trouble from being prolonged by any new act of the senate."¹—Cicero's suspicions were soon confirmed by letters from Rome, whence Cælius, at his word of Curio's changing sides, and denigrating himself for Cæsar; in answer to which, Cælius says, "the last page of your letter in your hand really touched me. What do you say? Curio turned advocate for Cæsar? who would have thought it besides myself? for let me die if I did not expect it! Good gods, how much do I long to be laughing with you at Rome!"

The new consuls being Cicero's particular friends, wrote congratulatory letters to them both upon their election, in which he begged the concurrence of their authority, to the decree of his supplication; and what he had more at heart, that they would not suffer any prolongation of his annual term; in which they readily obliged him, and received his thanks also by letter for that favour.² It was expected that some decisive would now be done in relation to the two Gauls, and the appointment of a successor to Cæsar, since both the consuls were supposed to be his enemies: but all attempts of that kind were still frustrated by the intrigues of Cæsar; when C. Marcellus began to renew the same action which his kinsman had made the year before, he was obstructed by his colleague Paullus, and the tribune Curio, whom Cæsar had privately bribed by immense bribes, to suffer nothing prejudicial to his interest to pass during their magistracy. He is said to have given Paullus about one hundred thousand pounds, and to Curio about more.³ The first wanted it to defray the charges of those splendid buildings which he had undertaken to raise at his own cost; the second to lighten himself of the load of his debts, which amounted to about half a million⁴; for he had lost his great fortunes so effectually in a few years, that he had no other revenue left, as Pliny says, but in the hopes of a civil war⁵. These facts are mentioned by all the Roman writers;

Momentanque fuit mutatus Curio rerum, Gallorum ceptus spoliis et Cæsaris auro—

Lucan. iv. 818.

Caught by the spoils of Gaul, and Cæsar's gold, Curio turn'd traitor, and his country sold.

and Servius applies that passage of Virgil, Vendidit hic auro patriam, to the case of Curio's selling Rome to Cæsar.

Cicero in the mean time was expecting with impatience the expiration of his annual term; but before he could quit the province he was obliged to see the account of all the money which had passed through his own or his officers' hands, stated and balanced; and three fair copies provided, two to be deposited in two of the principal cities of his jurisdiction, and a third in the treasury at Rome. That his whole administration, therefore, might be of a piece, he was very exact and punctual in acquitting himself of this duty, and would not indulge his officers in the use of any public money beyond the legal time or above the sum prescribed by law, as appears from his letters to some of them who desired it⁶. Out of the annual revenue which was decreed to him for the use of the province, he remitted to the treasury all that he had not expended, to the amount of above eight hundred thousand pounds. "This," says he, "makes my whole company groan; they imagined that it should have been divided among themselves, as if I ought to have been a better manager for the treasures of Phrygia and Cilicia than for our own. But they did not move me; for my own honour weighed with me the most; yet I have not been wanting to do every thing in my power that is honourable and generous to them all⁷."

His last concern was, to what hand he should commit the government of his province upon his leaving it, since there was no successor appointed by the senate on account of the heats among them about the case of Cæsar, which disturbed all their debates, and interrupted all other business. He had no opinion of his quaestor, C. Cælius, a young man of noble birth, but of no great virtue or prudence, and was afraid, after his glorious administration, that by placing so great a trust in one of his character, he should expose himself to some censure. But he had nobody about him of superior rank who was willing to accept it, and did not care to force it upon his brother, lest that might give a handle to suspect him of some interest or partiality in the choice⁸. He dropped the province, therefore,

¹ Laodiceæ me prædes accepturum arbitror omnis publicæ pecuniæ—nilhil est, quod in isto genere culquam possum commodare, &c.—Ep. Fam. ii. 17.

² Illud quidem certe factum est, quod lex jubebat, ut apud duas civitates, Laodiceensem, et Apameensem, quæ nobis maxime videbantur—rationes confectas et consolidatas deponeremus, &c.—Ibid. v. 20.

³ Cum enim rectum et gloriosum putarem ex annuo sumptu, qui mihi decretus esset. Me Cælio questori relinquere annum, referre in ærarium ad H. S. c. 10 ingemuit nostra cohors, omne illud putans distribui sibi oportere: ut ego amicior invenire Phrygiæ aut Ciliciæ avaritiis, quam nostro. Sed me non moverunt; nam mea laus apud me plurimum valuit. Nec tamen quoquam honorifice in quemquam fieri potuit, quod prætermissem.—Ad Att. vii. 1.

⁴ Ego de provincia decedens questorem Cælium præposui provincie. Puerum? iniques. At questorem; at nobillem adolescentem; at omnium fere exemplum. Neque erat superiore honore usus, quem præficerem. Pontinius multo ante discesserat. A Quinto fratre imperatari non poterat:

¹ Ep. Fam. ii. 7.

² Excursus pagella pupugit me tuo chirographo. Quid? Curum tunc defendit Curio? quis hoc putaret pro me? nam ita vivam, putavi.—Ibid. 13.

³ Ep. Fam. xv. 7, 10, 11, 12, 13.

⁴ Quintus. J. Cæc. 23.

⁵ Applan. ii. p. 443.

⁶ In thesauris auctoritatum æris alieni.—Val. Max. ix. 1.

⁷ Quod nihil in censu habuerit, præter discordiam principum.—Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 18.

after some deliberation, into Cælius's hands, and set forward immediately upon his journey towards Italy.

But before he quitted Asia he begged of Atticus by letter to send him a particular detail of all the news of the city. "There are odious reports," says he, "about Curio and Paullus; not that I see any danger while Pompey stands, or I may say, indeed, while he sits, if he has but his health; but in truth I am sorry for my friends Curio and Paullus. If you are now, therefore, at Rome, or as soon as you come thither, I would have you send me a plan of the whole republic, which may meet me on the road, that I may form myself upon it, and resolve what temper to assume on my coming to the city; for it is some advantage not to come thither a mere stranger." We see what a confidence he placed in Pompey, on whom indeed their whole prospect either of peace with Cæsar or of success against him depended: as to the intimation about his health, it is expressed more strongly in another letter: "All our hopes (says he) hang upon the life of one man, who is attacked every year by a dangerous fit of sickness." His constitution seems to have been peculiarly subject to fevers, the frequent returns of which, in the present situation of affairs, gave great apprehension to all his party. In one of those fevers which threatened his life for many days successively, all the towns of Italy put up public prayers for his safety; an honour which had never before been paid to any man while Rome was free.

Upon taking leave of Cilicia, Cicero paid a visit to Rhodes, for the sake (he says) of the children.

His design was to give them a view of that flourishing isle, and a little exercise, perhaps, in that celebrated school of eloquence where he himself had studied with so much success under Molo. Here he received the news of Hortensius's death, which greatly affected him, by recalling to his mind the many glorious struggles that they had sustained together at the bar, in their competition for the prize of eloquence. Hortensius reigned absolute in the forum when Cicero first entered it; and as his superior fame was the chief spur to Cicero's industry, so the shining specimen which Cicero soon gave of himself made Hortensius likewise the brighter for it, by obliging him to exert all the force of his genius to maintain his ground against his young rival. They passed a great part of their lives in a kind of equal contest and emulation of each other's merit; but Hortensius, by the supequem tamen si reliquiessem, dicerent inquit, non me plane post annum, ut senatus voluisset, de provincia decessissem, quoniam alterum me reliquiessem.—Ep. Fam. ii. 15; Ad Att. vi. 5, 6.

^a Illic odiosæ afferebantur de Curione, de Paulo: non quo ullum periculum videam stante Pompeio, vel etiam sedente, valeat modo. Sed mehercule Curionis et Paulli meorum familiarum vires doleo. Formam igitur mihi totius reipublicæ: si jam es Romæ, aut cum eris, velim mittas, quæ mihi obviam veniat. Ex qua me fingere possum, &c.—Ad Att. vi. 3.

^b In unitis hominis, quotannis, periculosos egrotantia, anima, positas omnes nostras spes habemus.—Ibid. viii. 2.

^c Quo quidem tempore universa Italia vota pro salute ejus, primo omnium civium, suscepit.—Vell. Pat. ii. 48; Dio, p. 155.

^d Rhodum volo puerorum causa.—Ad Att. vi. 7.

^e Cum e Cilicia decedens Rhodum venissem, et eo mihi de Q. Hortensii morte esset allatum; opinione omnium majorem animo cepi dolorem.—Brut. init.

riority of his years, having first passed through usual gradation of public honours, and satiated ambition by obtaining the highest, began somewhat of his old contention, and give the charms of ease and luxury, to which he strongly inclined him^a, till he was forced at the general voice of the city to yield the honour to Cicero, who never lost sight of the point of glory, nor was ever diverted by any notion of pleasure from his steady course arduous pursuit of virtue. Hortensius pursued several orations, which were extant long after his death; and it were much to be wished that had remained to this day, to enable us to judgment of the different talents of these two men; but they are said to have owed a great part of their credit to the advantage of his which yet was thought to have more of what was necessary to an orator, so that his orations were not admired so much by the Romans as they had been by the hearers^b; while Cicero valued productions made all others of less sought for, and consequently the less preserved. Hortensius, however, was allowed by the ancients, and by Cicero himself, to have possessed every accomplishment which adorn an orator: elegance of style, art of elocution, fertility of invention, sweetness of elocution, gracefulness of action^c. These two rivals, however, always with great civility and towards each other, and were usually in the way of thinking and acting in the affairs of the republic, till Cicero, in the case of his covering the plain marks of a lurking envy and delity in Hortensius; yet his resentment him no farther than to some free complaint to their common friend Atticus, who was his business to mitigate this disgust, and to prevent proceeding to an open breach, so that being naturally placable, lived again with him after his return, on the same easy terms as and lamented his death at this time with tenderness, not only as the private loss of but a public misfortune to his country, deprived of the service and authority which he perceived a statesman at so critical a time^d.

From Rhodes he passed on to Ephesus where he set sail on the first of October, and his tedious passage landed at Athens, on the

^a Nam is post consulatum—summum illud diem remisit, quo a puero fuerat incensus: omnium rerum abundantia voluit beatius, ut ipse remissius certe viveret.—Brut. p. 443.

^b Motus et gestus etiam plus artis habebat, oratori satis.—Brut. 425.

^c Dicoque melius quam scripsit Hortensius.—261.

^d Ejus scripta tantum intra famam sunt, quid id oratorum—existimatus est, novissime quoad videtur; ut appareat placuisse aliquid ex dioc legentes non invenimus.—Ad Quint. xi. 3.

^e Erat in verborum splendore elegans, concipiens, facultate copiosus: nec prætermittenda quam, quod erat in causa—vox canora et sua 425.

^f Nam et amicos amisso cum consuetudine juvenum multorum officiorum conjunctione meo privato—agebat etiam molestiam, quod magna sapientium bonorumque penuria, vir egregius, conjunxerat necum consiliorum omnium societate: et civibus tempore extinctus.—Brut. init.

neath⁴. Here he lodged again in his old quarters, in the house of his friend Aristus. His predecessor, Appian, who passed also through Athens on his return, had ordered a new portico or vestibule to be built at his cost to the temple of the Eleusinian Arctia; which suggested a thought likewise to Cicero of adding some ornament of the same kind to the Academy, as a public monument of his name, as well as of his affection for the place: for he noted, he says, those false inscriptions of other people's statues⁵ with which the Greeks used to litter their new masters, by effacing the old titles and inscribing them anew to the great men of Rome. He acquainted Atticus with his design, and desired his opinion upon it: but in all probability it was never executed, since his stay at Athens was now very short, and his thoughts fully bent on Italy: for as all his letters continued to him the certainty of a war, in which he must necessarily bear a part, so he was impatient to be at home, that he might have the clearer view of the state of affairs, and take his measures with greater deliberation⁶. Yet he was not still without hopes of peace, and that he should be able to make up the quarrel between the chiefs: for he was, of all men, the best qualified to effect it, on account not only of his authority, but of his intimate friendship with them both, who severally did great court to him at this time, and reckoned upon him as their own, and wrote to him with a confidence of his being a determined friend⁷.

In his voyage from Athens towards Italy, Tiro, one of his slaves, whom he soon after made free, happened to fall sick, and was left behind at Patrae in the care of friends and a physician. The mention of such an accident will seem trifling to those who are not acquainted with the character and excellent qualities of Tiro, and how much we are indebted to him for preserving and transmitting to posterity the precious collection of Cicero's letters, of which a great part still remain, and one entire book of them written to Tiro himself, several of which relate to the subject of this very passage. Tiro was trained up in Cicero's family among the rest of his young slaves, in every kind of useful and polite learning, and being a youth of singular parts and industry, soon became an eminent scholar, and extremely serviceable to his master in all his affairs both civil and domestic. "As for Tiro," says he to Atticus, "I see you have a concern for him: though he is wonderfully useful to me when he is well, in every kind both of my business and studies, yet I wish his health more for his own humanity and modesty, than for any service which I reap from him⁸." But his letter to Tiro himself will best show what an affectionate master he was: for, from the time of leaving him, he never failed writing to him by every messenger or ship which passed that way, though it were twice or thrice a day, and often sent one of his servants express to bring an account of his health: the first of these letters will give us a notion of the rest.

M. T. Cicero to Tiro.

"I thought that I should have been able to bear the want of you more easily, but in truth I cannot bear it; and though it is of great importance to my expected honour to be at Rome as soon as possible, yet I seem to have committed a sin when I left you. But since you were utterly against proceeding in the voyage till your health was confirmed, I approved your resolution; nor do I now think otherwise, if you continue in the same mind. But after you have begun to take meat again, if you think that you shall be able to overtake me, that is left to your consideration. I have sent Mario to you with instructions either to come with you to me as soon as you can, or if you should stay longer, to return instantly without you. Assure yourself, however, of this, that, as far as it can be convenient to your health, I wish nothing more than to have you with me; but if it be necessary for the perfecting your recovery to stay a while longer at Patrae, that I wish nothing more than to have you well. If you sail immediately, you will overtake me at Leucas; but if you stay to establish your health, take care to have good company, good weather, and a good vessel. Observe this one thing, my Tiro, if you love me, that neither Mario's coming, nor this letter hurry you. By doing what is most conducive to your health, you will do what is most agreeable to me: weigh all these things by your own discretion. I want you; yet so as to love you; my love makes me wish to see you well; my want of you to see you as soon as possible: the first is the better; take care, therefore, above all things, to get well again: of all your innumerable services to me, that will be the most acceptable.—The third of November¹."

By the honour that he mentions in the letter, he means the honour of a triumph, which his friends encouraged him to demand for his success at Amanus and Pindenissum: in writing upon it to Atticus, he says, "consider what you would advise me with regard to a triumph to which my friends invite me: for my part, if Bibulus, who, while there was a Parthian in Syria, never set a foot out of the gates of Antioch any more than he did upon a certain occasion out of his own house, had not solicited a triumph, I should have been quiet: but now it is a shame to sit still²." Again, "as to a triumph, I had no thoughts of it before Bibulus's most impudent letters, by which he obtained an

¹ De Tirone video tibi curæ esse. Quem quidem ego, et si mirabiles utilitates mihi præbet, cum valet, in omni genere vel negotiorum vel studiorum meorum, tamen propter humanitatem et modestiam malo saluum, quam propter usum meum.—Ad Att. vii. 5.

² Ep. Fam. xvi. 1.

³ Ad Att. vi. 8.

⁴ Phil. II. Oct. Athenas venimus, cum sane adversis rebus et amicis.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 5.

⁵ Audio Appianum σπερὶ ἑλαιοῦ, Eleusine facere. Num laquei furoris, et nos quoque Academicæ fecerimus?—quidem valde ipse Athenas amo. Volo esse aliquod munusculum. Odi falsas inscriptiones alienarum statuarum. Sed et tibi placebit.—Ad Att. vi. 1.

⁶ Copiosi ex multorum amicorum literis—ad arma rem spectare. Ut mihi cum venero, distimulare non liceat, sed sentiam. Sed quam subeunda fortuna est, eo citius solutus operam ut veniamus, quo facilius de tota re deliberemus.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 5.

⁷ Sive enim ad concordiam res adduci potest, sive ad bellum victoriam, utriusque rei me aut adiutorem esse velle, aut certe non expertum.—Ad Att. vii. 3.

⁸ Ipsum tamen Pompeium separatim ad concordiam invitare.—Ibid.

Ne autem sterque numerat suum. Nisi forte stimulat ipse. Nam Pompeius non dubitat (vere enim iudicat) ea, quæ de republica nunc sentiat, mihi valde probari. Utriusque enim accepti literas ejusmodi—ut neuter quemquam viciis pluri facere quam me videretur.—Ibid. vii. 1.

honourable supplication. If he had really done all that he has written, I should rejoice at it and wish well to his suit: but for him, who never stirred beyond the walls while there was an enemy on this side the Euphrates, to have such an honour decreed; and for me, whose army inspired all their hopes and spirits into his, not to obtain the same, will be a disgrace to us; I say to us, joining you to myself: wherefore I am determined to push at all, and hope to obtain all!'

After the contemptible account, which Cicero gives of Bibulus's conduct in Syria, it must appear strange to see him honoured with a supplication, and aspiring even to a triumph: but this was not for anything that he himself had done, but for what his lieutenant Cassius had performed in his absence against the Parthians; the success of the lieutenants being ascribed always to the auspices of the general, who reaped the reward and glory of it: and as the Parthians were the most dangerous enemies of the republic, and the more particularly dreaded at this time for their late defeat of Crassus, so any advantage gained against them was sure to be well received at Rome, and repaid with all the honours that could reasonably be demanded.

Whenever any proconsul returned from his province with pretensions to a triumph, his fasces, or ensigns of magistracy, were wreathed with laurel. With this equipage Cicero landed at Brundisium on the twenty-fifth of November, where his wife, Terentia, arrived at the same moment to meet him, so that their first salutation was in the great square of the city. From Brundisium he marched forward by slow stages towards Rome, making it his business on the road to confer with all his friends of both parties, who came out to salute him, and to learn their sentiments on the present state of affairs; from which he soon perceived what of all things he most dreaded, a universal disposition to war. But as he foresaw the consequences of it more coolly and clearly than any of them, so his first resolution was to apply all his endeavours and authority to the mediation of a peace. He had not yet declared for either side, not that he was irresolute which of them to choose, for he was determined within himself to follow Pompey; but the difficulty was, how to act in the mean time towards Cæsar, so as to avoid taking part in the previous decrees, which were prepared against him for abrogating his command, and obliging him to disband his forces on pain of being declared an enemy: here he wished to stand neuter awhile, that he might act the mediator with the better grace and effect^m.

In this disposition he had an interview with

¹ De triumpho, nulla me cupiditas unquam tenuit ante Bibuli impudentissimas litteras, quas amplissima supplicatio consecuta est. A quo si ea gesta sunt, quæ scripsit, gauderem et honori faverem. Nunc illum, qui pedem porta, quoad hostis hic Euphratem fuit, non extulerit, honore augeri, me, in cuius exercitu spem illius exercitus habuit, idem non asequi, dedecus est nostrum; nostrum, inquam, to conjungens. Itaque omnia experiar, et ut spero, asequar.—Ad Att. vii. 2.

^m Brundisium venimus vii. Kal. Dec.—Terentia vero, quæ quidem eodem tempore ad portam Brundisiam venit, quo ego in portum, mihi quæ obvia in foro fuit.—Ibid.

Mihi σκάφος unum erit, quod a Pompeio gubernabitur.—die M. Tulli σύντομα. Cn. Pompeio assentio.—Ibid. 3.

Nunc incido in discrimen ipsum,—dabant operam, ut eliciant sententiam meam—tu autem de nostro statu cogi-

Pompey on the 10th of December, of which he gives the following account:—"We were there," says he, "about two hours. He seemed to be extremely pleased at my return; he asked me to demand a triumph; promised to do so in it; advised me not to appear in the senate. I had obtained it, lest I should disgust any of the tribunes by declaring my mind: in a word, could be more obliging than his whole discourse on this subject. But as to public affairs, he put such a strain as if a war was inevitable, giving the least hopes of an accommodation. He said, that he had long perceived Cæsar to be hated from him, but had received a new instance of it; for that Hirtius came from the east a few days before, and did not come to see him when Balbus promised to bring Scipio on the next morning before him. He said, that Hirtius was gone back again to Cæsar in the belief that he takes for a clear proof of Cæsar's intention to break with him. In short, I have no other fort but in imagining that he, to whom all our enemies have voted a second consulship, fortune given the greatest power, will be so mad as to put all this to hazard: yet if I were to rush on, I see many more things to be apprehended than I dare venture to commit to you at present. I propose to be at Rome on the 10th of January."

There is one little circumstance first touched in Cicero's letters, which gave him particular uneasiness in his present situation, owing a sum of money to Cæsar, which he might draw some reproach upon him, thought it dishonourable and indecent (but he was a debtor to one against whom we were in public affairs: yet to pay it at that time would deprive him of a part of the money which he had reserved for his triumph^o. He desired, however, very earnestly to see it paid, and was done without doubt accordingly, since he made no further mention of it: it does not appear nor is it easy to guess, for what occasion he was contracted, unless it was to supply the ordinary expense of his buildings after his return from exile, when he complained of being particularly want of money from that general d of his fortunes.

Pompey, finding Cicero wholly bent on being contrived to have a second conference with him before he reached the city, in hopes to allay and beat him off from that vain project of accommodation, which might help to cool the ardour of his friends in the senate: he overtook him first, at Lavernum, and came on with him to Formiæ, where they spent a whole after close conversation. Pompey strongly disapproved all thoughts of a pacification, declaring there could be none but what was treacherous and dangerous; and that if Cæsar should disarm and take the consulship, he would t tabis: primum quo artificio tueamur bene Cæsaris.—Ad Att. vii. 1.

^o Ibid. vii. 4.

^o Illud tamen non desinam, dum addeam to Cæsaris nomine rogare, ut confectum relinquamus.

Mihi autem molestissimum est, quod solvendi triumphum, et instrumentum triumphum edum. Est enim ἀποστροφή, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀποστροφῆς λέγειν esse.—Ibid. vii. 8.

republic into confusion : but he was of opinion, that when he understood their preparations against him, he would drop the consulship and hold fast his army; but if he was mad enough to come forward and act offensively, he held him in utter contempt from a confidence in his own troops and those of the republic. They had got with them the copy of a speech which Antony, one of the new tribunes, made to the people four days before : it was a perpetual invective on Pompey's conduct from his first appearance in public, with great complaints against the violent and arbitrary condemnation of citizens and the terror of his arms. After reading it over together, "What think you (says Pompey) would Caesar himself do if in possession of the republic, when this paltry, beggarly fellow, his questor, dares to talk at this rate? on the whole, Pompey seemed not only not to desire, but even to dread a peace?"

Cicero, however, would not still be driven from the hopes and pursuit of an accommodation; the more he observed the disposition of both parties, the more he perceived the necessity of it: the honest, as they were called, were disunited among themselves; many of them dissatisfied with Pompey; all fierce and violent; and denouncing nothing but ruin to their adversaries; he clearly foresaw what he declared without scruple to his friends, "that which side soever got the better, the war must necessarily end in a tyranny; the only difference was, that if their enemies conquered they should be proscribed, if their friends, be slaves." Although he had an abhorrence therefore of Caesar's name, yet his advice was to grant him his own terms, rather than try the experiment of arms, "and prefer the most unjust conditions to the justest war; since, after they had been arming him against themselves for ten years past, it was too late to think of fighting, when they had made him too strong for them."

This was the sum of his thoughts and counsels when he arrived at Rome on the 4th of January; where he found the two new consuls entirely devoted to Pompey's interests. On his approach towards the city great multitudes came out to meet him with all possible demonstrations of honour: his last stage was from Pompey's villa near Alba, because his own at Tusculum lay out of the great road, and was not commodious for a public entry: on his arrival (as he says) he fell into the very flame of civil discord, and found the war in effect proclaimed; for the senate, at Cæpio's motion, had just voted a decree, "that Cæsar should dismiss his army by a certain day, or be declared an enemy; and when M. Antony and Q. Cassius, two of the tribunes, opposed their negative to it," as they had done to every decree proposed against Cæsar, and could not be persuaded by the entreaties of their friends to give way to the authority of the senate, they proceeded to that vote which was the last resort in cases of extremity, "that the consuls, prætors, tribunes, and all who were about the city with proconsular power, should take care that the republic received no detriment." As this was supposed to arm the magistrates with an absolute power to treat all men as they pleased whom they judged to be enemies, so the two tribunes, together with Curio, immediately withdrew themselves upon it, and fled in disguise to Cæsar's camp, on pretence of danger and violence to their persons, though none was yet offered or designed to them*.

M. Antony, who now began to make a figure in the affairs of Rome, was of an ancient and noble extraction; the grandson of that celebrated statesman and orator who lost his life in the massacres of Marius and Cinna: his father, as it is already related, had been honoured with one of the most important commissions of the republic; but after an inglorious discharge of it, died with the character of a corrupt, oppressive, and rapacious commander. The son, trained in the discipline of such a parent, whom he lost when he was very young, launched out at once into all the excess of riot and debauchery, and wasted his whole patrimony before he had put on the manly gown; showing himself to be the genuine son of that father who was born, as Sallust says, to squander money, without ever employing a thought on business till a present necessity urged him. His comely person, lively wit, insinuating address, made young Curio infinitely fond of him; so that, in spite of the commands of a severe father who had often turned Antony out of doors and forbidden him his house, he could not be prevailed with to forsake his company, but supplied him with money for his frolics and amours, till he had involved himself on his account in a debt of fifty thousand pounds. This greatly afflicted old Curio; and Cicero was called in to heal the distresses of the family, whom the son entreated, with tears in his eyes, to intercede for Antony as well as for himself, and not suffer them to be parted; but Cicero having prevailed with the father to make his son easy by discharging his debts, advised him to insist upon it as a condition, and to enforce it by his paternal power, that he should have no farther commerce with Antony†. This laid the ipseam flammam civilis discordiæ vel potius belli.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 11.

Ego in Tusculanum nihil hoc tempore. Devium est totis animis, &c.—Ad Att. vii. 5.

* Antonius quidem nosceret et Q. Cassius, nulla vi expulsi, ad Cæsarem cum Curione profecti erant; postea quam senatus consilium, prætoribus, tribunis plebis, et nobis, qui proconsules sumus, negotium dederat, ut curarem, ne quid respublica detrimenti caperet.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 11.

† Tenesne memoria prætextatum te decuisse?—nemo unquam puer emptus libidinis causam tam fuit in domini potestate, quam tu in Curionis. Quoties te pater ejus domo suo eiecit?—acime me de rebus mihi notissimis dicere? recordare tempus illud, cum pater Curio merens jacebat in lecto; filius se ad pedes meos prostratus, lacrymans te mihi commendabat, orabat, ut te contra patrem suum, si H.S. exagias peteret defenderem: tantum enim

* Ad Att. vii. 8.

† De republica quotidie magis timeo. Non enim boni, ut putant, conveniunt. Quos ego equites Romanos, quos maiores vias, qui acerrime tum cetera, tum hoc iter Pompeii vituperant. Pace opus est, ex victoria cum multis malis, cum certe tyrannus existet.—Ibid. vii. 5.

†† Et victus eris, proscribere; si vicioris, tamen servare.—Ibid. vii. 7.

Ad pacem horari non desino, quæ vel injusta utilior est, quam justissimum bellum.—Ibid. vii. 14.

Namque tantis ei vires non dedisset, quam nunc tam valenti restituit.—Ibid. vii. 3.

Nisi forte hæc illi tum arma dedimus, ut nunc cum bene pacis preparamus.—Ibid. vii. 6.

* Ego ad urbem accessi prid. non. Jan. obviam mihi sic me prædixit, ut nihil possit fieri ornatius. Sed incidi in foundation of an early aversion in Antony to Cicero, increased still by the perpetual course of Antony's life, which fortune happened to throw among Cicero's inveterate enemies: for, by the second marriage of his mother, he became son-in-law to that Lentulus who was put to death for conspiring with Catiline, by whom he was initiated into all the cabals of a traitorous faction, and infected with principles pernicious to the liberty of Rome. To revenge the death of this father, he attached himself to Clodius, and during his tribunate was one of the ministers of all his violences; yet was detected at the same time in some criminal intrigue in his family injurious to the honour of his patron^a. From this education in the city, he went abroad to learn the art of war under Gabinus, the most profligate of all generals, who gave him the command of his horse in Syria, where he signalised his courage in the restoration of king Ptolemy, and acquired the first taste of martial glory in an expedition undertaken against the laws and religion of his country^b. From Egypt, instead of coming home, where his debts would not suffer him to be easy, he went to Cæsar into Gaul, the sure refuge of all the needy, the desperate, and the audacious: and after some stay in that province, being furnished with money and credit by Cæsar, he returned to Rome to sue for the quaestorship^c. Cæsar recommended him in a pressing manner to Cicero, "entreating him to accept Antony's submission and pardon him for what was past, and to assist him in his present suit: with which Cicero readily complied," and obliged Antony so highly by it, that he declared war presently against Clodius, "whom he attacked with great fierceness in the forum, and would certainly have killed if he had not found means to hide himself under some stairs." Antony openly gave out "that he owed all this to Cicero's generosity, to whom he could never make amends for former injuries, but by the destruction of his enemy Clodius^d." Being chosen quaestor he went back immediately to Cæsar, without expecting his lot or a decree of the senate to appoint him his province: where, though he had all imaginable opportunities of acquiring money, yet by squandering as fast as he got it, he came a second time empty and beggarly to Rome, to put in for the tribunate; in which office, after the death of his friend Curio, having sold himself to be was (as Cicero says) as much the cause ensuing war as Helen was of that of Troy^e.

It is certain at least that Antony's flight the immediate pretext to it, as Cicero had said, "Cæsar," says he, "will betake himself to either from our want of preparation, or if regard be had to him at the election of consuls, especially if any tribune, obstructing the elections of the senate, or exciting the people to sedition, should happen to be censured or overruled, or expelled, or, pretending to be expelled, away to him^f." In the same letter he gives the true state of the merit of his cause: "Will he, can be more impudent? You have had government ten years, not granted to you by the senate, but extorted by violence and faction. Your term is expired, not of the law, but of your vicious will: but allow it to be a law; it is decreed that you must have a successor. You and say, have some regard to me: do you show your regard to us. Will you pretend an army longer than the people ordered, contrary to the will of the senate?" But Cæsar's strength lay not in the goodness of his cause or of his troops^g, a considerable part of which was now drawing together towards the confines of Italy, to be ready to enter into action at any time. The flight of the tribunes gave him a plausible handle to begin, and seemed to sanction his attempt. But "his real motive," says Plutarch, "was the same that animated Cyrus and Alexander before him, to disturb the peace of mankind, unquenchable thirst of empire, and the ambition of being the greatest man in the world, which was not possible till Pompey was destroyed." Laying hold therefore of the opportunity he presently passed the Rubicon, which was the boundary of his province on that side of the river, and, marching forward in a hostile manner, possessed himself without resistance of the great towns in his way—Ariminum, Pisum, Ancona, Arretium, &c.^h

In this confused and disordered state of the city, Cicero's friends were soliciting the decision of his triumph, to which the whole senate seemed their ready consent. But "the consul Lentulus to make the favour more particularly his own se pro te intercessisse: ipse autem amore ardens confirmabat, quod desiderium tui discedi ferre non posset—quo ego tempore tanta mala florentissime familie sedavi vel potius sustuli: patri persuasi, ut æs alienum filii dissolveret, &c.—[Phil. ii. 18.—] M. Antonius, perdunte pecunie gentibus, vacuusque curis, nisi instantibus.—Sallust. Hist. Fragm. i. iii.

^a Te domi P. Lentuli educatum.—[Phil. ii. 7.] Intimus erat in tribunatu Clodio—ejus omnium incendiorum fax—cujus etiam domi quiddam jam tum molitus est, &c.—Ibid. 19.

^b Inde iter Alexandriam, contra senatus auctoritatem, contra rempublicam et religionem: sed habebat duces Gabinium, &c.—Ibid.

^c Prius in ultimam Galliam ex Ægypto quam domum—venisti e Gallia ad quaesturam petendam.—Ibid.; Plut. in Anton.

^d Acceperam jam ante Cæsaris literas, ut mihi satisfieri paterer a te—postea custoditus sum a te, tu a me observatus in petitione quaesturæ, quo quidem tempore P. Clodium—in foro æs conatus occidere—ita prædicabas, te non existimare, nisi illum interfecisses, unquam nihil pro tuis in me injuriis satis esse facturum.—Phil. ii. 20.

Cum se ille fugiens in scalarum tenebras abdidiasset, &c.—Pro Mil. 15.

^e Deinde sine senatus consulto, sine sorte, sine Cæsarem occurrisset. Id enim unum in terris quæ æris alieni, nequitiæ, perditis vitæ rationibus perire ducebatur—advolsit gens ad Tribunatum. magistratu, si posset, vi tui similis esset—ut Helenia, sic iste hunc reipublicæ causam belli, &c.—21, 22.

^f Aut addita causa, si forte tribunus plebis impedirent, aut populum incitantes, notatus, aut consulto circumscriptus, aut sublevis aut expulsi dicere se expulsum ad se confugerit.—Ad Att. v. c. Ibid.; Ep. Fam. xvi. 11.

^g Alterius ducis causa melior videbatur, alter firmior. Hic omnia speciosa, illic valentia. Potens auctoritas, Cæsarem militum armavit & Vell. Pat. ii. 49.

^h Plut. in Anton.

ⁱ An ille id faciat, quod paulo ante decretum exercitum citra Rubiconem, qui finis est Gallie, ed.—Phil. vi. 3.

Itaque cum Cæsar amentia quadam rapereetur Ariminum, Pisaurum, Anconam, Arretium occupare reliquinos.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 12.

ed that it might be deferred for a while till the public affairs were better settled, giving his word that he would then be the mover of it himself." Caesar's sudden march towards Rome put an end to all farther thoughts of it, and struck the senate with such a panic, that, as if he had been nearly at the gates, they resolved presently to quit the city, and retreat towards the southern parts of Italy. All the principal senators had particular districts assigned to their care, to be provided with troops and all materials of defence against Caesar. Cicero had Capua, with the protection of the sea-coast from Formiæ; he did not accept any greater charge, for the sake of preserving his authority in the task of mediating peace; and for the same reason, when he perceived his new province wholly unprovided against Caesar, and that it was impossible to hold it without a strong garrison, he resigned his employment and chose not to act at all.

Capua had always been the common seminary place of educating gladiators for the great men of Rome, where Caesar had a famous school of men at this time, which he had long maintained for the best masters for the occasions of his public shows in the city; and as they were very numerous and well furnished with arms, there was room to apprehend that they would break out, and make some attempt in favour of their master, which might have been of dangerous consequence to the present circumstances of the republic, so that Pompey thought it necessary to take them out of their school, and distribute them among the principal inhabitants of the place, assigning two to each master of a family, by which he secured them from doing any mischief.

While the Pompeian party was under no small objection on account of Pompey's quitting the city, and retreating from the approach of Caesar, Labienus, one of the chief commanders on the Ubi tamen inter has turbas senatus frequens flagitium triumphum: sed Lentulus consul, quo majus suum munus faceret, simul atque expediret que essent comenda de republica dixit se relaturum.—Ep. Fam. vi. 11.

Ep. negotio præsum non turbulento; vult enim me Pompeius esse, quem tota hæc Campana et maritima ora abest traxerunt, ad quem delectus et summa negotii laborum.—Ad Att. vii. 11.

Ep. ubi ore maritimæ præsum a Formiis. Nullum inde negotium suscipere volui, quo plus apud illum meæ benevolentiaque ad pacem valeret.—Ep. Fam. vi. 12.

Nam certe neque tum peccavi, cum imparatam jam Pompeum, non solum ignavie delectus, sed etiam perfidie suspicionem fugiens, accipere nolui.—Ad Att. viii. 12.

Quod tibi ostenderam, cum a me Capuam rejicerem: pot fieri non vitandi oneris causa, sed quod videmus nunc illum urbem sine exercitu non posse.—Ep. Cic. ad Pomp. —Ad Att. viii. 11.

As Cicero, when proconsul of Cilicia, often mentions the dioceses that were annexed to his government, (Ep. Fam. xiii. 67.) so in this command of Capua he calls himself the episcopus of the Campanian coast: which shows, that these names, which were appropriated afterwards in the Christian church to characters and powers ecclesiastical, carried with them, in their original use, the notion of a civil authority and jurisdiction.

Gladiatores Caesaris, qui Capuæ sunt—sane commode Pompeius distribuit, binos singulis patribus familiarum. horum in ludu c fuerunt eruptionem facturi visus est.—Ad Att. vii. 14.

other side, deserted Caesar and came over to them, which added some new life to their cause, and raised an expectation that many more would follow his example. Labienus had eminently distinguished himself in the Gallic war, where, next to Caesar himself, he had borne the principal part, and by Caesar's favour had raised an immense fortune; so that he was much caressed, and carried about everywhere by Pompey, who promised himself great service from his fame and experience, and especially from his credit in Caesar's army, and the knowledge of all his councils: but his account of things, like that of all deserters, was accommodated rather to please than to serve his new friends; representing the weakness of Caesar's troops, their aversion to his present designs, the disaffection of the two Gauls, and disposition to revolt, the contrary of all which was found to be true in the experiment; and as he came to them single, without bringing with him any of those troops with which he had acquired his reputation, so his desertion had no other effect than to ruin his own fortunes, without doing any service to Pompey.

But what gave a much better prospect to all honest men was the proposal of an accommodation which came about this time from Caesar, who, while he was pushing on the war with incredible vigour, talked of nothing but peace, and endeavoured particularly to persuade Cicero "that he had no other view than to secure himself from the insults of his enemies, and yield the first rank in the state to Pompey." The conditions were, "that Pompey should go to his government of Spain, that his new levies should be dismissed, and his garrisons withdrawn, and that Caesar should deliver up his provinces, the farther Gaul to Domitius, the hither to Considius, and sue for the consulship in person, without requiring the privilege of absence." These terms were readily embraced in a grand council of the chiefs at Capua, and young L. Caesar, who brought them, was sent back with letters from Pompey, and the addition only of one preliminary article—"that Caesar, in the mean while, should recall his troops from the towns which he had seized beyond his own jurisdiction, so that the senate might return to Rome, and settle the whole affair with honour and freedom." Cicero was present at this council, of Maximam autem plagam accepit, quod is, qui summam auctoritatem in illius exercitu habebat, T. Labienus socius sceleris esse noluit: reliquit illum, et nobiscum est: multique idem facturi dicuntur.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 12.

Aliquantum animi videtur attulisse nobis Labienus.—Ad Att. vii. 13.

Labienum secum habet (Pompeius) non dubitantem de imbecillitate Caesaris copiarum: cujus adventu Cæsar noster multo animi plus habet.—Ibid. vii. 16.

Nam in Labieno parum est dignitatis.—Ibid. viii. 2.

—fortis in armis

Cæsareis Labienus erat: nunc transfuga vilis—

LUCAN. v. 345.

Balbus major ad me scribit, nihil malle Cæsarem, quam, principe Pompeio, sine metu vivere. Tu, puto, hæc credas.—Ad Att. viii. 9.

Feruntur omnino conditiones ab illo, ut Pompeius eat in Hispaniam; dilectus, qui sunt habiti, et præsidia nostra dimittantur: se ulterius Galliam Domitio, ceteriorum Considio Noniano—traditurum. Ad consulatus petitionem se venturum:—neque se jam velle, absente se, rationem sui haberi.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 12; Ad Att. vii. 14.

Accepimus conditiones; sed ita, ut removeat præsidia which he gave an account to Atticus: "I came to Capua, (says he,) yesterday, the twenty-sixth of January, where I met the consuls and many of our order: they all wished that Cæsar would stand to his conditions, and withdraw his troops. Favonius alone was against all conditions imposed by Cæsar, but was little regarded by the council: for Cato himself would now rather live a slave than fight; and declares, that if Cæsar recall his garrisons he will attend the senate when the conditions come to be settled, and not go to Sicily, where his service is more necessary, which I am afraid will be of ill consequence. There is a strange variety in our sentiments; the greatest part are of opinion, that Cæsar will not stand to his terms, and that these offers are made only to hinder our preparations: but I am apt to think that he will withdraw his troops; for he gets the better of us by being made consul, and with less iniquity than in the way which he is now pursuing, and we cannot possibly come off without some loss; for we are scandalously unprovided both with soldiers and with money, since all that which was either private in the city or public in the treasury is left a prey to him."

During the suspense of this treaty and the expectation of Cæsar's answer, Cicero began to conceive some hopes that both sides were relenting, and disposed to make up the quarrel—Cæsar, from a reflection on his rashness, and the senate on their want of preparation: but he still suspected Cæsar; and the sending a message so important by a person so insignificant as young Lucius Cæsar, looked, he says, as if he had done it by way of contempt, or with a view to disclaim it, especially when, after offering conditions, which were likely to be accepted, he would not sit still to wait an answer, but continued his march with the same diligence, and in the same hostile manner as before². His suspicions proved true; for, by letters, which came soon after from Furnius and Curio, he perceived that they made a mere jest of the embassy³.

It seems very evident that Cæsar had no real thoughts of peace, by his paying no regard to Pompey's answer, and the trifling reasons which he gave for slighting it⁴. But he had a double view in offering those conditions; for, by Pompey's rejecting them, as there was reason to expect from his known aversion to any treaty, he hoped to load him with the odium of the war; or by his embracing them, to slacken his preparations, and retard his design of leaving Italy, whilst he himself in the mean time, by following him with a celerity that amazed everybody⁵, might chance to up with him before he could embark, and decisive blow to the war, from which nothing to apprehend but its being drawn length. "I now plainly see," says Cicero, "later indeed than I could have wished, on of the assurances given me by Balbus, that at nothing else, nor has ever aimed at a from the beginning, but Pompey's life."

If we consider this famous passage Rubicon, abstractedly from the event, it s have been so hazardous and desperate that might reasonably condemn the thought of an attempt too rash for any prudent man to upon. If Cæsar's view, indeed, had been sess himself only of Italy, there could ha no difficulty in it. His army was unde the best which was then in the world; with victory, animated with zeal for the of their general, and an overmatch for an could be brought against it into the fiel this single army was all that he had to t he had no resource: the loss of one ba certain ruin to him, and yet he must ne run the risk of many before he could gain for the whole empire was armed against his province offered a fresh enemy, and a fr of action, where he was like to be expose same danger as on the plains of Pharsalia. B all, his enemies were masters of the sea, he could not transport his forces abroad, wit hazard of their being destroyed by a super or of being starved at land by the diffi conveying supplies and provisions to them pey relied chiefly on this single circumsta was persuaded, that it must necessarily d the war in his favour⁶: so that it seems s how such a superiority of advantage, in tl of so great a commander, could possibl success; and we must admire rather the than the conduct of Cæsar, for carrying through all these difficulties to the posse the empire.

Cicero seldom speaks of his attempt, kind of madness⁷, and seemed to reta hopes to the last that he would not per the same imagination made Pompey: senate so resolute to defy, when they we condition to oppose him. Cæsar on tl hand might probably imagine, that their proceeded from a vain conceit of their: which would induce them to venture a ba him in Italy, in which case he was sure c beat them: so that both sides were draw ex his locis, que occupavit, ut sine metu de his ipsis conditionibus Romæ senatus haberi possit.—Ad Att. vii. 14.

² Ad Att. vii. 15.

³ Spero in præsentia pacem nos habere. Nam et illum furoris, et hunc nostrum copiarum suppetiet.—Ibid.

Tamen vereor ut his ipsis (Cæsar) contentus sit. Nam cum ista mandata dedisset L. Cæsari, debuit esse paullo quietior, dum responsa referrentur.—Ibid. vii. 17.

Cæsarem quidem, L. Cæsare cum mandatis de pace misso, tamen aiunt acerrime loca occupare.—Ibid. 18.

L. Cæsarem vidi—ut id ipsum mihi ille videatur irridendi causas fecisse, qui tantis de rebus hunc mandata dederit, nisi forte non dedit, et hic sermone aliquo arrepto pro mandatis abusus est.—Ibid. 15.

⁴ Accepi literas tuas, Philotimi, Furnii, Curionis ad Furnium, quibus irridet L. Cæsaris legationem.—Ibid. 19.

⁵ Cæs. De Bello Civ. l. 1.

⁶ O celeritatem incredibilem!—Ad Att. vii. 21. Cicero calls him a monster of vigilance and [Ibid. vii. 9.]—for from his passage of the Rubicon he was forced to take in all the great towns on and spent seven days before Corfinium, yet in two months he marched through the whole length and came before the gates of Brundisium before could embark on the 9th of March.—Ad Att. ix.

⁷ Intelligo serius equidem quam vellem, propterea sermoneque Balbi, sed video plane nihil nihil actum ab initio, quam ut hunc occideret. ix. 5.

⁸ Existimat, (Pompeius) qui mare teneat, eorum potiri—itaque navalis apparatus ei semper alma cura fuit.—Ibid. x. 8.

⁹ Cum Cæsar amentia quadam reperetur.—xvi. 12.

perhaps than they intended, by mistaking each other's views. Caesar, I say, might well apprehend that they designed to try their strength with him in Italy; for that was the constant persuasion of the whole party, who thought it the best scheme which could be pursued. Pompey humoured him in it, and always talked big to keep up their spirits; and though he saw from the first the necessity of quitting Italy, yet he kept the secret to himself, and wrote word at the same time to Cato that he should have a firm army in a few days, with which he would march against Caesar in Picenum, so as to give them an opportunity of returning to the city⁷. The plan of the war, as it was commonly understood, was to possess themselves of the principal posts of Italy, and act chiefly on the defensive, in order to distress Caesar by their different armies, cut off his opportunities of forage, hinder his access to Rome, and hold him continually employed till the veteran army from Spain, under Pompey's lieutenants, Afranius, Petreus, and Varro, could come up to finish his overthrow⁸. This was the notion which the senate pursued of the war; they never conceived it possible that Pompey should submit to the disgrace of flying before Caesar, and giving up Italy to his enemy. In this confidence Domitius, a very considerable force, and some of the principal senators, threw himself into Corfinium, sitting town at the foot of the Apennine, on the Italian side, where he proposed to make a stand against Caesar, and stop the progress of his march; so he lost all his troops in the attempt, to the number of three legions, for want of knowing Pompey's secret. Pompey indeed, when he saw that Domitius intended, pressed him earnestly, by several letters, to come away and join with him, telling him, "That it was impossible to make any opposition to Caesar till their whole forces were joined; and that as to himself, he had with him only the two legions which were recalled from Spain, and were not to be trusted against him; and if Domitius should entangle himself in Corfinium, so as to be precluded by Caesar from a retreat, that he could not come to his relief with so weak an army, and bade him therefore not to be surprised to hear of his retiring if Caesar should choose to march towards him⁹". Yet, Domitius, disappointed with the opinion, that Italy was to be the seat of the war, and that Pompey would never suffer so good a body of troops, and so many of his best friends to be lost, would not quit the advantageous post of Corfinium, but depended still on being relieved; and when he was actually besieged, sent Pompey word, how easily Caesar might be intercepted between their two armies¹⁰.

Cicero was as much disappointed as any of the rest; he had never dreamt of their being obliged to quit Italy till, by Pompey's motions, he perceived at last his intentions, of which he speaks with great severity in several of his letters, and begs Atticus's advice upon that new face of their affairs; and to enable Atticus to give it the more clearly, he explains to him in short what occurred to his own mind on the one side and the other. "The great obligations," says he, "which I am under to Pompey, and my particular friendship with him, as well as the cause of the republic itself, seem to persuade me, that I ought to join my counsels and fortunes with his. Besides, if I stay behind, and desert that band of the best and most eminent citizens, I must fall under the power of a single person, who gives me many proofs indeed of being my friend, and whom, as you know, I had long ago taken care to make such from a suspicion of this very storm which now hangs over us; yet it should be well considered, both how far I may venture to trust him, and supposing it clear that I may trust him, whether it be consistent with the character of a firm and honest citizen to continue in that city, in which he has borne the greatest honours and performed the greatest acts, and where he is now invested with the most honourable priesthood, when it is to be attended with some danger, and perhaps with some disgrace, if Pompey should ever restore the republic. These are the difficulties on the one side—let us see what there are on the other: nothing has hitherto been done by our Pompey, either with prudence or courage; I may add also nothing but what was contrary to my advice and authority. I will omit those old stories; how he first nursed, raised, and armed this man against the republic; how he supported him in carrying his laws by violence, and without regard to the auspices; how he added the farther Gaul to his government, made himself his son-in-law, assisted as augur in the adoption of Clodius, was more zealous to restore me than to prevent my being expelled; enlarged the term of Caesar's command, served him in all his affairs in his absence—nay, in his third consulship, after he began to espouse the interests of the republic, how he insisted that the ten tribunes should jointly propose a law to dispense with his absence in suing for the consulship, which he confirmed afterwards by a law of his own, and opposed the consul Marcellus when he moved to put an end to his government on the first of March: but to omit, I say, all this, what can be more dishonourable, or show a greater want of conduct than this retreat, or rather shameful flight from the city? What conditions were not preferable to the necessity of abandoning our country? the conditions, I confess, were bad; yet

⁷ Domitius ad Pompeium—mittit, qui petant atque erant, ut sibi subveniat: Caesarem duobus exercitiis, et locorum angustias intercludi posse, frumentoque prohiberi, &c.

Cæsa. De Bello Civ. l. i.

⁷ Cæsar non impeditur, expertes sui tanti et tam multati omnes relinquebat.—Ad Att. viii. 8.

⁸ Pompeius ad me scribit, paucis diebus se firmum exercitum habiturum, spemque affert, si in Picenum agrum peruenit, nos Romanis reditu esse.—Ibid. vii. 16.

⁹ Excepit autem bello, aut tenenda sit urbs, aut ea Italia, illi commissa et reliquis copiis intercludenda.—Ibid. vii. 8.

¹⁰ Ut autem ille suis conditionibus stare noluerit, bellum incipit et.—tunc modo ut eum intercludamus, ne ad nos possit accedere: quod sperabamus fieri posse: diuina enim magnos habebamus—ex Hispanique sex legiones et magnæ auxilia, Afranio et Petreio ductibus, habet Cæsar. Videtur, si lasceret, posse opprimi, modo ut urbe salua.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 12.

¹¹ Illius autem spes Afranium cum magnis copiis advenire.—Ad Att. viii. 3.

¹² Sed discepta manu pares adveniant esse non possunt.

¹³ Quæstionem nobis commoveri, si audieris me regredi, si bene Cæsar ad me veniet,—etiam atque etiam te hortor, ut cum omni copia quam primum ad me venias.—Epist. Pomp. ad Domit. Ad Att. viii. 12.

what can be worse than this? But Pompey, you will say, will recover the republic: when, or what preparation is there for it? Is not all Picenum lost? Is not the way left open to the city? Is not all our treasure, both public and private, given up to the enemy? In a word, there is no party, no forces, no place of rendezvous, for the friends of the republic to resort to. Apulia is chosen for our retreat, the weakest and remotest part of Italy, which implies nothing but despair, and a design of flying by the opportunity of the sea," &c.^c In another letter, "There is but one thing wanting," says he, "to complete our friend's disgrace; his failing to succour Domitius: nobody doubts but that he will come to his relief; yet I am not of that mind. Will he then desert such a citizen, and the rest, whom you know to be with him? especially when he has thirty cohorts in the town: yes, unless all things deceive me, he will desert him: he is strangely frightened; means nothing but to fly; yet you, for I perceive what your opinion is, think that I ought to follow this man. For my part I easily know whom I ought to fly, not whom I ought to follow. As to that saying of mine which you extol, and think worthy to be celebrated, that I had rather be conquered with Pompey, than conquer with Cæsar, 'tis true, I still say so; but, with such a Pompey as he then was, or as I took him to be: but as for this man, who runs away before he knows from whom, or whither; who has betrayed us and ours, given up his country and is now leaving Italy; if I had rather be conquered with him, the thing is over, I am conquered," &c.^d

There was a notion in the meanwhile, that universally prevailed through Italy, of Cæsar's cruel and revengeful temper, from which horrible effects were apprehended: Cicero himself was strongly possessed with it, as appears from many of his letters, where he seems to take it for granted, that he would be a second Phalaris, not a Pisistratus; a bloody, not a gentle tyrant. This he inferred from the violence of his past life; the nature of his present enterprise; and, above all, from the character of his friends and followers; who were, generally speaking, a needy, profligate, audacious crew; prepared for every thing that was desperate^e. It was affirmed likewise with great confidence, that he had openly declared, that he was now coming to revenge the deaths of Cn. Carbo, M. Brutus, and all the other Marian chiefs, whom Pompey, when acting under Sylla, had cruelly put to death for their opposition to the Syllan cause^f. But there was no real ground for any of these suspicions: for Cæsar, who thought Tyranny (as Cicero says) the greatest of goddesses, and whose sole view it had been through life to bring his affairs to this crisis, and to make a bold push for empire, had, from the observation of past times and the fate of former tyrants, laid it down to maxim, that clemency in victory was the best means of securing the stability of it. Upon the surrender therefore of Corfinium, where he had the opportunity of giving a public specimen of himself, he showed a noble example of moderation, by generous dismissal of Domitius and all the other senators who fell into his hands; among whom Lentulus Spinther, Cicero's particular friend. This made a great turn in his favour, by easing people of the terrors which they had before conceived of him, and seemed to confirm what affected everywhere to give out, that he sought nothing by the war but the security of his person and dignity. Pompey on the other hand appeared every day more and more despicable, by flying before an enemy, whom his pride and perverseness was said to have driven to the necessity of taking arms.—"Tell me, I beg of you," says Cicero, "what can be more wretched, than for the one to be gathering applause from the worst of causes, the other giving offence in the best? the one to reckon the preserver of his enemies, the other the deserter of his friends? and in truth, though I have all the affection which I ought to have for my friend Cæsar, yet I cannot excuse his coming to the relief of such men: for if he is afraid to do it, what can be more paltry? or if, some think, he thought to make his cause more popular by their destruction, what can be more unjust?" &c.—From this first experiment Cæsar's clemency, Cicero took occasion to send him a letter of compliment, and to thank him particularly for his generous treatment of Lentulus, who, when consul, had been the chief author of restoration; to which Cæsar returned the following answer.

Cæsar Emperor to Cicero Emperor.

"You judge rightly of me, for I am thoroughly known to you, that nothing is farther removed from me than cruelty; and as I have a great pleasure from the thing itself, so I rejoice and triumph to find my act approved by you: nor does it stir me, that those who were dismissed by me are said to be gone away to renew the war against me: for I desire nothing more, than that I may always act like myself; they like themselves, wish that you would meet me at the city, that I may use your counsel and assistance as I have hitherto done in all things. Nothing, I assure you

^g Τὴν θεὸν μεγίστην δοτ' ἔχει τυραννίδα.—Att. vii. 11.

Tentemus hoc modo, si possumus, omnium voluntas recuperare, et diuturna victoria uti: quoniam nihil credulitate odium effugere non potuerunt, neque viam diutius tenere, præter unum L. Syllam, quem in statu non sum. Hæc nova sit ratio vincendi: misericordia et liberalitate nos muniamus.—Ep. Cæsar ad Opp. Att. ix. 7.

^h Cæsar. De Bello Civ. l. i. i. Plutarch. in Cæsar. Sed obsecro te, quid hoc miserius, quam alterum plausus in foedissima causa querere; alterum offensam in optima? alterum existimari conservatorem inimicorum alterum desertorem amicorum? et mehercule quam amemus Cæsarem nostrum, ut et facinus et debemus, tam hoc, quod talibus viris non subvenit, laudare non possum. Nam si tunc quid ignavius? sive, ut quidam putant, meliorem suam causam illorum cæde fore putavit, quod injustius?—Ad Att. viii. 9.

^c Ad Att. viii. 3.

^d Ibid. viii. 7.

^e Istum cujus φαλαρισμὸν times, omnia teterrime faceretur puto.—Ad Att. vii. 12.

Incertum est Phalarisne an Pisistratum sit imitaturus.—Ibid. 20.

^f Nam eadem video ad vicerit—et regnum non modo Romano homini sed ne Persæ quidem tolerabile.—Ibid. x. 8.

^g Qui hic potest se gerere non perdit? vita, mores ante facta, ratio suscepti negotii, socii.—Ibid. ix. 2; it. ix. 19.

^h Atque eum loqui quidam αἰθερτικῶς narrabant; Cn. Carbonis, M. Bruti se penas persequi, &c.—Ad Att. ix. 14.

is dearer to me than Dolabella; I will owe this honour therefore to him: nor is it possible for him to behave otherwise, such is his humanity, his good sense, and his affection to me. Adieu¹."

When Pompey, after the unhappy affair of Corfinium, found himself obliged to retire to Brundisium, and to declare, what he had never before admitted, his design of quitting Italy and carrying the war abroad¹; he was very desirous to see Cæsar along with him, and wrote two letters to him at Formiæ, to press him to come away directly; but Cæsar, already much out of humour with him, was disgusted still the more by his short and negligent manner of writing, upon an occasion so important²: the second of Pompey's letters, and Cæsar's answer, will explain the present state of their affairs, and Cicero's sentiments upon

G. Pompeius Magnus Proconsul to M. Cicero Emperor.

"If you are in good health, I rejoice: I read your letter with pleasure: for I perceived in it ancient virtue by your concern for the common good. The consuls are come to the army which is in Apulia: I earnestly exhort you, by your tender and perpetual affection to the republic, to be also to us, that by our joint advice we may reap help and relief to the afflicted state. I would you make the Appian way your road, and be in all haste to Brundisium. Take care of your health."

M. Cicero Emperor to Cn. Magnus Proconsul.

"When I sent that letter, which was delivered to me at Cassium, I had no suspicion of your crossing to see for the service of the republic, and was in great hopes that we should be able, either to bring you to accommodation, which to me seemed the safest, or to defend the republic with the greatest safety in Italy. In the mean time, before my letter reached you, being informed of your resolution by the instructions which you sent to the consuls, I did not wait till I could have a letter from you, but set out immediately towards you with my brother and our children for Apulia. When we were come to Theanum, your friend C. Lentulus and many others told us, that Cæsar was on the road to Capua, and would lodge that very night at Æternia: I was much disturbed at it, because if it was true, I not only took my journey to be precluded, but myself also to be certainly a prisoner. I went on therefore to Cales with intent to hear there till I could learn from Æternia the reality of my intelligence: at Cales there was brought to me a copy of the letter which you sent to the consul Lentulus, with which you sent me also a copy of one that you had received from Cæsar, dated the eighteenth of February, and which, that it was of great importance to the republic, that all the troops should be drawn together as soon as possible to one place; yet so as to leave a sufficient garrison in Capua. Upon reading these letters I was of the same opinion with all the rest, that you were resolved to march to Corfinium with all your forces, whither, when Cæsar lay before the town, I thought it impossible for me to come. While this affair was in the utmost expectation, we were informed at one and the same time both of what had happened at Corfinium, and that you were actually marching towards Brundisium: and when I and my brother resolved without hesitation to follow you thither, we were advertised by many who came from Samnium and Apulia, to take care that we did not fall into Cæsar's hands, for that he was upon his march to the same places where our road lay, and would reach them sooner than we could possibly do. This being the case, it did not seem advisable to me or my brother, or any of our friends, to run the risk of hurting, not only ourselves, but the republic, by our rashness: especially when we could not doubt, but that if the journey had been safe to us, we should not then be able to overtake you. In the mean while I received your letter dated from Canusium the twenty-first of February, in which you exhort me to come in all haste to Brundisium: but as I did not receive it till the twenty-ninth, I made no question but that you were already arrived at Brundisium, and all that road seemed wholly shut up to us, and we ourselves as surely intercepted as those who were taken at Corfinium: for we did not reckon them only to be prisoners, who were actually fallen into the enemy's hands, but those too not less so who happen to be inclosed within the quarters and garrisons of their adversaries. Since this is our case, I heartily wish, in the first place, that I had always been with you, as I then told you when I relinquished the command of Capua, which I did not do for the sake of avoiding trouble, but because I saw that the town could not be held without an army, and was unwilling that the same accident should happen to me which, to my sorrow, has happened to some of our bravest citizens at Corfinium; but since it has not been my lot to be with you, I wish that I had been made privy to your counsels: for I could not possibly suspect, and should sooner have believed anything than that for the good of the republic, under such a leader as you, we should not be able to stand our ground in Italy: nor do I now blame your conduct, but lament the fate of the republic; and though I cannot comprehend what it is which you have followed, yet I am not the less persuaded that you have done nothing but with the greatest reason. You remember, I believe, what my opinion always was: first, to preserve peace even on bad conditions; then about leaving the city; for as to Italy, you never intimated a tittle to me about it: but I do not take upon myself to think that my advice ought to have been followed: I followed yours; nor that for the sake of the republic, of which I despaired, and which is now overturned, so as not to be raised up again without a civil and most pernicious war: I sought you; desired to be with you; nor will I omit the first opportunity which offers of effecting it. I easily perceived through all this affair, that I did not satisfy those who are fond of fighting: for I made no scruple to own, that I wished for nothing so much as peace; not but that I had the same apprehensions from it as they; but I thought them more tolerable than a civil war: then after the war was begun, when I saw that conditions of ²Quid ambigo Corfinio demique me certiores consilii sui.

¹AM. AN. LX. 16.

—Ibid. LX. 2.

³Epistolarum Pompeii duarum, quas ad me misit, negligens, meoque in scribendo diligentiam volui tibi

transmisse: earum exempla ad te misi.—Ibid. viii. 11.

peace were offered to you, and a full and honourable answer given to them, I began to weigh and deliberate well upon my own conduct, which, considering your kindness to me, I fancied that I should easily explain to your satisfaction: I recollected that I was the only man who, for the greatest services to the public, had suffered a most wretched and cruel punishment: that I was the only one who, if I offended him to whom at the very time when we were in arms against him a second consulship and most splendid triumph was offered, should be involved again in all the same struggles; so that my person seemed to stand always exposed as a public mark to the insults of profligate citizens: nor did I suspect any of these things till I was openly threatened with them: nor was I so much afraid of them, if they were really to befall me, as I judged it prudent to decline them, if they could honestly be avoided. You see in short the state of my conduct while we had any hopes of peace; what has since happened deprived me of all power to do anything: but to those whom I do not please I can easily answer, that I never was more a friend to C. Cæsar than they, nor they ever better friends to the republic than myself: the only difference between me and them is, that as they are excellent citizens, and I not far removed from that character, it was my advice to proceed by way of treaty, which I understood to be approved also by you; theirs by way of arms; and since this method has prevailed, it shall be my care to behave myself so, that the republic may not want in me the spirit of a true citizen, nor you of a friend. Adieu."

The disgust which Pompey's management had given him, and which he gently intimates in this letter, was the true reason why he did not join him at this time: he had a mind to deliberate a while longer, before he took a step so decisive: this he owns to Atticus, where, after recounting all the particulars of his own conduct which were the most liable to exception, he adds, "I have neither done nor omitted to do anything, which has not both a probable and prudent excuse—and in truth was willing to consider a little longer what was right and fit for me to do." The chief ground of his deliberation was, that he still thought a peace possible, in which case Pompey and Cæsar would be one again, and he had no mind to give Cæsar any cause to be an enemy to him when he was become a friend to Pompey.

While things were in this situation, Cæsar sent young Balbus after the consul Lentulus, to endeavour to persuade him to stay in Italy, and return to the city, by the offer of everything that could tempt him: he called upon Cicero on his way, who gives the following account of it to Atticus: "Young Balbus came to me on the twenty-fourth in the evening, running in all haste by private roads after Lentulus with letters and instructions from Cæsar, and the offer of any government if he will return to Rome: but it will have no effect unless they happen to meet: he told me that Cæsar desired nothing so much as to overtake Pompey: which I believe; and to be friends with him again: which I do not believe; and begin to fear, that all his clemency: nothing else at last but to give that one cruel The elder Balbus writes me word, that wishes nothing more than to live in safety yield the first rank to Pompey. You take suppose to be in earnest."

Cicero seems to think that Lentulus might be persuaded to stay, if Balbus and he went together; for he had no opinion of the firmness of these consuls, but says of them both on a occasion, that they were more easily moved every wind than a feather or a leaf. He wrote another letter soon after from Balbus, of which he sent a copy to Atticus, "that he might pity he says, "to see what a dupe they thought of him."

Balbus to Cicero Emperor.

"I conjure you, Cicero, to think of some method of making Cæsar and Pompey friends who by the perfidy of certain persons are divided: it is a work highly worthy of your take my word for it, Cæsar will not only your power, but think himself infinitely obliged to you if you would charge yourself with this I should be glad if Pompey would do so too in the present circumstances, it is what rather than hope, that he may be brought terms: but whenever he gives over flying fearing Cæsar, I shall not despair that your authority may have its weight with him. I take it kindly that you were for Lentulus staying in Italy, and it was the greatest obligation which you could confer upon me: for I love as much as I do Cæsar himself: if he had let me to talk to him as freely as we used to do, not so often shunned the opportunities sought of conferring with him, I should have been less unhappy than I now am: for assuredly that no man can be more afflicted than I am one who is dearer to me than myself, and as part so ill in his consulship, that he seems anything rather than a consul: but should be disposed to follow your advice, and take you for Cæsar's good intentions, and pass this his consulship at Rome, I should begin to think that by your authority and at his motion, and Cæsar may be made one again with the nation even of the senate. Whenever this is brought about, I shall think that I have lived enough: you will entirely approve, I am sure, what Cæsar did at Corfinium: in an affair of that sort, nothing could fall out better, than should be transacted without blood. I am extremely glad that my nephew's visit was so to you; as to what he said on Cæsar's part, what Cæsar himself wrote to you, I know to be very sincere in it, whatever turn his affections take."

Cæsar at the same time was extremely anxious not so much to gain Cicero, for that was not expected, as to prevail with him to stand by him. He wrote to him several times to that effect, employed all their common friends to per-

^a Ad Att. viii. II.

^b Nihil prætermisum est, quod non habeat sapientem excusationem—et plane quid rectum, et quid faciendum mihi esset, diutius cogitare malui.—Ad Att. viii. 12.

^c Ad Att. viii. 9.

^d Nec me consules movent, qui ipsi pluma facilius moventur—ut vicem meam dolores, ex animo deri videres.—Ibid. viii. 15.

^e Ad Att. viii. 13.

with letters on that head^a: who, by his keeping such a distance at this time from Pompey, imagining that they had made some impression, began to attempt a second point with him, viz., to persuade him to come back to Rome and assist in the councils of the senate, which Cæsar designed to summon at his return from following Pompey: with this view, in the hurry of his march towards Brundisium, Cæsar sent him the following letter:

Cæsar Emperor to Cicero Emperor.

"When I had but just time to see our friend Furnius, nor could conveniently speak with or hear him, was in haste and on my march, having sent the legions before me, yet I could not pass by without writing, and sending him to you with my thanks; though I have often paid this duty before, and seem likely to pay it oftener, you deserve it so well of me. I desire of you in a special manner, that, as I hope to be in the city shortly, I may see you there, and have the benefit of your advice, your interest, your authority, your assistance in all things. But to return to the point: you will pardon the haste and brevity of my letter, and learn the rest from Furnius." To which Cicero answered:

Cicero Emperor to Cæsar Emperor.

"Upon reading your letter, delivered to me by Furnius, in which you pressed me to come to the city, I did not so much wonder at what you there intimated, of your desire to use my advice and authority, but was at a loss to find out what you meant by my interest and assistance; yet I flattered myself into a persuasion, that out of your admirable and singular wisdom you were desirous to enter into some measures for establishing the peace and concord of the city; and in that case I looked upon my temper and character as fit enough to be employed in such a deliberation. If the case be so, and you have any concern for the safety of our friend Pompey, and of reconciling him to yourself, and to the republic, you will certainly find no man more proper for such a work than I am, who from the very first have always been the adviser of peace, both to him and the senate; and since this recourse to arms have not meddled with any part of the war, but thought you to be really injured by it, while your enemies and enviers were attempting to deprive you of those honours which the Roman people had granted you. But as at that time I was not only a favourer of your dignity, but an encourager also of others to assist you in it; so now the dignity of Pompey greatly affects me, for many years ago I made choice of you two, with whom to cultivate a particular friendship, and to be, as I now am, most strictly united. Wherefore I desire of you, or rather beg and implore with all my prayers, that in the hurry of your cares you would indulge a moment to this thought, how by your generosity I may be permitted to show myself an honest, grateful, pious man, in remembering an act of the greatest kindness to me. If this related only to myself, I should hope still to obtain it from you; but it concerns, I think, both your honour and the republic, that by your means

I should be allowed to continue in a situation the best adapted to promote the peace of you two, as well as the general concord of all the citizens. After I had sent my thanks to you before on the account of Lentulus, for giving safety to him who had given it to me; yet upon reading his letter, in which he expresses the most grateful sense of your liberality, I took myself to have received the same grace from you which he had done, towards whom, if by this you perceive me to be grateful, let it be your care, I beseech you, that I may be so too towards Pompey!"

Cicero was censured for some passages of this letter, which Cæsar took care to make public, viz., the compliment on Cæsar's admirable wisdom; and above all, the acknowledgment of his being injured by his adversaries in the present war; in excuse of which, he says, "that he was not sorry for the publication of it, for he himself had given several copies of it, and considering what had since happened, was pleased to have it known to the world how much he had always been inclined to peace, and that, in urging Cæsar to save his country, he thought it his business to use such expressions as were the most likely to gain authority with him, without fearing to be thought guilty of flattery, in urging him to an act for which he would gladly have thrown himself even at his feet."

He received another letter on the same subject, and about the same time, written jointly by Balbus and Oppius, two of Cæsar's chief confidants.

Balbus and Oppius to M. Cicero.

"The advice, not only of little men such as we are, but even of the greatest, is generally weighed, not by the intention of the giver, but the event: yet relying on your humanity, we will give you what we take to be the best in the case about which you wrote to us; which, though it should not be found prudent, yet certainly flows from the utmost fidelity and affection to you. If we did not know from Cæsar himself that, as soon as he comes to Rome, he will do what in our judgment we think he ought to do, treat about a reconciliation between him and Pompey, we should give over exhorting you to come and take part in those deliberations, that by your help, who have a strict friendship with them both, the whole affair may be settled with ease and dignity; or if, on the contrary, we believed that Cæsar would not do it, and knew that he was resolved upon a war with Pompey, we should never try to persuade you to take arms against a man to whom you have the greatest obligations, in the same manner as we have always entreated you, not to fight against Cæsar. But since at present we can only guess rather than know, what Cæsar will do, we have nothing to offer but this, that it does not seem agreeable to your dignity, or your fidelity, so well known to all, when you are intimate with them both, to take arms against either; and this we do not doubt but Cæsar, according to his humanity, will highly approve; yet if you judge proper we will write to him, to let us know what he will really do about it; and if he returns us an answer, will presently send you notice what we think of it, and give you our word that we will advise only what we take to be most suitable to your honour, not to Cæsar's views; and are persuaded that Cæsar, out of his indulgence to his friends, will be pleased with it." This joint letter was followed by a separate one from Balbus.

^a Ad Att. ix. 6, 11.

^b Epistolam meam quod pervulgatam scribis esse non fero moleste. Quin etiam ipse multis dedi describendam. Ea enim et acciderunt jam et impendunt, ut testatum esse velim de pace quid senserim. Cum autem eum hortarer, eum præsertim hominem, non videbar ullo modo facilis moturus, quam si id, quod eum hortarer, convenire ejus sapientie dicerem. Eam si admirabilem dixi, cum eum ad salutem patriæ hortarer, non cum veritus, ne viderer assentiri, cui tali in re lubenter me ad pedes abjecissem, &c.—Ibid. viii. 9.

^c Quod queris quid Cæsar ad me scripserit. Quod enim: gratissimum tibi esse quod queris: oraque ut in eo perseverem. Balbus minor hæc eadem mandata.—Ad Att. viii. 11.

Balbus to Cicero Emperor.

"Immediately after I had sent the common letter from Oppius and myself, I received one from Cæsar, of which I have sent you a copy, whence you will perceive how desirous he is of peace, and to be reconciled with Pompey, and how far removed from all thoughts of cruelty. It gives me an extreme joy, as it certainly ought to do, to see him in these sentiments. As to yourself, your fidelity, and your piety, I am entirely of the same mind, my dear Cicero, with you, that you cannot, consistently with your character and duty, bear arms against a man to whom you declare yourself so greatly obliged; that Cæsar will approve this resolution I certainly know from his singular humanity, and that you will perfectly satisfy him, by taking no part in the war against him, nor joining yourself to his adversaries; this he will think sufficient, not only from you, a person of such dignity and splendour, but has allowed it even to me, not to be found in that camp, which is likely to be formed against Lentulus and Pompey, from whom I have received the greatest obligations. It was enough, he said, if I performed my part to him in the city and the gown, which I might perform also to them if I thought fit; wherefore I now manage all Lentulus's affairs at Rome, and discharge my duty, my fidelity, my piety, to them both; yet in truth I do not take the hopes of an accommodation, though now so low, to be quite desperate, since Cæsar is in that mind in which we ought to wish him. One thing would please me, if you think it proper, that you would write to him, and desire a guard from him, as you did from Pompey, at the time of Milo's trial, with my approbation; I will undertake for him, if I rightly know Cæsar, that he will sooner pay a regard to your dignity, than to his own interest. How prudently I write these things I know not; but this I certainly know, that whatever I write, I write out of a singular love and affection to you; for (let me die so as Cæsar may but live) if I have not so great an esteem for you, that few are equally dear to me. When you have taken any resolution in this affair, I wish that you would let me know it, for I am exceedingly solicitous that you should discharge your duty to them both, which in truth I am confident you will discharge. Take care of your health."

The offer of a guard was artfully insinuated; for while it carried an appearance of honour and respect to Cicero's person, it must necessarily have made him Cæsar's prisoner, and deprived him of the liberty of retiring, when he found it proper, out of Italy. But he was too wise to caught by it, or to be moved in any manner by letters themselves, to entertain the least thought going to Rome, since to assist in the senate, with Pompey and the consuls were driven out of it, in reality to take part against them. What gave him a more immediate uneasiness, was the expectation of an interview with Cæsar himself, who was now returning from Brundisium by the road of Formiæ, where he then resided; for though he would gladly have avoided him, if he could have contrived to do it decently, yet to leave the place just when Cæsar was coming to it, could not be interpreted as a particular affront; resolved therefore to wait for him, and to meet the occasion with a firmness and gravity which became his rank and character.

They met as he expected, and he sent Atticus the following account of what passed between them: "My discourse with him (says he) was said would rather make him think well of me than thank me. I stood firm in refusing to go to Rome but was deceived in expecting to find him as for I never saw any one less so; he was condemned, he said, by my judgment, and, if I not come, others would be the more backward. I told him that their case was very different from mine. After many things said on both sides, bade me come, however, and try to make peace. Shall I do it, says I, in my own way? Do, I imagine, replied he, that I will prescribe to you. I will move the senate then, says I, for a decree against your going to Spain, or transporting your troops into Greece, and say a great deal besides bemoaning the case of Pompey. I will not at all replied he, such things to be said. So I thought said I, and for that reason will not come; because I must either say them, and many more which cannot help saying, if I am there, or not come at all. The result was, that to shift off the discourse he wished me to consider of it, which I could not refuse to do, and so we parted. I am persuaded that he is not pleased with me, but I am pleased with myself, which I have not been before a long time. As for the rest, good gods, what a case he has with him! what a hellish band, as you call them!—what a deplorable affair! what desperate troops! what a lamentable thing to see Servilius and Titinius's, with many more of their kind in that camp, which besieged Pompey! he has legions, wakes at all hours, fears nothing; I see no end of this calamity. His declaration at last, which I had almost forgot, was odious; if he was not permitted to use my advice, he would use such as he could get from others, and pursue all measures which were for his service." At this conference, Cicero went directly to Arpinum and there invested his son, at the age of sixteen with the manly gown; he resolved to carry along with him to Pompey's camp, and though proper to give him an air of manhood before he enlisted him into the war; and since he could perform that ceremony at Rome, chose to oblige his countrymen by celebrating this festival in native city."

While Cæsar was on the road towards Rome

* Ad Att. ix. 18.

† Ego meo Cicero, quoniam Roma caremus, Arpinum togam purpuram dedi, idque municipibus non fuit gratum.—Ibid. ix. 19.

young Quintus Cicero, the nephew, a fiery giddy youth, privately wrote to him to offer his service, with a promise of some information concerning his uncle; upon which, being sent for and admitted to an audience, he assured Cæsar that his uncle was utterly unaffected to all his measures, and determined to leave Italy and go to Pompey. The boy was tempted to this rashness by the hopes of a considerable present, and gave much uneasiness by it both to the father and the uncle, who had reason to fear some ill consequence from it^b; but Cæsar desiring still to divert Cicero from declaring against him, and to quiet the apprehensions which he might entertain for what was past, took occasion to signify to him, in a kind letter from Rome, that he retained no resentment of his refusal to come to the city, though Tullus and Servius complained that he had not shown the same indulgence to them; ridiculous men, says Cicero, who after sending their sons to besiege Pompey at Brundisium, pretend to be scrupulous about going to the senate^c.

Cicero's behaviour, however, and residence in those villas of his which were nearest to the sea, gave rise to a general report, that he was waiting only for a wind to carry him over to Pompey: upon which Cæsar sent him another pressing letter to try, if possible, to dissuade him from that step.

Cæsar Emperor to Cicero Emperor.

"Though I never imagined that you would do anything rashly or imprudently, yet moved by common report I thought proper to write to you, and beg of you by our mutual affection, that you would not run to a declining cause, whither you did not think fit to go while it stood firm. For you will do the greatest injury to our friendship, and consult but ill for yourself, if you do not follow where fortune calls, for all things seem to have succeeded most prosperously for us—most unfortunately for them; nor will you be thought to have followed the cause (since that was the same when you chose to withdraw yourself from their councils), but to have condemned some act of mine, than which you can do nothing that could affect me more sensibly, and what I beg by the rights of our friendship that you would not do. Lastly, what is more agreeable to the character of an honest, quiet man, and good citizen, than to retire from civil broils? from which some, who would gladly have done it, have been deterred by an apprehension of danger; but you, after a full testimony of my life, and trial of my friendship, will find nothing more safe or more reputable than to keep yourself clear from all this contention. The 16th of April, on the road^d."

Antony also, whom Cæsar left to guard Italy in his absence, wrote to him to the same purpose, and on the same day.

Antónius Tribune of the people and Proprator to Cicero Emperor.

"If I had not a great esteem for you, and much greater indeed than you imagine, I should not be concerned at the report which is spread of you, especially when I take it to be false. But out of the excess of my affection, I cannot dissemble, that even a report, though false, makes some impression on me. I cannot believe that you are preparing to cross the sea, when you have such a value for Dolabella, and your daughter Tullia, that excellent woman, and are so much valued by us all, to whom in truth your dignity and honour are almost dearer than to yourself; yet I did not think it the part of a friend not to be moved by the discourse even of ill-designing men, and wrote this with the greater inclination, as I take my part to be the more difficult on the account of our late coldness, occasioned rather by my jealousy, than any injury from you. For I desire you to assure yourself, that nobody is dearer to me than you, excepting my Cæsar, and that I know also that Cæsar reckons M. Cicero in the first class of his friends. Wherefore I beg of you, my Cicero, that you will keep yourself free and undetermined, and despise the fidelity of that man who first did you an injury, that he might afterwards do you a kindness; nor fly from him, who, though he should not love you, which is impossible, yet will always desire to see you in safety and splendour. I have sent Calpurnius to you with this, the most intimate of my friends, that you might perceive the great concern which I have for your life and dignity^e."

Cælius also wrote to him on the same subject, but finding, by some hints in Cicero's answer, that he was actually preparing to run away to Pompey, he sent him a second letter, in a most pathetic, or, as Cicero calls it, lamentable strain^f, in hopes to work upon him by alarming all his fears.

Cælius to Cicero.

"Being in a consternation at your letter, by which you show that you are meditating nothing but what is dismal, yet neither tell me directly what it is nor wholly hide it from me, I presently wrote this to you. By all your fortunes, Cicero, by your children, I beg and beseech you not to take any step injurious to your safety; for I call the gods and men and our friendship to witness, that what I have told and forewarned you of was not any vain conceit of my own, but after I had talked with Cæsar, and understood from him how he resolved to act after his victory, I informed you of what I had learned. If you imagine that his conduct will always be the same, in dismissing his enemies and offering conditions, you are mistaken. He thinks and even talks of nothing but what is fierce and severe, and is gone away much out of humour with the senate and thoroughly provoked by the opposition which he has met with, nor will

^b Literas ejus ad Cæsarem missas ita gravior tullimus, ut se quidem coleremus—tantum scito post Hirtium convenerunt, accessit ab Cæsare; cum eo de meo animo ab eis comitibus alienissimo, et consilio relinquendi Italiam.

—Ad Att. x. 4, 5, &c.

^c Quintum pecuniam accepti vehementer. Avaritiam video fuisse, et open magni congruili. Magnum hoc malum est.

—Ibid. x. 7.

^d Cæsar mihi ignoscit per literas, quod non Romam venerim, et neque in optimam partem id accipere dicit. Facile patior, quod scribit, acum Tullum et Servium quosdam esse, quia non idem sibi, quod mihi remississet. Remissio ridicula, qui cum sitos misissent ad Cn. Pompeium circumstantiam, ipsi in senatum venire dubitarent.

—Ibid. x. 8.

^e Ad Att. x. 8.

^f Ibid.

^g M. Cæli epistolam scriptam miserabiliter.—Ibid. 8.

there be any room for mercy. Wherefore, if you yourself, your only son, your house, your remaining hopes, be dear to you; if I, if the worthy man your son-in-law, have any weight with you, you should not desire to overturn our fortunes and force us to hate or to relinquish that cause in which our safety consists, or to entertain an impious wish against yours. Lastly, reflect on this, that you have already given all the offence which you can give by staying so long behind; and now to declare against a conqueror whom you would not offend while his cause was doubtful, and to fly after those who run away, with whom you would not join while they were in condition to resist, is the utmost folly. Take care that, while you are ashamed not to approve yourself one of the best citizens, you be not too hasty in determining what is the best. But if I cannot wholly prevail with you, yet wait at least till you know how we succeed in Spain, which I now tell you will be ours as soon as Cæsar comes thither. What hopes they may have when Spain is lost, I know not; and what your view can be in acceding to a desperate cause, by my faith I cannot find out. As to the thing which you discover to me by your silence about it, Cæsar has been informed of it, and after the first salutation told me presently what he had heard of you. I denied that I knew anything of the matter, but begged of him to write to you in a manner the most effectual to make you stay. He carries me with him into Spain; if he did not, I would run away to you wherever you are before I came to Rome, to dispute this point with you in person and hold you fast even by force. Consider, Cicero, again and again, that you do not utterly ruin both you and yours; that you do not knowingly and willingly throw yourself into difficulties whence you see no way to extricate yourself. But if either the reproaches of the better sort touch you, or you cannot bear the insolence and haughtiness of a certain set of men, I would advise you to choose some place remote from the war till these contests be over, which will soon be decided. If you do this I shall think that you have done wisely, and you will not offend Cæsar.¹

Cælius's advice as well as his practice was grounded upon a maxim, which he had before advanced in a letter to Cicero, that in a public dissension, as long as it was carried on by civil methods one ought to take the honest side, but when it came to arms the stronger, and to judge that the best which was the safest.² Cicero was not of his opinion, but governed himself in this, as he generally did in all other cases, by a contrary rule, that where our duty and our safety interfere we should adhere always to what is right, whatever danger we incur by it.

Curio paid Cicero a friendly visit of two days about this time, on his way towards Sicily, the command of which Cæsar had committed to him. Their conversation turned on the unhappy condition of the times and the impending miseries of the war, in which Curio was open and without any reserve in talking of Cæsar's views. "He exhorted Cicero to choose some neutral place for his retreat, as him that Cæsar would be pleased with it, of him all kind of accommodation and safe passage through Sicily, made not the least doubt but Cæsar would soon be master of Spain and follow Pompey with his whole force, and Pompey's death would be the end of the war confessed withal that he saw no prospect or mering of hope for the republic; said that (was so provoked by the tribune Metellus at that he had a mind to have killed him, as his friends advised; that if he had done it a slaughter would have ensued; that his clen flowed, not from his natural disposition, but because he thought it popular, and if he once lost affections of the people he would be cruel; that he was disturbed to see the people so disgusted at seizing the public treasure, and though he resolved to speak to them before he left Rome he durst not venture upon it for fear of affront, and went away at last much disappointed.

The leaving the public treasure at Rome to Cæsar, is censured more than once by Cicero one of the blunders of his friends³; but it is a common case in civil dissensions for the honest side, through the fear of discrediting themselves by any irregular act, to ruin it by an unseasonable moderation. The public money was kept in the temple of Saturn, and the consuls contented themselves with carrying away the keys; fancying the sanctity of the place would secure it from violence, especially when the greatest part of a fund of a sacred kind, set apart by the law on occasions only of the last exigency or the test of a Gallic invasion⁴. Pompey was sensible of this mistake when it was too late, and sent instructions to the consuls to go back and fetch away the sacred treasure; but Cæsar was then so far advanced that they durst not venture upon it. Lentulus coldly sent him word that he should first march against Cæsar into Picenum that they might be able to do it with safety. Cæsar had none of these scruples, but as soon as he came to Rome ordered the "doors of the treasury to be broken open and the money to be seized for his own use, and had like to have killed the tribune Metellus," who, trusting to the authority of the consuls, was silly enough to attempt to hinder him. He found there an immense treasure, "both in coin and wedges of solid gold, reserved from the spoils of conquered nations from the time of the Punic war; for the republic (as Pliny says) had never been richer than it was at this day."

Cicero was now impatient to be gone, and more so on account of the inconvenient public display of his laurel, and lictors, and style of emperor, in a time of that jealousy and distraction which he felt too much to the eyes of the public as to the taunts and railery of his enemies resolved to cross the sea to Pompey, yet he

¹ Ad Att. x. 4.

² Ibid. vii. 12, 15.

³ Dio, p. 161.

⁴ C. Cassius—attulit mandata ad consules, ut vellent pecuniam de sanctioris arario auferrent rescripsit, ut prius ipse in Picenum.—Ad Att. vii. 12. Nec fuit illis temporibus res publica locupletior. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3.

⁵ Accedit etiam molesta hæc pompa lictorum et nomenque imperii quo appellor, sed incurrit hæc laus non solum in oculos, sed etiam in vocem volorum.—Ep. Fam. ii. 16.

⁶ Ep. Fam. viii. 16.

⁷ Illud to non arbitror fugere; quin homines in dissensione domestica debeant, quamdiu civiliter sine armis cernatur, honestiorem sequi partem: ubi ad bellum et castra ventum sit, firmiorem; et id melius statuere, quod tutius sit.—Ibid. viii. 14.

all his motions to be narrowly watched, took pains to conceal his intention, especially from Antony, who resided at this time in his neighbourhood, and kept a strict eye upon him. He sent him word therefore by letter, that he had "no design against Cæsar; that he remembered his friendship, and his son-in-law Dolabella; that if he had other thoughts, he could easily have been with Pompey; that his chief reason for retiring was to avoid the uneasiness of appearing in public with the formality of his lions¹." But Antony wrote him a surly answer, which Cicero calls a laconic mandate, and sent a copy of it to Atticus, to let him see, he says, how tyrannically it was drawn.

"How sincere is your way of acting! for he who has a mind to stand neuter stays at home; he who goes abroad seems to pass a judgment on the one side or the other. But it does not belong to me to determine whether a man may go abroad or not. Cæsar has imposed this task upon me, and sent to suffer any man to go out of Italy. Wherefore it signifies nothing for me to approve your resolution if I have no power to indulge you in it. I would have you write to Cæsar, and ask that favour of him: I do not doubt but you will obtain it, especially since you promise to retain a regard for our friendship²."

After this letter Antony never came to see him, but sent an excuse that he was ashamed to do it because he took him to be angry with him, giving him to understand at the same time by Trebatius, that he had special orders to observe his motions³.

These letters give us the most sensible proof of the high esteem and credit in which Cicero flourished at this time in Rome; when in a contest for empire, which force alone was to decide, we see the chiefs on both sides so solicitous to gain a man to their party who had no peculiar skill in arms or talents for war; but his name and authority was the acquisition which they sought; since whatever was the fate of their arms, the world, they knew, would judge better of the cause which Cicero espoused. The same letters will confute likewise in a great measure the common opinion of his want of resolution in all cases of difficulty, since no man could show a greater than he did on the present occasion, when, against the importunities of his friends and all the invitations of a successful power, he chose to follow that cause which he thought the best, though he knew it to be the weakest.

During Cæsar's absence in Spain, Antony, who had nobody to control him at home, gave a free course to his natural disposition, and indulged himself without reserve in all the excess of lewdness and luxury. Cicero, describing his usual equipage in travelling about Italy, says, "He carries with him in an open chaise the famed actress Cytheris, his wife follows in a second, with seven other close fitters full of his whores and boys. See by what loose hands we fall, and doubt if you can whether Cæsar, let him come vanquished or victorious, will not make cruel work amongst us at his return. For my part, if I cannot get a ship I will take a boat to transport myself out of their reach; but I shall tell you more after I have had a conference with Antony⁴." Among Antony's other extravagances, he had the insolence to appear sometimes in public with his mistress Cytheris in a chariot drawn by lions. Cicero, alluding to this in a letter to Atticus, tells him jocosely that he need not be afraid of Antony's lions⁵, for though the beasts were so fierce the master himself was very tame.

Pliny speaks of this fact as a designed insult on the Roman people, as if, by the emblem of the lions, Antony intended to give them to understand that the fiercest spirits of them would be forced to submit to the yoke⁶. Plutarch also mentions it; but both of them place it after the battle of Pharsalia, though it is evident from this hint of it given by Cicero that it happened long before.

Whilst Cicero continued at Formiæ deliberating on the measures of his conduct, he formed several political theses adapted to the circumstances of the times, for the amusement of his solitary hours: "Whether a man ought to stay in his country when it was possessed by a tyrant. Whether one ought not by all means to attempt the dissolution of the tyranny, though his city on that account was exposed to the utmost hazard. Whether there was not cause to be afraid of the man who should dissolve it, lest he should advance himself into the other's place. Whether we should not help our country by the methods of peace rather than war. Whether it be the part of a citizen to sit still in a neutral place while his country is oppressed, or to run all hazards for the sake of the common liberty. Whether one ought to bring a war upon his city, and besiege it, when in the hands of a tyrant. Whether a man, not approving the dissolution of a tyranny by war, ought not to join himself however to the best citizens. Whether one ought to act with his benefactors and friends, though they do not in his opinion take right measures for the public interest. Whether a man who has done great services to his country, and for that reason has been envied and cruelly treated, is still bound to expose himself to fresh dangers for it, or may not be permitted at last to take care of himself and his family and give up all political matters to the men of power;—by exercising myself (says he) in these questions, and examining them on the one side and the other, I relieve my mind from its present anxiety, and draw out something which may be of use to me⁷."

¹ Hic tamen Cytheridem secum lectica aperta portat, altera uxorem: septem præterea conjunctæ lecticæ sunt amicarum, unum amicum? vide quam turpi leto peramus: et dubita, si potes, quin ille seu victus, seu victor redierit, eadem facturus sit. Ego vero vel lintriculo, si navis non erit, eripiam me ex istorum periculo. Sed plura scribam cum illum convenero.—Ad Att. x. 10.

² Tu Antonii leones pertimescas, cave. Nihil est illo homine jucundius.—Ibid. x. 13.

³ Jugo subdidit eos, primusque Romæ ad curram Junxit Antonius; et quidem civili bello cum dimicatum esset in Pharsalicis campis; non sine ostento quodam temporum, generosæ spiritus jugum subito illo prodigio significante: nam quod ita vectus est cum mima Cytheride, supra monstra etiam istarum calamitatum fuit.—Plin. Hist. Nat. viii. 16.

⁴ In his ego me consultationibus exerceo, disserens in

¹ Cum ego scriptissima scripisssem, nihil me contra Cæsar's rationes cogitare; meminisse me generi mei, membris amicis, potius aliter sentire, esse cum Pompeio, me autem, quia cum victoribus invitum curarem, abesse velle.—Ad Att. x. 10.

² Ad Att. x. 10.

³ Minutius de me sibi imperatorem dicit Antonius, nec me tamen ipse adhuc videtur, sed hoc Trebatius narravit.—Ibid. x. 12.

⁴ Antonius ad me misit, ne pudore deterritum ad me non venis, quod me sibi succedere putaret.—Ibid. x. 15.

From the time of his leaving the city together with Pompey and the senate, there passed not a single day in which he did not write one or more letters to Atticus⁷, the only friend whom he trusted with the secret of his thoughts. From these letters it appears, that the sum of Atticus's advice to him agreed entirely with his own sentiments, that if Pompey remained in Italy he ought to join with him; if not, should stay behind and expect what fresh accidents might produce⁸. This was what Cicero had hitherto followed; and as to his future conduct, though he seems sometimes to be a little wavering and irresolute, yet the result of his deliberations constantly turned in favour of Pompey. His personal affection for the man, preference of his cause, the reproaches of the better sort, who began to censure his tardiness, and above all his gratitude for favours received, which had ever the greatest weight with him, made him resolve at all adventures to run after him; and though he was displeased with his management of the war and without any hopes of his success⁹, though he knew him before to be no politician, and now perceived him, he says, to be no general, yet with all his faults he could not endure the thought of deserting him, nor hardly forgive himself for staying so long behind him. "For as in love (says he), anything dirty and indecent in a mistress will stifle it for the present, so the deformity of Pompey's conduct put me out of humour with him, but now that he is gone my love revives and I cannot bear his absence," &c.¹⁰

What held him still a while longer was the tears of his family and the remonstrances of his daughter Tullia, who entreated him to wait only the issue of the Spanish war, and urged it as the advice of Atticus¹¹. He was passionately fond of this daughter, and with great reason, for she was a woman of singular accomplishments, with the utmost affection and piety to him. Speaking of her to Atticus, "how admirable (says he) is her virtue! how does she bear the public calamity! how her domestic disgusts! what a greatness of mind did she show at my parting from them! in spite of the tenderness of her love she wishes me to do nothing what is right and for my honour¹²." But as to affair of Spain, he answered, "that whatever the fate of it, it could not alter the case regard to himself; for if Cæsar should be driven out of it, his journey to Pompey would be less come and reputable, since Curio himself would over to him; or if the war was drawn into length there would be no end of waiting; or lastly, Pompey's army should be beaten, instead of still, as they advised, he thought just the contrary and should choose the rather to run away from violence of such a victory. He resolved, therefore he says, "to act nothing craftily; but what became of Spain to find out Pompey as soon as could, in conformity to Solon's law, who made capital for a citizen not to take part in a civil session."

Before his going off, Servius Sulpicius sent word from Rome that he had a great desire to a conference with him, to consult in common measures they ought to take. Cicero consented it, in hopes to find Servius in the same mind himself, and to have his company to Pompey's camp: for in answer to his message, he intimates his own intention of leaving Italy, and if Servius was not in the same resolution, advised him to himself the trouble of the journey; though, if he had anything of moment to communicate, he would wait for his coming¹³. But at their meeting found him so timorous and desponding, and so of scruples upon everything which was proposed, that, instead of pressing him to the same course with himself, he found it necessary to conceal his own design from him. "Of all the men," says he, "whom I have met with, he is alone a greater coward than C. Marcellus, who laments his being been consul; and urges Antony to his going, that he himself may stay with a better grace."

Cato, whom Pompey had sent to possess himself of Sicily, thought fit to quit that post, and yield utramque partem, tum græce tum latine, abduco parumper animum a molestiis et τοῦ ἀποδύου τι δέλιβρο.—Ad Att. ix. 4.

⁷ Hujus autem epistolæ non solum ea causa est, ut ne quis a me dies intermitteretur, quin deinde ad te literas, sed, &c.—Ibid. viii. 12.

Alteram tibi eodem die hanc epistolam dictavi, et pridie dederam meâ manu longiorem.—Ibid. x. 3.

⁸ Ego quidem tibi non sum auctor, si Pompeius Italiam relinquat, te quoque profugere, summo enim periculo facies, nec republice proderis; cui quidem posterius poteris prodere, si manseris.—Ibid. ix. 10.

⁹ Ingrati animi crimen horreo.—Ibid. ix. 2, 5, 7. Nec mehercule hoc facio republice causa, quam funditus deletam puto, sed nequis me putet ingratum in eum, qui me levavit his incommodiis, quibus ipse affecerat.—Ibid. ix. 19.

Fortunæ sunt committenda omnia. Sine spe conamur nulla. Si melius quid acciderit mirabimur.—Ibid. x. 2.

¹⁰ Sicut ἐν τοῖς ἔρωσι, alienant immunda, insulsa, indecora: sic me illius fugæ, negligentique deformitas avertit ab amore—nunc emergit amor, nunc desiderium ferre non possum.—Ibid. ix. 10.

¹¹ Sed cum ad me mea Tullia scribat, orans, ut quid in Hispania geratur expectem, et semper adscribat idem videri tibi.—Ibid. x. 8.

Lacrymæ meorum me interdum molliunt, precantium, ut de Hispaniis expectemus.—Ibid. x. 9.

¹² Cujus quidem virtus mirifica. Quomodo illa publicam cladem? quomodo domesticas trices? qui autem animus in discessu nostro? τί στροφή, τί ἐν σὺνῳγῃς; tamen nos recte facere et bene audire videtur.—Ad Att. x. 8.

¹³ Si polletur, quam gratus aut quam honestus tui ad Pompeium nostri adventus, cum ipsum Curionem ipsum transitarum putem? si trahitur bellum, expectem, aut quam diu? relinquatur, ut si vincam Hispania, quiescamus. Id ego contra puto: letum si victorem relinquendum magis puto, quam victum.—Ibid. x. 6.

Astute nihil sum acturus; fiat in Hispania quidlibet.—Ibid. x. 6.

Ego vero Solonis—legem negligam, qui capite exar-qui in seditione non alterius utriusque partis fuisse.—x. 1.

¹ Sin autem tibi homini prudentissimo videtur utile: nos colloqui, quanquam longius etiam cogitabam abdiscedere, cujus jam etiam nomen invitus audire, si propius accedam.—Ep. Fam. iv. 1.

Restat ut discedendum putem; in quo reliqua ridere esse deliberatio, quod consilium in discessu, qui sequamur—si habes jam statutum, quid tibi apud putes, in quo non sit conjunctum consilium tuum et meo, superaddes hoc labore itineris.—Ibid. iv. 2.

² Servili consilio nihil expeditur. Omnes captivæ omni sententia occurrunt. Unum C. Marcellum cogit timidiorem, quem consulem fuisse penitet—qui et Antonium confirmasse dicitur, ut me impedit, quo credo, honestus.—Ad Att. x. 15.

the island to Curio, who came likewise to seize it on Cæsar's part with a superior force. Cicero was much scandalized at Cato's conduct, being persuaded that he might have held his possession without difficulty; and that all honest men would have flocked to him, especially when Pompey's fleet was so near to support him: for if that had but once appeared on the coast, and begun to act, Curio himself, as he confessed, would have run away the first. "I wish," says Cicero, "that Cotta may hold out Sardinia, as it is said he will; for if so, how base will Cato's act appear!"

In these circumstances, while he was preparing all things for his voyage, and waiting only for a fair wind, he removed from his Cuman to his Pompeian villa, beyond Naples, which not being so commodious for an embarkment, would help to lessen the suspicion of his intended flight.¹ Here he received a private message from the officers of three cohorts which were in garrison at Pompeii, to beg leave to wait upon him the day following, in order to deliver up their troops and the town into his hands; but instead of listening to the overture, he slipped away the next morning before they could avoid seeing them, since such a force or a greater could be of no service there, and he was apprehensive that it was designed only as a trap for him.

Thus pursuing at last the result of all his deliberations, and preferring the consideration of duty to that of his safety, he embarked to follow Pompey; and though, from the nature of the war, he plainly saw and declared, "that it was a contention only for rule; yet he thought Pompey the modester, liberator, and juster king of the two; and if he did not conquer, that the very name of the Roman people would be extinguished; or if he did, that it would still be after the manner and pattern of itself, with much cruelty and blood!" With these melancholy reflections, he set sail on the eleventh of June,² rushing (as he tells us) knowingly and willingly into voluntary destruction, and doing just what cattle do, when driven by any force, running after those of his own kind: for as the ox (says he) follows the herd, so I follow the honest, or those at least who are called so, though it be to certain ruin."³ As to his brother Quintus, he was so far from desiring his company in this flight, that he pressed him to stay in Italy on account of his personal obligations to Cæsar, and the relation that he had borne to him: yet Quintus would not be left behind; but declared that he would follow his brother whithersoever he should lead, and think that party right which he should choose for him.

What gave Cicero a more particular abhorrence of the war into which he was entering was, to see Pompey on all occasions affecting to imitate Sylla, and to hear him often say, with a superior air, "Could Sylla do such a thing, and cannot I do it?" as if determined to make Sylla's victory the pattern of his own. He was now in much the same circumstances in which that conqueror had once been; sustaining the cause of the senate by his arms, and treated as an enemy by those who possessed Italy; and as he flattered himself with the same good fortune, so he was meditating the same kind of return, and threatening ruin and proscription to all his enemies. This frequently shocked Cicero, as we find from many of his letters, to consider with what cruelty and effusion of civil blood the success even of his own friends would certainly be attended.

We have no account of the manner and circumstances of his voyage, or by what course he steered towards Dyrrhachium; for after his leaving Italy, all his correspondence with it was in great measure cut off; so that from June, in which he sailed, we find an intermission of about nine months in the series of his letters, and not more than four of them written to Atticus during the continuance of the war.⁴ He arrived, however, safely in Pompey's camp, with his son, his brother, and nephew, committing the fortunes of the whole family to the issue of that cause: and that he might make some amends for coming so late, and gain the greater authority with his party, he furnished Pompey, reformation of it which Cæsar soon after effected, in order to reduce the computation of their months to the regular course of the seasons from which they had so widely varied. Some of the commentators, for want of attending to this cause, are strangely puzzled to account for the difficulty; and one of them ridiculously imagines, that by the Equinox, Cicero covertly means Antony, who used to make his days and nights equal, by sleeping as much as he waked!

¹ Ego prudens ac sciens ad postem ante oculos positum tum profectus.—Ep. Fam. vi. 6.

² Prudens et sciens tanquam ad interitum ruærem voluntarium. [Pro M. Marcel. 5.] quid ergo acturus es? idem, quod pecudes, quæ dispulæ sui generis sequuntur greges, ut bos armenta, sic ego bonos viros, aut eos, quicunque dicuntur boni, sequar, etiam si ruent.—Ad Att. vii. 7.

³ Fratrem—socium hujus fortunæ esse non erat æquum: cui magis etiam Cæsar irascetur. Sed impetrare non possum, ut maneat. [Ibid. ix. 1.] frater, quicquid mihi placeret, id rectum se putare aiebat.—Ibid. ix. 6.

⁴ Quam crebro illud, Sylla potuit, ego non potero!—Ita Syllaturit animus ejus, et proscripserit diu. [Ad Att. ix. 10.] Cnæus noster Syllam regni similitudinem concupivit. εὐδὸς οὐ λήγας. [Ibid. 7.] ut non nominatim sed generatim proscriptio esset informata.—Ibid. xi. 6.

⁵ Ad Att. xi. 1.—4.

¹ Curio mecum vixit—Siciliæ diffidens, et Pompeius magnæ celsæ.—Ad Att. x. 7.

² Curio—Pompeii classem timebat: quæ ei esset, se de Sicilia altitum.—Ibid. x. 4.

³ Cui quæ Siciliam tenere nullo negotio potuit, et si contulerat, armis boni ad eum se contulerant, Syracusis profectus est a. d. viii. Kal. Maii—utinam, quod alunt, Cotta Sardiniam teneat. Est enim rumor. O, si id fuerit, turpem Cæsarum!—Ibid. x. 16.

⁴ Ego ad minorem suspicionem profectus, profectus sum in Pompeianum a. d. iv. Id. Ut ibi essem, dum quæ res navigandum opus essent, pararentur.—Ibid.

⁵ Cum ad villam venissem, ventum est ad me, centuriones tribus cohortibus, quæ Pompeii sunt, me velle persequi; hæc mecum Ninnius noster, velle eos mihi se, et optatum tradere. At ego tibi postridie a villa ante domum, ut me omnino illi non viderent. Quid enim erat in tribus cohortibus? quid alii plures, quo apparatu?—et natural fieri poterat, ut tentarem. Omnem igitur susceptionem cessant.—Ibid.

⁶ Dominatio quæsitæ ab utroque est.—Ibid. viii. 11. Repetitur contentio est: in qua pulvis est moderatus rex et probus et integritas; et in qua nihil vincit, nomen populi alligantur delectat necesse est: sin autem vincit, Syllano potius, exemploque vincet.—Ibid. x. 7.

⁷ A. D. iii. Id. Jun.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 7. It is remarkable, that among the reasons which detained Cicero in Italy longer than he intended, he mentions the tempestuous weather of the Equinox, and the calm that succeeded it; yet this was about the end of May, [Ad Att. x. 17, 18.] to which above what a strange confusion there was at this time in the Roman Kalender; and what necessity for that who was in great want of money, with a large sum out of his own stock for the public service*.

But as he entered into the war with reluctance, so he found nothing in it but what increased his disgust: he disliked everything which they had done, or designed to do; saw nothing good amongst them but their cause; and that their own counsels would ruin them. For all the chiefs of the party, trusting to the superior fame and authority of Pompey, and dazzled with the splendour of the troops which the princes of the East had sent to their assistance, assured themselves of victory; and without reflecting on the different character of the two armies, would hear of nothing but fighting. It was Cicero's business therefore to discourage this wild spirit, and to represent the hazard of the war, the force of Cæsar, and the probability of his beating them, if ever they ventured a battle with him: but all his remonstrances were slighted, and he himself reproached as timorous and cowardly by the other leaders; though nothing afterwards happened to them but what he had often foretold*. This soon made him repent of embarking in a cause so imprudently conducted; and it added to his discontent, to find himself even blamed by Cato for coming to them at all, and deserting that neutral post which might have given him the better opportunity of bringing about an accommodation*.

In this disagreeable situation, he declined all employment; and finding his counsels wholly slighted, resumed his usual way of railery; and what he could not dissuade by his authority, endeavoured to make ridiculous by his jests. This gave occasion, afterwards, to Antony, in a speech to the senate, to censure the levity of his behaviour in the calamity of a civil war; and to reflect not only upon his fears, but the unseasonableness also of his jokes. To which Cicero answered, "that though their camp indeed was full of care and anxiety, yet in circumstances the most turbulent, there were certain moments of relaxation which all men, who had any humanity in them, were glad to lay hold on: but while Antony reproached him both with dejection and joking at the same time, it was a sure proof that he had observed a proper temper and moderation in them both*."

* Etai ego rebus omnibus, quod is quoque in angustis est, quicquid sumus, cui magnam dedimus pecuniam mutuum, opinantes nobis, constitutis rebus, eam rem etiam honori fore. [Ibid. xl. 3.] et quas habuimus facultates, eas Pompeio tum, cum id videbamus sapienter facere, detulimus.—Ad Att. 13.

* Quippe mihi nec quæ accidunt, nec quæ aguntur, ullo modo probantur. [Ibid. xl. 4.] Nihil boni præter causam. [Ep. Fam. vii. 3.] Itaque ego, quem tum fortes illi viri, Domitii et Lentuli, timidum esse dicebant, &c. [Ibid. vi. 21.] quo quidem in bello, nihil adversal accidit non prædicente me.—Ibid. 6.

* Cujus me mei facti penituit, non tam propter periculum meum, quam propter vitia multa, quæ sibi offendi, quo veneram.—Ibid. vii. 3. Plutarch. in Cic.

* Ipse fugi adhuc omne munus, eo magis, quod ita nihil poterat agi, ut mihi et meis rebus aptum esset. [Ad Att. xl. 4.] Quod autem idem mestitiam meam reprehendit, idem jocum; magno argumento est, me in utroque fuisse moderatum.—Phil. II. 16.

Some of Cicero's sayings on this occasion are preserved by different writers. When Pompey put him in mind of his coming so late to them: How can I come late, said he, when I find nothing in readiness among you?—and upon Pompey's asking him sarcastically, where his son-in-law Dolabella was; He is with your father-in-law,

Young Brutus was also in Pompey's camp, & he distinguished himself by a peculiar zeal; & Cicero mentions as the more remarkable, because he had always professed an irreconcilable hatred to Pompey as to the murderer of his father*. he followed the cause, not the man; sacrificed his resentments to the service of his country, looking now upon Pompey as the general of the republic and the defender of their common lib.

During the course of this war, Cicero speaks of Pompey's conduct but as a per succession of blunders. His first step, of leaving Italy, was condemned indeed by all, but particularly by Atticus; yet to us, at this distance seems not only to have been prudent, but necessary*. What shocked people so much at it the discovery that it made of his weakness, want of preparation; and after the security he had all along affected, and the defiance he declared against his adversary, it made him appear contemptible to run away at last on the first approach of Cæsar. "Did you ever see," Cælius, "a more silly creature than this Pompey; who, after raising all this bustle, is to be such a trifier? or did you ever read or see a man more vigorous in action, more temperate in victory, than our Cæsar?"

Pompey had left Italy about a year before (found it convenient to go after him; during the time he had gathered a vast fleet from all the maritime states and cities dependent on them without making any use of it to distress an enemy who had no fleet at all: he suffered Sicily and Sardinia to fall into Cæsar's hands without a battle, and the important town of Marseilles, after he endured a long siege for its affection to him. But his capital error was the giving up Spain neglecting to put himself at the head of the army that he had, in a country devoted to his interests, and commodious for the operations of naval force. When Cicero first heard of this blunder, he thought it monstrous; and, in the committing that war to his lieutenants, a replied he. To a person newly arrived from Italy informing them of a strong report at Rome, that I was blocked up by Cæsar; And you sailed hither the said he, that you might see it with your own eyes even after their defeat, when Nonnius was exhorting to courage, because there were seven eagles still Pompey's camp; You encourage well, said he, if you fight with jackdaws. By the frequency of the nettle jokes, he is said to have provoked Pompey to tell him, I wish that you would go over to the side that you may begin to fear us.—Macrob. Saturn. Plutarch. in Cic.

* Brutus amicus in causa venimus acriter.—Ad Att. 4; Plutarch. in Brut. et Pomp.

* Quorum dux quam ὁστρακισμῶν, tu quoque madvertis, cui ne Ploena quidem nota sunt: quam sine consilio, res testis.—Ad Att. vii. 13.

Si isto Italiam relinquet, faciet omnino male, et existimo ἀλογιστος, &c.—Ibid. ix. 10.

* Ecquando tu hominem ineptiorem quam tu Pompeium vidisti? qui tantas turbas, qui tam esset, commoritur? equum autem Cæsare nostro a in rebus agenda, eodem in victoria temperate legisti audisti?—Ep. Fam. viii. 15.

* Omnia hæc classis Alexandria, Colchia, Tyro, Cypro, Pamphilia, Lycia, Rhodo, &c. ad interitum Italiae commentus—comparatur.—Ad Att. ix. 9.

Nunciant Ægyptum cogitare; Hispaniam ab Monstra narrant.—Ad Att. ix. 11.

the superior genius and ascendant of Cæsar, was the ruin of his best troops and hopes at once.

Some have been apt to wonder why Cæsar, after fleeing Pompey out of Italy, instead of crossing the sea after him, when he was in no condition to resist, should leave him for the space of a year to gather arms and fleets at his leisure, and strengthen himself with all the forces of the East. But Cæsar had good reasons for what he did: he knew that all the troops which could be drawn together from those quarters were no match for his; that if he had pursued him directly to Greece, and driven him out of it, as he had done out of Italy, he should have driven him probably into Spain, where of all places he desired the least to meet him; and where, in all circumstances, Pompey had a sure resource as long as it was possessed by a firm and veteran army; which from Cæsar's business therefore to destroy in the first place, or he could expect no success from the war; and there was no opportunity of destroying it so favourable as when Pompey himself was at such a distance from it. This was the reason of his marching back with so much expedition, "to do," as he said, "an army without a general, and to leave to a general without an army." The event proved that he judged right; for within forty days from the first sight of his enemy in Spain, he made himself master of the whole province.

After the reduction of Spain, he was created dictator by M. Lepidus, then prætor at Rome; and by his dictatorial power declared himself consul, with P. Servilius Isauricus; but he was no sooner invested with this office, than he marched to Brundisium, and embarked, on the fourth of January, in order to find out Pompey. The carrying about in his person the supreme dignity of the empire, and no small authority to his cause, by making offices and states abroad the more cautious of attacking him, or giving them a better pretext at least for opening their gates to the consul himself. Cicero all this while, despairing of any success from the war, had been using all his endeavours to dispose his friends to peace, till Pompey made any farther mention of it in council; declaring that he valued neither life nor country for what he must be indebted to Cæsar, as the world would take the case to be, should he accept any conditions in his present circumstances. He was sensible that he had hitherto been acting a considerable part, and done nothing equal to the great success which he had acquired in the world; and was determined, therefore, to retrieve his honour, before he laid down his arms, by the destruction of his enemy, or to perish in the attempt.

During the blockade of Dyrrhachium, it was a great notion in Cæsar's army that Pompey would draw off his troops into his ships, and remove the war to some distant place. Upon this, Dolabella, who was with Cæsar, sent a letter to Cicero, into Pompey's camp, exhorting him, "that if Pompey should be driven from these quarters, to seek some other country, he would sit down quietly at Athens, or any city remote from the war: that it was time to think of his own safety, and be a friend to himself rather than to others: that he had now fully satisfied his duty, his friendship, and his engagements to that party which he had espoused in the republic: that there was nothing left but to be where the republic itself now was, rather than, by following that ancient one, to be in none at all; and that Cæsar would readily approve this conduct." But the war took a quite different turn; and instead of Pompey's running away from Dyrrhachium, Cæsar, by an unexpected defeat before it, was forced to retire the first, and leave to Pompey the credit of pursuing him, as in a kind of flight towards Macedonia.

While the two armies were thus employed, Cælius, now prætor at Rome, trusting to his power and the success of his party, began to publish several violent and odious laws, especially one for the cancelling of all debts. This raised a great flame in the city, till he was overruled and deposed from his magistracy by the consul Servilius and the senate: but being made desperate by this affront, he recalled Milo from his exile at Marseilles, whom Cæsar had refused to restore; and, in concert with him, resolved to raise some public commotion in favour of Pompey. In this disposition, he wrote his last letter to Cicero; in which, after an account of his conversion, and the service which he was projecting, "You are asleep," says he, "and do not know how open and weak we are here: what are you doing? are you waiting for a battle, which is sure to be against you? I am not acquainted with your troops; but ours have been long used to fight hard, and to bear cold and hunger with ease." But this disturbance, which began to alarm all Italy, was soon ended by the death of the authors of it, Milo and Cælius, who perished in their rash attempt, being destroyed by the soldiers whom they were endeavouring to debauch. They had both attached themselves very early to the interests and the authority of Cicero, and were qualified by their parts and fortunes to have made a principal figure in the republic, if they had continued in those sentiments, and adhered to his advice; but their passions, pleasures, and ambition, got the ascendant, and, through a factious and turbulent life, hurried them on to this wretched fate.

All thoughts of peace being now laid aside, Cicero's next advice to Pompey was, to draw the war into length, nor ever to give Cæsar the oppor-

¹ Illud autem a te peto, ut, si jam ille evitaverit hoc periculum, et se abdidit in classem, tu tuis rebus consulas: et aliquando tibi potius quam civis sis amicus. Satis factum est jam a te vel officio, vel familiaritati; satisfactum etiam partibus, et ei reipublice quam tu probabas. Reliquum est, ubi nunc est respublica ibi sumus potius, quam dum veterem illam sequamur, simul in nulla.—Ep. Fam. ix. 9.

² Cæs. De Bello Civ. iii. 600.

³ Vos dormitis, nec hæc adhuc mihi videmini intelligere, quam nos pateamus, et quam sumus imbecilli—quid istis facitis? prælium expectatis, quod firmissimum est? vestras copias non novi. Nostris valde depugnare, et facile algere et esurire consueverint.—Ep. Fam. viii. 17.

ad exercitum sine duce, et inde reversum ad sine exercitu.—Seston. J. Cæs. 34.

Cæs. De Bello Civ. ii.

si se daturus negare, neque portas consuli præclusum.—Id. iii. 500.

superans victoriam, primum copii suadere pacem, et pacem semper auctor; deinde cum ab ea sententia copiosius valde abhorreret.—Ep. Fam. vii. 3.

Cicero—de Cæsaris mandatis agere instituit; cum Pompeum in sermone Pompeius interpellavit, et loqui se prohibuit. Quid mihi, inquit, aut vita aut civitate est, quam beneficio Cæsaris habere videbor?—Cæs. De Bello Civ. iii. 505.

tunity of a battle. Pompey approved this counsel, and pursued it for some time, till he gained the advantage above-mentioned before Dyrrhachium; which gave him such a confidence in his own troops, and such a contempt of Cæsar's, "that from this moment," says Cicero, "this great man ceased to be a general; opposed a raw, new-raised army to the most robust and veteran legions; was shamefully beaten, and, with the loss of his camp, forced to fly away alone!"

Had Cicero's advice been followed, Cæsar must inevitably have been ruined: for Pompey's fleet would have cut off all supplies from him by sea, and it was not possible for him to subsist long at land while an enemy, superior in number of troops, was perpetually harassing him and wasting the country: and the report everywhere spread of his flying from Dyrrhachium before a victorious army which was pursuing him, made his march every way the more difficult, and the people of the country more shy of assisting him: till the despicable figure that he seemed to make raised such an impatience for fighting, and assurance of victory in the Pompeian chiefs, as drew them to the fatal resolution of giving him battle at Pharsalia. There was another motive likewise suggested to us by Cicero, which seems to have had no small influence in determining Pompey to this unhappy step; his superstitious regard to omens, and the admonitions of diviners, to which his nature was strongly addicted. The haruspices were all on his side, and flattered him with everything that was prosperous: and besides those in his own camp, the whole fraternity of them at Rome were sending him perpetual accounts of the fortunate and auspicious significations which they had observed in the entrails of their victims¹.

But, after all, it must needs be owned, that Pompey had a very difficult part to act, and much less liberty of executing what he himself approved, than in all the other wars in which he had been engaged. In his wars against foreign enemies, his power was absolute, and all his motions depended on his own will; but in this, besides several kings and princes of the East who attended him in person, he had with him in his camp almost all the chief magistrates and senators of Rome; men of equal dignity with himself, who had commanded armies, and obtained triumphs, and expected a share in all his councils; and that, in their common danger, no step should be taken but by their common advice: and as they were under no engagement to his cause but what was voluntary, so they were necessarily to be humoured, lest through disgust they should desert it. Now these were all uneasy in their present situation, and longed to be at home in the enjoyment of their estates and honours; and having a confidence of victory, from the number of their troops and the reputation of their leader, were perpetually teasing Pompey the resolution of a battle, charging him with a sign to protract the war for the sake of perpetuating his authority; and calling him another Memnon, who was proud of holding so many kings and generals under his command²; till, being unable to withstand their reproaches any longer, he was driven, by a kind of shame, and against his judgment, to the experiment of a decisive action.

Cæsar was sensible of Pompey's difficulty, persuaded that he could not support the indignity of showing himself afraid of fighting; and that assurance exposed himself often more than prudence would otherwise justify: for his besieging Pompey at Dyrrhachium, who was master of the sea which supplied everything to him, was wanted, while his own army was starving in land; and the attempt to block up intrenchments so widely extended with much smaller numbers than were employed to defend them, must not be thought rash and extravagant, were it not the expectation of drawing Pompey by it to a general engagement; for when he could not gain the end, his perseverance in the siege had like to have ruined him, and would inevitably have done so had he not quitted it, as he himself afterwards owned³.

It must be observed likewise, that while Pompey had any walls or intrenchments between him and Cæsar, not all Cæsar's vigour, nor the courage of his veterans, could gain the least advantage against him; but on the contrary, that Cæsar baffled and disappointed in every attempt. Till at Brundisium he could make no impression on the town, till Pompey at full leisure had seen his retreat, and embarked his troops: and at Dyrrhachium, the only considerable action which happened between them, was not only disadvantageous but almost fatal to him. Thus far Pompey certainly showed himself the greater captain, in suffering a force, which he could not resist in the field, to do him any hurt, or carry any point against him, since that depended on the skill of the general. By the help of intrenchments he knew how to make his new-raised soldiers a match for Cæsar's veterans; but when he was drawn to encounter him on the open plain, he fought against insuperable odds, by deserting his proper arms, as Cicero says of caution, counsel, and authority, in which was superior, and committing his fate to sword and spears, and bodily strength, in which his armies far excelled him⁴.

Cicero was not present at the battle of Pharsalia, but was left behind at Dyrrhachium much

¹ Καὶ ἐπὶ τῷδε αὐτὸν βασιλεὺς καὶ Ἀγαμέμνων καλοῦνται, ὅτι καὶ αὐτὸν βασιλεὺς διὰ τὸν πόλεμον ἤρχειν ἐξέστη τῶν οὐρανῶν λογισμῶν, καὶ ἰσχυρὰ αὐτοῖς.—App. p. 470.

Milites otium, socii moram, principes ambitum d' increpabant.—Flor. iv. 2; Dio, p. 185; Plutarch. in Po.

² Cæsar pro natura ferocis, et confidentis rei cupit ostentare acriem, provocare, lacessere; nunc obsidi castrorum, quæ sedem millium vallo obducent; quid his obsedi obsidio, qui patente mari omnibus et abundarent? nunc expugnatio Dyrrhachii irrita.—Flor. iv. 2.

³ Ὁμολόγει τε μεταγινώσκειν πρὸς Δυρραχίον σιτοπεδεύσας, &c.—App. p. 468.

⁴ Non his rebus pugnamus, quibus valere poteris consilio, auctoritate, causa, quæ erant in nobis superi

¹ Cum ab ea sententia Pompeius valde abhorreret, suadere instituit, ut bellum duceret: hoc interdum probabat et in ea sententia videbatur fore, et fulset fortasse, nisi quadam ex pugna cepisset militibus suis confidere. Ex eo tempore vir ille summus nullus imperator fuit: victus turpissime, amisisset etiam castra, solus fugit.—Ep. Fam. vii. 3.

² Hoc civili bello, dii immortales!—quæ nobis in Græcia Roma responsa haruspicum missa sunt? quæ dicta Pompeio?—etenim ille admodum extis et ostentis movebatur.—De Div. ii. 24.

SECTION VIII.

of humour, as well as out of order: his discontent to see all things going wrong on that side, and contrary to his advice, had brought upon him an ill habit of body and weak state of health, which made him decline all public command; but he prevailed Pompey to follow, and continue with him, as soon as his health permitted; and as a pledge of his sincerity, sent his son in the meanwhile along with him, who, though very young, behaved himself gallantly, and acquired great applause by his dexterity of riding and throwing the javelin, and performing every other part of military discipline at the head of one of the wings of horse, of which Pompey had given him the command. Cato staid behind also in the camp at Dyrrhachium, which he commanded with fifteen cohorts, when Fabianus brought them the news of Pompey's defeat, upon which Cato offered the command to Cæsar, as the superior in dignity; and upon his refusal of it, as Plutarch tells us, young Pompey was so enraged that he drew his sword, and would have killed him upon the spot, if Cato had not prevented it. This fact is not mentioned by Cæsar, yet seems to be referred to in his speech to Marcellus, where he says, that in the very war he had been a perpetual assertor of peace, to the end even of his life. But the wretched news from Pharsalia threw them all into such a consternation, that they presently took shipping, and dispersed themselves severally, as their hopes or obligations led them, into the different provinces of the empire. The greatest part, who were determined to renew the war, went directly into Africa, to the general rendezvous of their scattered forces; others, who were disposed to expect the better issue of things, and take such measures as time offered, retired to Achæia: but Cicero was resolved to make this the end of the war to himself, and recommended the same conduct to his friends, saying, that as they had been no match for Cæsar when entire, they could not hope to beat him when shattered and broken: and so, after a miserable campaign of about eighteen months, he submitted himself without hesitation to the mercy of the conqueror, and landed again at Brundisium about the end of October.

et laetitia et viribus, quibus pares non fuimus.—Ep. Fam. vi. 7.
 Dolentique pilis et gladiis, non consiliis neque auctoritate nostris de jure publico disceptari.—Ep. Fam. vi. 1.
 * Ipse fugi adhuc omne munus, eo magis, quod nihil ita mihi agi, ut mihi et meis rebus aptum esset.—me conficit sollicitudo, ex qua etiam summa infirmitas corporis; qua etiam, ac cum eo, qui negotium gerit, estque in magna infirmitate.—Ad Att. xi. 4.
 * Quo tamen in bello cum te Pompeius alie alteri præfatu, magnam laudem et a summo viro et ab exercitu merebare, equitando, jaculando, omni militari labore exercendo: atque ex quidem tua laus pariter cum republica cecidit.—De Offic. ii. 13.
 * Exitus de pace dixi, et in ipso bello, eadem etiam cum te mihi periculo sensi.—Pro Marcell. 5.
 * Transiis nunc post dies ex Pharsalica fuga venisse Ciceronem: qui cum interitum exercitus nunciasset.—De Divin. i. 32.
 * Hunc ego belli mihi finem feci; nec putavi, cum Cæsar pares non fuissimus, fractos superiores fore.—Ep. Fam. vi. 3.

CICERO no sooner returned to Italy than he began to reflect that he had been too hasty in coming home, before the war was determined, and without any invitation from the conqueror; and in a time of that general licence, had reason to apprehend some insult from the soldiers, if he ventured to appear in public with his fasces and laurel; and yet to drop them would be a diminution of that honour which he had received from the Roman people, and the acknowledgment of a power superior to the laws: he condemned himself therefore for not continuing abroad, in some convenient place of retirement, till he had been sent for, or things were better settled. What gave him the greater reason to repent of this step was, a message that he received from Antony, who governed all in Cæsar's absence, and with the same churlish spirit with which he would have held him before in Italy against his will, seemed now disposed to drive him out of it: for he sent him the copy of a letter from Cæsar, in which Cæsar signified, "that he had heard that Cato and Metellus were at Rome, and appeared openly there, which might occasion some disturbance; wherefore he strictly enjoined that none should be suffered to come to Italy without a special licence from himself." Antony therefore desired Cicero to excuse him, since he could not help obeying Cæsar's commands: but Cicero sent L. Lamia to assure him that Cæsar had ordered Dolabella to write to him to come to Italy as soon as he pleased, and that he came upon the authority of Dolabella's letter: so that Antony, in the edict which he published to exclude the Pompeians from Italy, excepted Cicero by name, which added still to his mortification; since all his desire was to be con- vived at only, or tacitly permitted, without being personally distinguished from the rest of his party.

But he had several other grievances of a domestic kind, which concurred also to make him unhappy: his brother Quintus, with his son, after their escape from Pharsalia, followed Cæsar into Asia, to obtain their pardon from him in person. Quintus had particular reason to be afraid of his resentment, on account of the relation which he had borne to him as one of his lieutenants in Gaul, where he had been treated by him with great generosity; so that Cicero himself would have dissuaded him from going over to Pompey, but could not prevail: yet

* Ego vero et incante, ut scribis, et celerius quam oportuit, feci, &c.—Ad Att. xi. 9.

Quare voluntatis me mæe nunquam penitebit, consilii penitet. In oppido aliquo mallem recessisse, quoad arcescer. Minus sermonis subtilissem: minus acceptissem doloris: ipsum hoc non me angere. Brundisii jacere in omnes partes est molestum. Propius accedere, ut suasdes, quomodò sine lictoribus, quos populus dedit, possum? qui mihi incolumi adimi non possunt.—Ad Att. xi. 6.

* Sed quid ego de lictoribus, qui pene ex Italia decedere sim jussus? nam ad me misit Antonius exemplum Cæsaris ad se literarum; in quibus erat, se audisse, Catonem et L. Metellum in Italiam venisse, Romæ ut essent palam, &c. Tum ille edixit ita, ut me exopere et Lellum nominatim. Quod sane nollem. Poterat enim sine nomine, re ipsa excipi. O multas graves offensiones!—Ibid. 7.

in this common calamity, Quintus, in order to make his own peace the more easily, resolved to throw all the blame upon his brother, and for that purpose made it the subject of all his letters and speeches to Cæsar's friends, to rail at him in a manner the most inhuman.

Cicero was informed of this from all quarters, and that young Quintus, who was sent before towards Cæsar, had read an oration to his friends, which he had prepared to speak to him against his uncle. Nothing (as Cicero says) ever happened more shocking to him; and though he had no small diffidence of Cæsar's inclination, and many enemies labouring to do him ill offices, yet his greatest concern was, lest his brother and nephew should hurt themselves rather than him, by their perfidy^a: for under all the sense of this provocation, his behaviour was just the reverse of theirs; and having been informed that Cæsar in a certain conversation had charged his brother with being the author of their going away to Pompey, he took occasion to write to him in the following terms:—

"As for my brother, I am not less solicitous for his safety than my own; but in my present situation dare not venture to recommend him to you: all that I can pretend to is, to beg that you will not believe him to have ever done anything towards obstructing my good offices and affection to you; but rather, that he was always the adviser of our union, and the companion, not the leader of my voyage: wherefore, in all other respects I leave it to you to treat him as your own humanity and his friendship with you require; but I entreat you, in the most pressing manner, that I may not be the cause of hurting him with you on any account whatsoever^b."

He found himself likewise at this time in some distress for want of money, which in that season of public distraction it was very difficult to procure, either by borrowing or selling: the sum which he advanced to Pompey had drained him; and his wife, by her indulgence to stewards and favourite servants, had made great waste of what was left at home; and instead of saving anything from their rents, had plunged him deeply into debt: so that Atticus's purse was the chief fund which he had to trust to for his present support^c.

The conduct of Dolabella was a farther mortification to him, who, by the fiction of an adoption into a plebeian family, had obtained the tribunate this year, and was raising great tumults and disorders in Rome, by a law which he published, to expunge all debts. Laws of that kind had been ^a Quintus misit filium non solum sui deprecatorem, sed etiam accusatorem meum—neque vero desistit, ubicunque est omnia in me maledicta conferre. Nihil mihi unquam tam incredibile accidit, nihil in his malis tam acerbum.—Ad Att. xi. 8.

^b Epistolæ mihi legerunt plenas omnium in me proborum—Ipse enim illi putavi perniciosum fore, si ejus hoc tantum oculis percubisset.—Ibid. 9.

^c Quintum filium—volumen sibi ostendisse orationis, quam apud Cæsarem contra me esset habiturus—multa postea patriâ, consilium scelere patrem esse locutum.—Ibid. 10.

^d Cum mihi literæ a Balbo minore misse essent, Cæsarem existimare, Quintum fratrem litibus meæ protectionis fuisse, sic enim scripsit.—Ad Att. xi. 12.

^e Velim consideres ut sit, unde nobis suppedientur sumtus necessarii. Si quas habuimus facultates, eas Pompeio, tum, cum id videbatur sapienter facere, detulimus.—Ibid. xiii. 2, 22, &c.

often attempted by desperate or ambitious men, but were always detested by the people, and particularly by Cicero, who treats maliciously the peace and prosperity, sapping the very foundations of civil society, destroying all faith and credit among men, and therefore, that we find his affair so much to heart, and complain in many of his letters to Atticus, of the loss of his son-in-law, as an additional sorrow and disgrace to him^b. Dolabella, embarrassed in his fortunes, and while Cæsar abroad, seems to have left his necessities at home, and forced to father for her subsistence. Cicero, through the difficulty of the times, or sufficient settlement on Dolabella's part, yet paid all her fortune; which it was at three different payments, within a year by law: he had discharged the two now preparing to make the third part, he frequently and pressingly recommended care of Atticus^c. But Dolabella's character was so entirely contrary to the temper both of Cicero and Tullia, ensued between them not long after account of it is delivered so darkly, that to say at what time or from what arose.

In these circumstances Tullia paid visit at Brundisium on the thirteenth but his great love for her made their more afflicting to him in that their fortunes; "I was so far," as taking that pleasure which I ought from the virtue, humanity, and piety of my daughter, that I was exceeding so deserving a creature in such condition, not by her own, but wholly I saw no reason therefore for keeping here in this our common affliction, to send her back to her mother would consent to it^d."

At Brundisium he received the news of his death, which did not surprise him, as the short reflection that he makes to Pompey's end (says he) I never about it: for the lost and desperate affairs had so possessed the minds of men and states abroad, that whithersoever it for granted that this would be his

^a Nec enim ulla res vehementius rempuam quam fides: quæ esse nulla potest, nisi solutio rerum crediturum, &c.—De Officiis. i.

^b Quod me audis fructuosum esse animum vides accessisse ad superiores agrorum generi actiones?—Ad Att. xi. 12.

^c Etiam omnium conspectum horreo, præse—Ibid. 14, 15, &c.

^d De dote, quod scribis, per omnes decem totam rem suscipias, et illam miseram meis opibus, si quas sunt; tuis, quibus tunc erit facultatibus.—Ibid. xi. 2.

^e De pensione altera, oro te, omni cura facienda sit.—Ibid. xi. 4.

^f Tullia mea ad me venit prid. Id. J. ex ipsius virtute, humanitate, pietate ne luptatem non cepi, quam capere ex singulis sed otium in credibili sum dolore affectus in tam misera fortuna versari.—Ibid. xi. xiv. 11.

not however help grieving at it; for I knew him to be an honest, grave, and worthy man.*"

This was the short and true character of the man from one who perfectly knew him, not heightened, as we sometimes find it, by the shining colour of his eloquence, nor depressed by the darker strokes of his resentment. Pompey had early acquired the surname of the Great, by that sort of merit which, from the constitution of the republic, necessarily made him great; a fame and success in war superior to what Rome had ever known in the most celebrated of her generals. He had triumphed at three several times over the three different parts of the known world, Europe, Asia, Africa, and by his victories had almost doubled the extent as well as the revenues of the Roman dominion; for as he declared to the people on his return from the Mithridatic war, he had found the Lesser Asia the boundary, but left it the middle of their empire. He was about six years older than Cæsar; and while Cæsar, immersed in pleasures, oppressed with debts, and suspected by all honest men, was hardly able to show his head, Pompey was flourishing in the height of power and glory, and by the consent of all parties placed at the head of the republic. This was the post that his ambition seemed to aim at—to be the first man in Rome—the leader, not the tyrant of his country: for he more than once had in his power to have made himself the master of it without any risk, if his virtue, or his phlegm at least, had not restrained him; but he lived in a perpetual expectation of receiving from the gift of the people what he did not care to seize by force; and by fomenting the disorders of the city, hoped to drive them to the necessity of creating him dictator. It is an observation of all the historians, that while Cæsar made no difference of power, whether it was conceded or usurped, whether over those who loved him or those who feared him, Pompey seemed to value what was offered, nor to have any desire to govern but with the good-will of the governed. When leisure he found from his wars he employed it in the study of polite letters, and especially of eloquence, in which he would have acquired great fame, if his genius had not drawn him to the more brilliant glory of arms: yet he pleaded several reasons with applause, in the defence of his friends and clients, and some of them in conjunction with Cæsar. His language was copious and elevated, his sentiments just, his voice sweet, his action noble, and full of dignity. But his talents were better formed for arms than the gown; for though he both he observed the same discipline, a perpetual modesty, temperance, and gravity of outward behaviour, yet in the licence of camps the example was more rare and striking. His person was extremely graceful, and imprinting respect, yet with an air of reserve and haughtiness which became the general better than the citizen. His parts were plausible rather than great, specious rather than penetrating, and his view of politics but narrow; for his chief instrument of governing was dissimulation; yet he had not always the art to conceal his real sentiments. As he was a better soldier than a statesman, so what he gained in the camp he usually lost in the city, and though adored when abroad, was often affronted and mortified at home, till the imprudent opposition of the senate drove him to that alliance with Crassus and Cæsar which proved fatal both to himself and the republic. He took in these two, not as the partners, but the ministers rather of his power; that by giving them some share with him he might make his own authority uncontrollable: he had no reason to apprehend that they could ever prove his rivals, since neither of them had any credit or character of that kind which alone could raise them above the laws—a superior fame and experience in war, with the militia of the empire at their devotion: all this was purely his own, till by cherishing Cæsar, and throwing into his hands the only thing which he wanted, arms and military command, he made him at last too strong for himself, and never began to fear him till it was too late. Cicero warmly dissuaded both his union and his breach with Cæsar, and after the rupture, as warmly still the thought of giving him battle. If any of these counsels had been followed, Pompey had preserved his life and honour, and the republic its liberty. But he was urged to his fate by a natural superstition, and attention to those vain auguries with which he was flattered by all the haruspices: he had seen the same temper in Marius and Sylla, and observed the happy effects of it; but they assumed it only out of policy, he out of principle. They used it to animate their soldiers, when they had found a probable opportunity of fighting; but he, against all prudence and probability, was encouraged by it to fight to his own ruin. He saw all his mistakes at last, when it was out of his power to correct them; and in his wretched flight from Pharsalia, was forced to confess that he had trusted too much to his hopes, and that Cicero had judged better, and seen farther into things than he. The resolution of seeking refuge in Egypt finished the sad catastrophe of this great man. The father of the reigning prince had been highly obliged to him for his protection at Rome and restoration to his kingdom; and the son had sent a considerable fleet to his assistance in the present war; but in this ruin of his fortunes, what gratitude was there to be expected from a court governed by eunuchs and mercenary Greeks? all whose politics turned, not on the honour of the king, but the establishment of their own power, which was likely to be eclipsed by the admission of Pompey. How happy had it been for him to have died in that sickness, when all Italy was putting up vows and prayers for his safety! or if he had fallen by the chance of war on the plains of Pharsalia, in the defence of his country's liberty, he had died still glorious, though unfortunate: but as if he had been reserved for an example of the instability of human greatness, he who a few days before commanded kings and consuls, and all the noblest of Rome, was sentenced to die by a council of slaves; murdered by a base deserter; cast out naked and headless on the Egyptian strand; and when the whole earth (as Velleius says) had scarce been sufficient for his victories, could not find a spot upon it at last for a grave. His body was burnt on the shore by one of his freedmen, with the planks of an old fishing-boat; and his ashes being conveyed to Rome, were deposited privately by his wife Cornelia in a vault of his Alban villa. The Egyptians, however, raised a monument to him on the place, and adorned it with figures of brass, which being defaced afterwards by time, and buried almost in sand and rubbish, was sought out and restored by the emperor Hadrian¹.

* De Pompeii exitu mihi dubium nunquam fuit: tanta enim desperatione rerum ejus omnium rerum et populorum minas occupant, ut quocunque venisset, hoc putarem futurum. Non possum ejus casum non dolere: hominem enim integrum et castum et gravem cognovi.—Ad Att. xi. 6.

On the news of Pompey's death, Cæsar was declared dictator the second time in his absence, and M. Antony his master of the horse, who by virtue of that post governed all things absolutely in Italy. Cicero continued all the while at Brundisium, in a situation wholly disagreeable, and worse to him (he says) than any punishment: for the air of the place began to affect his health, and to the uneasiness of mind added an ill state of body²: yet to move nearer towards Rome without leave from his new masters was not thought advisable, nor did Antony encourage it, being pleased rather, we may believe, to see him well mortified: so that he had no hopes of any ease or comfort but in the expectation of Cæsar's return, which made his stay in that place the more necessary for the opportunity of paying his early compliments to him at landing.

But what gave him the greatest uneasiness was, to be held still in suspense in what touched him the most nearly, the case of his own safety and of Cæsar's disposition towards him: for though all Cæsar's friends assured him not only of pardon, but of all kind of favour; yet he had received so intimation of kindness from Cæsar himself, who was so embarrassed in Egypt that he had no leisure to think of Italy, and did not so much as write a letter thither from December to June; for as he had rashly, and out of gaiety as it were, involved himself there in a most desperate war to the hazard of all his fortunes, he was ashamed (as Cicero says³) to write anything about it till he had extricated himself out of that difficulty.

His enemies in the mean time had greatly strengthened themselves in Africa, where P. Varus, who first seized it on the part of the republic, was supported by all the force of king Juba, Pompey's fast friend, and had reduced the whole province to his obedience; for Curio, after he had driven Cato out of Sicily, being ambitious to drive Varus out of Africa, and having transported thither the best part of four legions, which Cæsar had committed to him, was, after some little success upon his landing, entirely defeated and destroyed with his whole army in an engagement with Sabus, king Juba's general.

Curio was a young nobleman of shining parts; admirably formed by nature to adorn that character in which his father and grandfather had flourished before him, of one of the principal orators of Rome. Upon his entrance into the forum he was committed to the care of Cicero; but a natural propensity to pleasure, stimulated by the example and counsels of his perpetual companion Antony, hurried him into all the extravagance of expense and debauchery; for Antony, who always wanted money, with which Curio abounded, was ever so sequious to his will and ministering to his lusts, for the opportunity of gratifying his own: so that no boy purchased for the use of lewdness was more in a master's power than Antony in Curio's. He was equally prodigal of his money and his modesty, and not only of his own but of other people's; so that Cicero, alluding to the infamous effeminacy of his life, calls him in one of his letters, Misce Curio. But when the father, by Cicero's advice, had obliged him by his paternal authority to quit the familiarity of Antony, he reformed his conduct and adhering to the instructions and maxims of Cicero, became the favourite of the city, the leader of the young nobility, and a warm assertor of the authority of the senate against the power of the triumvirate. After his father's death, upon his first taste of public honours and admission into the senate, his ambition and thirst of popularity engaged him in so immense a prodigality, that to supply the magnificence of his shows and plays with which he entertained the city, he was soon

¹ Hujus viri fastigium tantis auctibus fortuna extulit, ut primum ex Africa, iterum ex Europa, tertio ex Asia triumpharet: et quot partes terrarum orbis sunt, totidem faceret monumenta victoriae. [Vell. Pat. li. 40.] Ut ipse in concione dixit,—Asiam ultimam provinciarum accepisse, mediam patriæ reddidisse. [Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 26; Flor. iii. 8.] Potentia quæ honoris causæ ad eum deferretur, non ut ab eo occuparetur, cupidissimus. [Vell. Pat. li. 29; Dio, p. 178.] Meus autem squalis Cn. Pompeius, habuit omnia summa tanta, majorem dicendi gloriam, abulisset, nisi eum majoris gloriæ cupiditas ad bellicas laudes abstraxisset. Erat oratione satis amplius: rem prudenter videbat: actio vero ejus habebat et in voce magnum splendorem, et in motu summam dignitatem. [Brut. 364; Pro Balbo. 1. 2.] Forma excellens, non ea, quæ sibi commendatur ætatis, sed ex dignitate constanti. [Vell. Pat. li. 29.] Illud os probum, ipsæque honorem extinxerunt frontia. [Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 12.] Solet enim aliud sentire et loqui, neque tantum valere ingenio, ut non appareat quid cupiat. [Ep. Fam. viii. 1.] Ille aluit, auxit, armavit—ille Gallie ultioris adjunctor—ille provincie propagator; ille abessenti in omnibus adjutor. [Ad Att. viii. 3.] aluerat Cæsarem, eundem repente timere coeperat. [Ibid. 8.] Ego nihil prætermisi, quantum facere, nitiq[ue] potui, quin Pompeium a Cæsaris conjunctione avocarem—Idem ego, cum jam omnes opes et suæ et populi Romani Pompeius ad Cæsarem detulisset, seroque ea sentire corripisset, quæ ego ante multo provideram—pacis, concordie, compositionis auctor esse non destiti: meaue illa vox est nota multis, Utinam, Pompei, cum Cæsare societatem aut nunquam coisces, aut nunquam dirimisses!—hæc mea, Antoni, et de Pompeio et de republica consilia fuerunt: quæ si valuisent, respublica staret. [Phil. ii. 10.] Multi testes, me et initio ne conjungeret se cum Cæsare, monuisse Pompeium, et postea, ne se jungeret, &c. [Ep. Fam. vi. 6.] Quid vero singularis ille vir ac pene divinus de me senserit, sciunt, qui eum de Pharsalica fuga Paphum prosecuti sunt: nunquam ab eo mentio de me nisi honorifica—cum me vidisse plus fateretur, se speravisse meliora. [Ibid. 15.] Qui, si mortem tum obisset, in amplissimis fortunis occidisset; si propagatione vite quot, quantas, quam incredibiles hausit calamitates? [Tusc. Disp. i. 36.] In Pelusiaco litore, imperio villæ sui regis, consilii spædonum, et ne quid malis dedit, Septimii desertoris sui gladio trucidatur. [Flor. iv. 2, 53.] Egyptum petere proposuit, memor beneficiorum quæ in patrem ejus Ptolemæi,—qui tum regnabat, contulerat—Princeps Romani nominis, imperio, arbitrioque Egypti mancipii jugulatus est—in tantum in illo viro a se discordante fortuna, ut cui modo ad victoriam terra deferretur, deesset ad sepulturam.—Vell. Pat. li. 54; Dio, p. 186; Appian. li. 481.

Provida Pompeio dederat Campania febres optandas. Sed multe urbes, et publicæ vota vicierunt. Igitur fortuna ipseus et urbis servatum victo caput abtulit.—Juv. x. 283.

² Quodvis enim supplicium levius est hac permansione. —Ad Att. xi. 18.
Jam enim corpore vix sustineo gravitatem hujus oculi, qui mihi laborem affert, in dolore.—Ibid. 22.

³ Ille enim ita videtur Alexandriam tenere, ut eum scribere etiam pudeat de illis rebus.—Ad Att. xi. 18.
Nec post id. Dec. ab illo datas ullas litteras.—Ibid. 17.

driven to the necessity of selling himself to Caesar : having no revenue left (as Pliny says) but from the sword of his citizens. For this he is considered commonly, by the old writers, as the chief instrument and the trumpet, as it were, of the civil war, in which he justly fell the first victim : yet after all his luxury and debauch, fought and died with a truly Roman, which would have merited a better fate, if it had been employed in a better cause ; for upon the loss of the battle, and his best days, being admonished by his friends to save himself by flight, he answered, that after losing an army which had been committed to him by Caesar, he would never show his face to him again ; and so continued fighting till he was killed among the last of his soldiers.

Curi's death happened before the battle of Pharsala, while Caesar was engaged in Spain ; by which means Africa fell entirely into the hands of the Pompeians, and became the general rendezvous of that party : hither Scipio, Cato, and Laelius, conveyed the remains of their scattered army from Greece, as Afranius and Petreius did from Spain, till, on the whole, they brought together again a more numerous army than Caesar's, and were in such high spirits as to be coming over with it into Italy before Caesar could return from Alexandria. This was confidently given out and expected at Rome ; and in Rome, Cicero was sure to be treated as a deserter : for while Caesar looked upon all men as rebels who did not act against him, and pardoned his enemies who submitted to his power ; it was considered law on the other side to consider all as enemies who were not actually in their camp ; so that Cicero had nothing now to wish, either for himself or the republic, but in the first place a death, of which he had still some hopes ; or else, that Caesar might conquer, whose victory was like to prove the more temperate of the two ; which makes him often lament the unhappy situation to which he was reduced, where nothing could be of any service to him, but what he had always abhorred.

Under this anxiety of mind, it was an additional vexation to him to hear that his reputation was attacked at Rome for submitting so hastily to the conqueror, or putting himself rather at all into his power. Some condemned him for not following Pompey ; some more severely for not going to Africa, as the greatest part had done ; others for not retiring with many of his party to Achaia, till they could see the farther progress of the war : as he was always extremely sensible of what was said of him by honest men, so he begs of Atticus to be his advocate ; and gives him some hints which might be urged in his defence. As to the first charge, for not following Pompey, he says, " that Pompey's fate would extenuate the omission of that step : of the second, that though he knew many brave men to be in Africa, yet it was his opinion that the republic neither could nor ought to be defended by the help of so barbarous and treacherous a nation : as to the third, he wishes indeed that he had joined himself to those in Achaia, and owns them to be in a better condition than himself, because they were many of them together ; and whenever they returned to Italy would be restored to their own at once ;" whereas he was confined like a prisoner of war to Brundisium, without the liberty of stirring from it till Caesar arrived.

While he continued in this uneasy state, some of his friends at Rome contrived to send him a letter in Caesar's name, dated the 9th of February, from Alexandria, encouraging him to lay aside all gloomy apprehensions, and expect every thing that was kind and friendly from him : but it was drawn in terms so slight and general, that instead of giving him any satisfaction, it made him only suspect what he perceived afterwards to be true, that it was forged by Balbus or Oppius on purpose to raise his spirits, and administer some little comfort to him. All his accounts, however, confirmed to him the report of Caesar's clemency and moderation, and his granting pardon without exception to all who asked it ; and with regard to himself, Caesar sent Quintus's virulent letters to Balbus, with orders to show them to him as a proof of his kindness and dislike of Quintus's perfidy. But Cicero's present despondency, which interpreted everything o Mihi cum omnia sunt intolerabilia ad dolorem, tum maxime, quod in eam causam venissem me video, ut ea sola utilia mihi esse videantur, quae semper nolui.—Ad Att. xi. 13.

p Dicebar debuisse cum Pompeio proficisci. Exitus illius minuit ejus officii prætermissem reprehensionem.—Sed ex omnibus nihil magis desideratur, quam quod in Africam non ierim. Judicio hoc sum usus, non esse barbaris auxiliis fallacissime gentis rempublicam defendendam—extremum est eorum, qui in Achaia sunt. Si tamen ipsi se hoc melius habent, quam nos, quod et multi sunt uno loco, et cum in Italiam venerint, domum statim venerint. Haec tu perge, ut facis, mitigare et probare quam plurimam.—Ad Att. xi. 7.

q Ut me ista epistola nihil consoletur ; nam et exiguae scriptae est et magnas suspiciones habet, non esse ab illo.—Ad Att. xi. 16.

Ex quo intelligis, illud de literis a d. v. Id. Feb. datis (quod inane esset, etiam si verum esset) non verum esse.—Ibid. 17.

Read alium tanta civem tulit indole Roma.

Lucan. iv. 814.

hunc hantia Curionum, in qua tres continuae serie occurrunt.—Flin. Hist. Nat. vii. 41.

Curionem habuit admirabilem ad diem.—Brut. 406.

Curionem pauper, corruptis libidinis causa, tam fuit in potestate, quam tu in Curionis. [Phil. ii. 18.] Duce hunc Curionem.—Ad Att. i. 14.

Curionis nobilitas, eloquentia, audax, suae alienaeque fortunae prodigium—cujus animo, voluptatibus vel libidine, neque opes ullae neque cupiditates sufficere possent.—Vall. Pat. 248.

Curio miles pauper olim fidelissimis atque amantissimis periculis.—Ep. Fam. ii. 1.

Curio autem civilis—non alius majorem quam C. Curio fecit faciem.—Vall. Pat. ii. 48.

Quid nunc rostra tibi praesent turbata, forumque

q Fraus tribunitia plebeus significat aere

Arma dabat populo, &c.

Lucan. iv. 800.

Curio, nunquam amicus exarctavit, quem a Caesare fidei commendatum acceperat, se in ejus conspectum reverens, amicum ; atque ita praesentis interficitur.—Caes. Gallic. Ch. ii.

Curio jaces, quam dira duces Pharsalia confert, Expectandumque tibi bellum civile negatum est.

Lucan. iv. 800.

Curio autem ex Africa jam affuturi videntur.—Ad Att. xi.

Curio enim diu audiebat, nos omnes adversarios ejus, nisi qui nobiscum essent ; te omnes, qui contra te essent, tuos.—Pro Ligur. ii. 1 ; Ad Att. xi. 6.

o Et autem, unum, quod mihi sit optandum, si quid ejus pax possit : quod nulla equidem habeo in spe : sed pax in litteris interdum significat, cogit me sperare quod optandum sit.—Ad Att. xi. 19 : it. 12.

by his fears, made him suspect Caesar the more for refusing grace to none, as if such a clemency must needs be affected and his revenge deferred only to a season more convenient; and as to his brother's letters, he fancied that Caesar did not send them to Italy because he condemned them, but to make his present misery and abject condition the more notorious and despicable to everybody*.

But after a long series of perpetual mortifications he was refreshed at last by a very obliging letter from Caesar, who confirmed to him the full enjoyment of his former state and dignity, and bade him resume his fasces and style of emperor as before*. Caesar's mind was too great to listen to the tales of the brother and nephew, and instead of approving their treachery, seems to have granted them their pardon on Cicero's account rather than their own; so that Quintus, upon the trial of Caesar's inclination, began presently to change his note, and to congratulate with his brother on Caesar's affection and esteem for him†.

Cicero was now preparing to send his son to wait upon Caesar, who was supposed to be upon his journey towards home; but the uncertain accounts of his coming diverted him awhile from that thought*, till Caesar himself prevented it, and relieved him very agreeably from his tedious residence at Brundisium, by his sudden and unexpected arrival in Italy; where he landed at Tarentum in the month of September, and on the first notice of his coming forward towards Rome, Cicero set out on foot to meet him.

We may easily imagine, what we find indeed from his letters, that he was not a little discomposed at the thoughts of this interview, and the indignity of offering himself to a conqueror against whom he had been in arms in the midst of a licentious and insolent rabble; for though he had reason to expect a kind reception from Caesar, yet he hardly thought his life (he says) worth begging, since what was given by a master might always be taken away again at pleasure*. But, at their meeting, he had no occasion to say or do anything that was below his dignity; for Caesar no sooner saw him than he alighted and ran to embrace him, and walked with him alone, conversing very familiarly for several furlongs†.

* Omnino dicitur nemini negare: quod ipsum est suspectum, notionem ejus differri.—Ad Att. xi. 20.

† Diligenter mihi fasciculum reddidit Balbi tabellarius: quod ne Caesar quidem ad istos videtur misisse, quasi quo illius improbitate offenderetur, sed credo, uti notitia nostra mala essent.—Ibid. 22.

* Reddite mihi tandem sunt a Cesare literæ satis liberales.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 23.

‡ Qui ad me ex Ægypto literas misit, ut eadem idem, qui fuisse: qui cum ipse imperator in toto imperio populi Romani unus esset, esse me alterum pœnis est: a quocumque fasces laureatos tenui, quoad tendendis putavi.—Pro Ligar. 3.

* Sed mihi valde Quintus gratulatur.—Ad Att. xi. 23.

† Ego cum Ballustio Ciceronem ad Cesarem mittere cogitabam.—Ibid. 17.

De illius Alexandria discessu nihil adhuc rumoris, contraque opinio—itaque nec mitto, ut constitueram, Ciceronem.—Ibid. 18.

* Sed non adeo, quemquam bonum ullam salutem mihi tanti fuisse putare, ut eam potero ab illo.—Ad Att. xi. 18.

† Sed—ab hoc ipso que dantur, ut a domino, rursus in ejusdem sunt potestate.—Ibid. 20.

‡ Ptolemaeus in Cic.

From this interview Cicero followed Caesar towards Rome: he proposed to be at Tusculum the seventh or eighth of October, and wrote his wife to provide for his reception there with a company of friends, who designed to make stay with him*. From Tusculum he came towards the city, with a resolution to spend time in study and retreat, till the republic should be restored to some tolerable state; "having his peace again (as he writes to Varro) with his friends, his books, who had been out of him with him for not obeying their precepts, but instead of living quietly with them, as Varro had been committing himself to the turbulent counsels, hazards of war, with faithless companions*."

On Caesar's return to Rome, he appointed Vatinius and Q. Fufius Calenus, consuls for three last months of the year: this was a very popular use of his new power, which he could however to practise through the rest of his creating these first magistrates of the state with any regard to the ancient forms, or recourse to people, and at any time of the year; which was a sensible disgust to the city, and an early species of the arbitrary manner in which he designed to govern them.

About the end of the year, Caesar embarked for Africa, to pursue the war against Scipio and other Pompeian generals, who, assisted by Juba, held the possession of that province with a vast army. As he was sacrificing for the success of this voyage, the victim happened to break and run away from the altar, which being taken upon as an unlucky omen, the haruspex admonished him not to sail before the winter solstice: he took ship directly in contempt of the admonition and by that means (as Cicero says) came upon enemies unprepared, and before they had gathered together all their forces*. Upon his leaving the city, he declared himself consul, together with Lepidus, for the year ensuing; and gave the government of the Hither Gaul to M. Brutus

* Ep. Fam. xiv. 20.

† Scito enim me posteaquam in urbem venerim, cum veteribus amicis, id est, cum liberis nostris in agnoscunt mihi, revocant in consuetudinem priore, quod in ea permanens, sapientiores, quod dicunt fuisse, &c.—Ep. Fam. ix. 1.

‡ Quid? ipse Caesar, cum a summo haruspice monitus in Africam ante brumam transmitteret, monitus misit? quod ni fecisset, uno in loco omnes adversarii copias convenissent.—De Divin. ii. 24.

Cum immolanti suffragies hostia profectorem ad Scipionem et Juhannem distulit.—Sueton. J. Cæs. Hirtius, in his account of this war, says, that he embarked at Lilybæum for Africa on the 6th of the 1st of Jan. [De Bello Afric. int.] that is, on the 7th of December: whereas Cicero, in the passage just cited, declares him to have passed over before the solstice, shortest day. But this seeming contradiction is owing to a cause already intimated, the great one that was introduced at this time into the Roman Calendar by which the months were all transposed from their seasons, so that the 7th of December, on which, not to their computation, Caesar embarked, was in coincidence, or the same with our 8th of October, or, consequently above two months before the solstice, or shortest day. All which is clearly and accurately explained in a learned dissertation, published by a person of great merit in the university of Cambridge, who chooses to conceal his name.—See Bibliothec. Literar. No. VII. 1794. 4to.

Greece, to Servius Sulpicius; the first of whom had been in arms against him at Pharsalia, and the second was a favourer likewise of the Pompeian cause, and a great friend of Cicero, yet seems to have taken no part in the war^c.

The African war now held the whole empire in suspense; Scipio's name was thought ominous and invincible on that ground; but while the general attention was employed on the expectation of some decisive blow, Cicero, despairing of any good from either side, chose to live retired and out of sight; and whether in the city or the country, shut himself up with his books; which (as he often says) had hitherto been the diversion only, but were now the support of his life^d. In this humour of study he entered into a close friendship and correspondence of letters with M. Terentius Varro, friendship equally valued on both sides, and at the same time immortalised by the mutual dedication of their learned works to each other; of Varro's Academic Questions to Varro; of Varro's edition on the Latin Tongue, to Cicero. Varro was senator of the first distinction, both for birth and merit; esteemed the most learned man of his age, and though now above fourscore years old, continued still writing and publishing books to his eighty-eighth year^e. He was Pompey's lieutenant in Spain in the beginning of the war; but after the defeat of Afranius and Petreius, quitted arms and retired to his studies, so that his present circumstances were not very different from those of Cicero, who, in all his letters to him, beset with great freedom the utter ruin of the state; and proposes "that they should live together in a communication of studies, and avoid at least the idle if not the tongues of men; yet so that if new masters should call for their help to settle the republic, they should run with arms and assist not only as architects but even as masons to build it up again; or if nobody would employ them, should write and read the best forms of government, and, as the learned ancients had done before them, serve their country, if not in the field and forum, yet by their books and studies, by composing treatises of morals and laws^f." In this retreat he wrote his book of Oratorial Questions, or the art of ordering and distributing points of an oration so as to adapt them in the most proper manner to their proper end of moving and pleasing an audience. It was written for the instruction of his son, now about eighteen years of age, but seems to have been the rude draught only that he intended, or not to have been finished to his satisfaction; since we find no mention of it in any of his letters, as of all his other works which were prepared for the public.

^a Quintus Gallus prefecti; Sulpicium Gracile.—Ep. lib. 6.

^b Quibus totius delectationem modo potebamus, nunc solam salutem.—Ep. Fam. ix. 2.

^c M. Terentium aetatem octogesimo octavo vitæ anno scripsit.—Plin. Hist. Nat. xxix. 4.

^d *Non deesse si quis adhibere volet, non modo ut architectum officium ut fabrum, ad edificandam rempublicam potius libenter accurrere: si nemo utetur opera, non est arduum et legere nocturnas; et si minus in curia sed in foro, at in literis et libris, ut doctissimi veteres fecerunt, navare rempublicam et de moribus et legibus scribere.* Nihil hæc videtur.—Ep. Fam. ix. 2.

Another fruit of this leisure was his Dialogue on famous Orators, called "Brutus," in which he gives a short character of all who had ever flourished either in Greece or Rome, with any reputation of eloquence, down to his own times; and as he generally touches the principal points of each man's life, so an attentive reader may find in it an epitome, as it were, of the Roman history. The conference is supposed to be held with Brutus and Atticus in Cicero's garden at Rome, under the statue of Plato^g, whom he always admired, and usually imitated in the manner of his dialogues; and in this seems to have copied from him the very form of his double title, Brutus, or of Famous Orators; taken from the speaker and the subject, as in Plato's piece, called Phædon, or of the Soul. This work was intended as a supplement, or a fourth book to the three, which he had before published on the complete orator. But though it was prepared and finished at this time, while Cato was living, as it is intimated in some parts of it, yet, as it appears from the preface, it was not made public till the year following, after the death of his daughter Tullia.

As at the opening of the war we found Cicero in debt to Cæsar, so we now meet with several hints in his letters of Cæsar's being indebted to him. It arose probably from a mortgage that Cicero had upon the confiscated estate of some Pompeian, which Cæsar had seized; but of what kind soever it was, Cicero was in pain for his money: "he saw but three ways," he says, "of getting it; by purchasing the estate at Cæsar's auction, or taking an assignment on the purchaser, or compounding for half with the brokers or money-jobbers of those times, who would advance the money on those terms. The first he declares to be base, and that he would rather lose his debt than touch anything confiscated: the second he thought hazardous, and that nobody would pay anything in such uncertain times; the third he liked the best, but desires Atticus's advice upon it^h."

He now at last parted with his wife Terentia, whose humour and conduct had long been uneasy to him; this drew upon him some censure, for putting away a wife who had lived with him above thirty years, the faithful partner of his bed and fortunes, and the mother of two children, extremely dear to him. But she was a woman of an imperious and turbulent spirit; expensive and negligent in her private affairs, busy and intriguing in the public; and, in the height of her husband's power, seems to have had the chief hand in the distribution of all his favours. He had easily borne her perverseness in the vigour of health, and the flourishing state of his fortunes; but in a declining life, soured by a continual succession of mortifications from abroad, the want of ease and quiet at home was no longer tolerable to him; the divorce, however, was not likely to cure the difficulties in which her management had involved him, for she had brought him a great fortune, which was all to be restored to her at parting.

^g Cum idem placuisset illis, tum in prætulo, propter Platonis statum concessimus.—Brut. 28.

^h *Nomen illud, quod a Cæsare, tres habet conditiones; aut emtionem ab hæsta; (perdere malo:—) aut delegationem a mancipio, annua die: (quis erit, cui credam?)—aut vectem conditionem, semel, συνέχει igitur.*—Ad Att. xii. 3.

This made a second marriage necessary, in order to repair the ill state of his affairs, and his friends of both sexes were busy in providing a fit match for him; several parties were proposed to him, and among others, the daughter of Pompey the Great, for whom he seems to have had an inclination, but a prudential regard to the times, and the envy and ruin under which that family then lay, induced him probably to drop it¹. What gave his enemies the greater handle to rally him was, his marrying a handsome young woman, named Publilia, of an age disproportionate to his own, to whom he was guardian, but she was well allied, and rich, circumstances very convenient to him at this time, as he intimates in a letter to a friend, who congratulated with him on his marriage.

"As to your giving me joy, says he, for what I have done, I know you wish it; but I should not have taken any new step in such wretched times, if at my return I had not found my private affairs in no better condition than those of the republic. For when through the wickedness of those, who, for my infinite kindness to them, ought to have had the greatest concern for my welfare, I found no safety or ease from their intrigues and perfidy within my own walls; I thought it necessary to secure myself by the fidelity of new alliances against the treachery of the old²."

Cæsar returned victorious from Africa about the end of July, by the way of Sardinia, where he spent some days: upon which Cicero says pleasantly in a letter to Varro, "he had never seen that farm of his before, which, though one of the worst that he has, he does not yet despise³." The uncertain event of the African war had kept the senate under some reserve, but they now began to push their flattery beyond all the bounds of decency, and decreed more extravagant honours to Cæsar than were ever given before to man, which Cicero often rallies with great spirit; and being determined to bear no part in that servile adulation, was treating about the purchase of a house at Naples, for a pretence of retiring still farther, and oftener, from Rome. But his friends, who knew his impatience under their present subjection, and the free way of speaking which he was apt to indulge, were in some pain lest he should forfeit the good graces of Cæsar and his favourites, and provoke them too far by the keenness of his rivalry⁴. They pressed him to accommodate himself to the times, and to use more caution in discourse; and to reside more at Rome, especial when Cæsar was there, who would interpret distance and retreat which he affected as a proof of his aversion to him.

But his answers on this occasion will show the real state of his sentiments and conduct towards Cæsar, as well as of Cæsar's towards him. Writing on this subject to Papirius Pætus, he says, "You are of opinion, I perceive, that it will not be allowed to me, as I thought it might be to quit these affairs of the city; you tell me of Catalus, and those times, but what similitude have they to these? I myself was unwilling, at that time, to stir from the guard of the state; but I then sat at the helm, and held the rudder; I am now scarce thought worthy to work at the pump: would the senate, think you, pass few decrees, if I should live at Naples? While I am still at Rome, and attend the forum, their decrees are all drawn at our friend's house; and whenever it comes into his head, my name is set down, as if present at drawing them, so that I hear from Armenia and Syria of decrees, said to be made at my motion, of which I had never heard a syllable at home. Do not take me to be in jest, for I assure you, that I have received letters from kings from the remotest parts of the earth, to thank me for giving them the title of king; when, so far from knowing that any such title had been decreed to them, I knew not even that there were any such men in being. What is then to be done? Why as long as our master of manners continues, I will follow your advice; but as soon as he is gone, will run away to your mushrooms," &c.

In another letter, "Since you express such a concern for me in your last, be assured, my dear Pætus, that whatever can be done by art (for it is not enough to act with prudence, and artifices also must now be employed) yet what I say, can be done by art, towards acquiring the good graces, I have already done it with the greatest care, nor, as I believe, without success; for I

¹ Some of his jests on Cæsar's administration are all preserved; which show, that his friends had reason enough to admonish him to be more upon his guard. Cæsar had advanced Laberius, a celebrated mimic, to the order of knights: but when he stepped from the stage into the theatre to take his place on the eques benches, none of the knights would admit him to sit among them. As he was marching off therefore in disgrace, happening to pass near Cicero, I would room for you here, says Cicero, on my bench, if not already too much crowded; alluding to Cæsar's sitting up the senate also with the scum of his creatures, even with strangers and barbarians. At another time being desired by a friend, in a public company, to propose for his son the rank of a senator in one of the forty towns of Italy, He shall have it, says he, if you please Rome; but it will be difficult at Pompeii. An answer likewise from Laodicea, coming to pay his respects to him, and being asked, what business had brought to Rome, said, that he was sent upon an embassy to Cæsar, to intercede with him for the liberty of his country, upon which Cicero replied, If you succeed, you shall be ambassador also for us.—Macrob. Saturn. ii. 3; Suet. c. 76.

² Ep. Fam. ix. 15.—Præfectus morum, or Master of public manners, was one of the new titles which the senate had decreed to Cæsar.

¹ De Pompeii Magni filia tibi rescripes, nihil me hoc tempore cogitare. Alteram vero illam, quam tu scribis, puto nosti. Nihil vidi foedius.—Ad Att. xii. 11.

² Ep. Fam. iv. 14.

In cases of divorce, where there were children, it was the custom for each party to make a settlement by will on their common offspring, proportionable to their several estates: which is the meaning of Cicero's pressing Atticus so often in his letters to put Terentia in mind of making her will, and depositing it in safe hands.—Ad Att. xi. 21, 22, 24; xii. 12.

Terentia is said to have lived to the age of a hundred and three years: [Val. Max. viii. 13; Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 58.] and took, as St. Jerome says, for her second husband, Cæsar's enemy, Sallust; and Messala for her third. Dio Cassius gives her a fourth, Vibius Rufus, who was consul in the reign of Tiberius, and valued himself for the possession of two things, which had belonged to the two greatest men of the age before him, Cicero's wife, and Cæsar's chair, in which he was killed.—Dio, p. 612; Hieron. Op. to. iv. par. 2. p. 190.

³ Illud enim adhuc prædium suum non insepexit: nec ulum habet deterius, sed tamen non contemnit.—Ep. Fam. ix. 7.

so much courted by all who are in any degree of favour with Cæsar, that I begin to fancy that they love me; and though real love is not easily distinguished from false, except in the case of danger, by which the sincerity of it may be tried, as of gold by fire, for all other marks are common to both; yet I have one argument to persuade me that they really love me, because both my condition and theirs is such as puts them under no temptation to dissemble; and as for him who has all power, I see no reason to fear any thing, unless that all things become of course uncertain, when justice and right are once deserted; nor can we be sure of anything that depends on the will, not to say the passion, of another. Yet I have not in any instance particularly offended him, but behaved myself all along with the greatest moderation; for as once I took it to be my duty to speak my mind freely in that city, which owed its freedom to me, so now, since that is lost, to speak nothing that may offend him, or his principal friends; but if I would avoid all offence, of things said facetiously or by way of raillery, I must give up all reputation of wit, which I would not refuse to do, if I could. But as to Cæsar himself, he has a very piercing judgment; and as your brother Servius, whom I take to have been an excellent critic, would readily say, 'This verse is not Plautus's—that verse is; having turned his ears, by great use, to distinguish the peculiar style and manner of different poets; so Cæsar, I hear, who has already collected some volumes of epopæisms, if any thing be brought to him for mine which is not so, presently rejects it, which he now does the more easily, because his friends live almost continually with me; and in the variety of discourse, when anything drops from me which they take to have some humour or spirit in it, they carry it always to him, with the other news of the town, for such are his orders; so that if he hears anything besides of mine from other persons, he does not regard it. I have no occasion therefore for your example of Cnæomachus, though aptly applied from Accius; for what is the very which you speak of, or what is there in me to be envied now? But suppose there was everything, it has been the constant opinion of philosophers, the only men in my judgment who have a right notion of virtue, that a wise man has nothing more to answer for, than to keep himself free from guilt, of which I take myself to be clear, on a double account; because I both pursued those measures which were the justest, and when I saw that I had not strength enough to carry them, did not think it my business to contend by force with those who were too strong for me. It is certain, therefore, that I cannot be blamed in what concerns the part of a good citizen; all that is now left, is not to say or do anything foolishly and rashly against the men in power, which I take also to be the part of a wise man. As for the rest, what people may report to be said by me, or how he may take it, or with what sincerity those live with me who now so assiduously court me, it is not in my power to answer. I comfort myself, therefore, with the consciousness of my former conduct, and the moderation of my present, and shall apply your similitude from Accius, not only to the case of envy, but of fortune, which I consider as light and weak, and what ought to be repelled by a firm and great mind, as waves by a rock. For since the Greek history is full of examples, how the wisest men have endured tyrannies at Athens or Syracuse; and, when their cities were enslaved, have lived themselves in some measure free, why may not I think it possible to maintain my rank, so as neither to offend the mind of any, nor hurt my own dignity?" &c.

Pætus, having heard that Cæsar was going to divide some lands in his neighbourhood to the soldiers, began to be afraid for his own estate, and writes to Cicero to know how far that distribution would extend. To which Cicero answers: "Are not you a pleasant fellow, who when Balbus has just been with you, ask me what will become of those towns and their lands? as if either I knew anything that Balbus does not; or if at any time I chance to know anything, I do not know it from him; nay, it is your part rather, if you love me, to let me know what will become of me, for you had it in your power to have learnt it from him, either sober, or at least when drunk. But as for me, my dear Pætus, I have done inquiring about those things: first, because we have already lived near four years by clear gain, as it were, if that can be called gain, or this life, to outlive the republic. Secondly, because I myself seem to know what will happen; for it will be, whatever pleases the strongest, which must always be decided by arms; it is our part, therefore, to be content with what is allowed to us: he who cannot submit to this, ought to have chosen death. They are now measuring the fields of Veie and Capenæ: this is not far from Tusculum. Yet I fear nothing, I enjoy it whilst I may; wish that I always may; but if it should happen otherwise, yet since, with all my courage and philosophy, I have thought it best to live, I cannot but have an affection for him by whose benefit I hold that life: who, if he has an inclination to restore the republic, as he himself perhaps may desire, and we all ought to wish, yet he has linked himself so with others, that he has not the power to do what he would. But I proceed too far, for I am writing to you; be assured however of this, that not only I, who have no part in their counsels, but even the chief himself does not know what will happen. We are slaves to him, he to the times; so neither can he know what the times will require, nor we what he may intend;" &c.

The chiefs of the Cæsarian party, who courted Cicero so much at this time, were Balbus, Oppius, Matius, Pansa, Hirtius, Dolabella; they were all in the first confidence with Cæsar, yet professed the utmost affection for Cicero: were every morning at his levee, and perpetually engaging him to sup with them; and the last two employed themselves in a daily exercise of declaiming at his house, for the benefit of his instruction, of which he gives the following account in his familiar way to Pætus: "Hirtius and Dolabella are my scholars in speaking—my masters in eating; for you have heard, I guess, how they declaim with me; I sup with them." In another letter he tells him, "that as king Dionysius, when driven out of Syracuse, turned schoolmaster at Corinth, so he, having lost his kingdom of the forum, had now opened a school," to which he merrily invites Pætus, with the offer of a "seat and cushion next to himself," as his usher¹. But to Varro, more seriously, "I acquainted you (says he) before, that I am intimate with them all, and assist at their councils; I see no reason why I should not—for it is not the same thing to bear what must be borne, and to approve what ought not to be approved." And again; "I do not forbear to sup with those who now rule. What can I do? we must comply with the times²."

The only use which he made of all this favour was, to screen himself from any particular calamity in the general misery of the times, and to serve those unhappy men who were driven from their country and their families, for their adherence to that cause which he himself had espoused. Cæsar was desirous indeed to engage him in his measures, and attach him insensibly to his interests, but he would bear no part in an administration established on the ruins of his country, nor ever cared to be acquainted with their affairs, or to inquire what they were doing; so that whenever he entered into their councils, as he signifies above to Varro, it was only when the case of some exiled friend required it, for whose service he scrupled no pains of soliciting, and attending even Cæsar himself; though he was sometimes shocked, as he complains, by the difficulty of access, and the indignity of waiting in an antechamber: not indeed through Cæsar's fault, who was always ready to give him audience; but from the multiplicity of his affairs, by whose hands all the favours of the empire were dispensed³. Thus in a letter to Amplius, whose pardon he had procured, "I have solicited your cause (says he) more eagerly than my present situation would well justify; for my desire to see you, and my constant love for you, most assiduously cultivated on your part, overruled all regard to the present weak condition of my power and interest. Every thing that relates to your return and safety is promised, confirmed, fixed, and ratified; I saw, knew, was present at every step: for by good luck I have all Cæsar's friends engaged to me by an old acquaintance and friendship; so that next to him they pay the first regard to me: Pansa, Hirtius, Balbus, Oppius, Matus, Postumius, take all occasions to give me proof of their singular affection. If this had been sought and procured by me, I should have no reason, as things now stand, to repent of my pains, but I have done nothing with the view of serving the times; I had an intimacy of long standing with them all, and never gave over soliciting them on your behalf. I found Pansa, however, the readiest of them all to serve you, and oblige me; who has not only an interest, authority with Cæsar⁴," &c.

But while he was thus caressed by Cæsar's friends, he was not less followed, we may imagine by the friends of the republic. These had all looked upon him as the chief patron of liberty, whose counsels, if they had been followed would have preserved it; and whose authority gave them the only hopes that were left, of recovering it: so that his house was as much frequented, and his levee as much crowded, as since "people now flocked (he says) to see a citizen, as a sort of rarity⁵." In another letter giving a short account of his way of life, he says, "Early in the morning, I receive the compliments of many honest men, but melancholy ones, as of these gay conquerors, who show into very officious and affectionate regard to me. When these visits are over, I shut myself up in my library, either to write or read. Here I also come to hear me, as a man of learning, because I am somewhat more learned than the rest of my time I give to the care of my body, for I have now bewailed my country less and more heavily than any mother ever bewails her only son⁶."

It is certain, that there was not a man in the republic so particularly engaged, both by principle and interest, to wish well to its liberty, or who so much to lose by the subversion of it, as he, as long as it was governed by civil methods stood upon the foundation of its laws, he undoubtedly the first citizen in it; had the influence in the senate, the chief authority the people; and as all his hopes and fortunes grounded on the peace of his country, so his labours and studies were perpetually applied to the promotion of it; it is no wonder therefore, in the present situation of the city, oppressed by a tyrannical power, to find him so particularly impatient under the common misery, and exerting so keen a sense of the diminution of his liberty, and the disgrace of serving, where he has been used to govern.

Cæsar, on the other hand, though he knew temper and principles to be irreconcilable with usurped dominion, yet, out of friendship to a man, and a reverence for his character, was minded to treat him with the greatest humanity and by all the marks of personal favour to his life not only tolerable, but easy to him all that he could do had no other effect on him than to make him think and speak somewhat favourably of the natural clemency of his master, and to entertain some hopes from it that he one day be persuaded to restore the public liberty, but exclusive of that hope, he never meant to govern but as a real tyranny, or his

¹ Hirtium ego et Dolabellam dicendi discipulos habeo, cœnandi magistros: puto enim te audire—Illos apud me delectant, me apud eos cenitare.—Ep. Fam. ix. 16.

² Ut Dionysius tyrannus, cum Syracusis pulsus esset, Corinthi dicitur ludum aperuisse, sic ego—amisso regno forensi, ludum quasi habere coepim—sella tibi erit in ludo, tanquam hypodisculo, proxima: eam pulvinus sequetur.—Ibid. 18.

³ Ostentavi tibi, me istis esse familiarem, et consiliis eorum interesse. Quod ego cur nolim nihil video. Non enim est idem, ferre aliquid ferendum est, et probare, aliquid probandum non est.—Ibid. 6.

⁴ Non desino apud istos, qui nunc dominantur, cenitare. Quid faciam? temporis serviendum est.—Ibid. 7.

⁵ Quod si tardius sit quam volumus, magnis occupationibus ejus, a quo omnia petuntur, aditus ad eum difficilioribus fuerunt.—Ep. Fam. vi. 13.

⁶ Ep. Fam. vi. 12.

⁷ Cum salutationi nos dedimus amicorum; hoc etiam frequentius, quam solebat, quod quædam albam, videntur bene sententiam civem videre, in bibliothecam.—Ibid. vii. 28.

⁸ Hæc igitur est nunc vita nostra. Mane ex domi et bonos viros multos, sed tristes, et hos lectores; qui me quidem perofficiose et peramant ob. Ubi salutatio defuxit, literis me involvo, aut scilicet lego. Veniunt etiam qui me audiunt, quasi doctorem, quia paulo sum, quam ipse, doctor. Inde omne tempus datur. Patriam eluxi jam gravius quam ulla mater unum filium.—Ep. Fam. ix. 24.

in any other style than as the oppressor of his country.

But he gave a remarkable proof at this time of his being no temporiser, by writing a book in praise of Cato, which he published within a few months after Cato's death. He seems to have been left a guardian to Cato's son, as he was also to young Lucullus, Cato's nephew; and this testimony of Cato's friendship and judgment of him might induce him the more readily to pay this honour to his memory. It was a matter however of no small deliberation in what manner he ought to treat the subject. His friends advised him not to be too explicit and particular in the detail of Cato's praises, but to content himself with a general encomium, for fear of irritating Cæsar, by pushing the argument too far. In a letter to Atticus, he calls this "an Archimedean problem;" "but I cannot hit upon anything," says he, "that those friends of yours will read with pleasure, or own with patience; besides, if I should drop the account of Cato's votes and speeches in the senate, and of his political conduct in the state, and give a slight commendation only of his constancy and gravity, even this may be more than they will care to hear: but the man cannot be praised as he deserves unless it be particularly explained how he foretold all that has happened to us; how he took arms to prevent its happening; and parted with life rather than see it happen".

These were the topics which he resolved to display with all his force; and from the accounts given of the work by antiquity, it appears that he had spared no pains to adorn it, but extolled Cato's virtue and character to the skies^a.

The book was soon spread into all hands; and Cæsar, instead of expressing any resentment, affected to be much pleased with it, yet declared that he would answer it; and Hirtius, in the meanwhile, drew up a little piece in the form of a letter to Cicero, filled with objections to Cato's character, but with high compliments to Cicero himself, which Cicero took care to make public, and calls it a specimen of what Cæsar's work was like to be^b. Brutus also composed and published a piece on the same subject, as well as another friend of Cicero, Fabius Gallus^c; but these were but little considered in comparison of Cicero's: and Brutus had made some mistakes in his account of the transactions in which Cato had been concerned, especially in the debates on Catiline's plot, in which he had given him the first part and merit, in derogation even of Cicero himself^d.

Cæsar's answer was not published till the next year, upon his return from Spain, after the defeat of Pompey's sons. It was a laboured invective, answering Cicero's book paragraph by paragraph, and accusing Cato with all the art and force of his rhetoric, as if in a public trial before judges^e, yet with expressions of great respect towards Cicero, whom, for his virtues and abilities, he compared to Pericles and Themistocles of Athens^f; and in a letter upon it to Balbus, which was shown by his order to Cicero, he said, that by the frequent reading of Cicero's Cato, he was grown more copious, but after he had read Brutus's, thought himself even eloquent^g.

These two rival pieces were much celebrated in Rome, and had their several admirers, as different parties and interests disposed men to favour the subject or the author of each; and it is certain, that they were the principal cause of establishing and propagating that veneration which posterity has since paid to the memory of Cato. For his name being thrown into controversy in that critical period of the fate of Rome, by the patron of liberty on the one side, and the oppressor of it on the other, became of course a kind of political test to all succeeding ages, and a perpetual argument of dispute between the friends of liberty and the flatterers of power. But if we consider his character without prejudice, he was certainly a great and worthy man—a friend to truth, virtue, liberty; yet falsely measuring all duty by the absurd rigour of the stoical rule, he was generally disappointed of the end which he sought by it—the happiness both of his private and public life. In his private conduct he was severe, morose, inexorable—banishing all the softer affections as natural enemies to justice, and as suggesting false motives of acting from favour, clemency, and compassion; in public affairs he was the same—had but one rule of policy—to adhere to what was right, without regard to times or circumstances, or even to a force that could control him; for instead of managing the power of the great, so as to mitigate the ill, or extract any good from it, he was urging it always to acts of violence by a perpetual defiance; so that, with the best intentions in the world, he often did great harm to the republic. This was his general behaviour; yet, from some particular facts explained above, it appears that his strength of mind was not always impregnable, but had its weak places of pride, ambition, and party zeal,

^a Ad Att. xiii. 6.—De Fin. iii. 2.

^b Sed de Catone prædiximus ἀρχαῖοθεν est. Non aequum ut scribam, quod tibi convivia non modo liberator, sed etiam meo animo legere possint. Quin etiam si a constantibus ejus dictis, et ab omni voluntate, consilisque quo de republica habuit, recedam; ψιλῶς quo velim postulare constantiamque ejus laudare, hoc ipsum sumptuosum est. Sed vere laudari ille vir non potest, nisi hoc omnia atque, quod ille est, que nunc sunt, et futura viderit, et ne darent contemderit, et facta ne videret, vitam reliquerit.—Ad Att. xiii. 4.

^c H. Cicero's libro, quo Catonem omni aequavit, &c.—Tust. Ann. iv. 34.

^d Quamvis futura sit Cæsaris vituperatio contra laudatorem meum perperam ex eo libro, quam Hirtius ad me misit, in quo colligit vitia Catonis, sed cum maximis beneficiis meo. Itaque mihi librum ad Muscum, ut tuis liberis daret. Volo cum divulgari, &c.—Ad Att. xiii. 4, 5.

^e Catonem tamen mihi mitte. Cupio enim legere.—Ep. Fam. vii. 31.

^f Catonem primum sententiam putat de animadversione dixisse, quam omnes ante dixerant præter Cæsarem, &c.—Ad Att. xiii. 21.

From this and other particulars which are mentioned in the same letter, we may observe, that Fallout had probably taken his account of the debates upon Catiline's "accomplishes," from Brutus's Life of Cato, and chosen to copy even his mistakes, rather than do justice to Cicero on that occasion.

^g Cicero's libro—quid aliud dictator Cæsar, quam rescripta oratione, velut apud judices respondit?—Tacit. Ann. iv. 34; Quintil. iii. 7.

^h Plut. in Cic.

ⁱ Legi epistolam: multa de meo Catone, quo assidissime legendo se dicto copiosorem factum; Brutus Catone lecto, se sibi visum disertum.—Ad Att. xiii. 46.

which, when managed and flattered to a certain point, would betray him sometimes into measures contrary to his ordinary rule of right and truth. The last act of his life was agreeable to his nature and philosophy: when he could no longer be what he had been, or when the ills of life overbalanced the good, which, by the principles of his sect, was a just cause for dying^b, he put an end to his life with a spirit and resolution which would make one imagine that he was glad to have found an occasion of dying in his proper character. On the whole, his life was rather admirable than amiable—fit to be praised rather than imitated^c.

As soon as Cicero had published his "Cato," he wrote his piece called "the Orator," at the request of Brutus, containing the plan or delineation of what he himself esteemed the most perfect eloquence or manner of speaking. He calls it the fifth part or book, designed to complete the argument of his "Brutus," and the other three on the same subject. It was received with great approbation; and in a letter to Lepta, who had complimented him upon it, he declares, that whatever judgment he had in speaking, he had thrown it all into that work, and was content to risk his reputation on the merit of it^d.

He now likewise spoke that famous speech of thanks to Cæsar for the pardon of M. Marcellus, which was granted upon the intercession of the senate. Cicero had a particular friendship with all the family of the Marcelli, but especially with this Marcus, who, from the defeat of Pompey at Pharsalia, retired to Mitylene in Lesbos, where he lived with so much ease and satisfaction to himself in a philosophical retreat, that Cicero, as it appears from his letters, was forced to use all his art and authority to persuade him to return, and take the benefit of that grace which they had been labouring to obtain for him^e. But how the affair was transacted we may learn from Cicero's account of it to Serv. Sulpicius, who was then proconsul of Greece. "Your condition," says he, "is better than ours in this particular, that you dare venture to write your grievances—we cannot even do that with safety; not through any fault of the conqueror, than whom nothing can be more moderate, but of victory itself, which in civil wars is always insolent. We have had the advantage of you however in one thing—in being acquainted a little sooner than you with the pardon of your colleague Marcellus; or rather, indeed, in seeing how the whole affair passed; for I would have believed, that from the beginning of these miseries or ever since the public right has been decided arms, there has nothing been done besides it with any dignity. For Cæsar himself, after having complained of the moroseness of Marcellus, as he called it, and praised in the strongest terms equity and prudence of your conduct, presently declared, beyond all our hopes, that what offence he had received from the man, he so refuse nothing to the intercession of the senate. What the senate did was this: upon the motion of Marcellus by Piso, his brother Cæsar having thrown himself at Cæsar's feet, they all rose and went forward in a supplicating manner towards Cæsar: in short, this day's work appeared to so decent, that I could not help fancying I saw the image of the old republic reviving: we all, therefore, who were asked their opinions before me, had returned thanks to Cæsar, except Volcatius (for he declared that he would not be done it, though he had been in Marcellus's place), as soon as I was called upon, changed my mind for I had resolved with myself to observe eternal silence, not through any laziness, but loss of my former dignity; but Cæsar's greatness of mind, and the laudable zeal of the senate, the better of my resolution. I gave thanks therefore to Cæsar in a long speech, and have depicted myself by it, I fear, on other occasions, of honest quiet, which was my only comfort in the unhappy times; but since I have hitherto avoided giving him offence, and if I had always continued silent, he would have interpreted it, perhaps, as proof of my taking the republic to be ruined shall speak for the future not often, or rather seldom, so as to manage at the same time both favour and my own leisure for study."

Cæsar, though he saw the senate unanimously their petition for Marcellus, yet took the pains to call for the particular opinion of every senator upon it, a method never practised except in a case of debate, and where the house was divided: he wanted the usual tribute of flattery upon an act of grace, and had a mind probably to make experiment of Cicero's temper, and to draw from him especially some incense on the occasion; but he was disappointed of his aim, for Cicero, touched by his generosity, and greatly pleased with himself, on the account of his friend, returned thanks to him in a speech, which, though made upon a spot, yet for elegance of diction, vivacity of sentiment, and politeness of compliment, is superior to anything extant of the kind in all antiquity. Many fine things which are said in it of Cæsar have given some handle indeed for a charge of insincerity against Cicero: but it must be remembered that he was delivering a speech of thanks not only for himself, but in the name and at the desire of the senate, where his subject naturally required the embellishments of oratory, and of all his compliments are grounded on a supposition that Cæsar intended to restore the republic, which he entertained no small hopes at this time, as he signifies in a letter to one of Cæsar's principal friends^f. This therefore he recommended

^b In quo enim plura sunt, quæ secundum naturam sunt, hujus officium est in vita manere: in quo autem aut sunt plura contraria, aut fore videtur, hujus officium est e vita excedere.—De Fin. lib. 18.

Vetus est enim: ubi non sis, qui fueris, non esse cur velle vivere.—Ep. Fam. vii. 3.

^c Cato sic abilit e vita, ut causam moriundum nactum esse esse gauderet.—Cum vero causam justam deus ipse dederit, ut tunc Socrati, nunc Catoni, &c.—Tusc. Quest. 1. 30.

Catoni—moriundum potius, quam tyranni vultus adspiciendus fuit.—De Offic. 1. 31.

Non immaturus decessit: vixit enim, quantum debuit vivere.—Seneca. Consol. ad Marc. 20.

^d Ita tres erunt, De Oratore: quartus Brutus: quintus, Orator.—De Div. 1. 1.

Oratorem meum tantopere a te probari, vehementer gaudere: mihi quidem sic persuasum, me quoque habuorūm judici in dicendo, in illum librum contulisse.—Ep. Fam. vi. 18.

^e Ep. Fam. iv. 7, 8, 9.

^f Ep. Fam. iv. 4.

^g Sperare tamen video, Cæsari, collegæ nostro, ut curet et esse, ut habeamus aliquam rempublicam.—Ep. Fam. xiii. 68.

enforce, and requires from him in his speech, with the spirit of an old Roman; and no reasonable man will think it strange that so free an address to a conqueror, in the height of all his power, should want to be tempered with some few strokes of flattery. But the following passage from the oration itself will justify the truth of what I am saying.

"If this," says he, "Cæsar, was to be the end of your immortal acts, that after conquering all your enemies, you should leave the republic in the condition in which it now is; consider, I beseech you, whether your divine virtue would not excite rather an admiration of you than any real glory; for glory is the illustrious fame of many and great services either to our friends, our country, or to the whole race of mankind. This part, therefore, still remains; there is one act more to be performed by you, to establish the republic again, that you may reap the benefit of it yourself in peace and prosperity. When you have paid this debt to your country, and fulfilled the ends of your nature by a satiety of living, you may then tell us, if you please, that you have lived long enough; yet what is it after all that we can really call long, of which there is an end? for when that end is once come, all past pleasure is to be reckoned as nothing, since no more of it is to be expected. Though your mind, I know, was never content with these narrow bounds of life which nature has assigned to us, but inflamed always with an ardent love of immortality: nor is this indeed to be considered as your life, which is comprised in this body and breath; but that—that I say, is your life which is to flourish in the memory of all ages, which posterity will cherish, and eternity itself propagate. It is to this that you must attend, to this that you must form yourself, which has many things already to admire, yet wants something still that it may praise in you. Posterity will be anxious to hear and read of your commands, provinces; the Rhine, the Ocean, the Nile; your innumerable battles, incredible victories, infinite monuments, splendid triumphs: but unless this city be established again by your wisdom and councils, your name indeed will wander far and wide, yet will have no certain seat or place at last where to fix itself. There will be also amongst those who are yet unborn the same controversy that has been amongst us; when some will extol your actions to the skies, others, perhaps, will find something defective in them; and that one thing above all, if you should not extinguish this flame of civil war, by restoring liberty to your country; for the one may be looked upon as the effect of fate, but the other is the certain act of wisdom. Pay a reverence, therefore, to those judges who will pass judgment upon you in ages to come, and with less partiality, perhaps, than we, since they will neither be biased by affection or party, nor prejudiced by hatred or envy to you: and though this, as some falsely imagine, should then have no relation to you, yet it concerns you certainly at the present, to act in such a manner that no oblivion may ever obscure the lustre of your praises. Various were the inclinations of the citizens, and their opinions wholly divided; nor did we differ only in sentiments and wishes, but in arms also and camps; the merits of the cause were dubious, and the contention between two celebrated leaders: many doubted what was the best; many what was convenient; many what was decent; some also what was lawful," &c.^o

But though Cæsar took no step towards restoring the republic, he employed himself this summer in another work of general benefit to mankind, the reformation of the calendar, by accommodating the course of the year to the exact course of the sun, from which it had varied so widely as to occasion a strange confusion in all their accounts of time.

The Roman year, from the old institution of Numa, was lunar, borrowed from the Greeks, amongst whom it consisted of three hundred and fifty-four days. Numa added one more to them to make the whole number odd, which was thought the more fortunate; and to fill up the deficiency of his year to the measure of the solar course, inserted likewise or intercalated, after the manner of the Greeks, an extraordinary month of twenty-two days, every second year, and twenty-three every fourth, between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth day of February¹: he committed the care of intercalating this month and the supernumerary day to the college of priests, who, in progress of time, partly by a negligent, partly a superstitious, but chiefly by an arbitrary abuse of their trust, used either to drop or insert them, as it was found most convenient to themselves or their friends, to make the current year longer or shorter². Thus Cicero, when harassed by a perpetual course of pleading, prayed, that there might be no intercalation to lengthen his fatigue; and when proconsul of Cilicia, pressed Atticus to exert all his interest to prevent any intercalation within the year, that it might not protract his government and retard his return to Rome³. Curio, on the contrary, when he could not persuade the priests to prolong the year of his tribunate by an intercalation, made that a pretence for abandoning the senate, and going over to Cæsar⁴.

This licence of intercalating introduced the confusion above-mentioned, in the computation of their time: so that the order of all their months was transposed from their stated seasons; the winter months carried back into autumn, the autumnal into summer: till Cæsar resolved to put an end to this disorder by abolishing the source of it, the use of intercalations; and instead of the lunar to establish the solar year, adjusted to the exact measure of the sun's revolution in the zodiac, or to that period of time in which it returns to ^o Pro M. Marcello, 8, 9, 10.

¹ This was usually called intercalaris, though Plutarch gives it the name of mercedonius, which none of the Roman writers mention, except that Festus speaks of some days under the title of mercedonius, because the merces or wages of workmen were commonly paid upon them.

² Quod institutum perire a Numa posterorum pontificum negligentia dissolutum est.—De Leg. li. 12; Censorin. De Die Nat. c. 30; Macrobi. Sat. l. 14.

³ Nos hic in multitudine et celebritate judiciorum—ita destinemur, ut quotidie vota faciamus ne intercaletur.—Ep. Fam. vii. 2.

Per fortunas primum illud præfulci atque præmuni quæso, ut simul annui; ne intercaletur quidem.—Ad Att. v. 13. 2.

⁴ Levissime enim, quia de intercalando non obtinuerat, transfugit ad populum et pro Cæsare loqui cepit.—Ep. Fam. viii. 6; Dio, p. 148.

the point from which it set out: and as this, according to the astronomers of that age, was supposed to be three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, so he divided the days into twelve artificial months; and to supply the deficiency of the six hours, by which they fell short of the sun's complete course, he ordered a day to be intercalated after every four years, between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of February¹.

But to make this new year begin and proceed regularly, he was forced to insert into the current year two extraordinary months between November and December; the one of thirty-three, the other of thirty-four days; besides the ordinary intercalary month of twenty-three days, which fell into it of course; which were all necessary to fill up the number of days that were lost to the old year, by the omission of intercalations, and to replace the months in their proper seasons². All this was effected by the care and skill of Sosigenes, a celebrated astronomer of Alexandria, whom Cæsar had brought to Rome for that purpose³; and a new calendar was formed upon it by Flavius a scribe, digested according to the order of the Roman festivals, and the old manner of computing their days by calends, ides, and nones; which was published and authorised by the dictator's edict, not long after his return from Africa. This year therefore was the longest that Rome had ever known, consisting of fifteen months, or four hundred and forty-five days, and is called the last of the confusion⁴; because it introduced the Julian or solar year, with the commencement of the ensuing January; which continues in use to this day in all Christian countries, without any other variation than that of the old and new style⁵.

Soon after the affair of Marcellus, Cicero had another occasion of trying both his eloquence and interest with Cæsar, in the cause of Ligarius; who was now in exile on the account of his having been in arms against Cæsar in the African war, in which he had borne a considerable command. His two brothers however had always been on Cæsar's side; and being recommended by Pansa, and warmly supported by Cicero, had almost prevailed for pardon; of which Cicero gives the following count in a letter to Ligarius himself.

Cicero to Ligarius.

"I would have you to be assured that I am my whole pains, labour, care, study, in procuring your restoration: for as I have ever had greatest affection for you, so the singular piety and love of your brothers, for whom as well as yourself I have always professed the utmost esteem, will suffer me to neglect any opportunity of my duty and service to you. But what I am now doing have done, I would have you learn from my letters rather than mine; but as to what I will and take to be certain in your affair, that I wish to acquaint you with myself: for if any man timorous in great and dangerous events, and in always the worst rather than hoping the best, I am; and if this be a fault, confess myself not to be free from it; yet on the twenty-seventh of November, when, at the desire of your brothers I been early with Cæsar, and gone through trouble and indignity of getting access and audience; when your brothers and relations thrown themselves at his feet, and I had what your cause and circumstances require came away persuaded that your pardon was obtained: which I collected not only from Cæsar's discourse, which was mild and generous, but from his eyes and looks, and many other signs, which could better observe than describe. It is your duty therefore, to behave yourself with firmness and courage; and as you have borne the more turbulent part prudently, to bear this calmer state of things cheerfully: I shall continue still to take the pains in your affairs as if there was the greatest difficulty in them, and will heartily supplicate your behalf, as I have hitherto done, not for Cæsar himself, but all his friends whom I ever found most affectionate to me. Adieu."

While Ligarius's affair was in this hopeful situation, Quætor Tubero, who had an old quarrel with him, desirous to obstruct his pardon, and knowing Cæsar to be particularly exasperated against those who, through an obstinate aversion to him had renewed the war in Africa, accused him in usual forms of an uncommon zeal and violence in prosecuting that war. Cæsar privately encouraged the prosecution, and ordered the cause to be tried in the forum, where he sat upon it in person, strongly prepossessed against the criminal determined to lay hold on any plausible pretence for condemning him: but the force of Cicero's eloquence, exerted with all his skill in a cause in which he had much at heart, got the better of his prejudices, and extorted a pardon from Cæsar against his will.

The merit of this speech is too well known to want to be enlarged upon here: those who will find no reason to charge Cicero with flattery but the free spirit which it breathes in the manner that power to which it was suing for mercy give a great idea of the art of the speaker: could deliver such bold truths without offence as of the generosity of the judge, who then not only with patience but approbation observed, "Cæsar," says he, "with what I

¹ This day was called Bissextus, from its being a repetition or duplicate of the sixth of the kalends of March, which fell always on the 24th; and hence our intercalary or leap year is still called Bissextile.

² Quo autem magis in posterum ex Kalendis Januariis nobis temporum ratio congrueret, inter Novembrem et Decembrem mensem adjecit duos alios: fuitque is annus —xv. mensium cum intercalario, qui ex consuetudine eum annum inciderat.—Suet. J. Cæs. 40.

³ Plin. Hist. Nat. xviii. 25.

⁴ Adnoscitur sibi M. Flavio scribæ, qui scriptos dies singulos ita ad dictatorem detulit, ut et ordi cœsum inveniri facillime posset, et invento certis status perseveraret—æque res factum est, ut annus confusionis ultimus in quadringentes quadraginta tres dies tenderetur.—Macrob. Sat. i. 14; Dio, 237.

Macrob. makes this year to consist of 443 days, but he should have said 445, since, according to all accounts, ninety days were added to the old year of 355.

⁵ This difference of the old and new style was occasioned by a regulation made by Pope Gregory, A. D. 1582, for it having been observed, that the computation of the vernal equinox was fallen back ten days from the time of the council of Nice, when it was found to be on the 21st of March; according to which all the festivals of the church were then solemnly settled; Pope Gregory, by the advice of astronomers, caused ten days to be entirely sunk and thrown out of the current year, between the 4th and 15th of October.

pled Ligarius's cause, when I betray even my own by it. O that admirable clemency, worthy to be celebrated by every kind of praise, letters, monuments! M. Cicero defends a criminal before you, proving him not to have been in those sentiments, in which he owns himself to have been: nor can he yet fear your secret thoughts, or while he is pleading for another, what may occur to you against himself. See, I say, how little he is afraid of you. See with what a courage and gaiety of spirit your generosity and wisdom inspire me. I will raise my voice to such a pitch that the whole Roman people may hear me. After the war is not only begun, Cæsar, but in great measure ended, when I was driven by no necessity, I went of my own choice and judgment to join myself with those who had taken arms against you. Before whom I say this? why before him who, though he says it to be true, yet restored me to the republic, when he had even seen me; who wrote to me from Egypt, that I should be the same man that I always been; and when he was the only emperor within the dominion of Rome, suffered me to be the other, and to hold my laurelled fasces as long as I thought them worth holding—¹. Do you then, Tullius, call Ligarius's conduct wicked? what reason? since that cause has never yet been called by that name: some indeed call it rashness, others fear; those who speak more severely, hope, ambition, hatred, obstinacy; or at the worst, rashness; but no man besides you has called it wickedness. For my part were I to take a proper and genuine name for our calamity, I would take it for a kind of fatality that had spread the unwary minds of men; so that none could think it strange that all human counsels were overruled by a divine necessity. Call us then, if you please, unhappy; though we can never be so to this conqueror: but I speak not of us who were, but of those who fell; let them be ambitious; let them be angry; let them be obstinate; let them be the guilt of crime, of fury, of parrying; let them be charged on Cn. Pompey, and on those who died with him. When did we ever hear any such thing from you, Cæsar? or of other view had you in the war, than to defend yourself from injury?—you considered it, from the first, not as a war, but a secession; not as a civil but civil dissension: where both sides seemed well to the republic; yet through a difference, partly of counsels, partly of inclinations, sprung from the common good: the dignity of the leaders was almost equal; though not perhaps those who followed them: the cause was then common, since there was something which one might serve on either side; but now, that must needs be thought the best which the gods have favoured; after the experience of your clemency, who are so displeased with that victory in which no man fell who was not actually in arms.”

The speech was soon made public, and greedily caught by all. Atticus was extremely pleased with the very industrious in recommending it; so that Cicero says merrily to him by letter,—“ You have sold my Ligarian speech finely: whatever I do for the future, I will make you the publisher.” and again, “ your authority, I perceive, has made my little oration famous: for Balbus and Oppian write me word that they are wonderfully taken with it, and have sent a copy to Cæsar.” The success which it met with made Tullius ashamed of the figure that he made in it, so that he applied to Cicero to have something inserted in his favour, with the mention of his wife, and some of his family, who were Cicero's near relations; but Cicero excused himself, “ because the speech was got abroad: nor had he a mind,” he says, “ to make any apology for Tullius's conduct.”

Ligarius was a man of distinguished zeal for the liberty of his country, which was the reason both of Cicero's pains to preserve, and of Cæsar's averseness to restore him. After his return he lived in great confidence with Brutus, who found him a fit person to bear a part in the conspiracy against Cæsar; but happening to be taken ill near the time of its execution, when Brutus, in a visit to him, began to lament that he was fallen sick in a very unlucky hour; Ligarius, raising himself presently upon his elbow, and taking Brutus by the hand, replied: “ Yet still, Brutus, if you mean to do anything worthy of yourself, I am well;” nor did he disappoint Brutus's opinion of him, for we find him afterwards in the list of the conspirators.

In the end of the year, Cæsar was called away in great haste into Spain, to oppose the attempts of Pompey's sons, who, by the credit of their father's name, were become masters again of all that province; and with the remains of the troops which Labienus, Varus, and the other chiefs who escaped, had gathered up from Africa, were once more in condition to try the fortune of the field with him: where the great danger to which he was exposed from this last effort of a broken party, shows how desperate his case must have been, if Pompey himself, with an entire and veteran army, had first made choice of this country for the scene of the war.

Cicero all this while passed his time with little satisfaction at home, being disappointed of the ease and comfort which he expected from his new marriage: his children, as we may imagine, while their own mother was living, would not easily bear with a young mother-in-law in the house with them. The son especially was pressing to get a particular appointment settled for his maintenance, and to have leave also to go to Spain, and make a campaign under Cæsar, whither his cousin Quintus was already gone: Cicero did not approve this project, and endeavoured by all means to dissuade him from it, representing to him that it would naturally draw a just reproach upon them, for not thinking it enough to quit their former party, unless they fought against it too; and that he would not be pleased to see his cousin more

¹ Ligarianam preclare vendidisti. Posthæc quicquid scripsero, tibi præconium deferam.—Ad Att. xiii. 12.

Ligarianam, ut video, præclare auctoritas tua commendavit. Scripsisti enim ad me Balbus et Oppian, mirifice se probare, ob eamque causam ad Cæsarem eam se orationem misisse.—Ibid. 12.

Ad Ligarianam de uxore Tullianæ, et privignæ, neque possum jam addere, est enim res pervergatæ, neque Tullianam volo defendere. Mirifice est enim commendatæ.—Ibid. 20.

² Plut. in Brut.

regarded there than himself; and promising withal, if he would consent to stay, to make him an ample and honourable allowance^a. This diverted him from the thoughts of Spain, though not from the desire of removing from his father, and taking a separate house in the city, with a distinct family of his own; but Cicero thought it best to send him to Athens, in order to spend a few years in the study of philosophy and polite letters; and to make the proposal agreeable, offered him an appointment that would enable him to live as splendidly as any of the Roman nobility who then resided there, Bibulus, Acidinus, or Messala^b. This scheme was accepted, and soon after executed, and young Cicero was sent to Athens with two of his father's freedmen, L. Tullius Montanus, and Tullius Marcianus, as the intendants and counsellors of his general conduct, while the particular direction of his studies was left to the principal philosophers of the place, and above all, to Cratippus, the chief of the Peripatetic sect^c.

In this uneasy state both of his private and public life, he was oppressed by a new and most cruel affliction—the death of his beloved daughter Tullia, which happened soon after her divorce from Dolabella, whose manners and humour were entirely disagreeable to her. Cicero had long been deliberating with himself and his friends, whether Tullia should not first send the divorce, but a prudential regard to Dolabella's power and interest with Caesar, which was of use to him in these times, seems to have withheld him.^d The case was the same with Dolabella; he was willing enough to part with Tullia, but did not care to break with Cicero, whose friendship was a credit to him, and whom gratitude obliged him to observe and reverence, since Cicero had twice defended and preserved him in capital causes^e; so that it seems most probable that the divorce was of an amicable kind, and executed at last by the consent of both sides; for it gave no apparent interruption to the friendship between Cicero and Dolabella, which they carried on with the same show of affection and professions of respect towards each other, as if the relation had still subsisted.

Tullia died in childhood at her husband's house^f, which confirms the probability of their agreement in the divorce: it is certain, at least, that she died in Rome, where Cicero was detained (he says by the expectation of the birth, and to receive the first payment of her fortune back again from Dolabella, who was then in Spain: she was delivered, as it was thought, very happily, and supposed to be out of danger, when an unexpected turn in her case put an end to her life, to the inexpressible grief of her father^g).

We have no account of the issue of this birth, which writers confound with that which happens three years before, when she was delivered at the end of seven months of a puny male child; whether it was from the first, or the second time of her lying-in, it is evident that she left a daughter by Dolabella, who survived her, and whom Cicero mentions more than once in his letters to Atticus by the name of Lentulus^h: desiring him to visit the child, and see a due care taken of him, and assign him what number of servants he thought properⁱ.

Tullia was about two-and-thirty years old at the time of her death; and by the few hints which are left of her character, appears to have been an excellent and admirable woman: she was most affectionately and piously observant of her father, and to the usual graces of her sex, having added the more solid accomplishments of knowledge in polite letters, was qualified to be the companion as well as the delight of his age, and was justly esteemed, not only as one of the best, but the most learned of the Roman ladies. It is not strange, therefore, that the loss of such a daughter, in the prime of her life, and the most comfortless season of his own, should affect him with all that grief, which the greatest calamity could imprint on a temper naturally timid and desponding.

Plutarch tells us that the philosophers came from all parts to comfort him; but that can hardly be true, except of those who lived in Rome, or his own family; for his first care was, to shut out company as much as he could, by removing Atticus's house, where he lived chiefly in a library, endeavouring to relieve his mind by turning over every book which he could meet with, on the subject of moderating grief^j; but finding his residence here too public, and a greater resort

^a De Hispania duo attuli; primum idem, quod tibi, me revereri vituperationem: non satis esse si hæc arma reliquissimus? etiam contraria? deinde fore ut angeretur, cum a fratre familiaritate et omni gratia vinceretur. Velim magis liberalitate uti mea quam sua libertate.—Ad Att. xii. 7.

^b Prestabo neo Bibulum, nec Acidinum, nec Messalam, quos Athenis futuros audio, majores sumptus facturos, quam quod ex eis mercedibus accipietur.—Ibid. 32.

^c L. Tullium Montanum nosci, qui cum Cicero profectus est.—Ibid. 52, 53.

^d Quanquam te, Marce fili, annum jam audientem Cratippum, &c.—De Off. l. i. §. 11.

^e Te oro ut de hac misera cogites—melius quidem in penam nihil fuit discidio—nunc quidem ipse videtur denunciare—placeat mihi igitur, et idem tibi nuncium remitti, &c.—Ad Att. xi. 23; Ibid. 3.

^f Quod scripsi de nuncio remittendo, quæ sit istius vis hoc tempore, et quæ conditio multitudinis, ignoro. Si metuendus iratus est, quies tamen ab illo fortasse nascetur.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 13.

^g Cujus ego salutem duobus capitulis judicis summa contentione defendi.—Ep. Fam. iii. 16.

^h Plut. in Cic.

ⁱ Me Romæ tenni omnino Tullie mee partus: sed et ea, quemadmodum spero, satis firma sit, teneor tantum a Dolabella procuratoribus exigam primam pensionem.—Ep. Fam. vi. 18.

^j The father's names were Publius Cornelius Lentulus Dolabella; the two last being surnames acquired partly by adoption, and distinguishing the different branches of the Cornelian family.

^k Velim aliquando, cum erit tuum commodum, Lentulum puerum visæ, eique de mancipiis, quæ tibi videbitur attribuas.—Ad Att. xii. 23.

Quod Lentulum invisæ, valde gratum.—Ibid. 30; It. N.B. Mr. Bayle declares himself surprised, to find that Ant. Ped. de illi-informed of the history of Tullia, as he tells us, that after Pius's death, she was married to P. Lentulus, and died in child-bed at his house: in which short account there is contained, he says, two or three lies. But Plutarch confirms the same account; and the mistake will read last, not on Asconius, but on Mr. Bayle himself, who does not reflect, from the authority of those ancients, that Lentulus was one of Dolabella's names, by which he was called indifferently, as well as by any of the rest.—Bayle Dict. de l'Art. TULLIA, note k.

^l Me mihi non defuisse tu testis ea, nihil enim de meo minuendo ab ullo scriptum est, quod ego non domi tu loquerer.—Ad Att. xii. 14.

him than he could bear, he retired to Astura, one of his seats near Antium, a little island on the Italian shore, at the mouth of a river of the same name, covered with woods and groves, cut out into lady walks; a scene of all others the fittest to induce melancholy, and where he could give a free course to his grief. "Here," says he, "I live without the speech of man: every morning early I hide myself in the thickest of the wood, and never come out till the evening: next to yourself, nothing is so dear to me as this solitude: my whole conversation is with books, yet that is sometimes interrupted by my tears, which I resist as well as I can, but am not yet able to do much."

Atticus urged him to quit this retirement, and put himself with business, and the company of his friends; and put him gently in mind, that, by neglecting himself so immoderately, he would hurt his character, and give people a handle to censure his weakness; to which he makes the following answer:

"As to what you write, that you are afraid lest an excess of my grief should lessen my credit and glory; I do not know what men would have said. Is it that I should not grieve? that is impossible: or that I should not be oppressed by grief? who was ever less so? When I took leave at your house, was any man ever denied leave to me? or did any one ever come who had come to complain of me? I went from you to Astura, where those gay sparks who find fault with me are not able even to read so much as I have written. How well, is nothing to the purpose; it is of a kind which nobody could write, with a disordered mind. I spent a month in my gardens near Rome, where I received all who came with the same easiness as before. At this very moment, when I am employing my whole time in reading and writing, those who are with me are more engaged with their leisure than I with my pains. Every one asks why I am not at Rome? because of recreation time: why not in some of my villas so suitable to the season? because I could not bear so much company. I am where he who is at the best house at Baie chooses to be in this part of the year. When I come to Rome, nobody can find anything amiss, either in my looks or discourse. As to that cheerfulness with which we used to season the misery of these times, I have lost it, indeed, for ever, but will never part with my constancy and firmness, either of mind or speech." &c.

All his other friends were very officious, likewise, in making their compliments of condolence, and administering arguments of comfort to him: Among the rest, Cæsar himself, in the hurry of his affairs in Spain, wrote him a letter on the occasion, dated from Hispalis, the last of April¹. Atticus wrote another, so friendly and affectionate, that it greatly moved him". Luceius, also, one

¹ Non tunc solitudine carere omnium colloquio, cumque in silvis me abstrusum decerneret et asperam, non ex eo me tunc vesperum. Secundum te, nihil mihi amicus loquutus. In ea mihi omnis sermo est cum literis; cumque interpellat fletus; cui repugno quoad possum, ac dum parum non sumus.—Ad Att. 15.

² Ad Att. xii. 48.

³ A Cæsar litteras accepti consolatarias, datas prid. Kal. Hispalis.—Ad Att. xiii. 20.

⁴ Diversi litteras scripserunt et prouidenter et amice, multas enim mihi lacrymas attulerunt.—Ibid. xii. 13.

of the most esteemed writers of that age, sent him two; the first to condole, the second to exhortate with him, for persevering to cherish an unmanly and useless grief²: but the following letter of Ser. Sulpicius is thought to be a masterpiece of the consolatory kind.

Ser. Sulpicius to M. T. Cicero.

"I was exceedingly concerned, as indeed I ought to be, to hear of the death of your daughter Tullia, which I looked upon as an affliction common to us both. If I had been with you, I would have made it my business to convince you what a real share I take in your grief. Though that kind of consolation is but wretched and lamentable, as it is to be performed by friends and relations, who are overwhelmed with grief, and cannot enter upon their task without tears, and seem to want comfort rather themselves, than to be in condition to administer it to others. I resolved, therefore, to write you in short, what occurred upon it to my own mind: not that I imagined that the same things would not occur also to you, but that the force of your grief might possibly hinder your attention to them. What reason is there, then, to disturb yourself so immoderately on this melancholy occasion? Consider how fortune has already treated us: how it has deprived us of what ought to be as dear to us as children; our country, credit, dignity, honours. After so miserable a loss as this, what addition can it possibly make to our grief, to suffer one misfortune more? or how can a mind, after being exercised in such trials, not grow callous, and think everything else of inferior value? But is it for your daughter's sake that you grieve? Yet how often must you necessarily reflect, as I myself frequently do, that those cannot be said to be hardly dealt with, whose lot it has been in these times, without suffering any affliction, to exchange life for death! For what is there in our present circumstances that could give her any great invitation to live? What business? what hopes? what prospect of comfort before her? Was it to pass her days in the married state, with some young man of the first quality (for you, I know, on the account of your dignity, might have chosen what son-in-law you pleased out of all our youth, to whose fidelity you might safely have trusted her)? Was it then for the sake of bearing children, whom she might have had the pleasure to see flourishing afterwards, in the enjoyment of their paternal fortunes, and rising gradually to all the honours of the state, and using the liberty to which they were born, in the protection of their friends and clients? But what is there of all this which was not taken away before it was even given to her? But it is an evil, you'll say, to lose our children. It is so; yet it is much greater to suffer what we now endure. I cannot help mentioning one thing, which has given me no small comfort, and may help also, perhaps, to mitigate your grief. On my return from Asia, as I was sailing from Ægina towards Megara, I began to contemplate the prospect of the countries around me. Ægina was behind, Megara before me;—Piræus on the right, Corinth on the left; all which towns, once famous and flourishing, now lie overturned, and buried in their ruins. Upon this sight, I could not but think presently within myself, Alas ! how do we poor mortals fret and vex ourselves, if any of our friends happen to die, or to be killed, whose life is yet so short, when the carcases of so many noble cities lie here exposed before me in one view ? Why wilt thou not then command thyself, Servius, and remember that thou art born a man ? Believe me, I was not a little confirmed by this contemplation. Try the force of it, therefore, if you please, upon yourself, and imagine the same prospect before your own eyes. But to come nearer home :—When you consider how many of our greatest men have perished lately at once—what destruction has been made in the empire—what havoc in all the provinces—how can you be so much shocked, to be deprived of the fleeting breath of one little woman, who, if she had not died at this time, must necessarily have died a few years after, since that was the condition of her being born ? But recall your mind from reflections of this kind to the consideration of yourself, and think rather on what becomes your character and dignity ; that your daughter lived as long as life was worth enjoying, as long as the republic stood ; had seen her father prætor, consul, augur ; been married to the noblest of our youth ; had tasted every good in life ; and when the republic fell, then quitted it :—what ground is there then, either for you or her, to complain of fortune on this account ? In short, do not forget that you are Cicero, one who has been used always to prescribe and give advice to others ; nor imitate those paltry physicians, who pretend to cure other people's diseases, yet are not able to cure their own ; but suggest rather to yourself the same lesson, which you would give in the same case. There is no grief so great which length of time will not alleviate ; but it would be shameful in you to wait for that time, and not to prevent it by your wisdom ; besides, if there be any sense in the dead, such was her love and piety to you, that she must be concerned to see how much you afflict yourself. Give this, therefore, to the deceased ; give it to your friends, give it to your country, that it may have the benefit of your assistance and advice, whenever there shall be occasion. Lastly, since fortune has now made it necessary to us to accommodate ourselves to our present situation, do not give any one a handle to think that you are not so much bewailing your daughter as the state of the times, and the victory of certain persons. I am ashamed to write any more, lest I should seem to distrust your prudence, and will add, therefore, but one thing farther, and conclude. We have sometimes seen you bear prosperity nobly, with great honour and applause to yourself ; let us now see that you can bear adversity with the same moderation, and without thinking it a greater burthen than you ought to do, lest, in the number of all your other virtues, this one at last be thought to be wanting. As to myself, when I understand that your mind is grown more calm and composed, I will send you word how all things go on here, and what is the state of the province. Adieu 7."

His answer to Sulpicius was the same in effect with what he gave to all his friends ; "that his case was different from all the examples which he had been collecting for his own imitation of men who had borne the loss of children with firmness since they lived in times when their dignity of state was able in great measure to compensate their misfortune ; but for me," says he, "as I had lost all those ornaments which you enumerate and which I had acquired with the utmost pains, have now lost the only comfort that was left to me. In this ruin of the republic, my thoughts are not diverted by serving either my friends or my country : I had no inclination to the forum ; not bear the sight of the senate ; took my case in truth as, to have lost all the fruits of my industry and fortunes : yet when I reflect that all this was common to you and to many others as well as to myself, and was forcing myself to bear it tolerably, I had still in Tullia some resource always to recur to, in which I could acquiesce in whose sweet conversation I could drop my cares and troubles : but by this last cruel wound the rest which seemed to be healed are broken again afresh : for as I then could relieve the uneasiness which the republic gave me by what I found at home ; so I cannot now, in the affliction I feel at home, find any remedy abroad, but am driven as well from my house as the forum, neither my house can ease my public grief, nor my public my domestic one."

The remonstrances of his friends had but little effect upon him ; all the relief that he found from reading and writing, in which he continued to employ himself, and did what no man had done before him, draw up a treatise of consolation for himself, from which he professes to have received his greatest comfort : "Though he it," he owns, "at a time when, in the opinion of philosophers, he was not so wise as he once has been : but I did violence," says he, "to my nature ; to make the greatness of my sorrow place to the greatness of the medicine, that I acted against the advice of Chrysippus, who dissuades the application of any remedy to the assaults of grief." In this work he chiefy imitated Crantor, the academic, who had laboured piece on the same subject ; yet he is also what ever pleased him from any other author who had written upon it^b ; illustrating his plan all the way by examples from their own history the most eminent Romans of both sexes who had borne the same misfortune with a remarkable constancy. This book was much read by the philosophers, especially Lactantius, to whom it was obliged for the few fragments which remain to us, as the critics have long since observed

^a Ep. Fam. iv. 6 ; Ad Att. xii. 28.

^b Faci, quod ante me nemo, ut ipse me per litteras laudat—affirmo tibi nullam consolationem esse. Ad Att. xii. 14 ; it. 28.

Quid ego de consolatione dicam ? quæ mihi quæ sane aliquantum medetur, ceteris item multum ille futuram puto.—De Div. li. 1.

In consolationis libro, quem in medio, (non enim tunc eramus) morore et dolore conscripsimus : vetat Chrysippus, ad recentes quasi tumores animum adhibere, id nos fecimus, naturæque vim ad ut magnitudinali medicina doloris magnitudinem concutit. Disp. iv. 29.

^c Crantorem sequor.—Plin. Hist. Nat. Præf. Neque tamen progredior longius, quam mihi de hominibus concedunt, quorum scripta omnia, quæ sunt in eam sententiam non legi solum—sed in ea scripta transtuli.—Ad Att. xii. 21, 22.

But after all his eagerness and solicitude about this temple, it was never actually built by him, since we find no mention of it in any of the ancient writers, which could not have been omitted if a fabric so memorable had ever been erected¹. It is likely that as his grief evaporated and his mind grew more calm, he began to consider his project more philosophically, and to perceive the vanity of expecting any lasting glory from such monuments which time itself, in the course of a few ages, must necessarily destroy: it is certain, at least, that as he made no step towards building it this summer, so Cæsar's death, which happened before the next, gave fresh obstruction to it, by the hurry of affairs in which it engaged him; and though he had not still wholly dropped the thoughts of it, but continued to make preparation and to set apart a fund for it, yet in the short and busy scene of life which remained to him, he never had leisure enough to carry it into execution.

He was now grown so fond of solitude that all company was become uneasy to him, and when his friend Philippus, the father-in-law of Octavius, happened to come to his villa in that neighbourhood, he was not a little disturbed at it, from the apprehension of being teased with his visits; and he tells Atticus, with some pleasure, that he had called upon him only to pay a short compliment, and went back again to Rome without giving him any trouble². His wife, Publilia, also wrote him word that her mother and brother intended to wait upon him, and that she would come along with them if he would give her leave, which she begged in the most earnest and submissive terms—but his answer was, that he was more indisposed than ever to receive company, and would not have them come; and lest they should come without leave, he desires Atticus to watch their motions and give him notice, that he might contrive to avoid them³. A denial so peremptory confirms what infinita posteritate—illud quasi consecratum remanere possit. Equidem jam nihil ego vestigalibus, et parvo contentus esse possum. Cogito interdum trans Tiberim hortos aliquos parare, et quidem ob hanc causam maxime; nihil enim video quod tam celebre esse possit. [Ad Att. xii. 18.] De hortis, etiam atque etiam te rogo. [Ibid. 22.] Ut sepe locuti sumus, commutationes dominorum reformido. [Ibid. 33.] Celebritatem requiro.—Ibid. 37.

¹ Cælius Rhodiginus tells us, that in the time of Sixtus IV. there was found near Rome, on the Applan-way, over against the tomb of Cicero, the body of a woman, whose hair was dressed up in net-work of gold, and which, from the inscription, was thought to be the body of Tullia. It was entire, and so well preserved by spices, as to have suffered no injury from time; yet when it was removed into the city, it mouldered away in three days. But this was only the hasty conjecture of some learned of that time, which, for want of authority to support it, soon vanished of itself; for no inscription was ever produced to confirm it, nor has it been mentioned, that I know of, by any other author, that there was any sepulchre of Cicero on the Applan-way.—Cæli. Rhod. Lectio. Antiq. iii. 34.

² Quod ex istis fructuosus robur receptum est, id ego ad illud sanum sepositum putabam.—Ad Att. xv. 14.

³ Mihi adhuc nihil prius fuit hac solitudine, quam verere, ne Philippus tollat: heri enim vespere venerat.—Ibid. xii. 16.

Quod eram veritus, non obturbavit Philippus: nam ut heri me salutavit, statim Romam profectus est.—Ibid. 18.

⁴ Publilia ad me scripsit, matrem suam cum Publilio me venturam, et se una, et ego pater: orat multis et supplicibus verbis ut liceat, et ut sibi rescribam—

Plutarch says, that his wife was now in disgrace with him, on account of her carriage towards his daughter, and for seeming to rejoice at her death; a crime which, in the tenderness of his affection, appeared to him so heinous, that he could not but be the thoughts of seeing her any more; and though it was inconvenient to him to part with her fortune at this time, yet he resolved to send her a divorce, as a proper sacrifice to the honour of Tullia⁴.

Brutus likewise about this time took a resolution of putting away his wife Claudia, for the sake of taking Porcia, Bibulus's widow, and his uncle Cato's daughter. But he was much censured for this step, since Claudia had no stain upon her character, was nobly born, the sister of Appian Claudius, and nearly allied to Pompey; so that her mother Servilia, though Cato's sister, seems to have been averse to the divorce, and strongly the interests of Claudia against her niece. Cato gave advice upon it was, that if Brutus was resolved upon the thing, he should do it out of hand, the best way to put an end to people's talking, showing that it was not done out of levity or complaisance to the times, but to take the daughter of Cato, whose name was now highly popular⁵, who Brutus soon after complied with, and made Porcia his wife.

There happened another accident this summer which raised a great alarm in the city, the surprising death of Marcellus, whom Cæsar had just pardoned. He had left Mitylene and was on his way as far as Piræus on his way towards Rome, where he spent a day with his old friend and colleague Serv. Sulpicius, intending to pursue his voyage the day following by sea; but in the night after Sulpicius had taken leave of him, on the twenty-third of May, he was killed by his friend and client, Magius, who stabbed himself in the breast with the same poniard; of which Sulpicius gives the following account to Cicero.

Serv. Sulpicius to M. T. Cicero.

"Though I know that the news which I am now going to tell you will not be agreeable, yet I thought it my duty to govern the lives of us all by the chance and nature govern the lives of us all, I thought it my duty to acquaint you with the manner in what manner soever it happened. On the twenty-second of May I came by sea from Epidaurus to Piræus to meet my colleague Marcellus, for the sake of his company spent that day with him there. The next day, when I took my leave of him, with design to go from Athens into Boeotia to finish the remaining part of my jurisdiction, he told me, intended to set sail at the same time towards Italy. The day following, about four or five in the morning, when I was preparing to set out rescript, me etiam gravius esse affectum, quam cum illi dixissem, me solum esse velle, quare nunc hoc tempore eam ad me venire—te hoc nunc rescribo. —Ad Att. 32.

¹ This affair of Publilia's divorce is frequently related, though with some obscurity, in his letters; and find Atticus employed by him afterwards to adjust the brother, Publilius, the time and manner of paying the fortune.—Ad Att. xiii. 34, 47; xvi. 2.

² A te expecto si quid de Bruto: quanquam me confectum putabat, sed divortium non probari.—Ad Att. xiii. 9.

Brutus si quid—curabis ut sciam. Cui quidem et primum agendum puto, presentium et statuit: sed cunctum enim omnem aut restinere aut sedare.—Ibid. 11.

Athen, his friend, P. Postumius, came to let me know that Marcellus was stabbed by his companion M. Magius Cilo, after supper, and had received two wounds, the one in his stomach, the other in his head near the ear, but he was in hopes still that he might live; that Magius presently killed himself; and that Marcellus sent him to inform me of the case, and to desire that I would bring some physicians to him. I got some together immediately, and went away with them before break-day: but when I was come near Piræus, Acciaius boy met me with a note from his master, which it was signified that Marcellus died a little time day. Thus a great man was murdered by a villain; and he, whom his very enemies had praised on the account of his dignity, received his death from the hands of a friend. I went forward to his tent, where I found two of his slaves and a few of his slaves; all the rest, they were fled, being in a terrible fright on the account of their master's murder. I was forced to lay his body with me into the city in the same way in which I came, and by my own servants; and I provided a funeral for him, as splendid as the custom of Athens would allow. I could not well with the Athenians to grant a place of burial for him within the city; they said that it was forbidden by their religion, and had never been granted to any man: but they readily granted me the most desirable in the next place, to bury him in any of their public schools that I chose. I chose a place, therefore, the noblest in Athens, the school of the Academy, where I myself had, and have since given orders that the place should provide a marble monument for him in the same place. Thus I have faithfully discharged to him, both when living and dead, my duty, which our partnership in office, and our particular relation to him, required. Adieu. Athens, the 10th of May, from Athens."

Marcellus was the head of a family which, by the succession of many ages, had made the first name in Rome; and was himself adorned with all those qualities that could qualify him to sustain that name which he derived from his noble ancestors. He formed himself in a particular manner for that station, where he soon acquired great fame, and of his contemporaries of his time seems to have approached nearest to Cicero himself, in the character of a public speaker. His manner of speaking was strong, and copious, with a sweetness of diction and propriety of action that added a grace to everything that he said. He was a great admirer and imitator of Cicero; of the principles in peace, and on the same side in war, so that Cicero laments his absence as the loss of a companion and partner in their common labours of life. Of all the magistrates, he was the fiercest opposer of Cæsar's power, and most active to reduce it: his high spirit, and the ancient glory of his house, made him impatient of the thought of receiving a master; and the battle of Pharsalia seemed at last to have laid one upon them, he retired to Mitylene, a usual resort of men of learning, there to spend the rest of his days in a studious retreat, remote from the noise and the hurry of war, and determined never to seek nor to accept any grace from the conqueror. Here Brutus paid him a visit, and found him, as he gave an account to Cicero, as perfectly easy and happy under all the misery of the times, from the consciousness of his integrity, as the condition of human life could bear, surrounded with the principal scholars and philosophers of Greece, and eager in the pursuit of knowledge; so that in departing from him towards Italy, he seemed (he said) to be going himself into exile rather than leaving Marcellus in it.

Magius, who killed him, was of a family which had borne some of the public offices, and had himself been quaestor; and having attached himself to the fortunes of Marcellus and followed him through the wars and his exile, was now returning with him to Italy. Sulpicius gives no hint of any cause that induced him to commit this horrid fact, which, by the immediate death of Magius, could never be clearly known. Cicero's conjecture was, that Magius, oppressed with debts, and apprehending some trouble on that score at his return, had been urging Marcellus, who was his sponsor for some part of them, to furnish him with money to pay the whole; and by receiving a denial, was provoked to the madness of killing his patron. Others assign a different reason, as the rage of jealousy and the impatience of seeing others more favoured by Marcellus than himself.

As soon as the news reached Rome, it raised a general consternation; and from the suspicious nature of the times all people's thoughts were presently turned on Cæsar, as if he were privately the contriver of it; and from the wretched fate of so illustrious a citizen, every man began to think himself in danger. Cicero was greatly shocked at it, and seemed to consider it as the prelude of some greater evil to ensue; and Atticus, signifying his concern upon it, advises him to take a more particular care of himself, as being the only consular senator left who stood exposed to any envy. But » Mihi, inquit, Marcellus satis est notus. Quid igitur de illo iudicas?—quod habiturus es similem tui—ita est, et vehementer placeo. Nam et didicit, et omnia ceteris studiis id egit unum, esseque quotidianis commentationibus acerrime exercevit. Itaque et lectis utitur verbis et frequentibus; et splendore vocis, dignitate motus fit speciosum et illustre, quod dicitur: omniaque sic suppetunt, ut ei nullam deesse virtutem oratoris putem.—Brut. 367.

Dolebam, Patres Conscripti,—illico emulo atque imitatore studiorum meorum, quasi quodam socio a me et comite distracto—quis enim est ille aut nobilitate, aut probitate, aut optimarum artium studio, aut innocentia, aut ullo genere laudis præstantior?—Pro Marcel. 1.

Nostrum enim sensus, ut in pace semper, scilicet tum etiam in bello congruebant.—Ibid. 6.

Qui hoc tempore ipso—in hoc communi nostro et quasi fatali malo, consoletur se cum consensientia optime mentis, tum etiam usurpatione ac renovatione doctrinæ. Vidi enim Mitylenis nuper virum, atque ut dixi, vidi plane virum. Itaque cum eum antea tui similem in dicende viderim; tum vero nunc doctissimo viro, tibi que ut intellexi, amiceissimo Cratippo, instructum omni copia, multo videbam stimiliorem.—Brut. ibid.; Senec. Consolat. ad Helv. p. 79.

» Pigh. Annal. A. U. 691.

» Quanquam mihi habeo quod dubitem, nisi ipsi Magio que fuerit causa amissionis. Pro quo quidem etiam sponsor sum factus est. Nimirum id fuit. Solvendo enim non erat. Credo eum a Marcello petisse aliquid, et illum, ut erat, constantius respondisse.—Ad Att. xlii. 10.

» Indignatus aliquem amicorum ab eo sibi præferri.—Val. Max. ix. 11.

» Minime miror te et graviter ferre de Marcello, et Cæsar's friends soon cleared him of all suspicion, as indeed the fact itself did when the circumstances came to be known, and fixed the whole guilt of it on the fury of Magius.

There appeared at this time a bold impostor, who began to make a great noise and figure in Italy, by assuming the name and pretending to be the grandson of Caius Marius: but apprehending that Cæsar would soon put an end to his pretensions and treat him as he deserved, he sent a pathetic letter to Cicero by some young fellows of his company, to justify his claim and descent, and to implore his protection against the enemies of his family,—conjuring him by their relation, by the poem which he had formerly written in praise of Marius, by the eloquence of L. Crassus, his mother's father, whom he had likewise celebrated, that he would undertake the defence of his cause. Cicero answered him very gravely that he could not want a patron when his kinsman Cæsar, so excellent and generous a man, was now the master of all, yet that he also should be ready to favour him^a. But Cæsar, at his return, knowing him to be a cheat, banished him out of Italy, since, instead of being what he pretended to be, he was found to be only a farrier whose true name was Herophilus^b.

Ariarathes, the brother and presumptive heir of Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, came to Rome this year, and as Cicero had a particular friendship with his family, and, when consul, had by a decree of the senate conferred upon his father the honour of the regal title, he thought proper to send a servant to meet him on the road and invite him to his house: but he was already engaged by Sestius, whose office it then was to receive foreign princes and ambassadors at the public expense, which Cicero was not displeased with in the present state of his domestic affairs. "He comes (says he,) I guess, to purchase some kingdom of Cæsar, for he has not at present a foot of land of his own^c."

Cicero's whole time during his solitude was employed in reading and writing: this was the business both of his days and nights. "It is incredible," he says, "how much he wrote and how little he slept: and if he had not fallen into that way of spending his time, he should not have plura vereri periculi genera. Quis enim hoc timeret, quod neque acciderat antea, nec videbatur natura ferre, ut accideret posset. Omnia ista metuenda, &c.—Ad Att. xlii. 10.

^a Heri—quidam urbani, ut videbantur, ad me mandata et literas attulerunt, a C. Mario, C. F. C. N. multis verbis agere mecum per cognationem, quæ mihi secum esset, per eum Marium, quem scripsissem, per eloquentiam L. Crassi avi sui, ut se defenderem—rescripsi nihil ei patrono opus esse, quoniam Cæsaris, propinqui ejus, omnis potestas esset, viri optimi et hominis liberalissimi: me tamen ei fœderum.—Ad Att. xlii. 49.

^b Herophilus equarius medicus, C. Marium septies consulum avum sibi vendicando, ita se extulit, ut colonie veteranorum complures et municipia splendida, collegiaque fere omnia patronum adoptarent—cæterum decreto Cæsaris extra Italiam relegatus, &c.—Val. Max. ix. 15.

^c Ariarathes Ariobarzani filius Romam venit. Vult, opinor, regnum aliquod emere a Cæsare: nam, quo modo nunc est, pedem ubi ponat in suo non habet. Omnino eum Sestius noster parochus publicus occupavit: quod quidem facile patior. Verumtamen quod mihi, summo beneficio meo, magna cum fratribus illius necessitudo est, invito eum per literas, ut apud me diversetur.—Ad Att. xlii. 2.

known what to do with himself^a." His was chiefly philosophical, which he had been of from his youth, and, after a long interval now resumed with great ardour, having taken resolution to explain to his countrymen in his own language whatever the Greeks had taught every part of philosophy, whether speculative or practical. "For being driven (as he tells from the public administration, he knew no effectual of doing good as by instructing the youth, and reforming the morals of the youth, which the licence of those times wanted every to restrain and correct them. The calamity of the city (says he), made this task necessary to me, since in the confusion of civil arms I could not defend it after my old way, nor, when it was possible for me to be idle, could I find any better on which to employ myself. My country therefore will pardon or rather thank me when the government was fallen into the power of a single person I neither wholly hid nor myself unnecessarily, nor acted in such a manner as to seem angry at the man or the times, nor flattered or admired the fortune of another, nor was I displeased with my own. For I had learned from Plato and philosophy, that these turns and revolutions of states are natural,—sometimes the hands of a few, sometimes of the many, sometimes of one. As this was the case of our republic, so when I was deprived of my post in it, I betook myself to these studies to relieve my mind from the sense of our calamities, and to serve my country at the same time in the best manner that I was able; for myself I supplied the place of my votes in the senate by my speeches to the people, and I took up philosophy as a substitute for my management of the state."

He now published, therefore, in the form of a dialogue, a book which he called "Hortensius," in honour of his deceased friend; where, in the course of learning he did what he had often done in the courts of law, undertake the defence of philosophy against Hortensius, to whom he assigned the office of arraigning it^b. It was the reading of this book long since unfortunately lost, which first introduced St. Austin, as he himself somewhere declares the study of the Christian philosophy: and yielded no other fruit, yet happy it was that world that it once subsisted, to be the instrument of raising up so illustrious a convert and champion to the church of Christ^c.

He drew up also about this time, in four

^a Credibile non est, quantum scribam die, quod noctibus. Nihil enim somni.—Ad Att. xlii. 26.

^b Nisi mihi hoc venisset in mentem, scribere ista que, quo verterem me non habebam.—Ibid. 10.

^c De Divin. ii. 2; De Fin. i. 3.

^d Cohortati sumus, ut maxime potuimus, philosophiæ studium eo libro, qui est inscriptus, Hortensius De Div. ii. 1.

^e Nos autem universæ philosophiæ vituperatoribus dimus in Hortensio.—Tusc. Disp. ii. 2.

^f It is certain that all the Latin Fathers made use of Cicero's writings; and especially Jerome, who was so grateful as Austin in acknowledging the benefit he had conceived some scruples on that score in his young age, he endeavoured to discourage his disciples from reading them at all; and declared, that he had either Cicero or Maro, or any heathen write hands for above fifteen years: for which his Rufinus rallies him very severely.—Hieron. O. pars 2. p. 414; it. pars 1. p. 288. Edit. Benedict.

ular account and defence of the philosophy Academy; the sect which he himself followed as he says, of all others the most consistent self, and the least arrogant as well as most ¹⁴. He had before published a work on the subject in two books,—the one called "Cato the other "Lucullus;" but considering that the one was not suited to the characters of the men, who were not particularly remarkable for any of that sort, he was thinking to change to Cato and Brutus, when Atticus happening to him that Varro had expressed a desire inserted in some of his writings, he presently and his scheme and enlarged it into four, which he addressed to Varro, taking upon himself the part of Philo of defending the principles of the Academy, and assigning to Varro that of Cato, of opposing and confuting them, and placing Atticus as the moderator of the dispute. He finished the whole with great accuracy, so as to make it a present worthy of Varro; and if he was not deceived, he says, by a partiality and self-interest common in such cases, there was nothing in the subject equal to it even among the Greeks". These four books, excepting part of the first, are now lost; whilst the second book of the first set, in which he took some pains to suppress, is still entire, under its original title of De Finibus.

He published likewise this year one of the noblest works and on the noblest subject in philosophy, his treatise called De Finibus, or of the good and ill of man,—written in Aristotle's manner; in which he explained with great elegance and simplicity the several opinions of all the sects on that most important question. It was inquired, he tells us, what is the chief end of all the views of life ought to be referred to, to make it happy; or what it is which we pursue as the supreme good and shuns as the greatest ill. The work consists of five books; in the first the Epicurean doctrine is largely and fully discussed, being defended by Torquatus, a friend of Cicero, in a conference supposed to have taken place in his Cuman villa, in the presence of a young gentleman who came with Torquatus to visit him. The two next explain the doctrine of the Stoics, asserted by Cato and opposed by Cicero in a friendly debate, upon their meeting accidentally in Lucullus's library. The fifth contains the opinions of the old Academy, or the Peripatetics, explained by Piso in a third dialogue supposed to be held at Athens in the presence of Cicero, his brother Quintus, cousin Lucius, and Atticus. The critics have observed some impropriety in this last book, in making Piso refer to the other two dialogues, of which he had no share and could not be presumed to have any knowledge¹⁵. But if any inaccuracy of that kind be really found in this or any other of his works, it may reasonably be excused by that multiplicity of affairs which scarce allowed him time to write, much less to revise what he wrote: and in dialogues of length, composed by piecemeal and in the short intervals of leisure, it cannot seem strange that he should sometimes forget his artificial to resume his proper character, and enter inadvertently into a part which he had assigned to another. He addressed this work to Brutus, in return for a present of the same kind which Brutus had sent to him a little before, a treatise upon virtue¹⁶.

Not long after he had finished this work he published another of equal gravity called his Tusculan Disputations, in five books also, upon as many different questions in philosophy, the most important and useful to the happiness of human life. The first teaches us how to contemn the terrors of death, and to look upon it as a blessing rather than an evil; the second, to support pain and affliction with a manly fortitude; the third, to appease all our complaints and uneasinesses under the accidents of life; the fourth, to moderate all our other passions; the fifth, to evince the sufficiency of virtue to make man happy. It was his custom, in the opportunities of his leisure, to take some friends with him into the country, where, instead of amusing themselves with idle sports or feasts, their diversions were wholly speculative,—tending to improve the mind and enlarge the understanding. In this manner he now spent five days at his Tusculan villa in discussing with his friends the several questions just mentioned; for after employing the mornings in declaiming and rhetorical exercises, they used to retire in the afternoon into a gallery called the Academy, which he had built for the purpose of philosophical conferences, where, after the manner of the Greeks, he held a school, as they called it, and invited the company to call for any subject that they desired to hear explained; which being proposed accordingly by some of the audience, became immediately the argument of that day's debate. These five conferences or dialogues he collected afterwards into writing, in the very words and manner in which they really passed, and published them under the title of his Tusculan Disputations, from the name of the villa in which they were held¹⁷.

He wrote also a little piece in the way of a funeral encomium in praise of Porcia, the sister of ¹⁴ Prefat. Davis in Lib. De Fin.

¹⁵ De Fin. l. 3.

¹⁶ In Tusculano, cum essent complures domus sumptuosae—ponere jubebam, de quo quis credere vellet ut id aut sedens aut ambulans disputationem. Itaque tunc quinque scholas, ut Græci appellant, in eadem libris contuli.—Tusc. Disp. l. 4.

Itaque cum ante meridiem dicitur verum tractatum—post meridiem in Academiæ disputationem. Itaque tunc quinque scholas, ut Græci appellant, in eadem libris contuli.—Tusc. Disp. l. 4.

Cato and wife of Domitius Ahenobarbus, Cæsar's mortal enemy; which shows how little he was still disposed to court the times. Varro and Lollius attempted the same subject, and Cicero desires Atticus to send him their compositions; but all the three are now lost,—though Cicero took the pains to revise and correct his, and sent copies of it afterwards to Domitius the son, and Brutus the nephew of that Porcia¹.

Cæsar continued all this while in Spain pursuing the sons of Pompey, and providing for the future peace and settlement of the province; whence he paid Cicero the compliment of sending him an account of his success with his own hand. Hirtius also gave him early intelligence of the defeat and flight of the two brothers, which was not disagreeable to him; for though he was not much concerned about the event of the war, and expected no good from it on either side, yet the opinion which he had conceived of the fierceness and violence of the young Pompeys, especially of the elder of them Cnæus, engaged his wishes rather for Cæsar. In a letter to Atticus, "Hirtius (says he) wrote me word that Sextus Pompey had withdrawn himself from Corduba into the hither Spain, and that Cnæus too was fled I know not whither, nor in truth do I care." And this indeed seems to have been the common sentiment of all the republicans; as Cassius himself, writing to Cicero on the same subject, declares still more explicitly: "May I perish (says he,) if I be not solicitous about the event of things in Spain, and would rather keep our old and clement master than try a new and cruel one. You know what a fool Cnæus is,—how he takes cruelty for a virtue, how he has always thought that we laughed at him; I am afraid lest he should take it into his head to repay our jokes in his rustic manner with the sword."

Young Quintus Cicero, who made the campaign along with Cæsar, thinking to please his company and to make his fortunes the better among them, began to play over his old game and to abuse his uncle again in all places. Cicero, in his account of it to Atticus, says, "there is nothing new but that Hirtius has been quarrelling in my defence with our nephew Quintus, who takes all occasions of saying everything bad of me, and especially at public feasts, and when he has done with me falls next upon his father. He is thought to say nothing so credible as that we are both irreconcilable to Cæsar, that Cæsar should trust neither of us, and even beware of me: this would be terrible, did I not see that our king is persuaded that I have no spirit left."

¹ Laudationem Porciæ tibi misit correctam: ac eo properavi; ut si forte aut Domitio filio aut Bruto mitteretur, hæc mitteretur. Id si tibi erit commodum, mognopere cures velim; et velim M. Varronis, Lollisque mittas laudationem.—Ad Att. xiii. 48; it. 37.

² Hirtius ad me scripsit, Sex. Pompeium Corduba exisse, et fugisse in Hispaniam citeriorem; Cnæum fugisse necno quo, neque enim curo.—Ad Att. xlii. 37.

³ Perceam, nisi sollicitus sum; ac malo veterem ac clementem dominum habere, quam novum et crudelem experiri. Scis, Cnæus quam sit fatuus; scis quomodo crudelitatem virtutem putet; scis, quam se semper a nobis derisum putet.

Vereor, ne nos rustice gladio velit ἀπαικτερίσαι.—Ep. Fam. xv. 12.

⁴ Novi sane nihil, nisi Hirtium cum Quinto acerrime pro me litigare; omnibus eum locis facere, maximeque

Atticus was always endeavouring to moderate Cicero's impatience under the present government and persuading him to comply more cheerfully with the times, nor to reject the friendship of Cæsar, which was so forwardly offered to him; and upon his frequent complaints of the slavery and indignity of his present condition, he took occasion to observe, what Cicero could not but own to be true, that if to pay a particular court and obsequence to a man was the mark of slavery, those who were powerful seemed to be slaves rather to him than to them². With the same view he was now pressing him among his other works to think of something to be addressed to Cæsar: but Cicero had no aptitude to this task; he saw how difficult it would be to perform it without lessening his character by descending to flattery,—yet being urged to it by other friends, he drew up a letter, which he communicated to Hirtius and Balbus, for his judgment upon it whether it was proper to be sent to Cæsar. The subject seems to have been advice about restoring the peace and liberty of the republic, and to dissuade him from the Parthian war, which he intended for his next expedition; he had finished the more necessary work of settling the state of things at home. "There was much in it (he says) but what might come from the best of citizens." It was drawn however with much freedom, that though Atticus seemed to like it, yet the other two durst not advise sending it unless some passages were altered and softened, which disgusted Cicero so much that he resolved not to write at all; and when Atticus still urging him to be more complaisant, answered with great spirit in two or three letters.

"As for the letter to Cæsar (says he), I always very willing that they should first see for otherwise I had both been wanting in duty to them, and if I had happened to give myself exposed myself also to danger. They have ingenuously and kindly with me in not coming what they thought; but what pleases me is, that by requiring so many alterations they give me an excuse for not writing at all. As for the Parthian war, what had I to consider about that which I thought would please him? for the subject was there else for a letter but flattery. I had a mind to advise what I really took to be best, could I have been at a loss for words? is no occasion, therefore, for any letter: for there is no great matter to be gained, and though not great, may make us uneasy, reason is there to run any risk? especially when in convivis; cum multa de me, tum redire ad nihil autem ab eo tam ἀπεικτερίσας dici, quam est mihi nos esse a Cæsare; scdm nobis habendum me vero cavendum. φοβερὸν ἔσθ, nisi viderem me gem, me animi nihil habere.—Ad Att. xiii. 37.

² Et si mehercule, ut tu intelligis, magis mihi est vivum, si observare servare est.—Ad Att. xlii. 48.

³ Epistolam ad Cæsarem mitti video tibi placuisse quidem hoc idem maxime placuit: et eo magis, quod est in ea nisi optimi civis; sed ita optimi, ut quibus parere omnes πολιτικοί præcipiunt. Sed nobis esse visum, ut isti ante legerent. Tu curabis. Sed nisi plane intelliges his placere, non est.—Ad Att. xlii. 51.

De epistola ad Cæsarem, κέρκις. Atque id quod isti aiunt illum scribere, se, nisi constituta non iturum in Parthos, idem ego suadebam in illa epistola.—Ibid. xlii. 31.

natural for him to think that as I wrote nothing him before, so I should have written nothing to him, had not the war been wholly ended: besides I am afraid lest he should imagine that I sent this a sweetener for my 'Cato.' In short, I was only ashamed of what I had written; and nothing could fall out more luckily than that it did please."

Again, "as for writing to Cæsar, I swear to you I must do it: nor is it yet the shame of it that has me which ought to do it the most; for how would it be to flatter when even to live is in me? But it is not, as I was saying, this which hinders me, though I wish it did, for should then be what I ought to be; but I can do nothing to write upon. As to those quotations addressed to Alexander by the eloquent I learned of that time, you see on what they turn: they are addressed to a youth armed with the thirst of true glory and desiring to be advised how to acquire it. On an occasion such dignity words can never be wanting; but can I do on my subject? Yet I had scratched here out of the block some faint resemblance of a king; but because there were some things in it a little better than what we see done every day, it was disliked. I am not at all sorry for that the letter gone, take my word for it should have had cause to repent. For do you not that very scholar of Aristotle, a youth of the best parts and the greatest modesty, after he had been called a king, grow proud, cruel, extravagant? Do you imagine that this man, ranked in processions of the gods and enshrined in the temple with Romulus, will be pleased with the moderate style of my letters? It is better that I be disgusted at my not writing, than at what I have written. In a word, let him do what he pleases; for the problem which I once proposed to you and which was so difficult, in what way I should manage to live over with me; and in truth I now wish to feel the effect of his resentment, be it what it may, than I was before afraid of it." "I beg of you, therefore, (says he in another letter,) let us see more of this, but show ourselves at least more so, by our silence and retreat."

From this little fact, one cannot help reflecting on the total effects of arbitrary power upon the lives and compositions of men of genius, and on the constraint that it necessarily lays on the free play of good sense and truth among men. It is not scarce shown itself in Rome, when we see of the greatest men, as well as the greatest which that republic ever bred, embarrassed in the choice of a subject to write upon, and for fear of choosing not to write at all; and it is the same power which, from this beginning, has debased the purity both of the Roman language, from the perfection of elegance to which Cicero had advanced them, to that state of coarseness and barbarism which we find in the productions of the lower empire.

It was the present state of things between Cæsar and Cicero, all the marks of kindness on the part of coldness and reserve on Cicero's. He was determined never to part with his freedom, and took the more pains for that reason to make Cicero easy under it; he seems indeed to have been somewhat afraid of him, not of his engaging in any attempt against his life, but lest by his insinuations, his railleries, and his authority, he should excite others to some act of violence; but what he more especially desired and wanted was, to draw from him some public testimony of his approbation, and to be recommended by his writings to the favour of posterity.

Cicero, on the other hand, perceiving no step taken towards the establishment of the republic, but more and more reason every day to despair of it, grew still more indifferent to everything else; the restoration of public liberty was the only condition on which he could entertain any friendship with Cæsar, or think and speak of him with any respect; without that no favours could oblige him, since to receive them from a master was an affront to his former dignity, and but a splendid badge of servitude: books, therefore, were his only comfort, for while he conversed with them he found himself easy, and fancied himself free.—Thus, in a letter to Cassius, touching upon the misery of the times, he adds, "What is become, then, you'll say, of philosophy? why, yours is in the kitchen, but mine is troublesome to me; for I am ashamed to live a slave, and feign myself, therefore, to be doing something else, that I may not hear the reproach of Plato."

During Cæsar's stay in Spain, Antony set forward from Italy to pay his compliments to him there, or to meet him at least on the road in his return towards home: but when he had made about half of the journey, he met with some despatches which obliged him to turn back in all haste to Rome. This raised a new alarm in the city, and especially among the Pompeians, who were afraid that Cæsar, having now subdued all opposition, was resolved, after the example of former conquerors, to take his revenge in cool blood on all his adversaries, and had sent Antony back as the properest instrument to execute some orders of that sort. Cicero himself had the same suspicion, and was much surprised at Antony's sudden return; till Balbus and Oppius eased him of his apprehensions by sending him an account of the true reason of it; which, contrary to expectation, gave no uneasiness at last to anybody but to Antony himself. Antony had bought Pompey's houses in Rome and the neighbourhood, with all their rich furniture, at Cæsar's auction, soon after his return from Egypt; but, trusting to his interest with Cæsar, and to the part which he had borne in advancing him to his power, never dreamt of being obliged to pay for them; but Cæsar, being disgusted by the account of his debauches and extravagances in Italy, and resolved to show himself the sole master, nor suffer any contradiction to his will, sent peremptory orders to L. Plancus, the prætor, to require immediate payment of Antony, or else to levy the money upon his sureties according to the tenor of their bond. This

* Ubi igitur, inquit, philosophia? Tua quidem in culina; mea molesta est. Pudet enim servire. Itaque facio me alias res agere, ne convictum Platonis audiam.—Ep. Fam. xv. 18.

* Hæc cum ex allorum literis cognovissem de Antonii adventu, admiratus sum nihil esse in tuta.—Ad Att. xii. 18. De Antonio Balbus quoque me cum Oppio conscripsit, idque tibi placuisse, ne perturbarer. Illis ego gratias.—Ibid. 19.

* Ad Att. xiii. 27.

* Ad Att. xiii. 28.

temore, abjectis ista; et semilibri saltem sinis;

consequitur et tacendo, et latendo.—Ibid. 31.

was the cause of his quick return, to prevent that disgrace from falling upon him, and find some means of complying with Cæsar's commands; it provoked him however to such a degree, that in the height of his resentment he is said to have entered into a design of taking away Cæsar's life; of which Cæsar himself complained openly in the senate⁷.

The war being ended in Spain by the death of Cnæus Pompey and the flight of Sextus, Cæsar finished his answer to Cicero's "Cato," in two books, which he sent immediately to Rome in order to be published. This gave Cicero at last the argument of a letter to him to return thanks for the great civility with which he had treated him in that piece; and to pay his compliments likewise in his turn upon the elegance of the composition. This letter was communicated again to Balbus and Oppius, who declared themselves extremely pleased with it, and forwarded it directly to Cæsar. In Cicero's account of it to Atticus, "I forgot," says he, "to send you a copy of what I wrote to Cæsar; not for the reason which you suspect, that I was ashamed to let you see how well I could flatter; for, in truth, I wrote to him no otherwise than as if I was writing to an equal, for I really have a good opinion of his two books, as I told you when we were together, and wrote, therefore, both without flattering him; and yet so that he will read nothing, I believe, with more pleasure⁸."

Cæsar returned to Rome about the end of September, when, divesting himself of the consularip, he conferred it on Q. Fabius Maximus and C. Trebonius for the three remaining months of the year^a. His first care after his arrival was to entertain the city with the most splendid triumph which Rome had ever seen; but the people, instead of admiring and applauding it as he expected, were sullen and silent, considering it, as it really was, a triumph over themselves, purchased by the loss of their liberty^a and the destruction of the best and noblest families of the republic. They had before given the same proof of their discontent at the Circensian games, where Cæsar's statue, by a decree of the senate, was carried in the procession along with those of the gods; for they gave none of their usual acclamations to the favourite deities as they

A. URB. 708.
CIC. 62.
COS.
Q. FABIVS
MAXIMVS,
C. TREBONIVS.

⁷ Appellatus es de pecunia, quam pro domo, pro hortis, pro sectione debebas—et ad te et ad prædes tuos milites misit. [Phil. ii. 29.] Idcirco urbem terrore nocturno, Italiam multorum dierum metu perturbasti—ne L. Plancus prædes tuos venderet.—[Ibid. 31.] Quin his ipse temporibus domi Cæsaris percussor ab isto missus, deprehensus dicebatur esse cum sica. De quo Cæsar in senatu, aperte in te invehens, questus est.—[Ibid. 28.]

^a Conscripsi de his libris epistolam Cæsari, quæ deferretur ad Dolabellam: sed ejus exemplum misi ad Balbum et Oppium, scripsitque ad eos, ut tunc deferri ad Dolabellam juberent meas literas, si ipsi exemplum probarent; ita mihi rescriperunt, nihil unquam se legisse melius.—Ad Att. xiii. 50.

Ad Cæsarem quam misi epistolam, ejus exemplum fugit me tum tibi mittere; nec id fuit quod suspicaris, ut me puderet tui—nec mehercule scripsi aliter, ac si πρὸς ἴσον ὄμιον quæ scriberem. Bene enim existimo de illis libris, ut tibi coram. Itaque scripsi et ἀπολαύεσθαι, et tamen sic, ut nihil eum existimem lecturum libentius.—[Ibid. 51.]

^a Utrouque anno binos consules substituit sibi in ternos novissimos menses.—Suet. J. Cæs. 76.

passed, lest they should be thought to give thanks to Cæsar. Atticus sent an account of it to Cicero who says in answer to him, "Your letter was agreeable, though the show was so sad—the people, however, behaved bravely, who would not do even the goddess Victory for the sake of so bad a neighbour^b." Cæsar, however, to make amends for the unpopularity of his triumph, and to put his people into good humour, entertained the whole city soon after with something more substantial than shows; two public dinners, with plenty of the most esteemed and costly wines of Chios and Falernum^c.

Soon after Cæsar's triumph, the consul Publius one of his lieutenants in Spain, was allowed a triumph too, for the reduction of some parts of the province which had revolted; but the magnificence of Cæsar made Fabius's triumph appear contemptible, for his models of the conquered towns, which were always a part of the show, being made of wood when Cæsar's were of silver or ivory. Chrysippus merrily called them, the cases of Cæsar's towns^d.

Cicero resided generally in the country, withdrew himself wholly from the senate^e; but Cæsar's approach towards Rome, Lepidus began to press him by repeated letters to come and seek them his assistance, assuring him that both he and Cæsar would take it very kindly of him. He did not guess for what particular service they wanted him, except the dedication of some temple to the presence of three augurs was necessary. But whatever it was, as his friends had long urged the same advice and persuading him to return to public affairs, he consented at length to quit his retirement and come to the city; soon after Cæsar's arrival, he had an opportunity of employing his authority and eloquence, he exerted them always with the greatest pleasure in the service and defence of an old friend, Deiotarus.

This prince had already been deprived by a part of his dominions for his adherence to Pompey, and was now in danger of losing the rest from an accusation preferred against him by his grandson, of a design pretended to have formed by him against Cæsar's life, when he was entertained at his house four years before his return from Egypt. The charge was gross and ridiculous; but under his present disgrace the charge was sufficient to ruin him, and he countenancing it so far as to receive and be

^b Suaves tuas literas! etiam acerba pompa—vero præclarum, quod propter tam malum vicem Victorie quidem plauditur.—Ad Att. xiii. 44.

^c Quid non et Cæsar dictator triumphi sui cum Palermi amphoras, Chii cados in convivia distribuit in Hispaniensis triumpho Chium et Falernum dedisti. Hist. Nat. xiv. 15.

Adjecit post Hispaniensem victoriam duo prædæ Sueton. 38.

^d Ut Chrysippus, cum in triumpho Cæsaris oppida essent translata, et post dies paucos Fabius lignea, theas esse oppidorum Cæsaris dixit.—Quint. Dio, 324.

^e Cum his temporibus non sane in senatum venisti Ep. Fam. xiii. 77.

^f Ecce tibi, orat Lepidus, ut veniam. Opinor autem nil habere ad templum effundum.—Ad Att. xiii. 45. Lepidus ad me heri—literas misit. Rogat magnopere sim Kalend. in senatu, me et sibi et Cæsari rebus gratum esse facturum.—[Ibid. 47.]

showed a strong prejudice against the king, and that he wanted only a pretence for stripping him of all that remained to him. Brutus likewise interested himself very warmly in the same cause; and when he went to meet Cæsar on his road from Nicæa, made an oration to him at Nicæa, in favour of Deiotarus, with a freedom which startled Cæsar, and gave him occasion to reflect on what he had perceived so clearly before, the invincible fierceness and vehemence of Brutus's temper. The present trial was held in Cæsar's house, where Cicero manifestly exposed the malice of the accuser, and the innocence of the accused, that Cæsar, being determined not to acquit, yet ashamed to condemn, chose the expedient of reserving his sentence for further deliberation, till he should go in person to the East, and inform himself of the whole affair on the spot. Cicero says that Deiotarus, neither present nor absent, could ever obtain any favour or pity from Cæsar; and that as oft as he pleaded for him, which he was always ready to do, he could never persuade Cæsar to think anything reasonable that he asked for him¹. He sent a copy of his oration to the king, and, at Dolabella's request, gave another likewise to him, excusing its trifling performance and hardly worth translating; "but I had a mind, (says he,) to make a present to my old friend and host, of coarse indeed, yet such as his presents usually are to me a little time after this trial, Cæsar, to show his confidence in Cicero, invited himself to spend with him at his house in the country, and on the third day of the Saturnalia for his visit, whom always dedicated to mirth and feasting with friends and relations². Cicero gives the following account of the entertainment, how the day passed between them. "O this day," says he, "whom I so much dreaded! yet no reason to repent of him, for he was well pleased with his reception. When he came the day before, on the eighteenth, to my neighbour's house, the house was so crowded with soldiers there was scarce a room left empty for Cæsar; in which there were about two thousand of men; that gave me no small pain for the next day; but Barba Cassius relieved me, for he assigned a guard, and made the rest encamp in the country, so that my house was clear. On the nineteenth, he staid at Philip's till one in the afternoon, but saw nobody; was settling accounts, I guess, with Balbus; then took a walk on the shore; bathed after two; heard the verses on Mamurra³, at which he never changed countenance; was rubbed, anointed, sat down to table. Having taken a vomit just before, he ate and drank freely, and was very cheerful⁴: the supper was good and well served:

But our discourse at table, as we eat,

For taste and seasoning still excell'd our meat⁵.

Besides Cæsar's table, his friends were plentifully provided for in three other rooms; nor was there anything wanting to his freedmen of lower rank and his slaves, but the better sort were elegantly treated. In a word, I acquitted myself like a man; yet he is not a guest to whom one would say at parting, 'Pray call upon me again as you return;' once is enough; we had not a word on business, but many on points of literature: in short, he was delighted with his entertainment, and passed the day agreeably. He talked of spending one day at Puteoli, another at Baize; thus you see the manner of my receiving him, somewhat troublesome indeed but not uneasy to me. I shall stay here a little longer, and then to Tusculum. As he passed by Dolabella's villa, his troops marched close by his

¹ Mamurra was a Roman Knight, and general of the artillery to Cæsar in Gaul; where he raised an immense fortune, and is said to have been the first man in Rome who incrusted his house with marble, and made all his pillars of solid marble. [Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 6.] He was severely lashed, together with Cæsar himself, for his excessive luxury, and more infamous vices, by Catullus; whose verses are still extant, and the same probably that Cicero here refers to, as being first read to Cæsar at his house.—Vide Catull. 27, 55.

The reader perhaps will not readily understand the time and manner of Cæsar's passing from Philip's house to Cicero's in this short account of it: but it must be remembered, that their villas were adjoining to each other on the Formian coast, near Cajeta; so that when Cæsar came out of Philip's at one, he took a walk on the shore for about an hour, and then entered into Cicero's; where the bath was prepared for him, and in bathing, he heard Catullus's verses; not produced by Cicero, for that would not have been agreeable to good manners, but by some of his own friends who attended him, and who knew his desire to see everything that was published against him, as well as his easiness in alighting or forgiving it.

² The custom of taking a vomit both immediately before and after meals, which Cicero mentions Cæsar to have done on different occasions, [Pro Deiot. 7.] was very common with the Romans, and used by them as an instrument both of their luxury and of their health: "they vomit," says Seneca, "that they may eat, and eat that they may vomit." [Consol. ad Helv. 9.] By this evacuation before eating, they were prepared to eat more plentifully; and by emptying themselves presently after it, prevented any hurt from repletion. Thus Vitellius, who was a famous glutton, is said to have preserved his life by constant vomits, while he destroyed all his companions who did not use the same caution: [Sueton. 12; Dio, lxx. 734.] And the practice was thought so effectual for strengthening the constitution, that it was the constant regimen of all the athletes, or the professed wrestlers trained for the public shows, in order to make them more robust. So that Cæsar's vomiting before dinner was a sort of compliment to Cicero, as it intimated a resolution to pass the day cheerfully and to eat and drink freely with him.

³ This is a citation from Lucilius, of an hexameter verse, with part of a second, which is not distinguished from the text, in the editions of Cicero's Letters.

sed bene cocto et

Condito sermone bono, et al quæris libenter.

Ad Att. xiv. 1. The Jesuits, Catrou and Rouille, take it, where Brutus made this speech, to be the capital city, Deiotarus's kingdom: but it was a city on the African coast, still called Nice, where Brutus met him on his last return from Spain; and when he was not so prevailed for Deiotarus, Cicero was forced to undertake as soon as Cæsar came to Rome.—Hist. tom. i. p. 81. not.

Quis enim cuiquam inimicior, quam Deiotarus?—a quo nos præsens, nec abscens rex Deiotarus equum equi boni impetravit—ille nunquam, semper abscens affui Deiotaro, quocumque sibi, quod nos pro Deiotaræ, equum dixit videri.—Phil. ii. 37.

Interdum pro Deiotaro, quam requirebas—tibi Quam velim sic legas, ut causam tenuem et inopem, sumptibus magno opere dignam. Sed ego hospitii veteri munusculum mittere volui levidemæ, crasso filo, modici ipsius solent esse munera.—Ep. Fam. ix. 12.

This festival, after Cæsar's reformation of the calendar on the 17th of December, and lasted three days. Saturn. i. 16.

horse's side on the right and left, which was done nowhere else. I had this from Nicias*."

On the last of December, when the consul Trebonius was abroad, his colleague, Q. Fabius, died suddenly; and his death being declared in the morning, C. Caninius Rebilus was named by Caesar to the vacancy at one in the afternoon, whose office was to continue only through the remaining part of that day. This wanton profanation of the sovereign dignity of the empire raised a general indignation in the city, and a consulate so ridiculous gave birth to much railery, and many jokes which are transmitted to us by the ancients[†], of which Cicero, who was the chief author of them, gives us the following specimen in his own account of the fact.

Cicero to Curius.

"I no longer either advise or desire you to come home to us, but want to fly somewhither myself, where I may hear neither the name nor the acts of these sons of Pelops. It is incredible how meanly I think of myself for being present at these transactions. You had surely an early foresight of what was coming on when you ran away from this place; for though it be vexatious to hear of such things, yet that is more tolerable than to see them. It is well that you were not in the field when, at seven in the morning, as they were proceeding to an election of questors, the chair of Q. Maximus, whom they called consul[‡], was set in its place, but his death being immediately proclaimed, it was removed, and Caesar, though he had taken the auspices for an assembly of the tribes, changed it to an assembly of the centuries; and at one in the afternoon, declared a new consul, who was to govern till one the next morning. I would have you to know, therefore, that whilst Caninius was consul nobody dined, and that there was no crime committed in his consulship, for he was so wonderfully vigilant that through his whole administration he never so much as slept. These things seem ridiculous to you, who are absent, but were you to see them you would hardly refrain from tears. What if I should tell you the rest? For there are numberless facts of the same kind, which I could never have borne if I had not taken refuge in the port of philosophy with our friend Atticus, the companion and partner of my studies," &c.[§]

Cæsar had so many creatures and dependants, who expected the honour of the consulship from him as the reward of their services, that it was impossible to oblige them all in the regular way, so that he was forced to contrive the expedient of splitting it, as it were, into parcels, and conferring it for a few months, or weeks, or even days, as it happened to suit his convenience; and as the thing itself was now but a name, without any real power, it was of little moment for what term it was granted, since the shortest gave the same privilege with the longest, and a man once declared consul, enjoyed ever after the rank and character of a consular senator[¶].

On the opening of the new year, Cæsar entered into his fifth consulship, in partnership with M.

Antony: he had promised it all along to Dolabella, but, contrary to expectation, took it at last to himself. This was contrived by Antony, who, jealous of Dolabella as a rival in Cæsar's favour, had been suggesting somewhat to his disadvantage, and labouring to create a diffidence of him in Cæsar, which seems to have been the ground of what is mentioned above, Cæsar's guarding himself as particularly when he passed by his villa. Dolabella was sensibly touched with this affront, and quite full of indignation to the senate, where, not daring to vent his spleen on Cæsar, he entertained the assembly with a severe speech against Antony, which drew on many warm and angry words between them; till Cæsar, to end the dispute, promised to resign the consulship to Dolabella, but he went to the Parthian war: but Antony protested, by his authority as augur, he would dissent that election whenever it should be attempted, and declared, without any scruple, that the ground of his quarrel with Dolabella was for having opposed him in an attempt to debauch his wife Antonia, daughter of his uncle; though that was thought to be a calumny, contrived to colour his divorce of her and his late marriage with Fulvia, the widow of Clodius[‡].

Cæsar was now in the height of all his glory and dressed (as Florus says) in all his trappings like a victim destined to sacrifice[¶]. He had risen from the senate the most extravagant honours, both human and divine, which flattery could invent, a temple, altar, priest; his image set in procession with the gods; his statue among kings; one of the months called after his name, and a perpetual dictatorship[§]. Cicero endeavoured to restrain the excess of this complaisance to the bounds of reason[¶], but in vain, since Cæsar was more forward to receive than they to give, and out of the gaiety of his pride, and to try, it were, to what length their adulation would go, when he was actually possessed of everything, carried with it any real power, was not content without a title, which could add nothing but a popular odium, and wanted to be called king. Plutarch thinks it a strange instance of folly in the people to endure with patience all the effects of kingly government, yet declare such abhorrence to the name. But the folly was as strange in the people as it was in Cæsar: it is natural to the multitude to be governed by names rather than things, and the constant art of pa-

* Dio, p. 240.

† Cum Cæsar ostendisset, se, priusquam proficeretur Dolabellam consulem esse jussurum—hic bonus augur se sacerdotio prædium esse dixit, ut comitis auspicio impedire vel vitare posset, idque se facturum asseruit.—Phil. ii. 32.

‡ Frequentissimo senatu—hanc tibi esse cum Dolabella causam odii dicere ausus est, quod ab eo sorori et uxore stuprum oblatum esse comperisset.—Phil. ii. 32.

§ Quæ omnia, velut infulus, in destinatam mentem cum congrebantur.—Flor. iv. 2, 32.

¶ Flor. ibid; Sueton. J. Cæs. 76.

¶ Plut. in Cæs.

o Ad Att. xiii. 52.

† Macrob. Saturn. li. 3; Dio, p. 236.

‡ Cicero would not allow a consul of three months, so irregularly chosen, to be properly called a consul: nor did the people themselves acknowledge him: for, as Suetonius tells us, [in J. Cæs. 80.] when, upon Fabius's entrance into the theatre, his officers, according to custom, proclaimed his presence, and ordered the people to make way for the consul, the whole assembly cried out He is no consul.

¶ Ep. Fam. vii. 30.

to keep up that prejudice; but it was unpardonable in so great a man as Caesar to lay so much stress on a title which, so far from being an honour to him, seemed to be a diminution rather of that superior dignity which he already enjoyed.

Among the other compliments that were paid to him, there was a new fraternity of Luperci instituted to his honour, and called by his name, of which Antony was the head. Young Quintus Cæsar was one of this society, with the consent of his father, though to the dissatisfaction of his mother, who considered it not only as a low piece of flattery, but an indecency, for a young man of family, to be engaged in ceremonies so immodest, of running naked and frantic about the streets*.

The festival was held about the middle of February; and Caesar, in his triumphal robe, seated himself in the rostra, in a golden chair, to see the diversion of the running, where, in the midst of their sport, the consul Antony, at the head of his naked crew, made him the offer of a regal diadem, and attempted to put it upon his head; at the sight of which a general groan issued from the whole assembly, till, upon Caesar's slight refusal of it, the people loudly testified their joy by a universal shout. Antony, however, ordered it to be entered into the public acts, that by the command of the people he had offered the kingly name and power to Caesar, and that Caesar would not accept it^b.

While this affair of the kingly title amused and amused the city, two of the tribunes, Marullus and Cæcilius, were particularly active in discouraging every step and attempt towards it: they took off the diadem which certain persons had privately placed upon Caesar's statue in the rostra, and committed those to prison who were suspected to have done it, and publicly punished others for daring to salute him in the streets by the name of king, saying that Caesar himself refused and abhorred the title. This provoked Caesar beyond his usual temper and command of himself, so that he accused him to the senate, of a design to raise a sedition against him, by persuading the city that he really intended to be a king; but when the assembly was about to pass the severest sentence upon them, he was content with deposing them from their magistracy, and expelling them from the senate^c, which intemperate people still the more of his real fondness for the name that he pretended to despise.

He had now prepared all things for his expedition against the Parthians, had sent his legions before him into Macedonia, settled the succession of all the magistrates for two years to come^d, appointed Cæcilius to take his own place as consul of the next year, named A. Hirtius and C. Pansa for consuls of the next, and D. Brutus and Cn. Plancus for the following year: but before his departure he resolved to have the regal title conferred upon him by the senate, who were too sensible of his power, and obsequious to his will, to deny him anything; and to make it the more palatable at the same time to the people, he caused a report to be industriously propagated through the city, of ancient prophecies found in the Sibylline books, that the Parthians could not be conquered but by a king; on the strength of which Cotta, one of the guardians of those books, was to move the senate at their next meeting, to decree the title of king to him^e. Cicero, speaking afterwards of this design, says, "It was expected that some forged testimonies would be produced, to show that he whom we had felt in reality to be a king, should be called also by that name, if we would be safe; but let us make a bargain with the keepers of those oracles, that they bring anything out of them rather than a king, which neither the gods nor men will ever endure again at Rome^f."

One would naturally have expected, after all the fatigues and dangers through which Caesar had made his way to empire, that he would have chosen to spend the remainder of a declining life in the quiet enjoyment of all the honours and pleasures which absolute power and a command of the world could bestow; but in the midst of all this glory he was a stranger still to ease: he saw the people generally disaffected to him, and impatient under his government; and though amused awhile with the splendour of his shows and triumphs, yet regretting severely in cool blood the price that they had paid for them; the loss of their liberty, with the lives of the best and noblest of their fellow-citizens. This expedition, therefore, against the Parthians, seems to have been a political pretext for removing himself from the murmurs of the city, and leaving to his ministers the exercise of an invidious power, and the task of taming the spirits of the populace; whilst he, by employing himself in gathering fresh laurels in the East, and extending the bounds and retrieving the honour of the empire against its most dreaded enemy, might gradually reconcile them to a reign that was gentle and clement at home, successful and glorious abroad.

But his impatience to be a king defeated all his projects, and accelerated his fate, and pushed on the nobles, who had conspired against his life, to the immediate execution of their plot, that they might save themselves the shame of being forced to concur in an act which they heartily detested^g; and the two Brutuses in particular, the honour of whose house was founded in the extirpation of kingly government, could not but consider it as a personal infamy, and a disgrace to their very name, to suffer the restoration of it.

* Proximo autem ænatu, L. Cottam quindecimvirem sententiam dicturum; ut quoniam libris fatalibus contineretur, Parthos non nisi a rege posse vinci, Cæsar rex appellaretur.—Sueton. J. Cæsar. 79; Dio, p. 247.

^f Quorum Interpres nuper falsæ quædam hominum fama dicturus in senatu putabatur, eum, quem re vera regem habebamus, appellandum quoque esse regem, si salvi esse vellemus—cum antistibus agamus, ut quidvis potius ex illis libris, quam regem proferant, quam Romæ posthac nec dii nec homines esse patientur.—De Divin. li. 54.

^g Quæ causæ conjuratis fuit maturandi destinata negotia, ne assentiri necesse esset.—Suet. J. Cæsar. 80; Dio, p. 247.

Quintus pater quantum vel potius millesimum nihil, qui lætetur Lupercio filio et Statio, ut cernat duobus sedecore cumulatam domum.—Ad Att. xii. 5.

^b Stabat in rostris collega tuus, amictus toga purpurea, cinctus aurea, coronatus: addeciens, accedens ad sellam: tuum ostendens: gemitus toto foro—tu diadema imponere: plangere populi, ille cum plausu rejiciebat—atque miseris jussit in fastis ad Lupercalia, C. Cæsari, fieri perpetuo M. Antonium consulum populi jussu tuum decessisse, Cæsarem uti noluisse. [Phil. li. 34.] Vell. ab eo ita repulsum erat, ut non offensus videretur. Phil. Part. li. 36.

^c Sueton. J. Cæsar. 79; Dio, p. 245; App. l. li. p. 496; Vell. li. 2. 62.

^d Hirtium consules et tribunos plebis in biennium, quos ille voluit.—Ad Att. xiv. 6.

There were above sixty persons said to be engaged in this conspiracy¹; the greatest part of them of the senatorian rank; but M. Brutus and C. Cassius were the chief in credit and authority; the first contrivers and movers of the whole design.

M. Junius Brutus was about one-and-forty years old, of the most illustrious family of the republic, deriving his name and descent in a direct line from that first consul, L. Brutus, who expelled Tarquin, and gave freedom to the Roman people¹. Having lost his father when very young, he was trained with great care by his uncle Cato, in all the studies of polite letters, especially of eloquence and philosophy; and under the discipline of such a tutor, imbibed a warm love for liberty and virtue. He had excellent parts, and equal industry, and acquired an early fame at the bar, where he pleaded several causes of great importance, and was esteemed the most eloquent and learned of all the young nobles of his age. His manner of speaking was correct, elegant, judicious, yet wanting that force and copiousness which is required in a consummate orator. But philosophy was his favourite study, in which, though he professed himself of the more moderate sect of the old Academy, yet from a certain pride and gravity of temper, he affected the severity of the Stoic, and to imitate his uncle Cato, to which he was wholly unequal; for he was of a mild, merciful, and compassionate disposition, averse to everything cruel, and was often forced, by the tenderness of his nature, to confute the rigour of his principles. While his mother lived in the greatest familiarity with Cæsar, he was constantly attached to the opposite party, and firm to the interests of liberty; for the sake of which he followed Pompey, whom he hated, and acted on that side with a distinguished zeal. At the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar gave particular orders to find out and preserve Brutus, being desirous to draw him from the pursuit of a cause that was likely to prove fatal to him; so that when Cato, with the rest of the chiefs, went to renew the war in Africa, he was induced by Cæsar's generosity and his mother's prayers, to lay down

¹ Conspiratum est in eum a sexaginta amplius, C. Cæsario, Marcoque et Decimo Bruto principibus conspirationibus. —Suet. ibid. 18.

² Some of the ancient writers call in question this account of Brutus's descent; particularly Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the most judicious and critical of them, who alleges several arguments against it, which seem to be very plausible. Yet while Brutus lived, it was universally allowed to him. Cicero mentions it in his public speeches, and other writings, as a fact that nobody doubted, and often speaks of the image of old Brutus, which Marcus kept in his house among those of his ancestors: and Atticus, who was peculiarly curious in the antiquities of the Roman families, drew up Brutus's genealogy or him; and deduced his succession from that old hero, in a direct line through all the intermediate ages, from father to son. —Corn. Nep. vit. Att. 18; Tusc. Disp. iv. 1.

He was born in the consulship of L. Cornelius Cinna III. and Cn. Papirius Carbo, A.U. 668, which fully confutes the vulgar story of his being commonly believed to be Cæsar's son; since he was but fifteen years younger than Cæsar himself: whose familiarity with his mother Servilia cannot be supposed to have commenced till many years after Brutus was born, or not till Cæsar had lost his first wife Cornelia, whom he married when he was very young, and always tenderly loved; and whose funeral oration he made when he was questor, and consequently thirty years old. —Sueton. J. Cæs. l. 6, 50; it. Brut. p. 343, 447, et Corradi notas.

his arms, and return to Italy. Cæsar endeavoured to oblige him by all the honours which his power could bestow; but the indignity of receiving from a master what he ought to have received from a free people, shocked him much more than any honours could oblige; and the ruin in which he saw his friends involved by Cæsar's usurped dominion, gave him a disgust which no favours could compensate. He observed, therefore, a distance and reserve through Cæsar's reign; aspired to no share of his confidence, or part in his counsels, and by the uncourtly vehemence with which he defended the rights of King Deiotarus, convinced Cæsar that he could never be obliged where he did not find himself free. He cultivated all the while the strictest friendship with Cicero, whose principles he knew were utterly averse to the measures of the times, and in whose free conversation he used to mingle his own complaints on the unhappy state of the republic, and the wretched hands into which it was fallen, till, animated by these conferences, and confirmed by the general discontent of all the honest, he formed the bold design of freeing his country by the destruction of Cæsar. He had publicly defended Milo's act of killing Clodius, by a maxim, which he maintained to be universally true, that those who live in defiance of the law, and cannot be brought to trial, ought to be taken off without a trial. This case was applicable to Cæsar in a much higher degree than to Clodius; whose power had placed him above the reach of the law, and left no way of punishing him, but by an assassination. This therefore, was Brutus's motive; and Antony gave him the justice to say, that he was the only one of the conspiracy who entered into it out of principle: that the rest, from private malice, rose up against the man, he alone against the tyrant.¹

C. Cassius was descended likewise from a family not less honourable or ancient, nor less zealous for the public liberty, than Brutus's: whose ancestor, Sp. Cassius, after a triumph and three consulships, is said to have been condemned, and put to death by his own father, for aiming at a domination. He showed a remarkable instance, when boy, of his high spirit and love of liberty; for he gave Sylla's son, Faustus, a box on the ear, bragging among his school-fellows of his father's greatness and absolute power; and when Pompey called the boys before him to give an account of their quarrel, he declared in his presence, that Faustus should dare to repeat the words, he would repeat the blow. He was questor to Crassus in the Parthian war, where he greatly signified by his courage and skill; and if Crassus had follohis advice, would have preserved the whole army; but after their miserable defeat, he made good his retreat into Syria with the remains of the broken legions: and when the Parthians, flushed with success, pursued him thither soon after, and blocked him up in Antioch, he preserved that city and province from falling into their hands, and, watching his opportunity, gained a considerable victory over them, with the destruction of their general. In the civil war, after the battle of Pharsalus, he sailed with seventy ships to the coast of Asia, to raise fresh forces in that country, and renew the war against Cæsar; but as the historians tell us, happening to meet with Cæsar crossing the Hellespont, in a common passage-boat, instead of destroying him, as he might have done, he was so terrified by the sight of the conqueror, that he saved his life in an abject manner, and delivered up his fleet to him; but Cicero gives us a hint of quite a different story, which is much more probable, and worthy of Cassius; that having got intelligence where Cæsar designed to land, he lay in wait for him in a bay of Cilicia, at the mouth of the river Cydnus, with a resolution to destroy him; but Cæsar happened to land on the opposite shore, where he was aware; so that seeing his project frustrated, and Cæsar secured in a country where all people were declaring for him, he thought it best to make his own peace too, by going over to him with his fleet. He married Tertius, the sister of Brutus; and though differing in temper and philosophy, was strictly united with him in friendship and politics, and the constant partner of all his counsels. He was brave, witty, learned, yet passionate, fierce, and cruel; so that Brutus was the more amiable friend, he the more dangerous enemy: in his later years he deserted the Stoics, and became a convert to Epicurus, whose doctrine he thought more natural and reasonable; constantly maintaining that the pleasure which their master recommended was to be found only in the rational practice of justice and virtue. While he lived himself, therefore, an Epicurean, he lived like a Stoic; was moderate in pleasures, temperate in diet, and a water-drinker through life. He valued himself very early to the observance of order, as all the young nobles did who had any great or laudable in view. This friendship was confirmed by a conformity of their sentiments in the civil war, and in Cæsar's reign; during which several letters passed between them, written with a freedom and familiarity which is to be found only in the most intimate correspondence. In these letters, though Cicero rallies his Epicurism, and lays out principles, yet he allows him to have acted with the greatest honour and integrity; and pleasantly says, that he should begin to think of sect to have more nerves than he imagined, since Cassius had embraced it. The old writers lay several frivolous reasons of disgust as the motives of his killing Cæsar; that Cæsar took a number of lions from him, which he had provided for a public show; that he would not give him the consulship; that he gave Brutus the more honourable pretorship in preference to him. But we need not look farther for the true motive than to his temper and principles; for his nature was naturally impetuous and violent; impatient of contradiction, and much more of subjection, and passionately fond of glory, virtue, liberty. It was from these qualities that Cæsar apprehended his danger; and when admonished to beware of Antony and Dolabella, used to say, that it was not the gay, the curled, and the jovial, whom he had cause to fear, but the thoughtful, the pale, and the lean;—meaning Brutus and Cassius!

¹ Natura admirabilis, et exquisita doctrina, et strenua industria. Cum enim in maximis causis versaretur. —[Brut. 26.] quo magis tuum, Brute, iudicium probet eorum, id est, ex veteri academia, philosophorum et secutus es, quorum in doctrina et præceptis dissensio ratio conjungitur cum suavitate dicendi et copia. [Brut. 218.] Nam cum inambularem in Xysto—M. ad me Brutus ut consueverat, cum T. Pomponio venerat. —[Brut. 15.] Brutus—itaque doleo et illius consilio et tua voce populum Romanum carere tamdiu. Quod cum per se doloris est, tum multo magis consideranti, ad quos ista non tantum lata sint, sed nescio quo pacto devenierint. —[Brut. 209.]

Ἄλλ' Ἀργεῖον γε καὶ πολλοὺς ἀνθρώπους λέγοντας ὅς μιν οὐλοῖτο Βρούτῳ ἐπιβιβῆσαι Κλισίῳ, πρὸς τῇ λαμπρότητι καὶ τῷ φαινομένῳ καλῷ τῆς πράξεως. —Plut. in Brut. p. 367; App. p. 436.

The next in authority to Brutus and Cassius, though very different from them in character, were Decimus Brutus and C. Trebonius: they had both been constantly devoted to Cæsar, and were singularly favoured, advanced, and entrusted by him in all his wars; so that when Cæsar marched first into Spain, he left them to command the siege of Marselles, Brutus by sea, Trebonius by land; in which they acquitted themselves with the greatest courage and ability, and reduced that strong place to the necessity of surrendering at discretion. Decimus was of the same family with his namesake, Marcus; and Cæsar, as if jealous of a name that inspired an aversion to kings, was particularly solicitous to gain them both to his interest, and seemed to have succeeded to his wish in Decimus, who forwardly embraced his friendship, and accepted all his favours, being named by him to the command of Cisalpine Gaul, and to the consulship of the following year, and the second year even of his estate, in failure of the first. He seems to have had no peculiar character of virtue or patriotism, nor any correspondence with Cicero before the act of killing Cæsar, so that people, instead of expecting it from him, were surprised at his doing it; yet he was brave, generous, magnificent, and lived with great splendour in the enjoyment of an immense fortune; for he kept a numerous band of gladiators, at his own expense, for the diversion of the city; and after Cæsar's death, spent about four hundred thousand pounds of his own money in maintaining an army against Antony^m.

† C. Cassius in ea familia natus, quæ non modo dominatum, sed ne potentiam quidem cujusquam ferre potuit. [Phil. ii. 11.] Quem ubi primum magistratu ablit, damnatumque constat. Sunt qui patrem actorem ejus supplicii ferant. Eum cognita domi causæ verberasse ac necasse, peculiumque filii Cæleri consecravisse. [Liv. ii. 41.] Cuius filium, Faustum, C. Cassius condiscipulum suum in schola, procriptionem paternam laudantem—colapho percussit. [Val. Max. iii. 1. vid. Plutar. in Brut.] Reliquias legionum C. Cassius—questor conservavit, Syriamque adeo in populû Romani potestate retinuit, ut transgrederes in eum Parthos, felid rerum eventu fugaret ac funderet. [Vell. Pat. ii. 46; Phil. xi. 14.] Οὐδὲ ἔργον ἔτερον ἡγοῦμαι τύχης ἐν ἀπὸρου καιρῷ γενέσθαι μᾶλλον, ἢ Κῆρσιον τὸν πολεμικῶτατον ἐπὶ τριηρῶν ἰβδουμήκοντα ἀπαρσκέψαι Καίσαρι συντυχόντα, μὴδ' ἐς χεῖρας ἐλθεῖν ὑποστῆναι, ὃ δ' οὕτως ἑαυτὸν ἀλογχρὲς ὑπὸ φόβου μόνου παραπέσειν παραδοῖς, ὅτερον ἐν Ρώμῃ δυναστεύοντα ἦδη κατέκτανεν. [App. ii. 483; Dio, xlii. 188; Sueton. J. Cæs. 63.] C. Cassius—sine his clarissimis viris hanc rem in Cilicia ad ostium fluminis Cydni confectisset, si ille ad eam ripam, quam constituerat, non ad contrariam naves appulisset. [Phil. ii. 11.] E quibus Brutum amicum habere malles, inimicum magis timescas. [Vell. Pat. ii. 72.] Ἡδούρην vero ἐ ἀπαρξίαν virtute, justitie, τῷ καλῷ παρρί, et vorum et probabile est. Ipse enim Epicurus—dicit, οὐκ ἔστιν ἡδέως ἀνευ τοῦ καλῶς καὶ δικαίως, ἦν. [Ep. Fam. xv. 18.] Cassius tota vita aquam bibit. [Senec. 547.] Quanquam quicquam loquor? cum uno fortissimo viro; qui postea quam forum attigisti, nihil fecisti nisi plenissimum amplissime dignitatis. In ista ipse αἰρέσει metuo ne plus nervorum sit, quam ego putarim, si modo eum tu probas. [Ep. Fam. xv. 16.] Differendo consulatum Cassium offenderat. [Vell. Pat. ii. 46; Plut. in Brut.; App. 408]

Trebonius had no family to boast of, but was wholly a new man, and the creature of Cæsar's power, who produced him through all the honours of the state to his late consulship of three months. Antony calls him the son of a buffoon, but Cicero of a splendid knight: he was a man of parts, prudence, integrity, humanity; was conversant also in the politer arts, and had a peculiar turn to wit and humour; for after Cæsar's death he published a volume of Cicero's sayings, which he had taken the pains to collect: upon which Cicero compliments him, for having explained them with great elegance, and given them a fresh force and beauty, by his humorous manner of introducing them. As the historians have not suggested any reason that should move either him or Decimus to the resolution of killing a man to whom they were infinitely obliged; so we may reasonably impute it, as Cicero does, to a greatness of soul, and superior love of their country, which made them prefer the liberty of Rome to the friendship of any man, and choose rather to be the destroyers than the partners of a tyrannyⁿ.

The rest of the conspirators were partly young men, of noble blood, eager to revenge the ruin of their fortunes and families; partly men obscure, and unknown to the public^o, yet whose fidelity and courage had been approved by Brutus and Cassius. It was agreed by them all in council to execute their design in the senate, which was summoned to meet on the Ides, or fifteenth, of March: they knew that the senate would applaud it when done, and even assist, if there was occasion, in the doing it^p; and there was a circumstance which peculiarly encouraged them, and seemed to be even ominous; that it happened to be Pompey's senate-house in which their attempt was to be made, and where Cæsar would consequently fall at the foot of Pompey's statue, as a just sacrifice to the manes of that great man^q. They took it also for granted, that the city would be generally on their side; yet for their greater security, Brutus gave orders to arm his gladiators that morning, as if for some public show, that they might be ready, on the first notice, to secure the avenue of the senate, and defend them from any sudden violence; and Pompey's theatre, which adjoined his senate-house, being the properest place for the exercise of the gladiators, would cover all suspicions that might otherwise arise from them. The deliberation that perplexed them, and on which they were much divided, was, whether they should not kill Antony also, and Lepidus, together with Cæsar; especially Antony, the more ambitious the two, and the more likely to create fresh danger to the commonwealth. Cassius, with the majority of the company, was warmly for killing him: the two Brutuses as warmly opposed, and finally overruled it: they alleged, "that to shed much blood than was necessary would disgrace the cause, and draw upon them an imputation of cruelty, and of acting not as patriots, but as partisans of Pompey; not so much to free the cause as to revenge themselves on their enemies, and get the dominion of it into their hands." What weighed with them the most, was a persuasion that Antony would be tractable, and easily reconciled, as soon as the affair was over; but this lenity proved their ruin; and by leaving their work imperfect, defeated all the benefit of it as we find Cicero afterwards often reproach them in his letters^r.

Many prodigies are mentioned by the historians to have given warning of Cæsar's death^s; which having been forged by some and credulously received by others, were copied as usual by all, to strike the imagination of their readers and draw an awful attention to an event in which they were supposed to be interested. Cicero has related one of the most remarkable of them,—"that Cæsar was sacrificing a little before his death, a great pomp and splendour, in his triumphal chariot and golden chair, the victim, which was a fat was found to be without a heart; and when Cassius seemed to be shocked at it, Spurinna the husband, admonished him to beware lest through failure of counsel his life should be cut off; the heart was the seat and source of them both. The next day he sacrificed again, in hopes to the entrails more propitious; but the liver of the bullock appeared to want its head, which reckoned also among the direful omens^t." T

^m Adjectis etiam consiliiis cædis, familiarissimis omnium, et fortuna partium ejus in summum evectis fastidium. D. Bruto et C. Trebonio, allicque clari nominis viris. [Vell. Pat. ii. 56.] Pluresque percussorum in tutoribus filii nominavit: Decimum Brutum etiam in secundis herodibus. [Sueton. J. Cæs. 83.] Cæs. De Bello Civ. l. ii; Plut. in Brut.; App. p. 497, 511; Dio, xlv. 247. &c.] D. Brutus—cum Cæsaris primus omnium amicorum fulset, interfectus fuit.—Vell. Pat. ii. 64.

ⁿ Scurræ filium appellat Antonius. Quasi vero ignotus nobis fuerit splendidus eques Romanus Trebonii pater. [Phil. xlii. 10.] Trebonii—consilium, ingenium, humanitatem, innocentiam, magnitudinem animi in patria liberanda quis ignorat? [Phil. xi. 4.] Liber iste, quem mihi misisti, quantum habet declarationem amoris tui? primum, quod tibi facietum videtur quicquid ego dixi, quod alius fortasse non item: deinde, quod illa, sive faceta sunt, sive sic sunt narrante te venustissima. Quin etiam antequam ad me veniat, risus omnis pene consumitur, &c. [Ep. Fam. xv. 21; ib. xli. 16.] Qui libertatem populi Romani unius amicitiæ præposit, depulsorque dominatus, quam participare esse maluit.—Phil. ii. 11.

^o In tot hominibus, partim obcuris, partim adolescentibus, &c.—Phil. ii. 11.

^p Ὅτι τῶν βουλευτῶν, εἰ καὶ μὴ προμύθοιεν, πρόσθε μὲν ἔδειξεν τὸ ἔργον, συνεπιληφόμενον.—App. 499.

^q Postquam senatus Idibus Martiis in Pompeii curiam edictus est, facile tempus et locum prætulurunt.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 80.

^r Plutar. in Cæs.; App. ii. 499, 509; Dio, 247. Quam vellem ad illas pulcherrimas epulas me Idibus tuis invitasset. Reliquarum nihil habemus.—Ep. i. x. 28; xli. 4; Ad Brut. ii. 7.

^s Sed Cæsari futura omnes evidentibus prodigiis declarata est, &c.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 81; Plut. in Cæs.

^t De Divin. l. 2; ii. 16. These cases of victims sometimes without a heart or liver, gave rise to a question among those who believed the reality of this divination, as the Stoics generally did, how to account for the cause of so strange a phenomenon. The conclusion was, that the gods made such changes instantly, in the moment of sacrificing, by annihilating the condition of the entrails, so as to make correspond with the circumstances of the sacrifice the admonition which they intended to give. [De Divin.] But this was laughed at by the naturalists, as was unphilosophical, who thought it absurd to imagine the deity could either annihilate or create, either anything to nothing, or form anything out of not anything. What seems the most probable, is, that if the facts facts, though ridiculed by Cicero, were publicly affirmed and believed at the time, and seem to have raised a general rumour through the city of some secret danger that threatened Caesar's life, so that his friends, being alarmed at it, were endeavouring to instil the same apprehension into Caesar himself, and had succeeded so far as to shake his resolution of going that day to the senate, when it was actually assembled by his summons in Pompey's senate-house,—till D. Brutus, by rallying those fears as unmanly and unworthy of him, and allying that his absence would be interpreted as affront to the assembly, drew him out against his will to meet his destined fate*.

In the morning of the fatal day, M. Brutus and C. Cassius appeared according to custom in the forum, sitting in their prætorian tribunals to hear and determine causes, where, though they had daggers under their gowns, they sat with the same equanimity as if they had nothing upon their minds, till the news of Caesar's coming out to the senate called them away to the performance of their part in the tragical act, which they executed at last with such resolution, that through the eagerness of stabbing Caesar they wounded even one another².

Thus fell Caesar on the celebrated Ides of March, after he had advanced himself to a height of power which no conqueror had ever attained before him; though to raise the mighty fabric he had made gave desolation in the world than any man perhaps who ever lived in it. He used to say that his conquests in Gaul had cost about a million and two hundred thousand lives³; and if we add the civil wars to the account, they could not cost the republic much less in the more valuable blood of its best citizens; yet when, through a perpetual course of faction, violence, rapine, slaughter, he had made his way at last to empire, he did not enjoy the quiet possession of it above five months⁴.

He was endowed with every great and noble quality that could exalt human nature and give a man the ascendancy in society; formed to excel in peace as well as war, provident in counsel, fearless in action, and executing what he had resolved with amazing celerity; generous beyond measure to his friends, placable to his enemies; and for parts, talents, eloquence, scarce inferior to any man. His orations were admired for two qualities which seldom found together,—strength and elegance.

Cicero ranks him among the greatest orators that Rome ever bred; and Quintilian says that he spoke with the same force with which he fought, and if he had devoted himself to the bar would have been the only man capable of rivalling Cicero. Nor was he a master only of the politer arts, but conversant also with the most abstruse and critical parts of learning; and among other works which he published, addressed two books to Cicero on the analogy of them, they were contrived by Caesar's friends, and almost conveyed away by some artifice, to give them a pretext of enforcing their admonitions, and putting upon his guard against dangers, which they really proceeded from quite different reasons than the pretended denunciations of the gods.

* Plutarch. in J. Cæs. * Ibid. in Brut. App. ii. 505.

† Inducit centena et novaginta duo hominum millia. Cicero prelo ab eo—quod ita esse confessus est ipse, bellum civilem stragem non prodendo.—Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 31.

‡ Sequæ illi tanto viro—plusquam quinque mensium principale quies contigit.—Vell. Pat. ii. 56.

of language, or the art of speaking and writing correctly⁵. He was a most liberal patron of wit and learning wheresoever they were found, and out of his love of those talents would readily pardon those who had employed them against himself; rightly judging that by making such men his friends he should draw praises from the same fountain from which he had been aspersed. His capital passions were ambition and love of pleasure, which he indulged in their turns to the greatest excess; yet the first was always predominant, to which he could easily sacrifice all the charms of the second, and draw pleasure even from toils and dangers when they ministered to his glory. For he thought tyranny (as Cicero says) the greatest of goddesses; and had frequently in his mouth a verse of Euripides which expressed the image of his soul, that if right and justice were ever to be violated, they were to be violated for the sake of reigning. This was the chief end and purpose of his life, the scheme that he had formed from his early youth, so that, as Cato truly declared of him, he came with sobriety and meditation to the subversion of the republic. He used to say, that there were two things necessary to acquire and to support power,—soldiers and money, which yet depended mutually on each other. With money, therefore, he provided soldiers, and with soldiers extorted money; and was of all men the most rapacious in plundering both friends and foes,—sparing neither prince, nor state, nor temple, nor even private persons who were known to possess any share of treasure. His great abilities would necessarily have made him one of the first citizens of Rome; but disdaining the condition of a subject, he could never rest till he had made himself a monarch. In acting this last part his usual prudence seemed to fail him, as if the height to which he was mounted had turned his head and made him giddy: for by a vain ostentation of his power he destroyed the stability of it; and as men shorten life by living too fast, so by an intemperance of reigning he brought his reign to a violent end⁶.

* It was in the dedication of this piece to Cicero, that Cæsar paid him the compliment, which Pliny mentions, of his having acquired a laurel superior to that of all triumphs, as it was more glorious to extend the bounds of the Roman will, than of their empire.—Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 30.

† De Cæsare et ipse ita judicio—illum omnium fore oratorum latine loqui elegantissime—et id—multis literis, et his quidem reconditis et exquisitis, summoque studio ac diligentia est consecutus. [Brut. 370.] C. vero Cæsar et foro tantum vacasset, non alius ex nostris contra Ciceronem nominaretur, tanta in eo vis est, id acumen, ex concitatio, ut illum eodem animo dixisse, quo bellavit, appareat. [Quintil. x. 1.] C. Cæsar, in libris, quos ad M. Ciceronem de Analogia conscripsit. [Aul. Gell. xix. 8.] Quin etiam in maximis occupationibus cum ad te ipsum, inquit, de ratione latine loquendi accuratissime scripserit.—[Brut. 370; Sueton. J. Cæs. 56.]—in Cæsare hæc sunt, mitis, clemensque natura—accedit, quod mirifice ingenii excellentibus, quale tuum est, delectatur—eodem fonte se hausturum intelligit laudes suas, e quo sit leviter aspersus. [Ep. Fam. vi. 6.] Τῆν θεὸν μερίστην σοὶ ἔχει τυραννίδα. [Ad Att. vii. 11.] Ipse autem in ore semper græcos versus de Phœnissis habebat—

Nam si violandum est jus, regnandi gratia
Violandum est: aliis rebus pietatem colas.

De Offic. iii. 21.

Cato dixit, C. Cæsarem ad evitendam rempublicam, sobrium accessisse. [Quintil. viii. 2.] Abstemium ne-it was a common question after his death, and proposed as a problem by Livy, whether it was of service to the republic that he had ever been born^c. The question did not turn on the simple merit of his acts, for that would bear no dispute, but on the accidental effects of them,—their producing the settlement under Augustus, and the benefits of that government, which was the consequence of his tyranny. Suetonius, who treats the characters of the Cæsars with that freedom which the happy reigns in which he lived indulged, upon balancing the exact sum of his virtues and vices, declares him on the whole to have been justly killed^d; which appears to have been the general sense of the best, the wisest, and the most disinterested in Rome, at the time when the fact was committed.

The only question which seemed to admit any dispute was, whether it ought to have been committed by those who were the leaders in it^e, some of whom owed their lives to Cæsar, and others had been loaded by him with honours to a degree that helped to increase the popular odium, particularly D. Brutus, who was the most cherished by him of them all, and left by his will the second heir of his estate^f. For of the two Brutuses, it was not Marcus, as it is commonly imagined, but Decimus, who was the favourite, and whose part in the conspiracy surprised people the most^g. But this circumstance served only for a different handle to the different parties, for aggravating either their crime or their merit. Cæsar's friends charged them with base ingratitude for killing their benefactor and abusing the power which he had given to the destruction of the giver. The other side gave a contrary turn to it,—extolled the greater virtue of the men for not being diverted by private considerations from doing an act of public benefit. Cicero takes it always in this view, and says, "that the republic was the more indebted to them for preferring the common good to the friendship of any man whatsoever; that as to the kindness of giving them their lives, it was the kindness only of a robber, who had first done them the greater wrong by usurping the power to take it; that if there had been any stain of ingratitude in the act they could never have acquired so much glory by it, and though he wondered indeed at some of them for doing it, rather than ever imagined that they would have done it, yet he admired them so much the more for being regardless of favours, that they might show their regard to their country^h."

Some of Cæsar's friends, particularly Pansa and que in imperiis neque in magistratibus prestitit—in Gallia fana, templaque deum donis referta expilavit: urbes diruit, sæpius ob prædam quam delictum—evidentissimis rapinis, ac sacrilegis onera bellorum civilium—sustinuit.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 54; Dio, p. 208.

^c Senec. Natur. Quest. v. 12.

^d Prægravant tamen cætera facta, dictaque ejus, ut et abusus dominatione et jure cæsus existimetur.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 76.

^e Disputari de M. Bruto solet, an debuerit accipere a D. Julio vitam, cum occidendum eum judicaret.—Senec. De Benef. II. 20.

^f Appian. II. 518.

^g Et si est enim Brutorum commune factum et laudis societas æqua, Decimo tamen iratiores erant illi, qui id factum dolebant, quo minus ab eo rem illam dicebant fieri debuisse.—Phil. x. 7.

^h Quod est aliud beneficium—latronum, nisi ut commorare possint, illis se dedisse vitam, quibus non ademerint? quod si esset beneficium, nunquam illi qui illum interfecerunt, a quo erant servati,—tantam essent gloriam consecuti.—Phil. II. 3.

Hirtius, advised him always to keep a standing guard of prætorian troops for the defence of his person, alleging that a power acquired by arms must necessarily be maintained by arms; but his common answer was, that he had rather die once by treachery than live always in fear of itⁱ. He used to laugh at Sylla for restoring the liberty of the republic, and to say in contempt of him that he did not know his letters^k. But, as a judicious writer has observed, "Sylla had learned a better grammar than he, which taught him to resign his guards and his government together; whereas Cæsar, by dismissing the one yet retaining the other, committed a dangerous solecism in politics^l, for he strengthened the popular odium and consequently his own danger while he weakened his defence.

He made several good laws during his administration, all tending to enforce the public discipline and extend the penalties of former laws. The most considerable as well as the most useful of them was, that no prætor should hold any province more than one year, nor a consul more than two^m. This was a regulation that had been often wished for (as Cicero says) in the best of times, and was one of the ablest dictators of the old republic had declared to be its chief security, not to suffer great and arbitrary commands to be of long duration but to limit them at least in time if it was not convenient to limit them in powerⁿ. Cæsar knew by experience that the prolongation of these extraordinary commands and the habit of ruling kingdoms was the readiest way not only to inspire a contempt of the laws but to give a man the power to subvert them; and he hoped, therefore, by this law to prevent any other man from doing what he himself had done, and to secure his own possession from the attempts of all future invaders.

runt, a quo erant servati,—tantam essent gloriam consecuti.—Phil. II. 3.

Quo etiam majorem ei respublica gratiam debet, et libertatem populi Romani unitis amicitie præposuit. deorsusque dominatus quam particeps esse maluit—admirandum obeam causam, quod immemor beneficiorum, mea patriæ fuisset.—Ibid. 11.

ⁱ Laudandum experientia consilium est Pansa ait, Hirtii: qui semper prædixerant Cæsari, ut principatus armis questum armis teneret. Ille dictitans, mori quam timere malle.—Vell. Pat. II. 57.

^j Invidias undique imminentes subire semel confestim esse, quam cavere semper.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 86.

^k Nec minoris impotentie voces propalam edebat. Syllam necesse literas, qui dictaturam deposuerat.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 77.

^l Sir H. Savile's "Dissertatio de Militia Romana," at the end of his translation of Tacitus.

^m Phil. I. 8; Sueton. J. Cæs. 49, 43.

ⁿ Que lex melior, utilior, optima etiam republicæ, ut præstat, quam ne prætorie provincie plus quam annum, neve plus quam biennium consules obtinerentur.—Phil. I. 8.

Mamercus Æmilius—maximam autem, ait, ejus causam esse, si magna imperia diuturna non essent, et temporis modus imponeretur, quibus juris imponi nec possent.—Liv. IV. 34.

SECTION IX.

CICERO was present at the death of Cæsar in the senate, where he had the pleasure (he tells us) to see the tyrant perish as he deserved*.

By this accident he was freed at once from all subjection to a superior, and all the uneasiness and indignity of managing a power which every moment could oppress him. He was now without competition the first citizen in Rome, the first in that credit and authority, with the senate and people, which illustrious merit and services will necessarily give in a free state. The conspirators considered him as such, and reckoned upon him as their sure friend; for they had no sooner finished their work than Brutus, holding up his bloody dagger, called out upon him by name, to congratulate with him on the recovery of his liberty; and when they all ran out presently after into the forum with their daggers in their hands, proclaiming liberty to the city, they proclaimed at the same time the name of Cicero, and hoped to recommend the justice of their act by the credit of his approbation†.

This gave Antony a pretence to charge him afterwards in public with being privy to the conspiracy and the principal adviser of it. But it is plain that he was not at all acquainted with it; although he had the strictest friendship with the actors and they the greatest confidence in him, yet his age, character, and dignity, rendered him wholly unfit to bear a part in an attempt of this nature, and to embark himself in an affair so remote with a number of men who, excepting a few of their leaders, were all either too young to be trusted or too obscure even to be known by the public. He could have been of little or no service in the execution of the act, yet of much use in justifying it afterwards to the city, for he had no share in it nor any personal interest to make his authority suspected. These were the reasons without doubt why Brutus and Cassius did not impart the design to him: had it been for any other motive, as some writers have supposed, or had it admitted any interpretation injurious to his honour, he must have been often reproached with it by Antony and his other adversaries of those times, who were so studious to invent and propagate every calumny that could depress his credit. I cannot, however, entirely acquit him of being in some degree accessory to the death of Cæsar; for it is evident from several of his letters that he had an expectation of such an attempt and that what quarter it would come, and not only expected but wished it. He prophesied very early that Cæsar's reign could not last six months, but must necessarily fall, either by violence or of itself, and hoped to live to see it. He knew the disaffection of the greatest and best of the city, which they expressed with great freedom in their letters, and with much more, we may imagine, in their private conversation. He knew the fierce and haughty spirit of Brutus and Cassius, and their impatience of a master, and cultivated a strict correspondence with them both at this time, as if for the opportunity of exciting them to some act of vigour. On the news that Atticus sent him of Cæsar's image being placed in the temple of Quirinus, adjoining to that of the goddess Salus,—“I had rather,” says he, “have him the comrade of Romulus than of the goddess Safety”: referring to Romulus's fate of being killed in the senate. In another letter it seems to be intimated that Atticus and he had been contriving, or talking at least together, how Brutus might be spirited up to some attempt of that kind, by setting before him the fame and glory of his ancestors. “Does Brutus then tell us (says he) that Cæsar brings with him glad tidings to honest men? where will he find them, unless he hangs himself? But how securely is he now intrenched on all sides? What use then of your fine invention; the picture of old Brutus and Ahala with the verses under, which I saw in your gallery? Yet what after all can he do?” One cannot help observing, likewise, in his pieces addressed about this time to Brutus, how artfully he falls into a lamentation of the times, and of the particular unhappiness of Brutus himself in being deprived by them of all the hopes and use of his great talents, putting him in mind at the same time of his double descent from ancestors who had acquired immortal glory by delivering Rome from servitude. Thus he concludes his treatise on Famous Orators:—

“When I look upon you, Brutus, I am grieved to see your youth, running as it were in full career

* Jam intelliges id regnum vix semestre esse posse—nos tamen hoc confirmamus illo augurio, quo diximus; nec nos fallit, nec aliter accidit. Corruat iste necesse est, aut per adversarios, aut ipse per se—id spero vivis nobis fore.—Ad Att. x. 8.

† Eum σύννοον Quirino malo, quam salutem.—Ad Att. xii. 15.

* Itane nunciat Brutus, illum ad bonos viros εὐαγγέλια? sed ubi eos? nisi forte se suspendit? hic autem ut fultum est! ubi igitur φιλοτέχνημα illud tuum quod vidi in Parthenone, Ahalam et Brutum? sed quid faciat?—Ad Att. xiii. 40.

Parthenone is supposed to denote some room or gallery in Brutus's, or more probably in Atticus's house, adorned with the images or portraits of the great men of Rome, under each of which, as Cornelius Nepos tells us, [in Vit. Att. 18.] Atticus had severally described their principal acts and honours, in four or five verses of his own composing: where the contemplation of these figures of old Brutus and Ahala, joined together in one picture, with the verses under, had given a handle perhaps to a conversation between Cicero and him, how Brutus might be incited by the example of those great ancestors to dissolve the tyranny of Cæsar. It seems also very probable, that this very picture of Atticus's invention, as Cicero calls it, might give occasion to the thought and coinage of that silver medal or denarius, which is still extant, with the heads and names of those two old patriots; Brutus on the one side, Ahala on the other.—Vide Theaur. Morell. in Fam. Junia. Tab. i. l.

Quid mihi attulerit ista domini mutatio, præter mentis, quam oculis cepi, justo interitu tyranni?—Ad Att. xiv. 24.

Cæsar interfecto—statim cruentum alte extollens Cicerone pugilem, Ciceronem nominatim exclamavit, ut ei recuperatam libertatem est gratulatus.—Phil. ii.

18 Dea, p. 240.

† Curare meo consilio interfectum. [Phil. ii. 11.] Vesiliana pelscherrimi facti Hic furiosus me principem dicit hunc. Utinam quidem fuisse, molestus nobis non esset. Phil. Fam. xii. 3; it. 2.

* Quam verisimile porro est, in tot hominibus partim ætatis, partim adolescentibus, neminem occultantibus, non necesse latere potuisse?—Phil. ii. 11.

through the midst of glory, stopped short by the wretched fate of your country. This grief sits heavy upon me, and on our common friend Atticus, the partner of my affection and good opinion of you. We heartily wish you well; wish to see you reap the fruit of your virtue, and to live in a republic, that may give you the opportunity not only to revive but to increase the honour and memory of the two noble families from which you descend: for the forum was wholly yours,—yours all that course of glory. You, of all the young pleaders, brought thither not only a tongue ready formed by the exercise of speaking, but had enriched your oratory by the furniture also of the severer arts, and by the help of the same arts had joined to a perfection of eloquence the ornament of every virtue. We are doubly sorry therefore on your account that you want the benefit of the republic, the republic of you; but though this odious ruin of the city extinguishes the use of your abilities, go on still, Brutus, to pursue your usual studies," &c.

These passages seem to give a reasonable ground to believe that Cicero, though a stranger to the particular councils of the conspirators, had yet a general notion of their design, as well as some share in promoting it. In his reply to Antony's charge, he does not deny his expectation of it, freely owns his joy for it, and thanks him for giving him an honour, which he had not merited, of bearing a part in it. He calls it "the most glorious act which had ever been done, not only in that but in any other city: in which men were more forward to claim a share which they had not, than to dissemble that which they had; that Brutus's reason for calling out upon him, was to signify that he was then emulating his praises by an act not unlike to what he had done. That if to wish Cæsar's death was a crime, to rejoice at it was the same,—there being no difference between the adviser and the approver; yet excepting Antony and a few more, who were fond of having a king, that there was not a man in Rome who did not desire to see the fact committed; that all honest men, as far as it was in their power, concurred in it; that some indeed wanted the counsel, some the courage, some the opportunity, but none the will to do it," &c.⁷

The news of this surprising fact raised a general consternation through the city, so that the first care of the conspirators was to quiet the minds of the people by proclaiming peace and liberty to all, and declaring that no farther violence was intended to any. They marched out, therefore, in a body, with a cap, as the ensign of liberty, carried before them on a spear⁸; and in a calm and orderly manner proceeded through the forum, where, in first heat of joy for the death of the tyrant, set of the young nobility who had borne no part in the conspiracy joined themselves to the company with swords in their hands, out of an ambition to be thought partners in the act; but they paid afterwards for that vanity, and without any of the glory were involved in the ruin which drew upon all the rest. Brutus designed to speak to the citizens from the rostra, but conceiving them to be in too great an agitation to attend to speeches, and being uncertain what the popular humour might turn, and knowing there were great numbers of Cæsar's old soldiers in the city, who had been summoned from all parts to attend him to the Parthian war, he thought proper, with his accomplices, under the conduct of Decimus's gladiators, to take refuge in the capitol⁹. Being here secured from any immediate violence, he summoned the people thither in the afternoon, and in a speech to them, which he prepared, justified his act and explained the motives of it, and in a pathetic manner exhorted them to exert themselves in the defence of their country and maintain the liberty now offered to them against all the abettors of the late tyranny. Cicero presently followed them into the capitol with the best and greatest part of the senate, to deliberate on the proper means of improving this happy beginning, and establishing their liberty on a firm and lasting foundation.

Antony in the meanwhile, shocked by the dizziness of the act, and apprehending some danger to his own life, stripped himself of his countenances and fled home in disguise, where he began to fortify his house, and kept himself close all day¹⁰, till perceiving the pacific conduct of the conspirators, he recovered his spirits, and appeared again the next morning in public.

While things were in this situation, L. Cornelius Cinna, one of the prætors, who was nearly related to Cæsar, made a speech to the people in presence of the conspirators; extolling their act as highly meritorious, and exhorting the multitude to follow them down from the capitol, and reward them with the honours due to the deliverers of the country; then throwing off his prætorian robes, he declared that he would not wear it any longer, being bestowed upon him by a tyrant, and that he would follow the laws. But the next day, as he was going to the senate, some of Cæsar's veteran soldiers gathered a mob of the same party, attacked the streets with volleys of stones and drove him into a house, which they were going presently to set on fire, with design to have burnt him; but Lepidus had not come to his rescue with the regular troops¹¹.

Lepidus was at this time in the suburbs of Rome at the head of an army, ready to depart to join with him: and though Marius, in his sixth ship, destroyed him for that act, by a decree of the senate, yet he himself used the same expedient afterwards; the slaves to take arms with him against Sylla, and marching with his army into the city to attack him. Max. viii. 6.

^a App. ii. p. 503; Dio, p. 250; Plutarch. in Cæs. c. 59.
^b Que tua fuga? que formido præclaro illo die propter conscientiam scelorum desperatio vite? illa fuga—clam to domum recepti.—Phil. ii. 39; 250; App. 503.

^c Plutarch. in Brut. App. p. 504.

⁷ Ecquis est igitur, qui te excepto, et ille, qui illum regnare gaudent, qui illud aut fieri noluert, aut factum improbat? omnes enim in culpa. Etenim omnes boni, quantum in ipsis fuit, Cæsarem occiderunt. Aliis consilium, aliis animus, occasio defuit; voluntas nemini, &c. Phil. ii. 12.

⁸ A cap was always given to slaves, when they were made free; whence it became the emblem of liberty: to expose it therefore on a spear, was a public invitation to the people to embrace the liberty that was offered to them by the destruction of their tyrant. There was a medal likewise struck on this occasion, with the same device, which is still extant. The thought however was not new; for Saturninus, in his sedition, when he had possessed himself of the capitol, exalted a cap also on the top of a spear, as a token of liberty to all the slaves who would government of Spain, which had been assigned to him by Caesar, with a part of Gaul. In the night therefore, after Caesar's death, he filled the forum with his troops, and finding himself superior to any man in power, began to think of making himself master of the city, and taking immediate revenge on the conspirators; but being a weak and vain man, Antony easily diverted him from that design, and managed him to his own views; "he represented the hazard and difficulty of the attempt, while the senate, the city, and all Italy were against him; that the only way to effect what they wished was to dissemble their real purpose; to recommend gentle counsels, and lull their adversaries asleep, so that they had provided a strength sufficient to oppose them; and that, as soon as things were ripe, he would join with him very heartily in avenging Caesar's death." With these remonstrances he lulled him, and to render their union the firmer, he flattered his vanity at the same time, gave his daughter in marriage to Lepidus' son, and invited him to seize the high-priesthood, vacant by Caesar's death, without any regard to the ordinary forms of election. Having thus gained access into his measures, he made use of his vanity and his forces to harass and terrify the senate party, till he had driven the conspirators out of the city; and when he had served his purpose with him at home, contrived to send him to govern, to keep the provinces and the commanders abroad in proper respect to them; and by sitting down with his army in the nearest part of Gaul, he might be ready for any event which should require his help in Italy.

The conspirators in the meanwhile had formed a scheme, beyond the death of Caesar; but they were to be as much surprised and amazed at what he had done, as the rest of the city. They relied entirely to the integrity of their cause, supposing that it would be sufficient of itself to insure that they expected from it, and draw a general concurrence to the defence of their liberty; and taking it for granted that Caesar's greatness, in the height of all his greatness, would deter his partisans from aiming at the same; they placed withal a great confidence in his authority, of which they assured themselves to be their own, and were not disappointed; when this moment he resolved at all adventures to support the credit of the men, and their act, as the means left of recovering the republic. He perceived that the people were all on their side, and as his force was removed, that they were masters of the city; his advice therefore was, to use their present advantage, and in the consternation of the senate party, and the zeal and union of their army, that Brutus and Cassius, as prætors, should lead the senate into the capitol, and proceed to issue vigorous decrees, for the security of the public tranquillity. But Brutus was for marching boldly, and with all due respect to the authority of the consul; and having conceived hopes of success, proposed the sending a deputation to him, and exhorted him to measures of peace; Cicero remonstrated against it, nor would he prevailed with to bear a part in it: he told them plainly, "that there could be no safe treaty with him; that as long as he was afraid of them, he would promise every thing; but, when his fears were over, would be like himself, and perform nothing; so that while the other consular senators were going forwards and backwards in this office of mediation, he stuck to his point, and staid with the rest in the capitol, and did not see Antony for the two first days."

The event confirmed what Cicero foretold: Antony had no thoughts of peace or of any good to the republic; his sole view was, to seize the government to himself, as soon as he should be in condition to do it; and then, on pretence of revenging Caesar's death, to destroy all those who were likely to oppose him: as his business therefore was to gain time by dissembling and deceiving the republican party into a good opinion of him, so all his answers were mild and moderate, professing a sincere inclination to peace, and no other desire than to see the republic settled again on its old basis. Two days passed in mutual assurances from both sides, of their disposition to concord and amity; and Antony summoned the senate on the third to adjust the conditions of it, and confirm them by some solemn act. Here Cicero, as the best foundation of a lasting quiet, moved the assembly in the first place, after the example of Athens, to decree a general amnesty, or act of oblivion, for all that was passed, to which they unanimously agreed. Antony seemed to be all goodness, talked of nothing but healing measures, and, for a proof of his sincerity, moved, that the conspirators should be invited to take part in their deliberations, and sent his son as a hostage for their safety: upon which they all came down from the capitol; and Brutus supped with Lepidus, Cassius with Antony, and the day ended to the universal joy of the city, who imagined that their liberty was now crowned with certain peace.

There were several things however very artfully proposed and carried by Antony, on the pretence of public concord, of which he afterwards made a most pernicious use, particularly a decree for the confirmation of all Caesar's acts. This motion was suspected by many, who stuck upon it for some time, and called upon Antony to explain it, and specify how far it was to extend: he assured them, "that no other acts were meant, than what were known to every body, and entered publicly on ' Dicebam illis in capitolio liberatoribus nostris, cum me ad ire vellet, ut ad defendendam rempublicam adhortarer, quoad metueres, omnia te promissurum, simul ac timere desisses, similem te futurum tui. Itaque cum ceteri consules frent, redirent, in sententia mansi: neque te illo die, neque postero vidi.—Phil. II. 35.

¶ In quo templo, quantum in me fuit, jeci fundamenta pacis, Atheniensiumque renovavi vetus exemplum: Græcum etiam verbum usurpavi, quo tum in sedandis discordiis erat usa civitas illa, atque omnem memoriam discordiarum oblivione sæpterna delendam censui. Præclara tum oratio M. Antonii, cæregia etiam voluntas: pax denique per eum et per liberos ejus cum præstantissimis civibus confirmata est.—Phil. I. 1.

Que fuit oratio de concordia?—Atus parvulus filius in capitolium a te missus pacis obces fuit. Quo senatus die læti? quo populus Romanus?—tum denique liberati per viros fortissimos videbamur, quia, ut illi volebant, libertatem pax sequebatur.—Ibid. 13; Plutarch. in Brut.

Phil. p. 268, 250, 257, 269.

¶ Mithridates me clamare, illo ipso primo capitolium in capitolium a prætoribus vocari? Dilectissimi, que tum opera effici potuerunt, instantibus bonis, etiam aut bonis, fractis latronibus!—Ad Phil. 14.

Cæsar's register: they asked, if any persons were to be restored from exile, he said one only, and no more; whether any immunities were granted to cities or countries, he answered none; and consented, that it should pass with a restriction, proposed by Ser. Sulpicius, that no grant, which was to take place after the ides of March, should be ratified.¹ This was generally thought so reasonable, and Antony's seeming candour had made such an impression, that those who saw the mischief of it durst not venture to oppose it, especially as there was a precedent for it in the case of Sylla; and as it was supposed to relate chiefly to the veteran soldiers, whom it was not possible to oblige, or keep in good humour, without confirming the privileges and possessions which Cæsar had granted to them. But Brutus and his friends had private reasons for entertaining a better opinion of Antony, than his outward conduct would justify; Cæsar had used him roughly on several occasions², and they knew his resentment of it; and that he had been engaged with Trebonius, on Cæsar's last return from Spain, in a design against his life; and though he did not perform that engagement, yet they thought it an obligation, as well as a proof of his continuing in the same mind, that he had not discovered it, which was the reason of their sparing him when Cæsar was killed, and of Trebonius's taking him aside on pretence of business, lest his behaviour on that occasion might provoke them to kill him too³.

But, as Cicero often laments, they had already ruined their cause, by giving Antony leisure to recollect himself, and gather troops about him, by which he forced upon them several other decrees against their will. One of them in favour of the veteran soldiers, whom he had drawn up for that purpose in arms about the senate⁴; and another still worse, for the allowance of a public funeral to Cæsar, which Atticus had been remonstrating against both to Cicero and Brutus, as pernicious to the peace of the city. But it was too late to prevent it: Antony was resolved upon it, and had provided all things for it, as the best opportunity of inflaming the soldiers and the populace, and raising some commotions to the disadvantage of the republican cause; in which he succeeded so well, that Brutus and Cassius had no small difficulty to defend their lives and houses from the violence of his mob⁵. In this tumult Helvius Cinna, one of the tribunes, and a particular friend of Cæsar, was torn in pieces by the rabble, being mistaken unluckily for the prætor of that name, who, as it is said above, had extolled the act of killing Cæsar in a speech from the rostra. This so alarmed those who had any similitude of name with any of the conspirators, that Caius Casca, another senator, thought fit by a public advertisement, to signify the distinction of his person and principles from Publius Casca, who gave the first blow to Cæsar⁶.

We are not to imagine, however, as it is commonly believed, that these violences were owing to the general indignation of the citizens, against the murderers of Cæsar, excited either by the spectacle of his body, or the eloquence of Antony, who made the funeral oration; for it is certain the Cæsar, through his whole reign, could never derive from the people any public signification of the favour; but on the contrary, was constantly mortified by the perpetual demonstrations of the hatred and disaffection to him. The case was the same after his death: the memory of his tyrannical and odious, and Brutus and Cassius the real favourites of the city; as appeared on all occasions wherever their free and genuine sense could be declared, in the public shows and theatres⁷; and Cicero frequently appeals to, as a proper encouragement to all honest men, to act with spirit and vigour in the defence of their common liberty. What happened therefore at the funeral was the effect of artifice and faction, the work of a mercenary rabble, the greatest part slaves and strangers, hired and prepared for violence, against a party many and pursuing pacific counsels, and placing all their trust and security in the justice of their cause. Cicero calls it a conspiracy of Cæsar's freedmen, who were the chief managers of the tumult, which the Jews seem to have borne a considerable part, who, out of hatred to Pompey, bore affront to their city and temple, were zealously attached to Cæsar, and above all the other foreigners in Rome, distinguished themselves by expressions of their grief for his death, so as to spend whole nights at his monument, in a kind of religious devotion to his memory⁸.

This first taste of Antony's perfidy was a warning to the conspirators what little reliance they had to depend upon him, or to expect safety in the city where he had the sovereign command, without a guard for their defence, which, though D. Brutus demanded for them, he could not obtain: whilst Antony, to alarm the still the more, took care to let them know that

¹ Summa constantia ad ea, quæ questita erant, respondit: nihil tum, nisi quod erat notum omnibus, in C. Cæsaris commentariis reperiebatur: num qui exules restituti? unum aiebat, præterea neminem. Num immunitates daret? nullas, respondebat. Assentiri etiam nos Ser. Sulpicio voluit, ne qua tabula post Idus Martias ullius decreti Cæsaris aut beneficii figeretur.—Phil. i. 1.

² Phil. II. 29.

³ Quanquam si interfici Cæsarem voluisse crimen est, vide quæso, Antoni, quid tibi futurum sit, quem et Narbone hoc consilium cum C. Trebonio cepisse notissimum est, et ob ejus consilii societatem, cum interficeretur Cæsar, tum a Trebonio vidimus vocari.—Ibid. 14.

⁴ Nonne omni ratione veterani, qui armati aderant, cum præsidii nos nihil haberemus, defendendi fuerunt?—Ad Att. xiv. 14.

⁵ Meministine te clamare, causam perisse, si funere elatus esset? at ille etiam in foro combustus, laudatusque miserabiliter; servique et agentes in tecta nostra cum sacris immisit.—Ad Att. xiv. 10, 14; Plutarch. in Brut.

⁶ C. Helvius Cinna tribunus plebis ex funere C. Cæsarum suam petens, populi manibus discriptus est Cornelio Cinna, in quem seviris eo existimabat; inquit quod cum affinis esset Cæsaris, adversus eum innotuisset, impium pro rostris orationem habuisset.—Max. ix. 9; Dio, p. 267, 268; Plutarch. in Cæs. et Brut. 1.

⁷ Omnes enim jam civis de republicæ salute uti et voce consentiunt.—Phil. i. 9.

⁸ Quid enim gladiatoribus clamores innumerabiles? quid populi versus? quid Pompeii statue plures infinitus? quid his tribunis plebis, qui vobis adversum parumne hæc significant, incredibiliter consentientium populi Romani voluntatem? &c.—Ibid. 15; Ad Att. xiv. 1.

⁹ Nam ista quidem libertorum Cæsaris conjunctio, si opprimeretur, si recte sciret Antonius.—Ad Att. xiv. 1.

¹⁰ In summo publico luctu exterarum gentium, nec tunc circulant, suo quæque more, lamentata est et ciqueque Judæi, qui etiam noctibus continuè frequentarunt.—Sueton. in J. Cæs. 84.

the populace were so enraged, that he it possible for any of them to be therefore quitted Rome: Treboprivately for Asia, to take possession, which had before been assigned of being prevented by the story. D. Brutus, for the same reason, of the Cisalpine or Italic Gaul, conferred upon him likewise by to strengthen himself there against by his neighbourhood to Rome, to protect all the friends of liberty.
accompanied by Cassius, retired to one near Lanuvium, to deliberate about conduct, and to take such measures as of the times and the motions of their make necessary.

As the conspirators were gone, his mask, and as if the late been accidental only, and the sudden vile mob, professed the same moderate, and affected to speak with the of Brutus and Cassius; and by able acts, proposed by him to the to have nothing so much at heart concord. Among other decrees he which was prepared and drawn up by lish for ever the name and office of seemed to be a sure pledge of his fidelity, and gave a universal satisfaction who passed it, as it were, by acclamation putting it even to the vote; and the walls of the house for it to Antony, afterwards told him, had fixed an eye by it on Cæsar, in declaring to the for the odium of his government, which was become both necessary and left Rome soon after Brutus and a little mortified to see things take turn, by the indolence of their friends; on frequent occasion to say, that the had produced nothing which pleased fact of the day, which was executed mainly vigour, but supported by childishness. As he passed through the country with but mirth and rejoicing in all the on the account of Cæsar's death:

unable to express (says he) what joy where; how all people flock about the Hirtius fuit; qua mente Antonius cæset, quæima scilicet et infidelissima. Nam se vinciam dare posse aiebat, neque arbitrari, quæquam nostrum, adeo esse militum esse et plebis. Quorum utrumque esse fal-sum advertere—placitum est mihi postulare esse Rome publico presidio: quod illos non puto.—Ep. Fam. xi. 1.

que vim jam regie potestatis obcederat, publica sustulit. De qua ne sententias quidem de amplissimis verbis per senatus consultum —maximum autem illud, quod dictature est: hæc inusta est a te—mortuo Cæsari idcirco sempernam, &c.—Phil. i. 1, 13.
tueri urbem a parricidiis viderem, nec te tum trito esse posse, eamque armis oppressio, mihi quoque ipse esse excedendum
est. 15.

ad huc me nihil delectat præter Idus
Att. xiv. 6, 21.] Itaque stulta jam Idum consoletur. Animis eam usi sumus virili-bus, mihi crede, puerilibus.—Ibid. xv. 4.

me; how greedy they are to hear an account of it from me: yet what strange politics do we pursue?
What a solecism do we commit? To be afraid of those whom we have subdued; to defend his acts, for whose death we rejoice; to suffer tyranny to live, when the tyrant is killed; and the republic to be lost, when our liberty is recovered.”

Atticus sent him word of some remarkable applause which was given to the famed comedian, Publius, for what he had said upon the stage, in favour of the public liberty; and that L. Cas-sius, the brother of the conspirator, then one of the tribunes, was received with infinite acclama-tions upon his entrance into the theatre; which convinced him only the more of the mistake of their friends in sitting still, and trusting to the merit of their cause, while their enemies were using all arts to destroy them. This general inclination, which declared itself so freely on the side of liberty, obliged Antony to act with caution, and, as far as possible, to persuade the city that he was on the same side too: for which end he did another thing at this time both prudent and popular, in putting to death the impostor Marius, who was now returned to Rome, to revenge, as he gave out, the death of his kinsman Cæsar; where, signalling himself at the head of the mob, he was the chief incendiary at the funeral and the subsequent riots, and threatened nothing less than destruction to the whole senate. But Antony, having served his main purpose with him, of driving Brutus and the rest out of the city, ordered him to be seized and strangled, and his body to be dragged through the streets: which gave him fresh credit with the republicans; so that Brutus, together with Cassius and other friends, had a personal conference with him about this time, which passed to mutual satisfaction.”

By these arts Antony hoped to amuse the conspirators, and induce them to lay aside all vigorous counsels, especially what he most apprehended, that of leaving Italy and seizing some provinces abroad, furnished with troops and money, which might put them into a condition to act offensively.
With the same view he wrote an artful letter to Cicero, to desire his consent to the restoration of S. Clodius, the chief agent of P. Clodius, who had been several years in banishment, for outrages committed in the city, chiefly against Cicero himself, on whose account he was condemned. Antony, by his marriage with Fulvia, the widow of P.
Clodius, became the protector of all that family, and the tutor of young Publius, her son, which gave him a decent pretence of interesting himself in this affair. He assures Cicero, “that he had procured a pardon for S. Clodius from Cæsar,

* Dicit enim non potest quantopere gaudeant, ut ad me concurrant, ut audire cupiant verba mea ea de re—alio enim περὸ λυγέμεθα, ut victos metueremus—nihil enim tam σλόικον, quam τυραννοκτόνους in cælo esse, tyranni facta defendi.—Ad Att. xiv. 6.

O illi boni! vivit tyrannis, tyrannus occidit. Ejus interfecti morte letamur, ejus facta defendimus.—Ibid. 9.

Ex prior theatrum. Publumque cognovi, bona signa consentientis multitudinis. Plausus vero, L. Cassio dato factus mihi quidem visus est.—Ad Att. xiv. 2.

Infinito fratris tui planctu dirumpitur.—Ep. Fam. xii. 2.
* Uncus impactus esse fugitivo illi, qui C. Marci nomen invaserat.—Phil. i. 2.

* Antonii colloquium cum nostris heroibus pro re nata non incommodum.—Ad Att. xiv. 6.

but did not intend to have made use of it, till he had obtained his consent; and though he thought himself now obliged to support all Cæsar's acts, yet he would not insist on this, against his leave; that it would be an obligation to young Publius, a youth of the greatest hopes, to let him see that Cicero did not extend his revenge to his father's friends: permit me," says he, "to instil these sentiments into the boy; and to persuade his tender mind, that quarrels are not to be perpetuated in families; and though your condition, I know, is superior to all danger, yet you would choose, I fancy, to enjoy a quiet and honourable, rather than a turbulent old age. Lastly, I have a sort of right to ask this favour of you, since I never refused anything to you; if I do not however prevail with you, I will not grant it to Clodius: that you may see how great your authority is with me: show yourself the more placable on that account^b."

Cicero never hesitated about giving his consent to what Antony could and would have done without it: "the thing itself, he knew, was scandalous, and the pardon said to be granted by Cæsar a forgery, and that Cæsar would never have done it, or suffered it to be done; and so many forgeries of that kind began to be published every day from Cæsar's books, that he was almost tempted, (he says,) to wish for Cæsar again^c." He answered him, however, with great civility, and in a strain of complaisance which corresponded but little with his real opinion of the man: but Antony's public behaviour had merited some compliments; and under the present state of his power, and the uncertain condition of their own party, Cicero resolved to observe all the forms of an old acquaintance with him, till by some overt act against the public interest, he should be forced to consider him as an enemy^d.

Antony made him but a cold reply, having heard, perhaps, in the mean time, of something which did not please him in his conduct. He told him only that his easiness and clemency were agreeable to him, and might hereafter be a great pleasure to himself^e.

Cleopatra, the queen of Egypt, was in Rome when Cæsar was killed; but being terrified by that accident and the subsequent disorders of the city, she ran away presently with great precipitation. Her authority and credit with Cæsar, in whose house she was lodged, made her insolence intolerable to the Romans, whom she seems to have treated on the same foot with her own Egyptians, as the subjects of absolute power and the slaves of a master whom she commanded. Cicero had a conference with her in Cæsar's gardens, where her haughtiness of her behaviour gave him no small offence. Knowing his taste and character, she made him the promise of some present very agreeable, but disobliger him the more by not performing it: he does not tell us what it was, but from the hints which he drops, it seems to have been statues or curiosities from Egypt for the ornament of his library, a sort of furniture which he peculiarly fond of. But her pride being mortified by Cæsar's fate, she was now forced to apply to him by her ministers for his assistance in a particular suit that she was recommending to the senate, in which he refused to be concerned. The affair seems to have related to her infant son, whom she pretended to be Cæsar's, and called his name; and was labouring to get him acknowledged as such at Rome, and declared the heir of her kingdom; as he was the year following, both Antony and Octavius; though Cæsar's friends were generally scandalised at it, and Oppius thought worth while to write a book to prove that child could not be Cæsar's^f. Cleopatra had been waiting to accompany Cæsar into the East, in order to preserve her influence over him, which was very great; for after his death, Helvius Cinna, one of the tribunes, owned that he had a law ready prepared and delivered to him by Cæsar, with order to publish it, as soon as he was gone, for grant to him the liberty of taking what number of wives and of what condition he thought fit, for the sake of propagating children. This was contrived probably to save Cleopatra's honour, and to legitimate his issue by her, since polygamy and marriage of a stranger were prohibited by the laws of Rome.

Cicero touches these particulars in several places, though darkly and abruptly, according to the style of his letters to Atticus. "The fight the queen," says he, "gives me no pain. I am glad to hear what farther news there is of her and her young Cæsar. I hate the queen: her son Ammonius, the witness and sponsor of her promises to me, knows that I have reason: they are things only proper for a man of letters, and suited to my character, so that I should not scruple to proclaim them from the rostra. Her other son, Sara, is not only a rascal, but has been rude to me: I never saw him at my house but once; and when I asked him civilly what commands he had from his father, he said that he came to look for Atticus. The pride of the queen when I saw her in the gardens, I can never think of it without resentment. I will have nothing therefore to do with them: they take me to have neither spirit nor even sense left^g."

^f Quorum C. Oppius, quasi plane defensione ac cinctus res egeret, librum edidit, non esse Cæsaris filium Cleopatram dicat.—Sueton. in J. Cæs. 32; Dio 227, 345.

^g Helvius Cinna—confessus est, habuisse se scriptam paratamque legem, quam Cæsar ferre jussisset cum abesset, ut uxores liberorum quærendorum causa, quæ quot decore vellet, liceret.—Sueton. ib. : Dio, p. 243.

^h Regine fuga mihi non molesta. [Ad Att. xiv. 8.] regina velim, atque etiam de Cæsare illo. [Ibid.] Reginam odi. Me jure facere scit sponsor promissæ ejus Ammonius; quæ quidam erant pueri, et filii

^b Ad Att. xiv. after letter the 13th.

^c Antonius ad me scripsit de restitutione S. Clodii: quam honorifice quod ad me attinet, ex ipsius literis cognoscere—quam dissolute, quam turpiter, quamque ita perniciosa, ut nonnunquam etiam Cæsar desiderandus esse videatur, facile existimabile: quæ enim Cæsar nunquam videret fecisset, neque passus esset, ea nunc ex falsis ejus commentariis proferuntur. Ego autem Antonio facillimum me præbui. Etenim ille, quoniam semel induxit in animum sibi licere quod vellet, fecisset nihilo minus me invito.—Ad Att. xiv. 13.

^d Ego tamen Antonii inveteratam sine ulla offensione amicitiam retinere sane volo.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 23.

Cui quidem ego semper amicus fui, antequam illum intellexi non modo aperte, sed etiam libenter cum republica bellum gerere.—Ibid. xi. 6.

^e Antonius ad me tantum de Clodio rescripsit, meam lenitatem et clementiam et sibi esse gratam, et mihi regine voluptati fore.—Ad Att. xiv. 19.

Antony having put his affairs into the best train he could, and appointed the first of June for a meeting of the senate in order to deliberate on the state of the republic, took the opportunity of that interval to make a progress through Italy, for the sake of visiting the quarters of the veteran soldiers, and engaging them to his service by all sorts of bribes and promises. He left the government of the city to Dolabella, whom Cæsar, upon his intended expedition to Parthia, had designed and nominated to the consulship : and though Antony had protested against that designation, and resolved to obstruct its effect, yet after Cæsar's death, when Dolabella, by the advantage of the general confusion, seized the ensigns of the office and assumed the habit and character of the consul, Antony fully received and acknowledged him as such at a secret meeting of the senate.¹

Cicero had always kept up a fair correspondence with his son-in-law, though he had long known him to be void of all virtue and good principles ; he had now greater reason than ever for insinuating himself as far as he was able into his confidence, in order to engage him, if possible, to the service of the republic, and use him as a check on the designs of his colleague Antony ; in which he had the greater prospect of success on the account of their declared enmity to each other. Dolabella greatly confirmed these hopes ; and as Antony had left the city, made all honest men think themselves sure of him by exerting a severe, as well as seasonable act of discipline, on the disturbers of the public tranquillity. For Dolabella, headed by the impostor Marius, and the son of Cæsar, had erected an altar in the forum, on the spot where Cæsar's body was burnt, a pillar of Numidian marble twenty feet high, dedicated to the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY. Here he performed daily sacrifices and divine rites ; the humour of worshipping at this new altar spread itself so fast among the meaner and the slaves, as to endanger the peace and safety of the city ; for the multitudes which flocked to the place, fired with a kind of enthusiastic rage, ran about the streets committing all sorts of outrage and violence against the supposed friends of liberty. But Dolabella put an end to the evil at once by demolishing the pillar and the altar, and punishing the authors of the disorders, and causing all of them as were free to be thrown down the Tiberian rock, and the slaves to be crucified. This was a universal joy to the city : the whole body of the people attended the consul to his house, and the theatres gave him the usual testimony of their thanks by the loudest acclamations.²

Cicero was infinitely pleased with this act, and wrote, ut vel in concione dicere audeam. Saram autem, præterquam quod nefarium hominem cognovi, non in me contumacem. Sornel enim omnino domi sed. Cum Dolabella ex eo quererem, quid opus sit autem ac dixit querere. Superbiam autem ipsius cum esset trans Tiberim in hortis, commemorare magno dolore non possum. Nihil igitur cum istis in autem me, quam vix stomachum habere arbitror.—Ad Att. xv. 15.

Antony collegam, depositis inimicitiiis, oblitus auspicia, non agere vacante, illo primo die collegam tibi esse esse.—Phil. I. 12.

Dolabella postea solidam columnam prope viginti pedum in forum statuit, scriptisque PARMENTIÆ, ut eandem longo tempore sacrificare, vota enjoyed some share of the praise, since it was generally imputed to the influence of his counsels : in a letter upon it to Atticus ; “ O my admirable Dolabella ! ” says he, “ I now call him mine, for, believe me, I had some doubt of him before : the fact affords matter of great speculation ; to throw them down the rock ; to crucify ; demolish the pillar ; pave the area ; in short, it is heroic. He has extinguished all appearance of that regret for Cæsar which was spreading every day so fast, that I began to apprehend some danger to our tyrant-killers ; but I now agree with you and conceive better hopes,” &c.¹ Again : “ O the brave act of Dolabella ! what a prospect does it give us ? I never cease praising and exhorting him.—Our Brutus, I dare say, might now walk safely through the forum with a crown of gold upon his head ; for who dares molest him, when the rock or the cross is to be their fate ? and when the very lowest of the people give such proofs of their applause and approbation ? ” He wrote at the same time from Baie the following letter to Dolabella himself.

Cicero to Dolabella Consul.

“ Though I was content, my Dolabella, with your glory, and reaped a sufficiency of pleasure from it, yet I cannot but own that it gives me an inexpressible joy, to find the world ascribing to me also some share in your praises. I have met with nobody here, though I see so much company every day (for there are many worthy men now at this place for the sake of their health, and many of my acquaintance from the great towns,) who, after extolling you to the skies, does not give thanks presently to me ; not doubting, as they all say, but it is by my precepts and advice, that you now show yourself to be this admirable citizen and singular consul : and though I could assure them, with great truth, that what you are doing flows wholly from yourself and your own judgment, and that you want not the advice of any one ; yet I neither wholly assent, lest I should derogate from your merit, by making it seem to proceed from my counsel ; nor do I strongly deny it, being myself perhaps more greedy of glory than I ought to be. But that can never be a diminution to you, which was an honour even to Agamemnon, the king of kings, to have a Nestor for his counsellor ; while it will be glorious to me to see a young consul, the scholar, as it were, of my discipline, flourishing in the midst of applause. L. Cæsar, when I visited him lately sick at Naples, though oppressed with suscipere, controversias quasdam, interposito per Cæsarem jurejurando, distrahere perseveravit.—Sueton. J. Cæs. 88.

Manabat enim illud malum urbanum, et itis corroborabatur quotidie, ut ego quidem et urbi et otio diffiderem urbano.—Ep. Fam. xli. 1.

Nam cum serperet in urbe infinitum malum—et quotidie magis magisque perditii homines, cum sui similibus servis, tectis et templis urbis minarentur ; talis animadversio fuit Dolabellæ, cum in audaces accleratosque servos, tum in impuros et nefarios cives, talisque eversio illius execratæ columnæ, &c. [Phil. I. 2.] Recordare, quæso, Dolabella, consensum illum theatri.—Ibid. 12.

¹ Ad Att. xiv. 15.

² O Dolabellæ nostri ἀποταλαί ! quanta est ἀναδεύουσις ? equidem laudare eum et hortari non desisto—mihi quidem videtur Brutus noster jam vel coronam auream per forum ferre posse : quis enim audeat violare, proposita cruce aut saxo ? præsertim tantis plausibus, tanta approbatione infimorum ?—Ibid. 16.

pain in every part of his body, yet before he had even saluted me could not forbear crying out, 'O my Cicero! I congratulate with you on account of the authority which you have with Dolabella, for if I had the same credit with my sister's son, Antony, we should all now be safe; but as to your Dolabella, I both congratulate with him and thank him; since, from the time of your consulship, he is the only one whom we can truly call a consul.' he then enlarged upon your act and the manner of it, and declared that nothing was ever greater, nothing nobler, nothing more salutary to the state; and this indeed is the common voice of all. Allow me, therefore, I beg of you, to take some share, though it be a false one, in the possession of another man's glory; and admit me in some degree into a partnership of your praises. But to be serious, my Dolabella, for hitherto I have been joking, I would sooner transfer all the credit that I have to you, if I really have any, than rob you of any part of yours; for as I have always had that sincere affection for you, to which you have been no stranger, so now I am so charmed by your late conduct that no love was ever more ardent. For, believe me, there is nothing after all more engaging, nothing more beautiful, nothing more lovely than virtue. I have ever loved M. Brutus, you know, for his incomparable parts, sweet disposition, singular probity, and firmness of mind; yet on the ides of March, such an accession was made to my love, that I was surprised to find any room for increase in that which I had long ago taken to be full and perfect. Who could have thought it possible that any addition could be made to my love of you? Yet so much has been added that I seem but now at last to love, before to have only esteemed you. What is it, therefore, that I must now exhort you to? Is it to pursue the path of dignity and glory? And as those do, who use to exhort, shall I propose to you the examples of eminent men? I can think of none more eminent than yourself. You must imitate therefore yourself; contend with yourself; for after such great things done, it would be a disgrace to you not to be like yourself. Since this then is the case, there is no occasion to exhort but to congratulate with you; for that has happened to you which scarce ever happened to any man, that by the utmost severity of punishing, instead of acquiring odium, you are become popular; and not only with the better sort, but the very meanest of the city. If this was owing to fortune, I should congratulate your felicity; but it was owing to the greatness of your courage, as well as of your parts and wisdom. For I have read your speech to the people; nothing was ever more prudent; you enter so deliberately and gradually into the reason of your act, and retire from it so artfully, that the case itself, in the opinion of all, appears to be ripe for punishment. You have freed us therefore both from our danger and our fears, and have done an act of the greatest service not only to the present times, but for the example of it also to posterity. You are to consider that the republic now rests upon your shoulders, and that it is your part not only to protect but to adorn those men, from whom we have received this beginning of our liberty; but of this we shall talk more fully when we meet again, as I hope we shall shortly: in the mean while, since you are now the common guardian both of the republic and of us all, take care, my dear Dolabella, that you guard more especially your own safety."

In this retreat from Rome he had a mind to make an excursion to Greece, and pay a visit to his son at Athens, whose conduct did not please him, and seemed to require his presence to reform and set it right*. But the news of Dolabella's behaviour, and the hopes which it gave of gaining the only thing that was wanted, a head and leader of their cause armed with the authority of the state, made him resolve to stay at least till after the first of June, lest his absence should be interpreted as kind of desertion; nor did he ever intend indeed to leave Italy, till he could do it without censure, and to the full satisfaction of Brutus, whom he was determined never to desert on any occasion†.

He had frequent meetings and conferences of this while with his old friends of the opposite side the late ministers of Caesar's power, Pansa, Hirtius, Balbus, Matius, &c. But Caesar's death, on which their sentiments were very different from his, in great measure broken their former confidence, and though the popularity of the act made them somewhat shy of speaking their minds freely of it, yet he easily perceived that they were still displeased with it, and seemed to want an occasion of revenging it. Pansa and Hirtius, as has been said, were nominated by Caesar to the consulship of the next year; and as Caesar's acts were ratified by the senate, were to succeed to it of course. This made Brutus and Cassius press Cicero earnestly to gain them, if possible, to the republican side, but especially Hirtius, whom they most expected. But Cicero seems to have had little hope of success; his account of them to Atticus, "That there was not one of them who did not dread peace more than war; that they were continually lamenting the miserable end of so good a man; and declaring that the republic was ruined by it; that all his acts would be made void as people's fears were over, and that closeness of his ruin, since, if it had not been for that, he might not have perished in such a manner; and of Hirtius in particular, he warmly loves him (says he) as Brutus stabbed; as to their desiring me to do him better, I am doing my endeavour: he is very honestly, but lives with Balbus, who is honestly too; how far they are to be trusted must consider."

But of all this set of men, Matius was the

* Ep. Fam. ix. 14.

† Quod sentio valde esse utile ad confirmationem, nonis, me illuc venire. [Ad Att. xiv. 13.] Magni est Cicerois, vel mea potius, vel mehercule utriusque intervenire discenti.—Ibid. 16.

‡ Nunc autem videmur habituri decem, quod si municipia, bonique desiderant.—Ibid. 20.

§ Ne vero discedam, nisi cum tu me id boneste facere posses. Bruto certe meo nullo loco deero.—Ibid. it. xvi. 13.

¶ Minime enim obsecrum est, quid isti molis meus vero discipulus, qui hodie apud me cœnat, valde illum, quem Brutus noster aucevit, et si quis, pœnem plane, timent otium. Brutus autem hanc eamque prae se ferunt, virum clarissimum inter totam rempublicam illius interitu perturbatum: irritumque ille egisset, simul ac desistens timere. Cuius illi malo fuisse: qua si usus non esset, nihil illi accidere potuisset.—Ad Att. xiv. 22.

¶ Quod Hirtium per me mellorem fieri vult, de equo operam, et ille optime loquitur, sed vivit habetque pen and explicit in condemning the act of the conspirators, so as to put Cicero out of humour with him, as a man irreconcilable to the liberty of the republic. Cicero called upon him on his way from Rome into the country, and found him sullen, sponding, and foreboding nothing but wars and evolution, as the certain consequence of Cæsar's oath. Among other particulars of their conversation, Mælius told him something which Cæsar had lately said both of him and Brutus; that he used to say of Brutus, "it was of great consequence which way he stood inclined, since whatever he had a mind to, he pursued with an impetuous eagerness; and he had remarked this of him more especially in his pleading for Deiotarus at Nicæa; where he spoke with a surprising vehemence and freedom: and of Cicero, that when he was attending Cæsar in the cause of Sestius, Cæsar perceiving him sitting in the room, and waiting till he was called, said, 'Can I doubt of my being extremely odious, when Cicero sits waiting and cannot get access to me?' yet if any man be easy enough to forgive it, it is, though I do not question but that he really does me."

There were several reasons, however, which made necessary to these men to court Cicero at this time as much as ever; for if the republic happened to recover itself, he was of all men the most capable to protect them on that side; if not, the best able to assist them against Antony, whose aims and success they dreaded still more: for if they must have a new master, they were disposed, for the sake of Cæsar, to prefer his heir and nephew, Octavius. We find Hirtius and Pansa, therefore, very assiduous in their observance of him. They spent a great part of the summer with him at different times in his villas, giving him the strongest assurances of their good intentions, and disposition to peace, and that he should be the arbiter of their future consulship; and though he continued still to have some distrust of them, yet Pansa wholly persuaded him that they were sincere.

Brutus and Cassius continued still near Lanuvium, in the neighbourhood of Cicero's villa at Ardea, of which, at Cicero's desire, they sometimes made use¹; being yet irresolute what measures they should take, they kept themselves quiet at Ardea, expecting what time and chance would offer, and waiting particularly to see what humour the consuls would be in at the next meeting of the senate, with regard to themselves and the republic; and since they were driven from the discharge of their prætorship in the city, they contrived to put the people in mind of them, from time to time, by their edicts, in which they made the strongest professions of their pacific disposition; and declared, "that their conduct should give no handle for a civil war; and that they would submit to a perpetual exile, if it would contribute in any manner to the public concord, being content with the consciousness of their act, as the greatest honour which they could enjoy²." Their present design was to come to Rome on the first of June, and take their places in the senate, if it should be thought advisable; or to present themselves at least in the rostra, and try the affections of the people, for whom Brutus was preparing a speech. They sent to know Cicero's opinion of this project, with the copy also of that speech which Brutus made in the capitol on the day of Cæsar's death, begging his revision and correction of it, in order to its being published. Cicero, in his account of it to Atticus, says, "the oration is drawn with the utmost elegance, both of sentiments and style; yet were I to handle the subject, I should work it up with more fire. You know the character of the speaker; for which reason I could not correct it. For in the style in which our friend would excel, and according to the idea which he has formed of the best manner of speaking, he has succeeded so well, that nothing can be better: but whether I am in the right or the wrong, I am of a quite different taste. I wish, however, that you would read it, if you have not already, and let me know what you think of it; though I am afraid, lest through the prejudice of your name, you should show too much of the Attic in your judgment: yet if you remember the thunder of Demosthenes, you will perceive that the greatest force may consist with the perfection of Attic elegance³."

Atticus did not like the speech; he thought the manner too cold and spiritless for so great an occasion; and begged of Cicero to draw up another to be published in Brutus's name: but Cicero would not consent to it, thinking the thing itself improper, and knowing that Brutus would take it ill⁴. In one of his letters on the subject,—"Though you think me in the wrong," says he, "to imagine that the republic depends on Brutus, the fact is certainly so: there will either be none at all, or it will be saved by him and his accomplices. As to your urging me to write a speech for him, take it from me, my Atticus, as a general rule, which by long experience I have found to be true, that there never was a poet or orator who thought any one preferable to himself. This is the case even with bad ones. What shall we think, then, of Brutus, who has both wit and learning? especially after the late experiment of him in the case of the edict. I drew up one for him at your desire. I liked mine; he his. Besides, when at his earnest solicitation I addressed to him my treatise on the best manner of speaking, he wrote word, not only to me, but to you too, that the qui item bene loquitur. Quid credas videris.—

¹ Testati edictis, libenter se vel in perpetuo exilio victuros, dum republicæ constaret concordia, nec ullam belli civilis præbituros materiam, plurimum sibi honoris esse in conscientia facti esse, &c. [Vell. Pat. ii. 62.] Edictum Bruti et Cassii probò. [Ad Att. xiv. 24.] De quibus tu bonam spem to habere significas propter edictorum humanitatem.—Ibid. xv. 1.

² Ad Att. xv. 1.

³ Ibid. 3, 4.

Ad Att. xv. 1.

De Bruto nostro—Cæsarem solitum dicere:—Magni est tibi quid velit: sed quicquid vult, valde vult. cum animadvertisse cum pro Deiotaro Nicomedi, valde vehementer cum visum, et libere dicere. et etiam proxime cum Sestii rogatu apud eum fuisse perorantem sedens quoad vocaret, dixisse eum:—Quidam quia summo in odio sim, cum M. Cicero me non commode me convenire possit? Atqui si non est facili, hic est: tamen non dubito, quin me perit.—Ad Att. xiv. 1.

Pansa vixi in Pompeiano. Is plane mihi prodest, ut bene sentire et cupere pacem &c.—Ad Att. xiv. 24. xv. 1.

Utrum mehercule Asture Brutus. [Ad Att. xiv. 11.] Apud me fuisse gaudeo: modo et libenter fuerit et de.—Ibid. xv. 2.

kind of eloquence which I recommended did not please him. Let every one, therefore, compose for himself—I wish only that it may be in his power to make a speech at all; for if ever he can appear again with safety at Rome, we have gained the victory*.”

In this interval a new actor appeared on the stage, who, though hitherto but little considered, soon made the first figure upon it, and drew all people's eyes towards him: the young Octavius, who was left by his uncle Cæsar the heir of his name and estate. He had been sent a few months before to Apollonia, a celebrated academy or school of learning in Macedonia, there to wait for his uncle on his way to the Parthian war, in which he was to attend him; but the news of Cæsar's death soon brought him back to Italy, to try what fortunes he could carve for himself, by the credit of his new name, and the help of his uncle's friends. He arrived at Naples on the eighteenth of April, whither Balbus went the next morning to receive him, and returned the same day to Cicero, near Cumæ, having first conducted Octavius to the adjoining villa of his father-in-law Philip. Hirtius and Pansa were with Cicero at the same time, to whom they immediately presented Octavius, with the strongest professions on the part of the young man, that he would be governed entirely by his direction^a.

The sole pretension which he avowed at present was, to assert his right to the succession of his uncle's estate, and to claim the possession of it; but this was thought an attempt too hardy and dangerous for a mere boy, scarce yet above eighteen years old; for the republican party had great reason to be jealous of him, lest with the inheritance of the estate, he should grasp at the power of his uncle; and Antony still more, who had destined that succession to himself, and already seized the effects, lest by the advantage of all that wealth, Octavius might be in a condition to make head against him. The mother, therefore, and her husband Philip, out of concern for his safety, pressed him to suspend his claim for awhile, and not assume an invidious name, before he could see what turn the public affairs would take; but he was of too great a spirit to relish any suggestions of caution, declaring it base and infamous to think himself unworthy of a name, of which Cæsar had thought him worthy^b: and there were many about him constantly pushing him on to throw himself upon the affections of the city and the army, before his enemies had made themselves too strong for him; so that he was on fire to be at Rome, and to enter into action, being determined to risk all his hopes on the credit of his name, and the friends and troops of his uncle.

Before he left the country, Cicero, speaking of him to Atticus, says,—“Octavius is still with us, and treats me with the greatest respect and friendship. His domestics give him the name of Cæsar Philip does not; nor for that reason do I. It not possible for him, in my opinion, to make good citizen, there are so many about him who threaten the death of our friends: they declare that what they have done can never be forgiven. We will be the case, think you, when the boy comes to Rome, where our deliverers cannot show the heads? who yet must ever be famous, nay, happy too, in the consciousness of their act; but as for us, unless I am deceived, we shall be undone. I long, therefore, to go abroad, where I may be no more of these Pelopidae,” &c.^c

As soon as Octavius came to Rome, he was produced to the people by one of the tribunes, made a speech to them from the rostra, which is now generally possessed by the enemies of Brutus who were perpetually making use of the advantage to inflame the mob against him. “Remember,” says Cicero, “what I tell you: this custom of seditious harangues is so much cherished, that those heroes of ours, or rather gods, will live in immortal glory, yet not without envy, and danger: their great comfort, however, is, consciousness of a most glorious act; but what comfort for us, who, when our king is killed, not yet free? But fortune must look to this, since reason has no sway^d.”

Octavius seconded his speech by what was to please the inferior part of the city much better the representation of public shows and plays: honour of his uncle's victories. Cæsar had misused and prepared for them in his lifetime; those whom he had entrusted with the management durst not venture to exhibit them after death, till Octavius, as his heir and representative undertook the affair, as devolved, of course, on himself^e. In these shows Octavius brought the golden chair which, among the other honours decreed to Cæsar when living, was ordered to be placed in the theatres and circus, as to a deity on all solemn occasions^f. But the tribunes ordered the chair to be taken away, upon which the knights testified their applause by a great clap. Atticus sent an account of this to Cicero, which was very agreeable to him^g; but he was not at all pleased with Octavius's conduct, since it indicated a spirit determined to revive the memory and to avenge the death of Cæsar; and he was less pleased to hear, also, that Matius had ^a Nobiscum hic perhonorifice et amice Octavius; quidem sui Cæsarem salutabant, Philippus non: ne nos quidem: quem nego posse bonum civem, ita circumstant, qui quidem nostris mortem minit. Negant hæc ferri posse. Quid censes, cum Romanus venerit, ubi nostri liberatores tui esse non possunt? quidem semper erunt clari; consensientia vero facilius beat: sed nos, nisi me fallit, jacebimus. I have exire, ubi nec Pelopidarum, &c.—Ad Att. xiv.

^b Sed memento, si aliter consuetudo perditur, cionum, ut nostri illi non heroes, sed dii, futuri quid gloria sempiterna sint, sed non sine invidia, ne sine culo quidem: verum illis magna consolatio, consensum illi clarissimi facti: nobis quæ, qui inter rege liberi non sumus? Sed hæc fortuna viderit, quæ ratio non gubernat.—Ad Att. xiv. 11.

^c Ludos autem victorie Cæsaris non audentibus! quibus obtingat id munus, ipse edidit.—Sueton. in A. Dio, p. 272.

^d Dio, xlv. 243.

^e De sella Cæsaris, bene tribuni. Præclaros etiam ordines.—Ad Att. xv. 3.

^a Ad Att. xiv. 20.

^b Octavius Neapolim venit a. d. xiiii. Kal. ibi eum Balbus mane postidit; eodemque die cum eo in Cumano. [Ad Att. xiv. 10.] Hic cum eo Balbus, Hirtius, Pansa. Modo venit Octavius, et quidem in proximam villam Philippi, mihi totus deditus.—Ibid. 11.

^c Non placebat Atii matri, Philippique vitrico, adiri nomen invidiosæ fortune Cæsaris—sprevit celestis animus humana consilia—dictitans nefas esse, quo nomine Cæsari dignus esset visus, abimur ipsum videri indignum.—Vell. Pat. II. 60.

upon him the care of these shows¹, since it confirmed the suspicion which he had before conceived of Matius, and made him apprehensive that he would be an ill counsellor to young Octavius, in which light he seems to have represented him to Brutus. Matius was informed of these suspicions, and complained to their common friend Trebatius of Cicero's unkind opinion and unfriendly treatment of him, which gave occasion to the following apology from Cicero, and the answer to it from Matius, which is deservedly valued, not only for the beauty of its sentiments and composition, but for preserving to us a name and character, which was almost lost to history, of a most esteemed and amiable person, who lived in the first degree of confidence with Cæsar, and for parts, learning, and virtue, was scarce inferior to any of that age.

Cicero takes pains to persuade Matius that he had said nothing of him but what was consistent with the strictest friendship; and to gain the easier credit with him, prefaces his apology with a detail and acknowledgment of Matius's perpetual civilities and observance of him through life, even when in the height of his power and credit with Cæsar; but when he comes to the point of the complaint he touches it very tenderly, and observes only in general, "that as Matius's dignity exposed everything which he did to public notice, so the malice of the world interpreted some of his acts more hardly than they deserved; that it was his care always to give the most favourable turn to them—but you (says he), a man of the greatest learning, are not ignorant, that if Cæsar was in fact a king, as I indeed look upon him to have been, there are two ways of considering the case of your duty; either that, which I commonly take, of extolling your fidelity and humanity, in showing so much affection even to a dead friend; or the other, which some people use, that the liberty of our country ought to be preferred to the life of any friend. I wish that you had heard with what zeal I used to defend you in these conversations; but there are two things especially that make the principal part of your praise, which no man speaks of more frequently or more freely than I: that you, of all Cæsar's friends, were the most active, both in disarming the civil war, and in moderating the victory; in which I have met with nobody who does not agree with me!" &c.

Matius to Cicero.

"Your letter gave me great pleasure, by letting me see that you retain still that favourable opinion of me, which I had always hoped and wished; and though I had never, indeed, any doubt of it, yet for the high value that I set upon it, I was very solicitous that it should remain always inviolable; I was conscious to myself that I had done nothing which could reasonably give offence to any honest man, and did not imagine, therefore, that a person of your great and excellent accomplishments could be induced to take any without reason, especially against one who had always professed, and still continued to profess, a sincere good-will to you. Since all this, then, stands just as I wish it, I will now give an answer to those accusations, from which you, agreeably to your character, out of your singular goodness and friendship, have so often defended me. I am no stranger to what has been said of me by certain persons, since Cæsar's death: they call it a crime in me, that I am concerned for the loss of an intimate friend, and sorry that the man whom I loved met with so unhappy a fate: they say that our country ought to be preferred to any friendship, as if they had already made it evident that his death was of service to the republic; but I will not deal craftily; I own myself not to be arrived at that degree of wisdom; nor did I yet follow Cæsar in our late dissensions, but my friend, whom, though displeased with the thing, I could not desert; for I never approved the civil war, or the cause of it, but took all possible pains to stifle it in its birth. Upon the victory, therefore, of a familiar friend, I was not eager either to advance or to enrich myself: an advantage which others, who had less interest with him than I, abused to great excess. Nay, my circumstances were even hurt by Cæsar's law, to whose kindness the greatest part of those who now rejoice at his death, owed their very continuance in the city. I solicited the pardon of the vanquished with the same zeal as if it had been for myself. Is it possible, therefore, for me, who laboured to procure the safety of all, not to be concerned for the death of him from whom I used to procure it? especially when the very same men who were the cause of making him odious, were the authors also of destroying him. But I shall have cause, they say, to repent, for daring to condemn their act. Unheard of insolence! that it should be allowed to some to glory in a wicked action, yet not to others even to grieve at it, without punishment! But this was always free even to slaves, to fear, rejoice, and grieve by their own will, not that of another; which yet these men, who call themselves the authors of liberty, are endeavouring to extort from us by the force of terror. But they may spare their threats; for no danger shall terrify me from performing my duty and the offices of humanity, since it was always my opinion, that an honest death was never to be avoided, often even to be sought. But why are they angry with me for wishing only that they may repent of their act? I wish that all the world may regret Cæsar's death. But I ought, they say, as a member of civil society, to wish the good and safety of the republic. If my past life and future hopes do not already prove that I wish it, without my saying so, I will not pretend to evince it by argument.—I beg of you, therefore, in the strongest terms, to attend to facts rather than to words; and if you think it the most useful to one in my circumstances, that what is right should take place, never imagine that I can have any union or commerce with ill-designing men. I acted the same part in my youth, where to mistake would have been pardonable; shall I then undo it all again, and renounce my principles in my declining age? No; it is my resolution to do nothing that can give any offence, except it be when I lament the cruel fate of a dear friend and illustrious man. If I were in different sentiments, I would never disown what I was doing, lest I should be thought not only wicked for pursuing what was wrong, but false and cowardly for dissembling it. But I undertook the care of the shows which young Cæsar exhibited for the victory of his uncle: this was an affair of private, not of public duty : it was what I ought to have performed to the memory and honour of my dear friend, and what I could not, therefore, deny to a youth of the greatest hopes, and so highly worthy of Cæsar. But I go often, also, to the consul Antony's, to pay my compliments : yet you will find those very men go oftener to ask and receive favours, who reflect upon me for it, as disaffected to my country. But what arrogance is this ? When Cæsar never hindered me from visiting whom I would—even those whom he did not care for—that they, who had deprived me of him, should attempt, by their cavils, to debar me from placing my esteem where I think proper. But I am not afraid that either the modesty of my life should be sufficient to confute all false reports of me for the future, or that they, who do not love me for my constancy to Cæsar, would not choose to have their friends resemble me rather than themselves. For my own part, if I could have my wish, I would spend the remainder of my days in quiet at Rhodes ; but if any accident prevent me, will live in such a manner at Rome, as always to desire that what is right may prevail. I am greatly obliged to our friend Trebatius, for giving me this assurance of your sincere and friendly regard for me, and for making it my duty to respect and observe a man whom I had esteemed always before with inclination. Take care of your health, and preserve me in your affection—^k."

¹ Ledorum ejus apparatus, et Matius ac Postumius promissiones non placent.—Ad Att. xv. 2.

² Ep. Fam. xi. 17.

Antony all this while was not idle, but pushed on his designs with great vigour and address : in his progress through Italy, his business was to gather up Cæsar's old soldiers from the several colonies and quarters in which they were settled ; and by large bribes, and larger promises, to attach them to his interests, and draw great bodies of them towards Rome, to be ready for any purpose that his affairs should require. In the city likewise he neglected no means which his consular authority offered, how unjust or violent soever, of strengthening his power ; and let all people now see for what ends he had provided that decree, to which the senate had consented for the sake of peace, of confirming Cæsar's acts ; for being the master both of Cæsar's papers and of his secretary Faberius, by whose hand they were written^l, he had an opportunity of forging and inserting at pleasure whatever he found of use to him, which he practised without any reserve or management ; selling publicly for money whatever immunities were desired by countries, cities, princes, or private men, on pretence that they had been granted by Cæsar and entered into his books. This also and shocked all honest men who saw the misdeed but knew no remedy : Antony had the power their own decree had justified it. Cicero complains of it heavily in many of his letters, and declares a thousand times better to die than to suffer "Is it so then ?" says he, "is all that our B has done come to this, that he might live at Læuvium ? That Trebonius might steal through private roads to his province ? That the acts, writings, sayings, promises, though Cæsar should have greater force now than he himself was living ?" All which be charged that mistake of the first day in not summoning senate into the capitol, where they might have done what they pleased when their own part uppermost, and these robbers, as he calls them, dispersed and dejected^m.

Among the other acts which Antony confessed on the pretence of their being ordered by Cæsar he granted the freedom of the city to all Sicilians restored to king Deiotarus all his former dominions. Cicero speaks of this with great indignation. "O my Atticus," says he, "the ideas of B have given us nothing but the joy of reflecting on ourselves on him whom we had reason to hate it was a brave act, but left imperfect—you what a kindness I have for the Sicilians ; I esteem it an honour to be their patron : Cæsar granted them many privileges which I did not like, though his giving them the rights of Læuvium was intolerable ; yet that was nothing to Antony has done, who for a large sum of money published a law, pretended to be made by the dictator, in an assembly of the people, though never heard a syllable of it in his lifetime, to make them all citizens of Rome. Is not Deiotarus's case just the same ? He is worthy indeed any kingdom, but not by the grant of Fulcrus there are a thousand instances of the same sort. When this last act was hung up as usual in the capitol, among the public monuments of the forgery appeared so gross that the people in the midst of their concern, could not help laugh at it ; knowing that Cæsar hated no man so much as Deiotarus. But the bargain was made in Fulcrus's apartments for the sum of eighty thousand pence by the king's agents at Rome, without consulting Cicero or any other of their master's friends the old king, it seems, was beforehand with them and no sooner heard of Cæsar's death than he seized upon his dominions again by force. "I knew it," says Cicero, "to be a universal rule that what tyrants had forcibly taken away, true owners might recover whenever they were able :—he acted like a man, but we contempt who whilst we hate the author, yet maintain his actsⁿ." By these methods Antony pressed ^k Ep. Fam. xi. 28. This Cn. Matius lived long afterwards in such favour and familiarity with Augustus, as to be distinguished by the title of Augustus's friend. Yet he seems to have declined all public honours and business, and to have spent the remainder of his days in an elegant and pleasurable retreat ; employing his time and studies in the improvements of gardening and planting, as well as in refining the delicacy of a splendid and luxurious life, which was the general taste of that age. For he first taught how to inoculate and propagate some of their curious and foreign fruits ; and introduced the way of cutting trees and groves into regular forms : on which subjects he published several books which are mentioned by the later writers.—Columel. De Re Rust. xii. 44. init. ; Plin. Hist. Nat. xii. 2 ; xv. 14.

^l Τα ὑπομνήματα τῶν βεβουλευμένων ὁ Ἀντώνιος ἔχων, καὶ τὸν γραμματέα τοῦ Καίσαρος Φαβέριον, ἐς πάντα αὐτὸν πείθοντων.—App. l. 3. § 39.

^m Ep. Fam. xii. 1 ; Ad Att. xiv. 9.

ⁿ Itane vero ? hoc meus et tuus Brutus egit, ut Læuvium esset ? ut Trebonius itineribus devitis prodiciis provinciam ? ut omnia facta, scripta, dicta, prout cogitata Cæsaribus plus valerent, quam si ipse viveret !

—Ad Att. xiv. 10.

^o Ad Att. xiv. 12.

^p Syngrapha II. 8. centies per legatos,—sine nostra, reliquorum hospitum regis sententia, facta in gynæceio in loco plurimas res venierunt, et venseunt—Res ipse sua sponte, nullis commentariis Cæsaribus, simul et audivit ejus interitum, suo Marte res suas recuperabat homo sapiens, jus semper hoc fuisse, ut, amassed infinite sums of money; for though at the time of Cæsar's death he owed, as Cicero told him, above three hundred thousand pounds, yet within less than a fortnight after it he had paid off the whole debt*.

There was another instance of his violence which gave still greater offence to the city; his seizing the public treasure which Cæsar had deposited for the occasions of the government, in the temple of Opia, amounting to above five millions and a half of our money; besides what Calpurnia, Cæsar's wife, from his private treasure had delivered into his hands, computed at about another million. This was no extraordinary sum if we consider the vastness of the mine from which it was drawn, the extent of the Roman empire, and that Cæsar was of all men the most rapacious in extorting it: Cicero, alluding to the manner in which it was raised, calls it a bloody and deadly treasure, gathered from the spoils and ruin of the subjects; which, if it were not restored, as it ought to be, to the true owners, might have been of great service to the public towards easing them of their taxes*.

But Antony, who followed Cæsar's maxims, took care to secure it to himself, the use of it was to purchase soldiers, and he was now in condition to outbid any competitor; but the first purchase that he made with it was of his colleague Dolabella, who had long been oppressed with the load of his debts, and whom, by a part of this money, and the promise of a farther share in the plunder of the empire, he drew entirely from Cicero and the republican party into his own measures. This was an acquisition worth any price to him; the general inclination both of the city and the country was clearly against him; the town of Puteoli, one of the most considerable of Italy, had lately chosen the two Brutuses and Cassius for their patrons*, and there wanted nothing but a leader to arm the whole empire in that cause: Dolabella seemed to be that very person, till bribed, as Cicero says, by force of money, he not only deserted but overturned the republic†.

These proceedings, which were preparatory to the appointed meeting of the senate on the first of June, began to open Brutus's eyes and convince him of the mistake of his pacific measures and favourable thoughts of Antony; he now saw that there was no good to be expected from him, or from the senate itself under his influence, and thought it time, therefore, in concert with Cassius, to require an explicit account of his intentions, and to expostulate with him gently in the following letter.

tyranni eripissent, ea tyrannis interfectis, si quibus crepta essent, recuperarent—Ille vir fuit, nos quidem commendimus, qui auctorem odimus, acta defendimus.—Phil. ii. 37.

* Tu autem quadringenties H.S. quod Idibus Martiis dabunt, quoniam modo ante Kalendas Aprilis debere debuit.—Idid.

† Qui est septies millies H.S. quod in tabulis, quæ sunt ad Opia patebat? funesta illius quidem pecunie, sed tamen, si his, quorum erat, non redderetur, quæ nos a tyrannis posset vindicare.—Phil. ii. 37; Plutarch. in Ant.

* Texavit Puteolanos, quod Cassium et Brutus patronos adeptum.—Phil. ii. 41.

† Ut illam odertim, quod cum republicam me auctore defendere cepisset, non modo deseruerit, emptus pecunia, sed etiam quantum in ipso fuit, everterit.—Ad Att. xvi. 15.

Brutus and Cassius, Prætors, to M. Antonius, Consul.

"If we were not persuaded of your sincerity and good-will to us we should not have written this to you, which, out of the kind disposition that you bear to us, you will take without doubt in good part. We are informed that a great multitude of veteran soldiers is already come to Rome, and a much greater expected there on the first of June. If we could harbour any suspicion or fear of you, we should be unlike ourselves; yet surely, after we had put ourselves into your power, and by your advice dismissed the friends whom we had about us from the great towns, and that not only by public edict but by private letters, we deserve to be made acquainted with your designs, especially in an affair which relates to ourselves. We beg of you, therefore, to let us know what your intentions are with regard to us. Do you think that we can be safe in such a crowd of veterans? who have thoughts, we hear, even of rebuilding the altar, which no man can desire or approve who wishes our safety and honour. That we had no other view from the first but peace, nor sought anything else but the public liberty, the event shows. Nobody can deceive us but you, which is not certainly agreeable to your virtue and integrity; but no man else has it in his power to deceive us. We trusted, and shall trust to you alone. Our friends are under the greatest apprehensions for us; for though they are persuaded of your integrity, yet they reflect that a multitude of veterans may sooner be pushed on to any violence by others than restrained by you. We desire an explicit answer to all particulars, for it is silly and trifling to tell us that the veterans are called together because you intend to move the senate in their favour in June; for who do you think will hinder it when it is certain that we shall not? Nobody ought to think us too fond of life, when nothing can happen to us but with the ruin and confusion of all things*."

During Cicero's stay in the country, where he had a perpetual resort of his friends to him, and where his thoughts seemed to be always employed on the republic, yet he found leisure to write several of those philosophical pieces which still subsist both to the pleasure and benefit of mankind. For he now composed his treatise on the Nature of the Gods, in three books, addressed to Brutus, containing the opinions of all the philosophers who had ever written anything on that argument; to which he bespeaks the attention of his readers as to a subject of the last importance, which would inform them what they ought to think of religion, piety, sanctity, ceremonies, faith, oaths, temples, &c., since all these were included in that single question of the gods*. He drew up likewise his Discourse on Divination, or the foreknowledge and prediction of future events, and the several ways by which it was supposed to be acquired or communicated to man; where he explains in two books whatever could be said for and against the actual existence of the thing itself. Both these pieces are written in the way of dialogue, of which he gives the following account. "Since Carneades," says he, "has argued both acutely and copiously against divination, in answer to the Stoics, I am now inquiring what judgment we ought to form concerning it; and for fear of giving my assent rashly to a thing, either false in itself or not sufficiently understood, I think it best to do what I have already done in my three books on the Nature of the Gods, weigh and compare diligently all the arguments with each other: for as rashness of assent and error is in all cases shameful, so most of all in that where we are to judge what stress is to be laid on auspices and things of a divine and religious nature; for the danger is, lest either by neglecting them we involve ourselves in an impiety, or by embracing them, in an old woman's superstition.⁷ He now also wrote his piece on the advantages of old age, called "Cato," from the chief speaker in the dialogue: he addressed it to Atticus, as a lecture of common comfort to them both, in that gloomy scene of life on which they were entering; "having found so much pleasure (he says) in writing it that it not only eased him of all the complaints of age, but made age itself even agreeable and cheerful to him."⁸ He added soon after another present of the same kind to Atticus, a treatise on Friendship: "a subject (he says) both worthy to be known to all, and peculiarly adapted to the case of their particular intimacy; for as I have already written of age, an old man to an old man, so now in the person of a sincere friend I write on friendship to my friend." This is written also in dialogue, the chief speaker of which is Lælius; who, in a conversation with his two sons-in-law Fannius and Scævola, upon the death of P. Scipio and the memorable friendship that had subsisted between them, took occasion, at their desire, to explain to them the nature and benefits of true friendship. Scævola, who lived to a great age, and loved to retail his old stories to his scholars, used to relate to them with pleasure all the particulars of this dialogue, which Cicero having committed to his memory, dressed up afterwards in his own manner into the present form⁹. Thus this agreeable book, which when considered only as an invention or essay, is one of the most entertaining pieces in antiquity, must needs affect us more warmly when it is found at last to be a history, or a picture drawn from the life, exhibiting the real characters and sentiments of the best and greatest men of Rome. He now also wrote his discourse on Fate; which was the subject of a conversation with Hirtius in his villa near Puteoli, where they spent several days together in May; and he is supposed to have finished about the same time a translation of Plato's famous dialogue called Timæus, on the nature and origin of the universe.

* Ep. Fam. xi. 2.

* De Nat. Deor. l. 6.

But he was employing himself also upon a work of a different sort which had been long upon his hands; a history of his own times, or rather of his own conduct, full of free and severe reflections on those who had abused their power to the oppression of the republic, especially Cæsar and Crassus. This he calls his Anecdote; a work not to be published, but to be shown only to a few friends, in the manner of Theopompus, an historian famed for his severe and invective style¹. Atticus was urging him to put the last hand to it, and to continue it down through Cæsar's government; but he chose to reserve this last part for a distinct history, in which he designed to vindicate at large the justice of killing a tyrant. We meet with several hints of this design in his letters: in one to Atticus he says, "I have not yet polished my Anecdote to my mind; as to what you would have me add, it will require a separate volume, but believe me, I could speak more freely and with less danger against that detested party, whilst the tyrant himself was alive than now when he is dead. For he, I know not why, indulged me wonderfully: but now, which way soever we stir, we are called back not only to Cæsar's acts but to his very thoughts. Again, I do not well understand what you would have me write; is it that the tyrant was killed according to the strict laws of justice? Of that I shall both speak and write my thoughts fully on another occasion." His other friends also seem to have had some notice of this work, for Trebonius, in a letter to him from Athens, after reminding him of his promise to give him a place in some of his writings, adds, "I do not doubt but that if you write anything on the death of Cæsar, you will give me not the least share both of that act and of your affection." Dion Cassius says, that he delivered this book sealed up to his son, with strict orders not to read or publish it till after his death; but from this time he never saw his son, and left the piece probably unfinished: though some copies of it afterwards got abroad, from which his commentator, Asconius, has quoted several particulars².

In the end of May he began to move towards Rome, in order to assist at the senate on the first of June, and proposed to be at Tusculum on the twenty-sixth, of which he gave Atticus notice. There passed all the while a constant commerce of letters between him and Brutus, who desired a personal conference with him at Lanuvium, in which Cicero resolved to humour him, though he did not think it prudent at that time, when without any particular use it would only give jealousy to Antony. But the nearer he came to the city, the more he was discouraged from the thoughts of entering it: he understood that it was filled with soldiers; that Antony came thither attended by strong body of them; that all his views were bent on war; and that he designed to transfer the province of Gaul from D. Brutus to himself, by vote of the people³. Hirtius dissuaded his going et amoris tui ferre.—Ep. Fam. xii. 16.

¹ Ad Att. II. 6; Dion. Hal. proem. 1.

² Librum meum illum ἀνέκδοτον nondum, ut volo perpolivi. Ista vero, que tu contexi vis, aliud quoddam separatim volumen exspectant. Ego autem, credas mihi velim, minore periculo existimo contra illas nefarias partes vivo tyranno dici potuisse, quam mortuo. Ille enim nescio quo pacto ferebat me quidem mirabiliter. Nunc quæcumque nos commovimus, ad Cæsaris non modo acta, verum etiam cogitata revocamus. [Ad Att. xiv. 17] Sed parum intelligo quid me velis scribere—an sic uti tyrannum jure optima cæsum? multa dicentur, multiscribentur a nobis, sed alio modo ac tempore.—Ibid. xv.

³ Namque illud non dubito, quin, si quid de interitu Cæsaris scribas, non patiaris me minimam partem et

⁴ Dio, p. 96; It. Ascon. in Tog. Candid.

⁵ Puto enim nobis Lanuvium eundem, non sine mul-

⁷ De Divin. I. 4.

⁸ Mihi quidem illa jucunda hujus libri confectio fuit, ut non modo omnes abstererit senectutis molestias, sed effecerit mollem etiam et jucundam senectutem.—De Senect. 1.

⁹ Digna mihi res tum omnium cognitione, tum nostra familiaritate visa est—sed ut tum ad senem senex de senectute, sic hoc libro ad amicum amicitias de amicitia scripsi—et cum Scævola—exposuit nobis sermonem Lælii de amicitia, habitum ab illo secum, et cum altero genero C. Pannio, &c.—De Amicit. 1.

ad resolved to stay away himself; Varro sent him word that the veterans talked desperately against him those who did not favour them: Græceius also dishonoured him, on the part of C. Cassius, to be upon his guard, for that certain armed men were provided for some attempt at Tusculum. All these informations determined him at last not to venture to the senate; but to withdraw himself from that city, where he had not only flourished (he says) with the greatest, but lived even a slave with some dignity. The major part of the senate followed as example and fled out of the city for fear of some violence, leaving the consuls, with a few of their creatures, to make what decrees they thought fit.

This turn of affairs made Cicero resolve to prosecute what he had long been projecting, his voyage to Greece, to spend a few months with his son at Athens. He despaired of any good from these consuls, and intended to see Rome no more if their successors entered into office, in whose administration he began to place all his hopes. He wrote, therefore, to Dolabella to procure him the rest of an honorary lieutenantancy; and lest Antony, an angry man, as he calls him, should think himself slighted, he wrote to him too on the same subject. Dolabella immediately named him for one of his own lieutenants, which answered his purpose all better, for without obliging him to any service, he limiting him to any time, it left him at full liberty to go wherever he pleased; so that he readily accepted it and prepared for his journey.¹ He heard in the meanwhile from Balbus that the senate would be held again on the fifth, when commissions would be granted severally to Brutus and Lentius to buy up corn in Asia and Sicily for the use of the republic; and that it would be decreed at the same time, that those provinces should be assigned to them with the other prætors at the expiration of the year.²

Their case at this time was very remarkable, it being wholly new in Rome to see prætors driven out of the city, where their residence was absolutely of course—Bruto enim placere, se a me conveniri. O rem summi et inexplicabilem! puto me ergo Iturum—Antoniæ consilia narras turbulenta—sed mihi totum ejus consilium ad bellum spectare videtur, si quidem D. Bruto provincia eripitur.—Ad Att. xv. 4.

¶ Hirtius jam in Tusculano est: mihi quæ, ut absum, placentur auctor est; et ille quidem periculi causam propterea nosceret ad me epistolam misit—in qua scripserat, etas, veteranos eos, qui relictantur—Improbissime ego; ut magno periculo Romæ sint futuri, qui ab eorum viribus discedere videantur.—Ibid. 5.

¶ Græceius ad me scripsit, C. Cassium ad se scripsisse, meos comparari, qui in Tusculanum armati mitterentur—Id quidem mihi non videbatur; sed cavendum meum.—Ibid. xv. 8.

¶ Mihi vero deliberatum est, ut nunc quidem est, abesse a me, in qua non modo florui cum summa, verum etiam servi cum aliqua dignitate.—Ibid. 5.

¶ Kalendis Junius cum in senatum, ut erat constitutum, venire vellemus, metu perterriti repente diffuginus.—Ibid. 12.

¶ Etenim scripsi ad Antonium de legatione, ne, si ad Dolabellam solum scripsissem, iracundus homo commoveretur. [Ad Att. xv. 8.] Sed heus tu,—Dolabella me sibi ligavit, &c.—Ibid. 11.

¶ A Balbo reddidit mihi literæ, fore Nonis senatum, ut Brutus in Asia, Cassius in Sicilia, frumentum emendum et ad urbem mittendum curarent. O rem miseram! ait, tam tempore decretum iri, uti is et reliquis prætoribus provincia decerneretur.—Ibid. 9.

necessary, and could not legally be dispensed with for above ten days in the year; but Antony readily procured a decree to absolve them from the laws¹; being glad to see them in a situation so contemptible, stripped of their power and suffering a kind of exile, and depending, as it were, upon him for their protection: their friends, therefore, at Rome had been soliciting the senate for some extraordinary employment to be granted to them, to cover the appearance of a flight and the disgrace of living in banishment, when invested with one of the first magistracies of the republic.²

This was the ground of the commission just mentioned to buy corn, which seemed however to be below their character, and contrived as an affront to them by Antony, who affected still to speak of them always with the greatest respect³. But their friends thought anything better for them than to sit still in Italy, where their persons were exposed to danger from the veteran soldiers, who were all now in motion; and that this employment would be a security to them for the present, as well as an opportunity of providing for their future safety, by enabling them to execute what they were now meditating, a design of seizing some provinces abroad and arming themselves in defence of the republic, which was what their enemies were most afraid of, and charged them with publicly, in order to make them odious. Cicero in the meantime, at their desire, had again recommended their interests to Hirtius, who gave him the following answer.

“ I wish that Brutus and Cassius could be prevailed with by you as easily to lay aside all crafty counsils, as they can obtain by you from me whatever they desire. They were leaving Italy, you say, when they wrote to you? Whither, or wherefore? do not let them go, I beseech you, my dear Cicero, nor suffer the republic to be wholly lost; though overwhelmed indeed already by these rapines, burnings, murders. If they are afraid of anything, let them be upon their guard, but act nothing offensively; they will not, I am confident, gain a tittle the more by the most vigorous, than the most pacific measures, if they use but caution. The things which are now stirring cannot last long, but if made the subject of war, will acquire present strength to hurt. Let me know your opinion of what may be expected from them.” Cicero sent him word, that he would be answerable for their attempting nothing desperate; and was informed, at the same time by Balbus, that Servilia, Brutus's mother, had undertaken that they should not leave Italy⁴.

Servilia, though sister to Cato, had been one of Cæsar's mistresses, and next to Cleopatra, the most beloved of them all. In the civil war he gave her several rich farms out of his Pompeian confiscations, and is said to have bought a single

¹ Cur M. Brutus, te referente, legibus est solutus, si ab urbe plusquam decem dies absuisset?—Phil. II. 13.

² Καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν εἰς εὐπρέπειαν ἢ βουλὴ σίτου φροντιστὰς προστάξεν, ἵνα μὴ τὸ ἐν μέσῳ διδωσθὲν φέγειν νομίζουτο.—Appian. Bell. Civ. iv. 623; it. III. 530.

³ Frumentum imponere—quod minus in republicis sordidus? [Ad Att. xv. 10.] Patrie liberatores urbe carebant—quos tamen ipsi consules et in concionibus et in omni sermone laudabant.—Phil. I. 2.

⁴ Cui rescipit nihil filios callidius cogitare, idque confirmavi—Balbus ad me—Serviliam confirmare non discessuros.—Ad Att. xv. 6.

jewel for her at the price of about 50,000*l*.^p She was a woman of spirit and intrigue, in great credit with the Cæsarian party, and at this very time possessed the estate and villa of Pontius Aquila, one of the conspirators, which had been confiscated and granted to her by Cæsar. Cicero reckons it among the solecisms of the times, that the mother of the tyrant-killer should hold the estate of one of her son's accomplices^q; yet she had such a share in all the counsels of Brutus, that it made Cicero the less inclined to enter into them, or to be concerned with one whom he could not trust. "When he is influenced so much," says he, "by his mother's advice, or at least her entreaties, why should I interpose myself?"

At their desire, however, he went over to them at Antium, to assist at a select council of friends, called to deliberate on what was proper for them to do with regard to this new commission. There were present among others, Favonius, Servilia, Porcia, Brutus's wife, and his sister Tertulla, the wife of Cassius. Brutus was much pleased at his coming, and after the first compliments, begged him to deliver his opinion to the company on the subject of their meeting. Upon which he presently advised, what he had been considering on the road, "that Brutus should go to Asia, and undertake the affair of the corn: that the only thing to be done at present was, to provide for their safety; that their safety was a certain benefit to the republic. Here Cassius interrupted him, and, with great fierceness in his looks, protested that he would not go to Sicily, nor accept as a favour what was intended as an affront, but would go to Achaia. Brutus said that he would go to Rome, if Cicero thought it proper for him; but Cicero declared it impossible for him to be safe there. But supposing, says he, that I could be safe? Why then, says Cicero, I should advise it by all means, as the best thing which you could do, and better than any province. After much discourse and complaining for the loss of their opportunities, for which Cassius laid all the blame on D. Brutus, Cicero said, that though that was true, yet it was in vain to talk of what was past; and as the case then stood, he saw nothing left but to follow his advice, to which they all at last seemed to agree, especially when Servilia undertook by her mediation, to get the affair of the corn left out of their commission; and Brutus consented that the plays and shows, with which he was to entertain the city shortly as prætor, should be given by proxy in his absence. Cicero took his leave, pleased with nothing in the conference but the consciousness of having done his duty: for as to the rest, he gave all, he says, for lost; found the vessel not only broken, but shattered to pieces, and neither prudence, reason, or design in what they were doing; so that if he had any doubt before, he had none now, but longed to get abroad as soon as possible*."

^p Ante alias dilexit M. Bruti matrem Serviliam,—cui sexages II. S. margaritam mercaus est, &c.—Sueton. in J. Cæs. 50.

^q Quin etiam hoc ipso tempore multa δυσκόλεια: Pontii Neapolitanum a matre tyrannocætoni possideri.—Ad Att. xiv. 21.

^r Matris consilio cum utatur, vel etiam precibus, quid me interponam?—Ad Att. xv. 10.

^s Ad Att. xv. 11, 12.

Octavius, upon his coming to Rome, was very roughly received by Antony: who, despising his age and want of experience, was so far from treating him as Cæsar's heir, or giving him possession of his estate, that he openly threatened and thwarted him in all his pretensions; nor would suffer him to be chosen tribune, to which he aspired, with the seeming favour of the people, in the room of that Cinna who was killed at Cæsar's funeral^t. This necessarily drew the regard of the republican party towards him, and Cicero began to take the more notice of him in proportion as Antony grew more and more formidable: at present he gives the following account of him. "Octavianus, I perceive, has parts and spirit, and seems to be affected, as we could wish, towards our heroes: but how far we may trust his age, name, succession, education, is a matter of great deliberation. His father-in-law, who came to see me at Astura, thinks not at all. He must be cherished however, if for nothing else, yet to keep him at a distance from Antony. Marcellus sets nobly, if he instils into him a good disposition towards our friends. He seemed to be much influenced by him, but to have no confidence in Pansa and Hirtius; his natural disposition is good, if it does but hold."

In the midst of these affairs with which his mind, as he complains, was much distracted, he pursued his literary studies with his usual ardour, and to avoid the great resort of company, which interrupted him, at his house near Baia, he removed to his Pompeian villa, on the south side of Naples. Here he began his book of Offices, for the use and instruction of his son, designed, he says, to be the fruit of this excursion; he composed also an oration, adapted to the state of the times, and sent it to Atticus, to be suppressed, published at his discretion; promising him while to finish and send him in a short time his Secunda History or Anecdote, in the manner of Herodotus to be kept close in his cabinet*."

Before he could leave Italy, he was obliged to return to Tusculum to settle his private affairs, and provide his equipage; and wrote Dolabella, to give orders for the mules and other necessities, which the government used to furnish to those who went abroad with a public character. Here Atticus and he took leave of each other with all possible marks of the most sincere and tender affection. The unsettled condition of the times, and the uncertainty when, or in what circumstances they should meet again, raised several melancholy reflections in them both, which, as soon as they parted, drew many tears from Atticus.

^t In locum tribuni plebis forte demortui candidatus petitorum se ostendit—sed adversante comitibus missi Antonio consule—Sueton. in August. 10; Dio, p. 78. App. p. 506.

^u Ad Att. xv. 12.

^x Nos hic φιλοσοφούμενα (quid enim aliud?) et τὰ τοῦ καθήκοντος magnifice explicamus, προσφύμενα, que Ciceroni; qua de re enim potius pater filio? Dicit alia. Quid quæres? Exhibet opera peregrinationis hujus.—Ego autem in Pompeianum properabam, non quod in loco quidquam pulchrius, sed interpellatores illic mihi molesti—of which he gave Cicero an account in his next letter, with a promise to follow him into Greece. Cicero answered him with equal tenderness: "It moved me," says he, "to hear of the tears which you shed after you left me; had you done it in my presence, I should have dropt perhaps all thoughts of my journey. That part however pleases me, where you comfort yourself with the hopes of our meeting again shortly, which expectation indeed is what chiefly supports me; I will write to you perpetually, give you an account of everything which relates to Brutus, send you very shortly my treatise on Glory, and finish for you the other work, to be locked up with your treasure," &c.

Orationem tibi misi. Ejus custodiende et proferendæ arbitrium tuum—jam probo Ἠρακλείδων, præsertim cum tu tantopere delectare—enitar igitur.—Ad Att. xv. 12, 13. ^y Ibid. 18.

These little passages from familiar letters, illustrate more effectually the real characters of men, than any of their more specious and public acts. It is commonly thought the part of a statesman, to master himself of everything natural, and banish every passion that does not serve his interest or ambition; but here we see a quite different character: one of the greatest statesmen of the world thinking and cultivating in himself the soft and social affections of love and friendship, as knowing them to be designed equally by nature for the comfort as well of public as private life.

Atticus likewise, whose philosophy was as incompatible as ambition with all affections that did not reside in himself, was frequently drawn by the sweetness of his nature to correct the viciousness of his principle. He had often reproved Cicero for an excess of love to his daughter Tullia, yet the sooner got a little Attica of his own than he was to discover the same fondness, which gave him occasion to repay his raillery with great sweetness. "I rejoice," says he, "to perceive that you take so much delight in your little girl. I have already myself, and know her to be amiable, though I have never seen her. Adieu to Patro, and all your Epicurean school." In Epist. ad Att. xv. 27. ut a me discernerem, lacrymæque, molesto ferebam. et a me presente facies, consilium totius itineris meum. Sed illud præclare, quod te consolata est, brevi tempore congregandi: quæ quidem expectatio maxime sustentat. Mæse tibi litteræ non deerunt. Ego scribam ad te omnia. Librum tibi celeriter de gloria. Excudam aliquid 'Hepæstædion', quod est in thesauris tuis.—Ad Att. xv. 27.

R.—The treatise here mentioned on Glory, which he sent after to Atticus, and published in two books, is actually preserved, and subsisting, long after the invention of printing, yet happened to perish unhappily for want of being produced into public light, by the help of admirable art.—Raimundus Superantius made a present of it to Petrarch, who, as he tells the story in one of his epistles, lent it to his schoolmaster, who, being old and infirm, turned it for the relief of his necessities into some unskilful hand, whence Petrarch could never recover it, upon his own death. About two centuries after, it appeared again in the possession of Bernardus Justinianus, who is mentioned in the catalogue of his books, which he bequeathed to a monastery of nuns; but when it could be found in that monastery after the strictest search, was generally believed, that Petrus Alconius, who was a friend to that house, and had the free use of the library, stolen it; and, after transcribing as much of it as he could into his own writings, had destroyed the original for want of discovery; it being observed by the critics, that in his book De Erilitio, there were many bright passages, almost connected with the rest of the work, which seemed to have above his taste and genius.—Petrarch. Epist. xv. 1; de thesauris. Paul. Manut. Not.; Ad Att. xv. 27; Bayle; Hist. de Auteurs; Menagiana, v. iv. p. 96.

another letter, "I am mightily pleased with the fondness that you express for your little daughter, and to see you feel at last, that the love of our children does not flow from habit or fashion, but from nature; for if that be not so, there can be no natural conjunction between one man and another, without which all society must necessarily be dissolved."

There was now great expectation of the shows and plays which Brutus, as prætor of the city, was going to exhibit, according to annual custom, in honour of Apollo, on the third of July; and all people were attentive and impatient to see in what manner they would be received. Brutus wrote to Cicero, to beg that he would grace them with his presence; but Cicero thought the request absurd, nor at all agreeable to Brutus's usual prudence. His answer was, "that he was got too far upon his journey to have it now in his power, and that it would be very improper for him, who had not been in Rome since it was filled with soldiers, not so much out of regard to his danger as his dignity, to run thither on a sudden to see plays; that in such times as these, though it was reputable for those to give plays whose office required it, yet for his seeing them, as it was not necessary, so neither would it be thought decent." He was heartily solicitous, however, that they might meet with all imaginable encouragement, and charged Atticus to send him a particular account of what passed on each day from their first opening.

The success of them answered all their hopes, for they were received with an incredible applause by all ranks, though Antony's brother, Caius, as the next prætor in office, presided at them. One of the plays was "Tereus," a tragedy of Accius, which having many strokes in it on the characters and acts of tyrants, was infinitely clapped by the people. Atticus performed his part to Cicero, and sent him a punctual account of what passed every day, which he constantly communicated to Brutus, who was now in his neighbourhood; in Nesis, a little isle on the Campanian shore, the seat of young Lucullus. In his answer to Atticus, "Your letters," says he, "were very acceptable to Brutus: I spent several hours with him, soon after I received them; he seemed to be delighted with the account of 'Tereus,' and thought himself more obliged to the poet Accius who made it, than to the prætor Antony, who presided at it. But the more joy you send us of this sort, the more indignation it gives me to see the Roman people employ their hands in clapping plays, not in defending the republic. This perhaps may provoke our enemies to discover themselves before they intended it, yet if they be but mortified, I care not by what b In quibus unum alienum summa sua prudentia, id est illud, ut spectem ludos suos. Rescripsi adlicet, primum me jam profectum, ut non integrum sit. Dein ἀγωνιστῶν esse, me, qui Romanam omnino post hæc arma non accesserim, neque id tam periculi mei causam fecerim, quam dignitatis, subito ad ludos venire. Tali enim tempore ludos facere illi honestum est, cui necesse est: spectare mihi, ut non est necesse, sic ne honestum quidem est. Equidem illos celebrari, et esse quam gratissimos mirabiliter cupio.—Ad Att. xv. 26.

* Filiolam tibi jam Romæ jucundam esse gaudeo; eamque, quam nunquam vidi, tamen et amo, et amabilem esse certo scio. Etiam atque etiam valete Patron et tui condiscipuli.—Ad Att. v. 19; vii. 20.

means." In a speech made afterwards to the senate, he urges this judgment of the city as a proper lesson to Antony, to teach him the way to glory. "O happy Brutus!" says he, "who when driven from Rome by force of arms, resided still in the hearts and bowels of his citizens, who made themselves amends for the absence of their deliverer, by their perpetual applauses and acclamations."

But there was one thing which, through the inadvertency of Brutus's managers, or the contrivance of the prætor Antony, gave Brutus some uneasiness: that in the edict for proclaiming his shows, the month, instead of Quintilis, was styled July, by its new name lately given to it in honour of Cæsar; for it raised great speculation, and was thought strange, that Brutus by edict should acknowledge and confirm an act, contrived to perpetuate the honour of tyranny. This little circumstance greatly disturbed him, imagining, that it would be reflected upon as a mean condescension; and since it could not be remedied as to the plays, he resolved to correct it for the rest of the shows; and gave immediate orders, that the huntings of the wild beasts, which were to follow, should be proclaimed for the thirteenth of Quintilis*.

While Cicero continued in these parts, he spent the greatest share of his time with Brutus; and as they were one day together, L. Libo came to them, with letters just received from young S. Pompey, his son-in-law, with proposals of an accommodation addressed to the consuls, on which he desired their opinion. Cicero thought them drawn with great gravity and propriety of expression, excepting a few inaccuracies, and advised only to change the address; and instead of the consuls, to whom alone they were directed, to add the other magistrates, with the senate and people of Rome, lest the consuls should suppress them, as belonging only to themselves. These letters brought in substance, "that Pompey was now master of seven legions: that as he had just stormed a town called Borea, he received the news of Cæsar's death, which caused a wonderful joy, and change of affairs through the province of Spain, and a concourse of people to him from all parts. The sum of his demands was, that all who had the command of armies should dismiss them; but to Libo he signified, that unless his father's estate and house at Rome, which Antony now possessed, were restored to him, he would agree to nothing."

* Bruto tue literæ gratæ erant. Fui enim apud illum multas horas in Neide, cum paulo ante tuas literas acceperim. Delectari mihi Tereos videbatur; et habere majorem Acoo, quam Antonio, gratiam. Mihi autem quo letiora sunt, eo plus estomachi et molestie est, populum Romanum manus suæ, non in defendenda republica sed in plaudendo consumere. Mihi quidem videntur, istorum animi incendi etiam ad representandam improbitatem suam. Sed tamen dum modo doleant aliquid, doleant quodlibet.—Ad Att. xvi. 2.

† Quid? Apollinarium ludorum plausus, vel testimonia potius, et judicia populi Romani parum magna videbantur? O beatos illos, qui cum adesse ipsi propter vim armorum non licebat, aderant tamen, et in medullis populi Romani ac visceribus hærebant! nisi forte Acoo tum plaudat—et non Bruto putabat, &c.—Phil. i. 15.

‡ Quam ille doluit de Nonis Julis! mirifice est conturbatus. Itaque esse scripturam aiebat, ut venationem etiam, quæ postridie ludos Apollinæos futura est, proscriberent, &c. Id. Quint.—Ad Att. xvi. 4.

§ Ibid.

This overture from Pompey was procured by the management of Lepidus: who having the province of Spain assigned to him, where he was very strong, had no mind to be engaged at such a distance from Rome, and did from attending to the main point in view, that of affairs in Italy; for which purpose, on the pretence of the public quiet, he made the offer of terms on honourable terms to Pompey, and "that on condition of laying down his arms, and leaving the province, he should be restored to his estates and honours, and have the command of the whole naval power of Rome, in the same manner as his father had it before him; and as he proposed and recommended to the senate Antony himself." Where to preserve respect to Cæsar's acts, by which Pompey's estates had been confiscated, it was decreed that the sum, for which they had been sold, should be paid to him by the public, to enable him to purchase them again. This amounted to above five millions and a-half of our money, exclusive of his plate, and furniture; which being wholly refused, he was content to lose it. On these terms ratified by the authority of the senate, he actually quitted Spain, and came to Rome. The project was wisely concerted by Lepidus and Antony; for, while it carried a show of moderation and disposition to peace, it disarmed a private enemy, who was in condition to give obstruction to their designs, and diversion to their arms, at a time when the necessity of the circumstances required their presence and whole attention at home, to lay a firm foundation of their power at the heart and centre of the empire.

There happened an incident at this time of a domestic kind, which gave some pleasure to Cicero and Atticus: the unexpected conversation of their nephew Quintus. He had long ago quitted his father and uncle, and attached himself to Cæsar, who supplied him liberally with money. On Cæsar's death he adhered still to that cause, and was in the utmost confidence in Antony; and, as Atticus calls him, his hand, or the minister of all his projects in the city; but upon some late disgust, he began to entertain overtures to his friends of coming over to them, pretending to have conceived an abhorrence of Antony's designs, and signifying to his father that Antony would have engaged him to seize a strong post in the city, and declare him his ally; and upon his refusal, was become an enemy. The father, overjoyed at this change, carried his son to Cicero, to persuade him § Phil. v. 13, 14, &c.; & Phil. xiii. 4, 5, &c.

† App. p. 528; Dio, xiv. 275.

‡ Salvius enim actis Cæsaris, quæ concordie causæ dimis, Pompeio sua domus patebit, eamque non solum quam Antonius emit, redimet—decevisis tantam niam Pompeio, quantum ex bonis patris in prædatione inimicus victor redeget—nam argentum, supellectilem, vinum amittet equo animo, quæ illi dissipavit—atque illud septies milles, quod adol. Patres Conscripti, spondestis, ita describetur, ut a vobis Cn. Pompeii filius in patrimonio suo collo. Phil. xiii. 4.

§ Quintus filius, ut scribis, Antoni est dextera. Att. xvi. 20.

¶ Quintus pater exultat lætitia. Scripsit enim si idcirco profugere ad Brutum voluisse, quod cum militum daret Antonius, ut cum dictatorem efficeret, præsincerity, and to beg his intercession also with Atticus, to be reconciled to him; but Cicero, who knew the fickleness and perfidy of the youth, gave little credit to him: taking the whole for a contrivance only to draw money from them; yet in compliance with their request, he wrote what they desired to Atticus, but sent him another letter at the same time with his real thoughts on the matter.

"Our nephew Quintus," says he, "promises to be a very Cato. Both his father and he have been pressing me, that I would undertake for him to you; yet so, that you should not believe him, till you yourself had seen the effects of it. I shall give him therefore such a letter to you as he would have; but let it not move you, for I have written this lest you should imagine that I am moved myself. The gods grant that he may perform what he promises, for it will be a common joy to us all. I will say nothing more of it at present," &c.

But young Quintus got the better, at last, of all Cicero's suspicions; and after spending several days with him, convinced him, by his whole behaviour and conversation, that he was in earnest: so that he not only recommended him very affectionately to Atticus, but presented him also to Brutus, to make the offer of his service to him in person. "If he had not wholly persuaded me," says he, "that what I am saying of him is certainly true, I should not have done what I am going to tell you, for I carried the youth with me to Brutus, who was so well satisfied with him, that he gave him full credit, without suffering me to be his sponsor; in commending him, he mentioned you in the kindest manner, and at parting, embraced and kissed him. Wherefore, though there is reason rather to congratulate, than to entreat you, yet I beg, that whatever he may have done hitherto, through the weakness of age, with more levity than became him, you would believe it all to be now over," &c.

Quintus kept his word with them; and to give proof of his zeal and sincerity, was so hardy, before the end of the year, as to undertake to accuse Antony to the people, for plundering the temple of Opis*. But this accident of changing his party, which gave so much joy at present to the whole family, though owing rather to a giddiness of temper than any good principle, proved fatal not long after, both to the young man and his father: as it seems to have been the most probable cause of their being proscribed and murdered the year following, by Antony's order, together with Cicero himself.

Cicero was now ready for his voyage, and had provided three little yachts or galleys to transport himself and his attendants; but as there was a report of legions arriving daily from abroad, and of pirates also at sea, he thought it would be safer to sail in company with Brutus and Cassius, who had drawn together a fleet of good force, which now lay upon the coast. He gave several hints of this design to Brutus, who received it more coldly than he expected, and seemed uncertain and irresolute about the time of his own going. He resolved, therefore, to embark without farther delay, though in some perplexity to the last, about the expediency of the voyage, and jealous of its being censured, as a desertion of his country. But Atticus kept up his spirits, by assuring him constantly in his letters that all people approved it at Rome, provided that he kept his word, of returning by the first of the new year⁴.

He sailed slowly along the coast towards Rhegium, going ashore every night to lodge with some friend or client. He spent one day at Velia, the native place of Trebatius; whence he wrote a kind letter to him, dated the nineteenth of July, advising him "by no means to sell that family estate," as he then designed, "situated so healthfully and agreeably, and affording a convenient retreat from the confusion of the times, among a people who entirely loved him." At this place he began his treatise of "Topics," or the art of finding arguments on any question: it was an abstract of Aristotle's piece on the same subject, which Trebatius, happening once to meet with in Cicero's Tusculan library, had begged of him to explain. But Cicero never found leisure for it till this voyage, in which he was reminded of the task by the sight of Velia; and though he had neither Aristotle nor any other book to help him, he drew it up from his memory, and finished it as he sailed before he came to Rhegium; whence he sent it to Trebatius, with a letter dated the twenty-seventh. He excuses the obscurity of it from the nature of the argument, requiring great attention to understand, and great application to reduce it to practice: in which, however, he promises to assist him, if he lived to return, and found the republic subsisting*.

In the same voyage, happening to be looking over his treatise on the Academic Philosophy, he conspicuit, id recusasset; recusasse autem se, ne patris animam offenderet; ex eo sibi illum hostem.—Ad Att. xv. 21.

* Quintus illius mihi pollicetur se Catonem. Egit autem et pater et filius, ut tibi sponderem: sed ita, ut tum crederem, cum ipse cognosce. Huic ego literas impetus arbitratus sum. Ex eo te movent; has scripsi in eam partem, ne meruisse putares. Dii faciant, ut faciat ea, que promittit. Quamvis enim gaudium. Sed ego nihil dico amplius.—Ad Att. xvi. 1.

† Quod si id sibi mihi fecisset, judicassem que hoc quod dicit firmum fore, non fecissem id, quod dicturus sum. Sed enim mecum adolescentem ad Brutum: sic ei prolatum est, quod ad te scribo, ut ipse crediderit, me sponte accipere noluerit. Eumque laudans amicissime tui mentis fecerit. Complexus, oculatusque dimiserit.—Ad Att. xvi. 5.

‡ Quintus scribit, se ex Nomis se, quibus nos magna gaudemus, sedem Opis explicaturum, idque ad populum.—Ibid. 14.

‡ Legiones enim adventare dicuntur. Hæc autem navigatio habet quasdam suspiciones periculi. Itaque constituebam ut δυσκολία. Paratorem offendi Brutum, quem audiebam.—Nam Cassi classem, que plane bella est, non numero ultra fretum.—Ad Att. xvi. 4.

§ Bruto cum sepe inieceram de δυσκολία, non perinde atque ego putaram, arripere vius est.—[Ibid. 5.] Consilium meum quod als quotidie magis laudari, non moleste fero; expectabamque, si quid ad me scriberes. Ego enim in variis sermonibus incidebam. Quin etiam ideoque trahabam, ut quam diutissime integrum esset. [Ibid. 2: Ep. Fam. xi. 29.] Scribis enim in eorum ferri professionem meam, sed ita, si ante Kal. Jan. redeam. Quod quidem certe emittat. [Ibid. 6.] Ea mente disceam, ut adesse Kal. Jan. quod initium cogendi senatus fore videbatur.—Phil. i. 2.

¶ Ep. Fam. vii. 19.

• Itaque ut primum Velia navigare cepi, institui Topica Aristoteles conscribere, ab ipso urbe communione, amantissima tui. Eum librum tibi misi Rhegio, scriptum quam plenissime illa res scribi potuit, &c.—Ep. Fam. vii. 19.

observed the preface of the third book to be the same that he had prefixed to his book on Glory, which he had lately sent to Atticus. It was his custom, it seems, to prepare at leisure a number of different poems adapted to the general view of his studies, and ready to be applied to any of his works which he should afterwards publish; so that by mistake he had used this preface twice without remembering it: he composed a new one therefore on ship-board for the piece on Glory, and sent it to Atticus, with orders to bind it up with his copy in the place of the former preface¹. So wonderful was his industry and love of letters, that neither the inconvenience of sailing, which he always hated, nor the busy thoughts which must needs intrude upon him on leaving Italy in such a conjuncture, could disturb the calm and regular pursuit of his studies.

From Rhegium, or rather Leucopetra, a promontory close by it, he passed over to Syracuse on the first of August, where he staid but one night, though in a city particularly devoted to him, and under his special protection: but he was unwilling to give umbrage or suspicion to those at Rome of having any views abroad which concerned the public²; he set sail, therefore, again the next morning towards Greece, but was driven back by contrary winds to Leucopetra; and, after a second attempt with no better success, was forced to repose himself in the villa of his friend Valerius, and wait for the opportunity of a fair wind³.

¹ Nunc negligentiam meam cognosce. De Gloria librum ad te misi, at in eo proemium id est, quod in Academico tertio. Id eventus ob eam rem, quod habeo volumen proemiorum: ex eo eligere soleo, cum aliquod σφύρασμα institui. Itaque jam in Tusculano, qui non meminisse me absumo isto proemio, conjeci id in eum librum, quem tibi misi. Cum autem in navi legerem Academicos, agnovi erratum meum, itaque statim novum proemium exaravi; tibi misi.—Ad Att. xvi. 6.

N.B. A collection of prefaces prepared beforehand, and calculated indifferently for any treatise, will be thought perhaps a strange and fantastical way of composing: but though they had no necessary connection with the subject of any particular work, they were yet adapted to the general view of his writings, and contrived severally to serve the different ends which he proposed by the publication of them. Thus, in some he takes occasion to celebrate the praises of his principal friends, to whom they were addressed; in others, to enter into a general defence of Philosophy, in answer to those who conspired him for spending so much time upon it: in some, he represents the miserable state of the times, and subversion of the republic, in a manner proper to alarm his citizens, and rouse them to assert their ancient liberty; in others, he contrives to give a beautiful description of some of his villas or gardens, where the scene of the dialogue was laid, all which the reader will find very agreeably executed in the prefaces of his philosophical pieces; which are yet connected so artfully with the treatises that follow them, and lead us so naturally into the argument, as if they had been originally contrived for the sake of introducing it.—Tusc. Disp. init.: De Div. ii. 1; De Fin. i. 1; De Legib. ii. 1.

² Kal. Sext. veni Syracusas—que tamen urbe mihi conjunctissima, plus una me nocte cupiens retinere non potuit. Veritus sum, ne meus repentinus ad meos necessarios adventus suspitionis aliquid afferret, si eorum commoratus.—Phil. i. 3.

³ Cum me ex Sicilia ad Leucopetram, quod est promontorium agri Rhegini, venti detulissent; ab eo loco descendendi, ut transmitterem; nec ita multum proventus, rejectus austro sum in eum ipsum locum.—[Ibid.] ibi cum ventum expectarem: erat enim villa Valerii nostri, ut familiariter eorum, et libenter.—Ad Att. xvi. 7.

Here the principal inhabitants of the country came to pay him their compliments; some of fresh from Rome, who brought great news of an unexpected turn of affairs there towards a general pacification: "That Antony seemed disposed to listen to reason; to desist from his pretensions on Gaul, submit to the authority of the senate, make up matters with Brutus and Cassius, had written circular letters to all the principal senators to beg their attendance in the senate on the first of September; and that Cicero's absence was particularly regretted, and even blamed at this crisis." This agreeable account of things, which him presently drop all thoughts of pursuing his voyage; in which he was confirmed likewise by letters from Atticus, who, contrary to his former advice, pressed him now, in strong and positive terms, to come back again to Rome.

He returned therefore by the same course which he had before taken, and came back to Velia on the seventeenth of August: Brutus lay within a few miles of it with his fleet, and hearing of his approach, came immediately on foot to salute him. "He declared himself exceedingly pleased with Cicero's return; owned that he had never approved, that he had not dissuaded the voyage, thinking it incumbent to give advice to a man of his experience now told him plainly that he had escaped two imputations on his character,—the one, of too great a despair and desertion of the common cause; the other, of the vanity of going to see the Olympean games. This last, (as Cicero says,) would have been shameful for him in any state of the republic, but in the present, unpardonable; and profited himself therefore greatly obliged to the wind preserving him from such an infamy, and to the good citizens, blowing him back to the service of his country."

Brutus informed him likewise of what had passed in the senate on the first of August, and how he had signalled himself by a brave and honest speech, and some vigorous motions in favour of the public liberty, in which nobody had the courage to second him. He produced also Antony's edict, and answer to it, which pleased Cicero very much on the whole, though he was still satisfied with the resolution of returning, yet he found no such reason for it as his first intelligence had suggested any hopes of doing much service at Rome; where there was not one senator who had the courage to support Piso, nor Piso himself the resolution to appear in the senate again the next day⁴.

This was the last conference that he ever had with Brutus; who, together with Cassius, left him soon after it. They were both to succeed on the

¹ Rhegini quidam, illustres homines eo venerunt. Iam sane recentes—hec afferbant, edictum Brutus et Cassii fore frequentem senatum Kal. a Bruto et Cassio huiusmodi ad consulares et pretorios; ut adessent. Res summam spem nuntiabant, fore, ut Antonius cedere conveniret, nostri Romam redirent. Addebat etiam desiderari, subacuari, &c.—Ad Att. xvi. 7.

² Nam xvi. Kal. Sept. cum venissem Veliam. Br. audivit, erat enim cum suis navibus apud Helorum villam citra Veliam millia passuum ibi. pedibus ad statum. Dii immortales, quam valde ille reditus, vel per reversionem mea letatus est? Effudit illa omnia, tacuerat—se autem letari quod effugissem duas vituperationes, &c.—Ad Att. xvi. 7; Ep. Fam. xii. 2 ad Brut. 15.

³ Ad Att. ibid.: Phil. i. 4, 5; Ep. Fam. xii. 2.

as all prætors did at the expiration of their office, to the government of some province, which was assigned to them either by lot, or by an extraordinary decree of the senate. Cæsar had intended Macedonia for the one, and Syria for the other; but as these were two of the most important commands of the empire, and would throw a great power into their hands at a time when their enemies were taking measures to destroy them, so Antony contrived to get two other provinces deputed to them of an inferior kind; Crete to Brutus, and Cyrene to Cassius; and by a law of the people, procured Macedonia and Syria to be conferred upon himself and his colleague Dolabella. In consequence of which, he sent his brother Caius in all haste to possess himself of the first, and Dolabella to secure the second, before their rivals could be in condition to seize them by force, of which they were much afraid; taking it for granted that this was the project which Brutus and Cassius were now meditating. Cassius had acquired a great reputation in the East, by his conduct in the Parthian war; and Brutus was highly honoured in Greece for his eminent virtue and love of philosophy: they resolved therefore to slight the petty provinces which were granted to them, and to try their fortunes in the more powerful ones that Cæsar had promised them; and with that view had provided the fleets above-mentioned to transport themselves to those countries which they had destined for the scene of action: Brutus to Macedonia, Cassius to Syria, where we shall soon have occasion to give a farther account of their success^b.

Cicero in the mean while pursued his journey towards Rome, where he arrived on the last of the month. On his approach to the city, such multitudes flocked out to meet him, that the whole day was spent in receiving the compliments and congratulations of his friends as he passed along to his house^c. The senate met the next morning, to which he was particularly summoned by Antony, but excused himself by a civil message, as being too much indisposed by the fatigue of his journey. Antony took this as an affront, and in great rage threatened openly in the senate to order his house to be pulled down, if he did not come immediately; till, by the interposition of the assembly, he was dissuaded from using any violence^d.

The business of the day was to decree some new and extraordinary honours to the memory of Cæsar, with a religious supplication to him as to a divinity. Cicero was determined not to concur in it, yet knew that an opposition would not only be fruitless, but dangerous; and for that reason staid away. Antony, on the other hand, was desirous to have him there, fancying that he would either be frightened into a compliance, which would lessen him with his own party, or, by opposing what was intended, make himself odious to the soldiery; but as he was absent, the decree passed without any contradiction.

The senate met again the next day, when Antony thought fit to absent himself, and leave the stage clear to Cicero^e; who accordingly appeared, and delivered the first of those speeches which, in imitation of Demosthenes, were called afterwards his Philippics. He opens it with a particular account of the motives of his late voyage, and sudden return; of his interview with Brutus, and his regret at leaving him. "At Velia," says he, "I saw Brutus: with what grief I saw him, I need not tell you: I could not but think it scandalous for me to return to a city from which he was forced to retire, and to find myself safe in any place where he could not be so; yet Brutus was not half so much moved with it as I, but, supported by the consciousness of his noble act, showed not the least concern for his own case, while he expressed the greatest for yours." He then declares, "that he came to second Piso; and in case of any accidents, of which many seemed to surround him, to leave that day's speech as a monument of his perpetual fidelity to his country." Before he enters upon the state of the republic, he takes occasion to complain of "the unprecedented violence of Antony's treatment of him the day before, who would not have been better pleased with him had he been present; for he should never have consented to pollute the republic with so detestable a religion, and blend the honours of the gods with those of a dead man." He "prays the gods to forgive both the senate and the people for their forced consent to it: that he would never have decreed it, though it had been to old Brutus himself, who first delivered Rome from regal tyranny, and, at the distance of five centuries, had propagated a race from the same stock to do their country the same service." He "returns thanks to Piso for what he had said in that place the month before; wishes that he had been present to second him; and reproves the other consuls for betraying their dignity by deserting him." As to the public affairs, he dwells chiefly on Antony's abuse of their decree to confirm Cæsar's acts: declares himself "still for the confirmation of them; not that he liked them, but for the sake of peace; yet of the genuine acts only, such as Cæsar himself had completed; not the imperfect notes and memorandums of his pocket-books; not every scrap of his writing, or what he had not even written, but spoken only, and that without a voucher." He charges Antony with "a strange inconsistency in pretending such a zeal for Cæsar's acts, yet violating the most solemn and authentic of them, his laws (of which he gives several examples): thinks it intolerable to oblige them to the performance of all Cæsar's promises, yet annul so freely what ought to be held the most sacred and inviolable of anything that he had done." He addresses himself pathetically to both the consuls, though Dolabella only was present; tells them, "that they had no reason to resent his speaking so freely on the behalf of the republic: that he made no personal reflections; had not touched their characters, their lives, and manners: that if he offended in that way, he desired no quarter^f; but if, according to his custom, he delivered himself with all freedom on public affairs, he begged, in the first place, that they would not be angry; in the next, that if they were, they would express their anger as became citizens, by civil, not military methods: that he had been admonished, indeed, not to expect that the same liberty would be allowed to him, the

^b Plut. in Brut.; App. 227, 533; Phil. II. 13, 38.

^c Plut. in Cic.

^d Cassius de via languerem, mihi que displicerem, mihi pro amicis qui hoc et diceret, at ille, vobis audientibus, cum fabris se domum meam venturum esse dixit, &c.—Phil. I. 1.

^e Veni postredie, ipse non venit.—Phil. v. 7.

^f Phil. I. 4. ^g Ibid. 5, 6.

^h Ibid. 7, 11.

enemy of Cæsar, which had been indulged to Piso, his father-in-law; that Antony would resent whatever was said against his will, though free from personal injury; if so, he must bear it as well as he could." Then, after touching on their plundering the temple of Opis of those sums which might have been of great service to the state, he observes, "that whatever the vulgar might think, money was not the thing which they aimed at; that their souls were too noble for that, and had greater designs in view¹: but they quite mistook the road to glory, if they thought it to consist in a single man's having more power than a whole people. That to be dear to our citizens, to deserve well of our country, to be praised, respected, beloved, was truly glorious; to be feared and hated, always invidious, detestable, weak, and tottering. That Cæsar's fate was a warning to them how much better it was to be loved than to be feared: that no man could live happy who held life on such terms that it might be taken from him not only with impunity but with praise²." He puts them in mind of the many public demonstrations of the people's disaffection to them, and their constant applauses and acclamations to those who opposed them; to which he begs them "to attend with more care, in order to learn the way how to be truly great and glorious." He concludes by declaring, "that he had now reaped the full fruit of his return, by giving this public testimony of his constant adherence to the interests of his country: that he would use the same liberty oftener, if he found that he could do it with safety; if not, would reserve himself as well as he could to better times, not so much out of regard to himself as to the republic."

In speaking afterwards of this day's debate, he says, that "whilst the rest of the senate behaved like slaves, he alone showed himself to be free; and though he spoke indeed with less freedom than it had been his custom to do, yet it was with more than the dangers with which he was threatened seemed to allow³." Antony was greatly enraged at his speech, and summoned another meeting of the senate for the nineteenth, where he again required Cicero's attendance, being resolved to answer him in person, and justify his own conduct: for which end, he employed himself during the interval in preparing the materials of a speech, and declaiming against Cicero in his villa near Tibur. The senate met on the appointed day in the Temple of Concord, whither Antony came with a strong guard, and in great expectation of meeting Cicero, whom he had endeavoured by artifice to draw thither: but though Cicero himself was ready and desirous to go, yet his friends over-ruled and kept him at home, being apprehensive of some design intended against his life⁴.

Antony's speech confirmed their apprehensions, in which he poured out the overflowings of his spleen with such fury against him, that Cicero, alluding to what he had done a little before in public, "that he seemed once more rather to spew than to speak⁵." He produced Cicero's letter to him the restoration of S. Clodius, in which Cicero acknowledged him not only for his friend, but a citizen; as if the letter was a confutation of speech, and Cicero had other reasons for quarrelling with him now than the pretended service public⁶. But the chief thing with which he was concerned, his being not only privy to the murder of Cæsar, but the contriver of it, as well as the author of every step which the conspirators had taken: by this he hoped to inflame the soldiery to some violence, whom he had planted for that purpose about the avenues of the temple, and who were hearing even of their debates. Cicero, in his account of it to Cassius, says, "that he should scruple to own a share in the act, if he could have a share in the glory: but that if he had really been concerned in it, they should never have let the work half finish⁷."

He had resided all this while in Rome or neighbourhood; but as a breach with Antony was now inevitable, he thought it necessary for his security to remove to a greater distance, to one of his villas near Naples. Here he composed a second Philippic, by way of reply to Antony, not delivered in the senate, as the tenor of it seems to imply, but finished in the country, near intent to be published till things were actually come to extremity, and the occasions of the republic required it necessary to render Antony's character as odious as possible to the people. This oration is a most bitter invective on his whole conduct, describing it as a perpetual scene of lewdness, faction, violence, rapine, heightened with all the colours of wit and eloquence—it was greatly admired by the ancients, and shows, that in the decline of life Cicero had lost no share of that fire and spirit with which his earlier productions were animated: but he never had a cause more interesting or where he had greater reason to exert himself: he knew that in case of a rupture, which alone the piece was calculated, either Antony or the republic must perish; and he was determined to risk his own life upon the quarrel, and bear the indignity of outliving a second time the liberty of his country.

He sent a copy of this speech to Brutus and Cassius, who were infinitely pleased with it: and now at last clearly saw that Antony meditated nothing but war, and that their affairs were growing daily more and more desperate; and being resolved therefore to leave Italy, they took occasion a little before their departure to write the following letter in common to Antony.

Brutus and Cassius, Prætors, to Antony, Consul.

"If you are in good health, it is a pleasure to us. We have read your letter, exactly of a piece with your edict, abusive, threatening, wholly worthy to be sent from you to us. For our part

¹ Itaque omnibus est visus, ut ad te antea scripsisse meo more, non dicere.—Ep. Fam. xli. 2.

² Atque etiam literas, quas me sibi misisse dicebat, &c.—Phil. II. 4.

³ Nullam aliam ob causam me auctorem facinus Cæsar interfecendi criminatur, nisi ut in me veterani incideret.—Ep. Fam. xli. 2; III. 4.

¹ Phil. I. 12.

² Ibid. 14.

³ Locutus sum de republica minus equidem libere, quam me consuetudo, liberis tamen quam periculi minæ postulabant.—Phil. v. 7.

⁴ In summa reliquorum servitute liber unus fuit.—Ep. Fam. xli. 25.

⁵ Quo die, si per amicos mihi cupienti, in senatum venire licuisset, cordis initium fecisset a me.—Phil. v. 7.

⁶ Magnæ cum elidere vellet in oedris causam, tum tentaret inauditis.—Ep. Fam. xli. 25.

latency, we have never done you any injury; nor imagined that you would think it strange, that senators and men of our rank should require anything by edict of a consul: but if you are angry that we have presumed to do it, give us leave to be assured that you would not indulge that privilege at least to Brutus and Cassius: for as to our raising troops, exacting contributions, soliciting peace, sending expresses beyond sea; since you say that you ever complained of it, we believe us; and take it as a proof of your good intention: it is not indeed own any such practices, yet think it strange, when you objected nothing of that kind, that you could not contain yourself from reproaching us with the death of Cæsar. Consider with yourself whether it is to be endured, for the sake of the public quiet and liberty, that we cannot depart from their rights by edict, if the consul must presently threaten them with it. Do not think to frighten us with such threats: it is not agreeable to our character to be moved by any danger: nor must Antony pretend to command those by whose means he now is free. If there were other reasons to dispose us to raise a civil war, your letter would have no power to hinder it; for threats can have no influence on those who are free. But you know well that it is not possible for us to be driven anything against our will, and for that reason we are not threatened that whatever we do it may be to be the effect of fear. These then are our reasons: we wish to see you live with honour and splendour in a free republic: have no desire to quarrel with you: yet value our liberty more than our friendship. It is your business to consider again and again what you attempt and what you maintain: and to reflect, not how long you have lived, but how short a time he reigned: may the gods that your counsels may be salutary to the republic and to yourself; if not, at least that they may hurt you as little as consistent with the safety and dignity of the republic."

Cicero perceived by this time that there was much to be done for him in the city against a man armed with supreme power both civil and military; and was so far provoked by the ill usage he had received, that in order to obtain by force what he could not gain by force, he formed a design against Antony's life, and actually sent certain slaves to assassinate him, who were discovered and seized with their poniards in Antony's house, as they were watching an opportunity to execute their plot. The story was supported by many to be forged by Antony to justify his treatment of Octavius, and his depriving him of the estate of his uncle: but all men of sense, as Cicero says, both believed and applauded it; and the greatest part of the old writers treat it as an established fact.

They were both of them equally suspected by the

Ep. Fam. xi. 3.
 "Ep. multitudine factum ab Antonio crimen videtur, quoniam adolescentis impetum saceret. Prudentes autem boni viri et credunt factum et probant. [Ep. ad Cl. 22.] Invidiis M. Antonii consulis latus petierat. De Cl. i. 8.
 "Quidam hæc nonnullis percussoribus ei subornavit. Plurimum deprehensa, &c.—Sueton. in August. 10; Plutarch. in Anton.

senate; but Antony more immediately dreaded on the account of his superior power, and supposed credit with the soldiers, whom he had served with through all the late wars and on several occasions commanded. Here his chief strength lay; and to ingratiate himself the more with them, he began to declare himself more and more openly every day against the conspirators; threatening them in his edicts, and discovering a resolution to revenge the death of Cæsar, to whom he erected a statue in the rostra, and inscribed it 'To the most worthy parent of his country.' Cicero, speaking of this in a letter to Cassius, says, "Your friend Antony grows every day more furious, as you see from the inscription of his statue; by which he makes you not only murderers but parricides. But why do I say you and not rather us? for the madman affirms me to be the author of your noble act. I wish that I had been, for if I had he would not have been so troublesome to us at this time."

Octavius was not less active in soliciting his uncle's soldiers, sparing neither pains nor money that could tempt them to his service; and by outbidding Antony in all his offers and bribes to them, met with greater success than was expected, so as to draw together in a short time a firm and regular army of veterans, completely furnished with all necessaries for present service. But as he had no public character to justify this conduct, which in regular times would have been deemed treasonable, so he paid the greater court to the republican chiefs, in hopes to get his proceedings authorised by the senate; and by the influence of his troops procure the command of the war to himself: he now therefore was continually pressing Cicero by letters and friends to come to Rome, and support him with his authority against their common enemy Antony; promising to govern himself in every step by his advice.

But Cicero could not yet be persuaded to enter into his affairs; he suspected his youth and want of experience, and that he had not strength enough to deal with Antony; and above all, that he had no good disposition towards the conspirators: he thought it impossible that he should ever be a friend to them, and was persuaded rather, that if ever he got the upper hand, his uncle's acts would be more violently enforced, and his death more cruelly revenged, than by Antony himself. These considerations withheld him from a union with him, till the exigences of the republic made it absolutely necessary; nor did he consent at last without making it an express condition that Octavius should employ all his forces in defence of the common liberty, and particularly of Brutus and his accomplices: where his chief care and caution still was, to arm him only with a power sufficient to oppress Antony, yet so checked and limited, that he should not be able to oppress the republic.

* Augur tuus amicus furorem indies, primum in statua, quam posuit in rostris, inscripsit, Parenti optime merito. Ut non modo scilicet, sed jam etiam parricidæ judicemini. Quid dico judicemini? judicemur potius. Vestri enim pulcherrimi facti ille furiosus me principem dicit fuisse. Utinam quidem fulsem, molestus non esset.—Ep. Fam. xii. 3.

* Valde tibi assentior, si multum possit Octavianus, multo firmitus acta tyranni comprobatur iri, quam in Telluris, atque id contra Brutum fore—sed in isto jus vocis quanquam animi satis, auctoritatis parum est.—Ad Att. xvi. 14.

This is evident from many of his epistles to Atticus: "I had a letter," says he, "from Octavianus on the first of November: his designs are great: he has drawn over all the veterans of Casilinum and Calatia: and no wonder, he gives sixteen pounds a man. He proposes to make the tour of the other colonies: his view plainly is, to have the command of the war against Antony; so that we shall be in arms in a few days. But which of them shall we follow?—Consider his name, his age; he begs to have a private conference with me at Capua or near it: 'tis childish to imagine that it could be private: I gave him to understand that it was neither necessary nor practicable. He sent to me one Cæcina of Volaterræ, who brought word that Antony was coming towards the city with the legion of the *Alaudæ: that he raised contributions from all the great towns, and marched with colours displayed: he asked my advice whether he should advance before him to Rome with three thousand veterans, or keep the post of Capua and oppose his progress there, or go to the three Macedonian legions, who were marching along the upper coast, and are, as he hopes, in his interest—they would not take Antony's money, as this Cæcina says, but even affronted and left him while he was speaking to them. In short he offers himself for our leader, and thinks that we ought to support him. I advised him to march to Rome: for he seems likely to have the meaner people on his side; and if he makes good what he promises, the better sort too. O Brutus, where art thou? What an opportunity dost thou lose? I did not indeed foresee this: yet thought that something like it would happen. Give me your advice: shall I come away to Rome; stay where I am; or retire to Arpinum, where I shall be the safest? I had rather be at Rome, lest if anything should be done I should be wanted: resolve therefore for me: I never was in greater perplexity†."

Again: "I had two letters the same day from Octavianus: he presses me to come immediately to Rome; is resolved, he says, to do nothing without the senate—I tell him that there can be no senate till the first of January, which I take to be true: he adds also, 'nor without my advice.' In a word, he urges, I hang back: I cannot trust his age: do not know his real intentions; will do nothing without Pansa; am afraid that Antony may prove too strong for him; and unwilling to stir from the sea; yet would not have anything vigorous done without me. Varro does not like the conduct of the boy, but I do. He has firm troops and may join with D. Brutus: what he does, he does openly; musters his soldiers at Capua; pays them: we shall have a war I see instantly‡."

* This legion of the Alaudæ was first raised by J. Cæsar, and composed of the natives of Gaul, armed and disciplined after the Roman manner, to which he gave the freedom of Rome. He called it by a Gallic name, Alaudæ, which signified a kind of lark, or little bird with a tuft or crest rising upon its head; in imitation of which, this legion wore a crest of feathers on the helmet; from which origin the word was adopted into the Latin tongue. Antony, out of compliment to these troops, and to assure himself of their fidelity, had lately made a judiciary law, by which he erected a third class of judges, to be drawn from the officers of this legion, and added to the other two of the senators and knights; for which Cicero often reproaches him as a most infamous prostitution of the dignity of the republic.—Phil. I. 8.

† Ad Att. xvi. 8.

‡ Ibid. 8.

Again: "I have letters every day from vianus; to undertake his affairs; to come to at Capua; to save the state a second time resolves to come directly to Rome.

Urged to the fight, 'tis shameful to refuse,
Whilst fear yet prompts the safer part to chuse

HOMER.

He has hitherto acted, and acts still with vigour, and will come to Rome with a great force. he is but a boy: he thinks the senate may be immediately: but who will come? or if they who, in this uncertainty of affairs, will come against Antony? he will be a good guard to the first of January: or it may come perhaps before. The great towns favour the senate strangely. They flock to him from all parts to exert him to proceed: could you ever have thought it? There are many other passages of the kind, expressing a diffidence of Octavianus, a inclination to sit still and let them fight it out themselves: till the exigency of affairs made union at last mutually necessary to each other.

In the hurry of all these politics, he was securing his studies still with his usual application; and besides the second Philippic mentioned, now finished his book of Offices, duties of man, for the use of his son. Admired by all succeeding ages as the most perfect system of heathen morality, and the noblest and specimen of what mere reason could do to guide man through life with innocence and happiness. He now also drew up, as it is thought, his Stoical Paradoxes, or an illustration of peculiar doctrines of that sect, from the examples and characters of their own countrymen, which he addressed to Brutus.

Antony left Rome about the end of September in order to meet and engage to his service legions from Macedonia, which had been thither by Cæsar on their way towards Philippi and were now by his orders returning to Rome. He thought himself sure of them, and by the time to be master of the city; but on his arrival at Brundisium on the eighth of October, three legions, to his great surprise, rejected all his offers and refused to follow him. This affront so enraged him, that calling together all the centurions who were suspected of being the authors of their disaffection, he ordered them to be massacred in his own lodgings to the number of three hundred, while he and his wife Fulvia stood calmly looking on, to witness their cruel revenge by the blood of these men: after which he marched back towards Rome by the Appian road at the head of the single legion which submitted to him; whilst the other legions took their route along the Adriatic coast without declaring yet for any side^b.

^a Ad Att. xvi. 11.

^b Ibid.

^c A. d. vii. Id. Oct. Brundisium erat protectus tonitruus, obviam legionibus Macedonicis im. quas si cillare pecunia cogitabat, easque ad urbem addere. Ep. Fam. xii. 23.

Quippe qui in hospitibus tectis Brundisii fortissime cives optimos, jugulari jussu: quorum ante pedes morientium sanguine os uxoris respersum esse com. —Phil. iii. 2.

Cum ejus promissæ legiones fortissime reclamationem ad se venire jussit centuriones, quos se republica sentire cognoverat, eosque ante pedes uxorisque suæ, quam secum gravis imperator ad cecum duxerat, jugulari coegit.—Phil. v. 8.

He returned full of rage both against Octavius and the republicans, and determined to make what he could of the remainder of his consulship, in visiting the provinces and military commands out of the hands of his enemies, and distributing them to his friends. He published at the same time several fierce and threatening edicts, in which "he as Octavius the name of Spartacus, reproached him with the ignobleness of his birth; charged Cæsar with being the author of all his counsels; based young Quintus as a perfidious wretch who had offered to kill both his father and uncle; made three of the tribunes, on pain of death, to appear in the senate, Q. Cassius, the brother of the conspirator, Carfulenus, and Canutius c." In his humour he summoned the senate on the early-fourth of October, with severe threats to those who should absent themselves; yet he himself neglected to come, and adjourned it by edict the twenty-eighth: but while all people were in expectation of some extraordinary decrees from him, and of one particularly which he had pretended to declare young Cæsar a public enemy^d; happened to receive the news that two of the boys from Brundisium, the fourth, and that which was called the Martial, had actually declared against Octavius, and posted themselves at Alba, in the neighbourhood of Rome^e. This shocked him much, that instead of prosecuting what he had expected, he only huddled over what nobody expected, the decree of a supplication to Lepidus; and the same evening, after he had distributed to his friends by a pretended allotment the several provinces of the empire, which few or none of them had except from so precarious a title, he changed his habit of the consul for that of the general, and left the city with precipitation, to put himself at the head of his army, and possess himself by force of Alpine Gaul, assigned to him by a pretended decree of the people against the will of the senate^f. On the news of his retreat Cicero presently closed his books and the country and set out towards Rome: he seemed to be called by the voice of the republic to take the reins once more into his hands. The field was now open to him; he was not a consul and scarce a single prætor in the city, nor any troops from which he could apprehend danger. He arrived on the ninth of December, and immediately conferred with Pansa, who lay very ill, about the measures proper to be taken on their approaching entrance into the consulship.

Before his leaving the country Oppius had been with him, to press him again to undertake the affairs of Octavius and the protection of his troops: but his answer was, "that he could not consent to it, unless he were first assured that Octavius would not only be no enemy, but even a friend to Brutus: that he could be of no service to Octavius till the first of January, and there would be an opportunity before that time of trying Octavius's disposition in the case of Casca, who had been named by Cæsar to the tribunate, and was to enter upon it on the tenth of December: for if Octavius did not oppose or disturb his admission, that would be a proof of his good intentions^g." Oppius undertook for all this on the part of Octavius, and Octavius himself confirmed it, and suffered Casca, who gave the first blow to Cæsar, to enter quietly into his office.

The new tribunes, in the mean time, in the absence of the superior magistrates, called a meeting of the senate on the nineteenth. Cicero had resolved not to appear there any more, till he should be supported by the new consuls; but happening to receive the day before the edict of D. Brutus, by which he prohibited Antony the entrance of his province, and declared that he would defend it against him by force, and preserve it in its duty to the senate, he thought it necessary for the public service, and the present encouragement of Brutus, to procure, as soon as possible, some public declaration in his favour: he went, therefore, to the senate very early, which being observed by the other senators, presently drew together a full house, in expectation of hearing his sentiments in so nice and critical a situation of the public affairs^h.

He saw the war actually commenced in the very bowels of Italy, on the success of which depended the fate of Rome: that Gaul would certainly be lost, and with it probably the republic, if Brutus was not supported against the superior force of Antony: that there was no way of doing it so ready and effectual, as by employing Octavius and his troops; and though the entrusting him with that commission would throw a dangerous power into his hands, yet it would be controlled by the equal power and superior authority of the two consuls, who were to be joined with him in the same command.

The senate being assembled, the tribunes ac-ce Sed, ut scribis, certissimum esse video discrimen Cascæ nostri tribunatum: de quo quidem ipsi dixi Oppio, cum me hortaretur, ut adolescentemque totamque causam, manumque veteranorum complecterer, me nullo modo facere posse, ni mihi exploratum esset, eum non modo non inimicum tyrannocætonis, verum etiam amicum fore: cum ille diceret, ita futurum. Quid igitur festinamus? Inquam. Illi enim mea opera ante Kal. Jan. nihil opus est. Nos autem ante Id. Dec. ejus voluntatem perspicimus in Casca. Mihi valde assensus est.—Ad Att. xvi. 15.

h Cum tribuni plebis odixissent, senatus addebat ad diem xiii. Kal. Jan. haberentque in animo de præsidio consulum designatum referre, quanquam statueram in senatum ante Kal. Jan. non venire: tamen cum eo ipso die edictum tuum propositum esset, nefas esse duxi, aut ita haberi senatum, ut de tuis divinis in rempublicam meritis sileretur, quod factum esset, nisi ego venissem, aut etiam si quid de te non honorifice diceretur, me non adesse. Itaque in senatum veni mane. Quod cum esset animadværum, frequentissimi senatores convenerunt.—Ep. Fam. xl. 6.

Primum in Cæsarem ut maledicta congesti—Ignominiam obicit C. Cæsaris filio (Phil. iii. 6.) quem in illo Spartacum appellat. [Ibid. 8.] Q. Ciceronem, fratris filium compellat edicto—ausus est scribere, hunc de filio et patris paricidio cogitasse, [Ibid. 7.] quid autem mirari, Q. Cassio—mortem denunciare ei in senatum. [Ibid. 8.] D. Carfulenus—e senatu vi et mortis minis eicere: Tib. Canutium—non templo solum, sed aditu habere capitulisti.—Ibid. 9.

Cum senatum vocasset, adhibulasque consularem, sua sententia C. Cæsarem hostem judicaret.—Phil. v. App. 56.

Postea vero quam legio Martia ducent præstantissimam vidit, nihil egit aliud, nisi ut aliquando liberis daret: quam est imitata quarta legio.—Phil. v. 8.

Postea ex legio concessit Alba, &c.—Phil. iii. 3.

Postea festinasse senatusconsultum de supplicatione et decemviri fecit—præclara tamen senatuscognatio—die vespertina, provinciarum religiose sortitione—Mithridates et P. Naso—nullam se habere provinciam, cum Antoni sortitionem fuisse judicaverunt.—Phil. iii.

quainted them that the business of the meeting was to provide a guard for the security of the new consuls, and the protection of the senate in the freedom of their debates; but that they gave a liberty withal of taking the whole state of the republic into consideration. Upon this Cicero opened the debate, "and represented to them the danger of their present condition, and the necessity of speedy and resolute counsels against an enemy who lost no time in attempting their ruin. That they had been ruined indeed before, had it not been for the courage and virtue of young Cæsar, who, contrary to all expectation, and without being even desired to do what no man thought possible for him to do, had, by his private authority and expense, raised a strong army of veterans, and baffled the designs of Antony; that if Antony had succeeded at Brundisium, and prevailed with the legions to follow him, he would have filled the city at his return with blood and slaughter: that it was their part to authorise and confirm what Cæsar had done, and to empower him to do more, by employing his troops in the farther service of the state, and to make a special provision, also, for the two legions which had declared for him against Antony¹. As to D. Brutus, who had promised by edict to preserve Gaul in the obedience of the senate, that he was a citizen, born for the good of the republic—the imitator of his ancestors; nay, had even exceeded their merit; for the first Brutus expelled a proud king, he a fellow-subject far more proud and profligate: that Tarquin, at the time of his expulsion, was actually making war for the people of Rome; but Antony, on the contrary, had actually begun a war against them. That it was necessary, therefore, to confirm by public authority what Brutus had done by private, in preserving the province of Gaul, the flower of Italy, and the bulwark of the empire²." Then, after largely inveighing against Antony's character, and enumerating particularly all his cruelties and violences, he exhorts them in a pathetic manner to act with courage in defence of the republic, or die bravely in the attempt: that "now was the time either to recover their liberty or to live for ever slaves: that if the fatal day was come, and Rome was destined to perish, it would be a shame for them, the governors of the world, not to fall with as much courage as gladiators were used to do, and die with dignity, rather than live with disgrace." He puts them in mind of "the many advantages which they had towards encouraging their hopes and resolution; the body of the people alert and eager in the cause; young Cæsar in the guard of the city; Brutus, of Gaul; two consuls of the greatest prudence, virtue, concord between themselves; who had been meditating nothing else, for many months past, but the public tranquillity;" to all which he promises his own attention and vigilance, both day and night, for their safety¹. On the whole, therefore, he gives his vote and opinion, "that the new consuls, C. Pansa and A. Hirtius, should take care that the senate may meet with security on the first of January; that D. Brutus, emperor, and consul elect, had merited greatly of the republic, by defending the authority and liberty of the senate and people of Rome: that his army, the towns and colonies of his province, should be publicly thanked and praised for their fidelity to him: that it should be declared to be of the last consequence to the republic that D. Brutus and L. Plancus (who commanded the farther Gaul) emperor and consul elect, as well as all others who had the command of provinces, should keep them in their duty to the senate, till successors were appointed by the senate; and since, by the pains, virtue, and conduct, of young Cæsar, and the assistance of veteran soldiers who followed him, the republic had been delivered, and was still defended, from the greatest dangers; and since the Martial and four legions, under that excellent citizen and queen Egnatuleius, had voluntarily declared for the authority of the senate, and the liberty of the people, that the senate should take special care that honours and thanks be paid to them for their eminent services; and that the new consuls, on their entrance into office, should make it their business to see all this executed in proper form to all which the house unanimously agreed, and ordered a decree to be drawn conformably to opinion.

From the senate he passed directly to the forum and in a speech to the people, gave an account of what had passed: he begins, by signifying "his intention to see so great a concourse about him, greater than he had ever remembered, a sure omen of their inclinations, and an encouragement both to his endeavours and his hopes of recovering the republic." Then he repeats with some variation what he had delivered in the senate, of the praises of Cæsar and Brutus, and the wicked designs of Antony that "the race of the Brutuses was given to them by the special providence of the gods, for the perpetual defenders and deliverers of the republic": by what the senate had decreed, they had in the senate though not in express words, declared Antony a public enemy; that they must consider him there as such, and no longer as consul; that they must deal with an enemy with whom no terms of peace could be made, who thirsted not so much for their liberty as their blood, to whom no sport so agreeable as to see citizens butchered before their eyes—That the gods, however, by portentous prodigies, seemed to foretell his speedy downfall, since such a consent and union of all ranks as him could never have been effected but by a divine influence," &c.

These speeches, which stand the third and fourth in the order of his Philippics, were extremely received both by the senate and people. Speedily afterwards of the latter of them to the people, he says: "If that day had put an end to my life, I had reaped sufficient fruit from it, you all with one mind and voice cried out that I had twice saved the republic." As he had broken all measures with Antony beyond the possibility of a reconciliation, so he published publicly about this time his second Philippic, which hitherto been communicated only to friends, whose approbation it had received.

The short remainder of this turbulent year was spent in preparing arms and troops for the defence of the new consuls, and the defence of the

¹ Phil. iv. 3.

² Ibid. 4, &c.

¹ Phil. iii. 1, 2, 3.

² Ibid. 14, &c.

³ Ibid. 4, 5.

⁴ Quo quidem tempore, etiam si ille dies vitam mihi allaturus esset, satis magnum cepissem fructum vos universa una mente ac voce iterum a me vocatam esse rempublicam conclamatis.—Phil. vi. 1 and the new levies were carried on with the greater diligence, for the certain news that was brought to Rome, that Antony was actually besieging Modena, into which Brutus, unable to oppose him in the field, had thrown himself with all his forces, as the strongest town of his province, and the best provided to sustain a siege. Young Caesar, in the meanwhile, without expecting the orders of the senate, but with the advice of Cicero, by which he was governed himself in every step, marched out of Rome at the head of his troops, and followed Antony into the province, in order to observe his motions, and take all occasions of distressing him, as well as to encourage Brutus to defend himself with vigour, till the consuls could bring up the great army which they were preparing for his relief.

SECTION X.

On the opening of the year, the city was in great expectation to see what measures their new consuls would pursue: they had been at school, as it were, all the summer to Cicero, forming the plan of their administration, and taking their lessons of governing from him, and seem to have been brought entirely into his general view, of establishing the peace and liberty of the republic on the foundation of an amnesty. But their great obligations to Caesar, and long engagements with that party, which they owed all their fortunes, had left no scruples in them, which gave a check to their zeal, and disposed them to act with more lenity against old friends than the condition of the times would allow; and before the experiment was made, to try the gentler method of a treaty. On these sentiments, as soon as they were inculcated, they entered into a deliberation with the senate on the present state of the republic, in order to perfect what had been resolved upon at their last meeting, and to contrive some farther measures for the security of the public tranquillity. Both spoke with great spirit and firmness, and setting themselves as leaders in asserting the rights of their country, and exhorting the assembly to courage and resolution in the defence of so good a cause; and when they had done, they called upon Marcus Calenus, to deliver his sentiments the next day. He had been consul four years before by the nomination, and was father-in-law to Caesar, which by custom was a sufficient ground for giving him that compliment. Cicero's opinion was already well known; he was for the shortest and readiest way of coming at their end, by declaring Antony a public enemy, and without loss of time acting against him by open force: but this was not relished by the consuls, who called thereupon Calenus to speak first; that as he was a friend to Antony, and sure to be on the opposite side, he might instil some sentiments of that nature into the senate, before Cicero had made a strong impression. Calenus's opinion therefore was, that before they proceeded to acts of hostility they should send an embassy to Antony, to admonish him to desist from his attempt upon Gaul, and submit to the authority of the senate. Piso and several others were of the same mind, alleging it to be unjust and cruel to condemn a man till they had first heard what he had to say for himself.

But Cicero opposed this motion with great warmth, not only as "vain and foolish, but dangerous and pernicious. He declared it dishonourable to treat with any one who was in arms against his country, until he laid them down and sued for peace; in which case no man would be more moderate or equitable than himself: that they had in effect proclaimed him an enemy already, and had nothing left but to confirm it by a decree, when he was besieging one of the great towns of Italy, a colony of Rome, and in it their consul-elect and general, Brutus:" he observed from what motives those other opinions proceeded; "from particular friendships, relations, private obligations; but that a regard to their country was superior to them all: that the real point before them was, whether Antony should be suffered to oppress the republic; to mark out whom he pleased to destruction; to plunder the city, and enslave the citizens." That this was his sole view, he showed from a long detail not only of his acts, but of his express declarations; for "he had said in the temple of Castor, in the hearing of the people, that whenever it came to blows no man should remain alive who did not conquer; and in another speech, that when he was out of his consulship, he would keep an army still about the city, and enter it whenever he thought fit: that in a letter (which Cicero himself had seen) to one of his friends, he bade him to mark out for himself what estate he would have, and whatever it was he should certainly have it: that to talk of sending ambassadors to such a one, was to betray their ignorance of the constitution of the republic, the majesty of the Roman people, and the discipline of their ancestors: that whatever was the purpose of their message, it would signify nothing: if to beg him to be quiet, he would despise it; if to command him, he would not obey it: that without any possible good, it would be a certain damage; would necessarily create delay and obstruction to the operations of the war; check the zeal of the army; damp the spirits of the people, whom they now saw so brisk and eager in the cause: that the greatest revolutions of affairs were effected often by trifling incidents; and above all in civil wars, which were generally governed by popular rumour: that how vigorous soever their instructions were to the ambassadors, that they would be little regarded: the very name of an embassy implied a diffidence and fear which was sufficient to cool the ardour of their friends: they might order him to retire from Modena, to quit the province of Gaul; but this was not to be obtained by words, but extorted by arms: that while the ambassadors were going and coming, people would be in doubt and suspense about the success of their negotiation; and under the expectation of a doubtful war, what progress could they hope to make in their levies? that his opinion therefore was, to make no farther men-

¶ Et eratic consulum animum meum erexit, spemque non modo salutis conservande, verum etiam dignitatis recuperande.—Phil. v. 1.

¶ Phil. v. 1, 2, 3.

¶ Ibid. 9.

¶ Ibid. 8, 12.

¶ Ibid. 10.

tion of an embassy, but to enter instantly into action: that there should be a cessation of all civil business; a public tumult proclaimed; the shops shut up; and that instead of their usual gown they should all put on the sagum, or habit of war; and that levies of soldiers should be made in Rome, and through Italy, without any exception of privilege or dismissal from service: that the very fame of this vigour would restrain the madness of Antony, and let the world see that the case was not, as he pretended, a struggle only of contending parties, but a real war against the commonwealth: that the whole republic should be committed to the consuls, to take care that it received no detriment: that pardon should be offered to those of Antony's army who should return to their duty before the first of February; that if they did not come to this resolution now, they would be forced to do it afterwards, when it would be too late perhaps, or less effectual*."

This was the sum of what he advised as to their conduct towards Antony. He next proceeded to the other subject of their debate, the honours which were ordered to be decreed at their last meeting; and began with D. Brutus, as consul-elect, in favour of whom, besides many high expressions of praise, he proposed a decree to this effect: "Whereas D. Brutus, emperor and consul-elect, now holds the province of Gaul in the power of the senate and people of Rome, and, by the cheerful assistance of the towns and colonies of his province, has drawn together a great army in a short time; that he has done all this rightly and regularly, and for the service of the state; and that it is the sense therefore of the senate and people, that the republic has been relieved in a most difficult conjuncture, by the pains, counsel, virtue of D. Brutus, emperor, consul-elect, and by the incredible zeal and concurrence of the province of Gaul." He moved also for an extraordinary honour to M. Lepidus, who had no pretension to it indeed from past services, but being now at the head of the best army in the empire, was in condition to do the most good or ill to them of any man. This was the ground of the compliment; for his faith being suspected, and his union with Antony dreaded, Cicero hoped, by this testimony of their confidence, to confirm him in the interests of the senate; but he seems to be hard put to it for a pretext of merit to ground his decree upon: he takes notice, "that Lepidus was always moderate in power, and a friend to liberty; that he gave a signal proof of it when Antony offered the diadem to Cæsar; for, by turning away his face, he publicly testified his aversion to slavery, and that his compliance with the times was through necessity, not choice;—that since Cæsar's death he had practised the same moderation; and when a bloody war was revived in Spain, chose to put an end to it by the methods of prudence and humanity, rather than by arms and the sword, and consented to the restoration of S. Pompey*." For which reason he proposed the following decree: "Whereas the republic has often been well and happily administered by M. Lepidus the chief priest, and the people of Rome have always found him to be an enemy to kingly government; and whereas by his endeavours, virtue, wisdom, and his singular clemency and mildness, a most dreadful civil war is extinguished; and S. Pompey the Great, the son of Cnæus, out of respect to the authority of the senate, has quitted his arms, and is restored to the city; that the senate and people, out of regard to the many and signal services of M. Lepidus, emperor, and chief priest, place great hopes of their peace, concord, liberty, in his virtue, authority, felicity; and from a grateful sense of his merits, decree that a gilt equestrian statue shall be erected to him by their order in the rostra, or any other part of the forum which he shall choose†." He comes next to young Cæsar, and, after enlarging on his praises, proposes, "that they should grant him a proper commission and command over his troops, without which he could be of no use to them: and that he should have the rank and all the rights of a proprætor, not only for the sake of his dignity, but the necessary management of their affairs, and the administration of the war." And then offers the form of a decree: "Whereas C. Cæsar, the son of Caius, priest, proprætor, has, in the utmost distress of the republic, excited and enlisted veteran troops to defend the liberty of the Roman people; and whereas the Martial and fourth legions, under the leading and authority of C. Cæsar, have defended and now defend the republic, and the liberty of the Roman people; and whereas C. Cæsar is gone at the head of his army to protect the province of Gaul; has drawn together a body of horse, archers, elephants, under his own and the people's power, and in the most dangerous crisis of the republic has supported the safety and dignity of the Roman people; for these reasons the senate decrees that C. Cæsar, the son of Caius, priest, proprætor, be henceforward a senator, and vote in the rank and place of a prætor; and that in soliciting for any future magistracy, the same regard be had to him as would have been had by law if he had been quæstor the year before*." As to those who thought these honours too great for so young a man, and apprehended danger from his abuse of them, he declares "their apprehensions to be the effect of envy rather than fear, since the nature of things was such, that he who had once got a taste of true glory, and found himself universally dear to the senate and people, could never think any other acquisition equal to it:" he wishes that "J. Cæsar had taken the same course when young of endearing himself to the senate and honest men; but neglecting that, he spent the force of his great genius in acquiring a vain popularity, and having no regard to the senate and the better sort, opened himself a way to power which the virtue of a free people could not bear: that there was nothing of this kind to be feared from the son; nor after the proof of such admirable prudence in a boy, any ground to imagine that his riper age would be less prudent; for what greater folly could there be, than to prefer a useless power, an invidious greatness, the lust of reigning always slippery and tottering, to true, weighty solid glory? If they suspected him as an enemy to some of their best and most valued citizens, they might lay aside those fears; he had given up a his resentments to the republic, made her the moderatrix of all his acts; that he knew the most inwar sentiments of the youth; would pawn his credit for

* Phil. v. 10, 12.

* Ibid. 14.

* Phil. v. 15.

* Ibid. 17.

him to the senate and people; would promise, engage, undertake, that he would always be the same that he now was, such as they should wish and desire to see him^a. He proceeds also to give a public testimonial of praise and thanks to L. Egnatilius, for his fidelity to the republic, in bringing over the fourth legion from Antony to Caesar, and moves that it might be granted to him for that piece of service, to sue for and hold any magistracy three years before the legal time^b. Lastly, as to the veteran troops which had followed the authority of Caesar and the senate, and especially the Martial and fourth legions, he moved "that an exemption from service should be decreed to them and their children, except in the case of a Gallic or domestic tumult; and that the consuls C. Pansa and A. Hirtius, or one of them, should provide lands in Campania, or elsewhere, to be divided to them; and that as soon as the present war was over, they should all be discharged, and punctually receive whatever sums of money C. Caesar had promised to them when they first declared for him."

This was the substance of his speech, in the latter part of which, the proposal of honours, the senate readily agreed with him; and though those which were decreed to Octavius seemed so extraordinary to Cicero himself that he thought it proper to make an apology for them, yet there were others of the first rank who thought them not great enough, so that Philippus added the honour of a stator; Ser. Sulpicius and Servilius the privilege of suing for any magistracy still earlier than Cicero had proposed^c. But the assembly was much divided about the main question of sending a deputation to Antony: some of the principal senators were warmly for it, and the consuls themselves favoured it and artfully avoided to put it to the vote, which would otherwise have been carried by Cicero, who had a clear majority on his side. The debate being held on till night, was adjourned to the next morning, and kept up with the same warmth for three days successively, while the senate continued all the time in Cicero's opinion, and would have passed a decree conformable to it, had not Salvius the tribune put his negative upon them^d. This firmness of Antony's friends prevailed at last for an embassy, and three consular senators were promptly nominated to it, S. Sulpicius, L. Piso, and L. Philippus: but their commission was strictly limited and drawn up by Cicero himself, giving them no power to treat with Antony, but to carry to him only the peremptory commands of the senate, to quit the siege of Modena, and desist from all hostilities in Gaul: they had instructions likewise after the delivery of their message to speak with D. Brutus in Modena, and signify to him and his army that the senate and people had a grateful sense of their services, which would one day be a great honour to them^e.

The unusual length of these debates greatly raised the curiosity of the city, and drew the whole body of the people into the forum to expect the issue; where, as they had done also not long before, they could not forbear calling out upon Cicero with one voice to come and give them an account of the deliberations^f. He went therefore directly from the senate into the rostra, produced by Appuleius the tribune, and acquainted them in a speech with the result of their debates:—"that the senate, excepting a few, after they had stood firm for three days to his opinion, had given it up at last with less gravity indeed than became them, yet not meanly or shamefully, having decreed not so much an embassy as a denunciation of war to Antony, if he did not obey it; which carried indeed an appearance of severity, and he wished only that it had carried no delay: that Antony, he was sure, would never obey it, nor ever submit to their power, who had never been in his own: that he would do, therefore, in that place what he had been doing in the senate, testify, warn, and declare to them beforehand, that Antony would perform no part of what their ambassadors were sent to require of him: that he would still waste the country, besiege Modena, and not suffer the ambassadors themselves to enter the town or speak with Brutus,—believe me," says he, "I know the violence, the impudence, the audaciousness of the man; let our ambassadors then make haste, which I know they are resolved to do; but do you prepare your military habit, for it is a part also of our decree that if he does not comply we must all put on that garb; we shall certainly put it on; he will never obey; we shall lament the loss of so many days which might have been employed in action^g. I am not afraid, when he comes to hear how I have declared this beforehand, that for the sake of confuting me he should change his mind and submit. He will never do it, will not envy me this glory, will choose rather that you should think me wise than him modest:" he observes, "that though it would have been better to send no message, yet some good would flow from it to the republic; for when the ambassadors shall make the report, which they surely will make, of Antony's refusal to obey the people and senate, who can be so perverse as to look upon him any longer as a citizen? Wherefore wait," says he, "with patience, citizens, the return of the ambassadors, and digest the inconvenience of a few days; if on their return they bring peace, call me prejudiced; if war, provident^h." Then after assuring them "of his perpetual vigilance for their safety, and applauding their wonderful alacrity in the cause, and declaring that of all the assemblies which he had seen, he had never known so full a one as the present," he thus concludes: "The season of liberty is now come, my citizens, much later indeed than became the people of Rome, but so ripe now that it cannot be deferred a moment. What we nisi paruerit—mittuntur enim qui nuncient, ne oppugnet consulem designatum, ne Mutinam obsideat, ne provinciam depouletur.—Phil. vi. 2.

Dantur mandata legatis, ut D. Brutum, militesque ejus adeant, &c.—Ibid. 3.

g Quid ego de universo populo Romano dicam? qui pleno ac referto foro bis me una mente atque voce in concionem vocavit.—Phil. vi. 8.

h Phil. vi. 1, 2, 3.

i Ibid. 4, 6.

^a Phil. v. 18.

^b Ibid. 19.

^c Statim Philippus decrevit, celeritatem petitionis primo Servilio, post majorem etiam Servilio: nihil tum minus videbatur.—Ad Brut. 15.

^d Hæc in sententia mens et consules discessionem facere voluit, omnibus istis latronibus auctoritate ipsa eorum jureprimæ de manibus arma occidissent.—Phil. xiv. 7.

^e Inque hæc sententia per triduum sic valuit, ut quamvis discedo facta non est, tamen præter paucos, omnes michi assensum viderunt.—Phil. vi. 1; App. p. 536.

^f Quamquam non est illa legatio, sed denunciatio belli, have hitherto suffered was owing to a kind of fatality which we have borne as well as we could; but if any such case should happen again, it must be owing to ourselves; it is not possible for the people of Rome to be slaves, whom the gods have destined to the command of all nations: the affair is now reduced to the last extremity; the struggle is for liberty; it is your part either to conquer, which will surely be the fruit of your piety and concord, or to suffer anything rather than live slaves; other nations may endure slavery, but the proper end and business of the Roman people is liberty."

The ambassadors prepared themselves immediately to execute their commission, and the next morning early set forward towards Antony, though Ser. Sulpicius was in a very declining state of health. Various were the speculations about the success of this message; but Antony gained one certain advantage by it, of more time, either to press the siege of Modena or to take such measures as fresh accidents might offer; nor were his friends without hopes of drawing from it some pretence for opening a treaty with him, so as to give room to the chiefs of the Cæsarian faction to unite themselves against the senate and republican party, which seemed to be inspired by Cicero, with a resolution of extinguishing all the remains of the late tyranny. For this purpose the partisans of that cause were endeavouring to obviate the offence which might be given by Antony's refusal to comply with what was enjoined; contriving specious answers for him, and representing them as a reasonable ground of an accommodation, in hopes to cool the ardour of the city for the prosecution of the war: Calenus was at the head of this party, who kept a constant correspondence with Antony, and took care to publish such of his letters as were proper to depress the hopes and courage of his adversaries, and keep up the spirits of his friends^k.

Cicero, therefore, at a meeting of the senate called in this interval about certain matters of ordinary form, took occasion to rouse the zeal of the assembly by warning them of the mischief of these insinuations. He observed, "that the affairs then proposed to their deliberation were of little consequence, though necessary in the common course of public business, about the Appian-way, the coin, the Luperci, which would easily be adjusted; but that his mind was called off from the consideration of them by the more important concerns of the republic—that he had always been afraid of sending the embassy—and now everybody saw what a languor the expectation of it had caused in people's minds, and what a handle it had given to the practices of those who grieved to see the senate recovering its ancient authority; the people united with them; all Italy on the same side; their armies prepared; their generals ready to take the field—who feign answers for Antony and applaud them as if they had sent ambassadors not to give, but receive conditions from him." Then, after exposing the danger and iniquity of such practices, and rallying the principal abettor of them, Calenus, he adds, "that he who all his life had been the author and promoter of civil peace; who owed whatever he was, whatever he had to it; his honours, interest, dignity; nay, even the talents and abilities which he was master of; yet I, (says he,) the perpetual adviser of peace, am for no peace with Antony"—where, perceiving himself to be heard with great attention, he proceeds to explain at large through the rest of his speech,—“that such a peace would be dishonourable, dangerous, and could not possibly subsist:” he exhorts the senate therefore to be “attentive, prepared and armed beforehand, so as not to be caught by a smooth or suppliant answer and the false appearance of equity: that Antony must do everything which was prescribed to him before he could pretend to ask anything; if not, that it was not the senate which proclaimed war against him, but he against the Roman people. But for you, fathers, I give you warning, (says he,) the question before you concerns the liberty of the people of Rome, which is entrusted to your care; it concerns the lives and fortunes of every honest man; it concerns your own authority, which you will for ever lose, if you do not retrieve it now—I admonish you too, Papas, for though you want no advice in which you excel, yet the best pilots in great storms are sometimes admonished by passengers: never suffer that noble provision of arms and troops which you have made to come to nothing; you have such an opportunity before you as no man ever had; by this firmness of the senate, this alacrity of the equestrian order, this ardour of the people, you have it in your power to free the republic for ever from fear and danger!”

The consuls in the mean while were taking care that the expectation of the effect of the embassy should not supersede their preparations for war; and agreed between themselves that one of them should march immediately to Gaul with the troops which were already provided, and the other stay behind to perfect the new levies which were carried on with great success both in the city and the country; for all the capital towns of Italy were vying with each other in voluntary contributions of money and soldiers, and in decrees of infamy and disgrace to those who refused to list themselves into the public service^m. The first part fell by lot to Hirtiusⁿ, who, though but lately recovered from a dangerous indisposition, marched away without loss of time at the head of a brave army; and particularly of the two legions, the Martial and the fourth, which were esteemed the flower and strength of the whole, and now put themselves under the command and auspices of the consul. With these, in conjunction with Octavius, he hoped to obstruct all the designs of Antony, and prevent his gaining any advantage against Brutus till Pansa could join them, which would make them superior in force and enable them to give him battle with good assurance of victory. He contented himself in the meanwhile with dispossessing Antony of some of his posts, and distressing him by straitening his quarters and opportunities of forage; in which he had some success, as he signified in a letter to his

ⁱ Phil. vii.

^m An cum municipiis pax erit, quorum tanta studiis cognoscuntur in decretis faciendis, militibus damnis pecuniis pollicendis—hec jam tota Italia sunt.—Phil. 7, 8, 9.

ⁿ Consul sortitu ad bellum profectus A. Hirtius.—Phil. xiv. 2.

^k Ille literas ad te mittit de spe sua secundarum rerum? eas tu lætus proferas?—describendas etiam des improbis civibus? eorum augeas animas? bonorum spem, virtutemque debilitas?—Phil. vii. 2.

colleague Pansa, which was communicated to the senate: "I have possessed myself (says he) of Claterna and driven out Antony's garrison; his horse were rooted in the action and some of them slain." and in all his letters to Cicero he assured him that he would undertake nothing without the greatest caution; in answer probably to what Cicero was constantly inculcating, not to expose himself too forwardly till Pansa could come up to him*.

The ambassadors returned about the beginning of February, having been retarded somewhat longer than they intended by the death of Ser. Sulpicius, which happening when they were just arrived at Antony's camp, left the embassy maimed and imperfect, as Cicero says, by the loss of the best and ablest man of the three†. The report which they made to the senate answered exactly in every point to what Cicero had foretold; that Antony would perform no part of what was required, nor suffer them even to speak with Brutus, but continued to batter the town with great fury in their presence: he offered, however, some conditions of his own which, contrary to their instructions, they were weak enough to receive from him and lay before the senate: the purport of them was, "that the senate should assign lands and rewards to all his troops, and confirm all the other grants which he and Dolabella had made in their consulship: that all his decrees from Caesar's books and papers should stand firm: that no account should be demanded of the money taken from the temple of Opis; nor any inquiry made into the conduct of the seven commissioners created to divide the lands to the veteran soldiers; and that his judiciary law should not be repealed: on these terms he offered to give up Cisalpine Gaul, provided that he might have the greater Gaul in exchange for five years with an army of six legions, to be completed out of the troops of D. Brutus*."

Pansa summoned the senate to consider the report of the ambassadors, which raised a general indignation through the city, and gave all possible advantage to Cicero towards bringing the house into his sentiments; but contrary to expectation, he found Calenus's party still strong enough to give him much trouble, and even to carry some points against him, all tending to soften the rigour of his motions and give them a turn more favourable towards Antony. He moved the senate to decree that a war or rebellion was actually commenced: they carried it for a tumult: he urged them to declare Antony an enemy: they carried it for the softer term of adversary*. He proposed that all persons should be prohibited from going to Antony: they excepted Varius Cotyla, one of his lieutenants, who was then in the senate taking notes of everything which passed: in these votes Pansa himself and all the consular senators concurred, even L. Caesar, who, though a true friend to liberty, yet being Antony's uncle, thought himself obliged by decency to vote on the milder side†.

But Cicero in his turn easily threw out, what was warmly pressed on the other side, the proposal of a second embassy; and carried likewise the main question, of requiring the citizens to change their ordinary gown for the sagum or habit of war; by which they decreed the thing while they rejected the name. In all decrees of this kind, the consular senators, on the account of their dignity, were excused from changing their habit; but Cicero, to inculcate more sensibly the distress of the republic, resolved to waive his privilege and wear the same robe with the rest of the city*. In a letter to Cassius, he gives the following short account of the state of things at this time: "We have excellent consuls, but most shameful consulars: a brave senate, but the lower they are in dignity the braver: nothing firmer and better than the people, and all Italy universally: but nothing more detestable and infamous than our ambassadors, Philip and Piso; who, when sent only to carry the orders of the senate to Antony, none of which he would comply with, brought back of their own accord intolerable demands from him: wherefore all the world now flock about me, and I am grown popular in a salutary cause," &c.*

The senate met again the next day to draw into form and perfect what had been resolved upon in the preceding debate; when Cicero in a pathetic speech took occasion to expostulate with them for their imprudent lenity the day before: "He showed the absurdity of their scruples about voting a civil war: that the word tumult, which they had preferred, either carried in it no real difference, or if any, implied a greater perturbation of all things†: he proved from every step that Antony had taken, and was taking; from everything which the senate, the people, the towns of Italy, were doing and decreeing against him, that they were truly and properly in a state of civil war; the fifth which had happened in their memory, and the most desperate of them all, being the first which was ever raised, not by a dissenation of parties contending for a superiority in the republic, but against a union of all parties, to enslave and oppress the republic*." He proceeds to expostulate with Calenus for his obstinate adherence to Antony, and exposes the weakness of his pretended plea for it, a love of peace and concern for the lives of the citizens: he

* Dei sui presidium, Claterna petitis sum, fugati equites, postulatum commissum, oculos aliquot.—Phil. viii. 2.

† Hirtius nihil nisi considerate, ut mihi crebris literis significat, acturus videbatur.—Ep. Fam. xii. 3.

‡ Cum Ser. Sulpicius state illos antelaret, sapientia senatus, subito creptus e causa totam legationem orbem et delibitissimam reliquit.—Phil. ix. 1.

§ Ante comas oculosque legatorum tormentis Mutinam vibravit—ne punctum quidem tempora, cum legati esse ut, oppugnatione respiravit—cum illi contempti et rejecti revertentem, dixissentque senatus, non modo illum

¶ Gulius non discessisse, uti consulens sumus, sed ne a Mutina quidem recedisse, potestatem sibi D. Bruti conveniendi non fuisse, &c.—Phil. viii. 7, 8, 9.

‡ The princeps sagorum: ego semper hostem appellavi, cum illi adversarium: semper hoc bellum, cum illi insidiam, &c.—Phil. xii. 7.

* Phil. viii. 1, 10.

† Equidem, P. C. quamquam hoc honore uti togati solent esse, cum est in agis civitas; statui tamen a vobis, ceterisque civibus in tanta atrocitate temporis—non differre vestitu.—Phil. viii. 11.

‡ Egregios consules habemus, sed turpissimos consulares: senatum fortissem, sed infimo quemque honore fortissimum. Populo vero nihil fortius, nihil melius, Italiaque universa. Nihil autem fediis Philippo et Pisone legatis, nihil flagitiosius: qui cum essent missi, ut Antonio ex senatus consulto certas res nunciarent: cum ille eorum rerum nulli paruisset, nitro ab illo ad nos intolerabilia postulata retulerunt. Itaque ad nos concurrunt: factique jam in re salutari sumus.—Ep. Fam. xii. 4.

‡ Phil. viii. 1.

* Ibid. 3.

puts him in mind that "there was no juster cause of taking arms than to repel slavery; that several other causes indeed were just, but this necessary; unless he did not take himself to be affected by it, for the hopes of sharing the dominion with Antony: if so, he was doubly mistaken; first, for preferring a private interest to the public; secondly, for thinking anything secure or worth enjoying in a tyranny—that a regard for the safety of citizens was a laudable principle, if he meant the good, the useful, the friends to their country: but if he meant to save those who, though citizens by nature, were enemies by choice, what difference was there between him and such citizens?—that their ancestors had quite another notion of the care of citizens; and when Scipio Nasica slew Tiberius Gracchus, when Opimius slew Caius Gracchus, when Marius killed Saturninus, they were all followed by the greatest and the best both of the senate and the people:—that the difference between Calenus's opinion and his was not trifling, or about a trifling matter; the wishing well only to this or that man: that he wished well to Brutus; Calenus to Antony; he wished to see a colony of Rome preserved; Calenus to see it stormed; that Calenus could not deny this, who was contriving all sorts of delay, which could distress Brutus and strengthen Antony." He then addressed himself to the other consulars, and reproached them for their shameful behaviour the day before, in voting for a second embassy, and said, that "when the ambassadors were sent against his judgment, he comforted himself with imagining that as soon as they should return, despised and rejected by Antony, and inform the senate that he would neither retire from Gaul nor quit the siege of Modena, nor even suffer them to speak with Brutus; that out of indignation they should all arm themselves immediately in the defence of Brutus; but on the contrary, they were grown more dispirited to hear of Antony's audaciousness; and their ambassadors, instead of courage, which they ought to have brought, had brought back nothing but fear to them^b. Good gods!" says he, "what is become of the virtue of our ancestors? When Popilius was sent ambassador to Antiochus, and ordered him, in the name of the senate, to depart from Alexandria, which he was then besieging; upon the king's deferring to answer and contriving delays, he drew a circle round him with his staff, and bade him give his answer instantly before he stirred out of that place or he would return to the senate without it." He then recites and ridicules the several demands made by Antony; his arrogance, stupidity, absurdity: and reproves^c Piso and Philip, men of such dignity, for the meanness of bringing back conditions, when they were sent only to carry commands: he complains that "they paid more respect to Antony's ambassador, Cotyla, than he to theirs; for instead of shutting the gates of the city against him, as they ought to have done, they admitted him into that very temple where the senate then sat; where the day before he was taking notes of what every man said, and was caressed, invited and entertained by some of the principal senators, who had too little regard to their dignity, too much to their danger. But what after all was the danger? which must end either in liberty or death: the one always desirable, the other unavoidable: while to fly from death basely was worse than death itself:—that it used to be the character of consular senators, to be vigilant, attentive, always thinking, doing, or proposing something for the good of the public: that he remembered old Scævola in the Marne war, how in the extremity of age oppressed with years and infirmities, he gave free access to everybody; was never seen in his bed; always the first in the senate: he wished that they all would imitate such industry, or at least not envy those who did^d: that since they had now suffered a six years' slavery, a longer term than honest and industrious slaves used to serve; what watchings, what solicitude, what pains ought they to refuse, for the sake of giving liberty to the Roman people?" He concludes by adding a clause to their last decree: "to grant pardon and impunity to all who should desert Antony and return to their duty by the fifteenth of March: or if any who continued with him should do any service worthy of reward, that one or both the consuls should take the first opportunity to move the senate in their favour: but if any person from this time should go over to Antony, except Cotyla, that the senate would consider him as an enemy to his country."

The public debates being thus adjusted, Paas called the senate together again the next day, to deliberate on some proper honours to be decreed to the memory of Ser. Sulpicius, who died upon the embassy. He spoke largely in his praise, and advised to pay him all the honours which had ever been decreed to any who had lost their lives in the service of their country: a public funeral, sepulchre, and statue. Servilius, who spoke next, agreed to a funeral and monument, but was against a statue, as due only to those who had been killed by violence in the discharge of their embassies. Cicero was not content with this, but out of private friendship to the man, as well as a regard to the public service, resolved to have all the honours paid to him which the occasion could possibly justify. In answer therefore to Servilius, he showed with his usual eloquence, that "the case of Sulpicius was the same with the case of those who had been killed on the account of their embassies: that the embassy itself had killed him; that he set out upon it in so weak a condition, that though he had some hopes of coming to Antony, he had none of returning; and when he was just arrived to the congress, expired in the very act of executing his commission^e: that it was not the manner but the cause of the death, which their ancestors regarded; if it was caused by the embassy, they granted a public monument, to encourage the fellow citizens, in dangerous wars, to undertake that employment with cheerfulness: that several statues had been erected on that account, which none had ever merited better than Sulpicius; that there could be no doubt but that the embassy he killed him, and that he had carried out death along with him, which he might have escaped by staying at home, under the care of his wife and children. But when he saw, that if he did not obey the authority of the senate, he should be unlike himself; and if he did obey, must necessarily lose his life; he chose, in so critical a state of t ^a Phil. viii. 4-6.

^c Ibid. 8, 9.

^b Ibid. 7.

^d Phil. viii. 10.

^e Ibid. 3.

^f Phil. ix. 1.

republic, rather to die than seem to decline any service which he could possibly do; that he had many opportunities of refreshing and reposing himself in the cities through which he passed, and was pressed to it by his colleagues: but in spite of his distemper, persevered to death in the resolution of urging his journey, and hastening to perform the commands of the senate. That, if they recollected how he endeavoured to excuse himself from the task when it was first moved in the senate, they must needs think that this honour to him when dead, was but a necessary atonement for the injury which they had done to him when living; for though it was harsh to be said, yet he must say it, that it was they who had killed him, by overruling his excuse, when they saw it grounded, not on a feigned, but a real sickness; and when, to their remonstrance, the consul Pansa joined his exhortation with a gravity and force of speech which his ears had not learnt to bear:" then, says he, "he took his son and me aside, and professed that he could not help preferring your authority to his own life; we, through admiration of his virtue, durst not venture to oppose his will. His son was tenderly moved, nor was my concern much less, yet both of us were obliged to give way to the greatness of his mind; and the force of his reasoning when, to the joy of you all, he promised that he would do whatever you prescribed, nor would decline the danger of that vote of which he himself had been the proposer. Restore life therefore to him, from whom you have taken it, for the life of the dead is in the memory of the living: take care that he, whom you unwillingly sent to his death, receive an immortality from you; for if you decree a statue to him in the rostra, the remembrance of his embassy will remain to all posterity." Then after illustrating the great virtues, talents, and excellent character of Sulpicius, he observes, "that all these would be perpetuated by their own merit and effects, and that the statue was the monument rather of the gratitude of the senate, than of the fame of the man; of a public, rather than of a private signification; an eternal testimony of Antony's audaciousness, of his waging an impious war against his country: of his rejecting the embassy of the senate^b." For which reasons he proposed a decree, "that a statue of brass should be erected to him in the rostra by order of the senate, and the cause inscribed on the base: that he died in the service of the republic; with an area of five feet on all sides of it, for his children and posterity to see the shows of gladiators; that a magnificent funeral should be made for him at the public charge, and the consul Pansa should assign him a place of burial in the Esquiline field, with an area of thirty feet every way, to be granted publicly, as a sepulchre for him, his children, and posterity." The senate agreed to what Cicero desired: and the statue itself, as we are told by a writer of the third century, remained to his time in the rostra of Augustus^c.

Sulpicius was of a noble and patrician family, of the same age, the same studies, and the same principles with Cicero, with whom he kept up a perpetual friendship. They went through their exercises together when young, both at Rome and at Rhodes, in the celebrated school of Molo, whence he became an eminent pleader of causes, and passed through all the great offices of the state, with a singular reputation of wisdom, learning, integrity; a constant admirer of the modesty of the ancients, and a reprover of the insolence of his own times. When he could not arrive at the first degree of fame, as an orator, he resolved to excel in what was next to it, the character of a lawyer; choosing rather to be the first in the second art, than the second only in the first: leaving therefore to his friend Cicero the field of eloquence, he contented himself with such a share of it as was sufficient to sustain and adorn the profession of the law. In this he succeeded to his wish, and was far superior to all who had ever professed it in Rome: being the first who reduced it to a proper science, or rational system, and added light and method to that, which all others before him had taught darkly and confusedly. Nor was his knowledge confined to the external forms, or the effects, of the municipal laws; but enlarged by a comprehensive view of universal equity, which he made the interpreter of its sanctions, and the rule of all his decisions; yet he was always better pleased to put an amicable end to a controversy, than to direct a process at law. In his political behaviour he was always a friend to peace and liberty; moderating the violence of opposite parties, and discouraging every step towards civil dissention; and, in the late war, was so busy in contriving projects of an accommodation, that he gained the name of the peace-maker. Through a natural timidity of temper, confirmed by a profession and course of life averse from arms, though he preferred Pompey's cause as the best, he did not care to fight for it; but taking Caesar's to be the strongest, suffered his son to follow that camp, while he himself continued quiet and neuter: for this he was honoured by Caesar, yet could never be induced to approve his government. From the time of Caesar's death, he continued still to advise and promote all measures which seemed likely to establish the public concord, and died at last as he had lived, in the very act and office of peace-making^d.

^a Non facile quem dixerim plus studii quam illum ot ad dicendum, et ad omnes bonarum rerum disciplinas adhibuisse: nam et in hisdem exercitationibus ineunte ætate fulmus; et postea Rhodum una ille etiam profectus est, quo melior esset et doctior: et inde ut rediit, videtur mihi in secunda ætate primus esse maluisse, quam in prima secundus—sed fortasse maluit, id quod est adeptus, longe omnium non ejusdem modo ætatis, sed eorum etiam qui fuissent, in jure civili esse princeps—juri civilis magnum usum et apud Scævola et apud multos fuisse, artem in hoc uno—hic enim attulit hanc artem—quasi lucem ad eos, quæ confusæ ab aliis aut respondebantur aut agebantur.—[Brut. 262, &c.] Neque ille magis juris consultus, quam justitiæ fuit: ita enim quæ proficisciebantur a legibus et a jure civili semper ad facilitatem æquitatemque referebat: neque constituto litium actiones malebat, quam controversias tollere. [Phil. ix. 5.] Servius vero Pacificator cum suo librariolo videtur oblitus legationem. [Ad Att. xv. 7.] Cognoram enim jam abesse, te hæc mala multo ante providentem, defensorem pacis et in consulatu tuo et post consulatum fuisse.—Ep. Fam. iv. 1.

^b N.B.—The old lawyers tell a remarkable story of the origin of Sulpicius's fame and skill in the law: that going one day to consult Mucius Scævola about some point, he

^c Phil. ix. 4, 5.

^d Ibid. 5, 6.

^e Pomponius de Origine Juris.

The senate had heard nothing of Brutus and Cassius from the time of their leaving Italy, till Brutus now sent public letters to the consuls, giving a particular account of "his success against Antony's brother Caius, in securing Macedonia, Illyricum, and Greece, with all the several armies in those countries, to the interests of the republic; that C. Antony was retired to Apollonia, with seven cohorts, where a good account would soon be given of him; that a legion under L. Piso had surrendered itself to young Cicero, the commander of his horse; that Dolabella's horse, which was marching in two separate bodies towards Syria, the one in Thessaly, the other in Macedonia, had deserted their leaders, and joined themselves to him; that Vatinius had opened the gates of Dyrrhachium to him, and given up the town with his troops into his hands. That in all these transactions Q. Hortensius, the proconsul of Macedonia, had been particularly serviceable in disposing the provinces and their armies to declare for the cause of liberty¹."

Pansa no sooner received the letters, than he summoned the senate to acquaint them with the contents, which raised an incredible joy through the whole city². After the letters were read, Pansa spoke largely in the praises of Brutus, extolled his conduct and services, and moved that public honours and thanks should be decreed to him; and then, according to his custom, called upon his father-in-law Calenus to declare his sentiments the first, who, in a premeditated speech delivered from writing, "acknowledged Brutus's letters to be well and properly drawn; but since what he had done was done without any commission and public authority, that he should be required to deliver up his forces to the orders of the senate, or the proper governors of the provinces³." Cicero spoke next, "and began with giving the thanks of the house to Pansa, for calling them together on that day, when they had no expectation of it, and not deferring a moment to give them a share of the joy which Brutus's letters had brought.. He observes that Pansa, by speaking so largely in the praise of Brutus, had shown that to be true which he had always taken to be so, that no man ever envied another's virtue who was conscious of his own. That he had prevented him to whom, for his intimacy was so dull in apprehending the meaning of Mucius's answer, that after explaining it to him twice or thrice, Mucius could not forbear saying, It is a shame for a nobleman, and a patrician, and a pleader of causes, to be ignorant of that law which he professes to understand. The reproach stung him to the quick, and made him apply himself to his studies with such industry, that he became the ablest lawyer in Rome; and left behind him near a hundred and eighty books written by himself on nice and difficult questions of law.—Digest. 1. 1. tit. 2. par. 43.

The Jesuits Catrou and Rouille have put this Sulpicius into the list of the conspirators who killed Cæsar: but a moderate acquaintance with the character of the man, or with Cicero's writings, would have shown them their error, and that there was none of consular rank but Trebonius concerned in that affair.—Hist. Rom. vol. 17. p. 343, not a.

¹ Phil. x. 4, 5, 6.

² Dil immortales! qui ille nuncius, que ille literæ, que lætitia senatus, que alacritas civitatis erat?—Ad Brut. ii. 7.

³ Phil. x. 1, 2, 3.

with Brutus, that task seemed particularly long, from saying so much as he intended (subject." Then addressing himself to Calenus, "What could be the meaning of that trial war which he declared against the Bru? Why he alone was always opposing, when one else was almost adoring them? That of Brutus's letters being rightly drawn, w to praise Brutus, but his secretary. Wh he ever hear of a decree in that style, that were properly written? yet the expression fall from him by chance, but was designedly meditated, and brought in writing⁴." He e him "to consult with his son-in-law Pansa, e than with himself, if he would preserve hi racter; professes that he could not help j him, to hear it given out among the peop there was not a second vote on the side: who gave the first, which would be the c believed, in that day's debate. You wouk away (says he) the legions from Brutus those which he has drawn off from the trai designs of C. Antony, and engaged by hi authority in the public service; you wouk him sent once more, as it were, into banish naked and forlorn; but for you, fathers! i you betray or desert Brutus, what citizen v honour? Whom will you favour, unless think those who offer kingly diadems v to be preserved; those who abolish the m king, to be abandoned." He proceeds to di with great force the merit and praises of B "his moderation, mildness, patience of inj how studiously he had avoided every step could give a handle to civil tumults; quietu city, living retired in the country, forbid resort of friends to him, and leaving Italy lest any cause of war should arise on his acc that as long as he saw the senate disposed v everything, he was resolved to bear too: but he perceived them inspired with a spirit of li he then exerted himself to provide them su to defend it⁵; that if he had not defeat desperate attempts of C. Antony, they ha Macedonia, Illyricum, and Greece: the b which afforded either a commodious retr Antony, when driven out of Italy, or the opportunity of invading it, which now, by Br management, being strongly provided with t stretched out its arms as it were, and offer help to Italy⁶. That Caius's march thro provinces was to plunder the allies, to a waste and desolation wherever he passed, t to play the armies of the Roman people again people themselves; whereas Brutus made it: wheresoever he came, to dispense light, hop security to all around him: in short, that th gathered forces to preserve, the other to ove the republic. That the soldiers themselves judge of this as well as the senate, as the declared by their desertion of C. Antony, w that time either was, or would soon be, Br prisoner⁷; that there was no apprehensive danger from Brutus's power: that his legion mercenaries, his horse, and above all himself, wholly theirs. Formed for the service of republic, as well by his own excellent virtus kind of fatality derived from his ancestors,

⁴ Phil. x. 2.

⁵ Ibid. 5.

⁶ Ibid. 3, 4.

⁷ Ibid. 6.

on the father's and the mother's side; that none could ever blame him for anything, unless for too great a backwardness and aversion to war, and his not humouring the ardour of all Italy in their eager thirst of liberty—that it was a vain fear, which some pretended to entertain, that the veterans would be disgusted to see Brutus at the head of an army, as if there were any difference between his army and the armies of Hirtius, Pansa, D. Brutus, Octavius; all which had severally received public honours for their defence of the people of Rome; that M. Brutus could not be more suspected by the veterans than Decimus, for though the act of the Brutuses, and the praise of it, was common to them both, yet those who disapproved it were more angry with Decimus, as thinking him, of all others, the last who ought to have done it: yet what were all their armies now doing, but relieving Decimus from the siege? That if there was any real danger from Brutus, Pansa's sagacity would easily find it out: but as they had just now heard from his own mouth, he was so far from thinking his army to be dangerous, that he looked upon it as the firmest support of the commonwealth; that it was the constant art of the disaffected, to oppose the name of the veterans to every good design; that he was always ready to encourage their valour, but would never endure their arrogance. "Shall we," says he, "who are now breaking off the shackles of our servitude, be discouraged if any one tells us, that the veterans will not have it so? Let that then come out from me at last which is true, and becoming my character to speak: that if the resolutions of this body must be governed by the will of the veterans, if all our words and acts must be regulated by their humour, then it is high time to wish for death, which to Roman citizens was ever preferable to slavery; that since so many chances of death surrounded them all both day and night, it was not the part of a man, much less of a Roman, to scruple the giving up that breath to his country, which he must necessarily give up to nature." That Antony was the single and common enemy of them all, though he had indeed his brother Lucius with him, who seemed to be born on purpose, that Marcus might not be the most infamous of all mortals; that he had a crew also of desperate villains, gazing after the spoils of the republic: that the army of Brutus was provided against these, whose sole will, thought, and purpose was, to protect the senate and the liberty of the people—who after trying, in vain, what patience would do, found it necessary at last to oppose force to force. That they ought, therefore, to grant the same privilege to M. Brutus, which they had granted before to Decimus, and to Octavius, and confirm by public authority what he had been doing for them by his private counsel; for which purpose he proposed the following decree: "Whereas by the pains, counsel, industry, virtue of Q. Cæpio Brutus, proconsul, in the utmost distress of the republic, the province of Macedonia, Illyricum, and Greece, with all their legions, armies, horse, are now in the power of the consuls, senate and people of Rome; that Q. Cæpio Brutus, proconsul, has acted herein well, and for the good of the republic, agreeably to his character, the dignity of his ancestors, and to his usual manner of serving the commonwealth, and that his conduct is and ever will be acceptable to the senate and people of Rome. That Q. Cæpio Brutus, proconsul, be ordered to protect, guard, and defend the province of Macedonia, Illyricum, and all Greece: and command that army which he himself has raised. That whatever money he wants for military service, he may use and take it from any part of the public revenues, where it can best be raised, or borrow it where he thinks proper; and impose contributions of grain and forage, and take care to draw all his troops as near to Italy as possible: and whereas it appears by the letters of Q. Cæpio Brutus, proconsul, that the public service has been greatly advanced by the endeavours and virtue of Q. Hortensius, proconsul; and that he concerted all his measures with Q. Cæpio Brutus, proconsul, to the great benefit of the commonwealth. That Q. Hortensius, proconsul, has acted therein rightly, regularly, and for the public good, and that it is the will of the senate, that Q. Hortensius, proconsul, with his questors, proquestors, and lieutenants, hold the province of Macedonia, till a successor be appointed by the senate."

Cicero sent this speech to Brutus, with that also which he made on the first of January, of which Brutus says, in answer to him: "I have read your two orations, the one on the first of January, the other on the subject of my letters against Calenus. You expect now, without doubt, that I should praise them. I am at a loss what to praise the most in them; your courage or your abilities: I allow you now in earnest to call them Philippics, as you intimated jocosely in a former letter."—Thus the name of Philippics, which seems to have been thrown out at first in gaiety and jest only, being taken up and propagated by his friends, became at last the fixed and standing title of these orations, which yet for several ages were called, we find, indifferently either Philippics or Antonians^b. Brutus declared himself so well pleased with these two which he had seen, that Cicero promised to send him afterwards all the rest^c.

Brutus, when he first left Italy, sailed directly for Athens, where he spent some time in concerting measures how to make himself master of Greece and Macedonia, which was the great design that he had in view. Here he gathered about him all the young nobility and gentry of Rome who, for the opportunity of their education, had been sent to this celebrated seat of learning; but of them all he took the most notice of young Cicero, and after a little acquaintance grew very fond of him, admiring his parts and virtue, and surprised

^a Legi orationes tuas duas, quarum altera Kal. Jan. usus es; altera de literis meis, que habita est ab eis contra Calenum. Nunc scilicet hoc expectas, dum eas laudem. Nescio animi ingenii tui major in illis libellis laus continetur. Jam concedo, ut vel Philippicæ vocentur, quod tu quadam epistola jocans scripsisti.—Ad Brut. li. 5.

^b M. Cicero in primo Antonianarum ita scriptum reliquit.—Aul. Gell. xiii. 1.

^c Hæc ad te oratio perferetur, quoniam te video delectari Philippicis nostris.—Ad Brut. li. 4.

^a Phil. x. 7.

^b Ibid. 8.

^c Ibid. 9.

^d Ibid. 10.

^e Ibid. 11.

^f M. Brutus, as appears from the style of this decree, had been adopted lately by his mother's brother, Q. Servilius Cæpio, whose name, according to custom, he now assumed with the possession of his uncle's estate.

to find in one so young such a generosity and greatness of mind, with such an aversion to tyranny^d. He made him, therefore, one of his lieutenants, though he was but twenty years old; gave him the command of his horse, and employed him in several commissions of great trust and importance, in all which the young man signalised both his courage and conduct, and behaved with great credit to himself, great satisfaction to his general, and great benefit to the public service; as Brutus did him the justice to signify, both in his private and public letters to Rome. In writing to Cicero, "Your son," says he, "recommends himself to me so effectually by his industry, patience, activity, greatness of mind, and in short by every duty, that he seems never to drop the remembrance of whose son he is; wherefore, since it is not possible for me to make you love him more than you do already, yet allow thus much to my judgment as to persuade yourself that he will have no occasion to borrow any share of your glory in order to obtain his father's honours."^e This account, given by one who was no flatterer, may be considered as the real character of the youth,—which is confirmed likewise by what Lentulus wrote of him about the same time. "I could not see your son," says he, "when I was last with Brutus, because he was gone with the horse into winter-quarters; but, by my faith, it gives me great joy for your sake, for his, and especially my own, that he is in such esteem and reputation; for as he is your son, and worthy of you, I cannot but look upon him as my brother."^f

Cicero was so full of the greater affairs, which were the subject of his letters to Brutus, that he had scarce leisure to take notice of what was said about his son. He just touches it, however, in one or two letters: "As to my son, if his merit be as great as you write, I rejoice at it as much as I ought to do; or if you magnify it out of love to him, even that gives me an incredible joy to perceive that he is beloved by you^g. Again, I desire you, my dear Brutus, to keep my son with you as much as possible: he will find no better school of virtue than in the contemplation and imitation of you."^h

Though Brutus intimated nothing in his public letters but what was prosperous and encouraging, yet in his private accounts to Cicero he signified a ^d Plut. in Brut.

^e Cicero filius tuus sic mihi se probat, industria, patientia, labore, animi magnitudine, omni denique officio, ut prorens nunquam dimittere videtur cogitationem, cujus sit filius. Quare quoniam efficere non possum, ut pluris facias eum, qui tibi est carissimus, illud tibi iudicio meo, ut tibi persuadeas, non fore illi abutendum gloria tua, ut adimpleatur honores paterni. Kal. Apr.—Ad Brut. li. 3.

^f Filium tuum, ad Brutum cum veni, videre non potui, ideo quod jam in hiberna, cum equitibus erat profectus. Sed mediis fidius ea esse eum opinione, et tua et ipsius, et in primis meae causae gaudeo. Fratris enim loco mihi est, qui ex te natus, teque dignus est. Vale. iiii. Kal. Jun.—Ep. Fam. xli. 14.

^g De Cicerone meo, et si tantum est in eo, quantum scribis, tantum scilicet quantum debeo, gaudeo: et si, quod amas eum, eo maiora facis; id ipsum incredibiliter gaudeo, a te eum diligere.—Ad Brut. li. 6.

^h Ciceronem meum, mi Brutus, velim quam plurimum tecum habere. Virtutis disciplinam meliorem reperiet nullam, quam contemplationem atque imitationem tui. xiii. Kal. Maii.—Ibid. 7.

great want of money and recruits, and begged to be supplied with both from Italy, especially with recruits, either by a vote of the senate, or if that could not be had, by some secret management, without the privy of Pansa. To which Cicero answered, "You tell me that you want two necessary things, recruits and money: it is difficult to help you. I know no other way of raising money which can be of use to you but what the senate has decreed, of borrowing it from the cities. As to recruits, I do not see what can be done; for Pansa is so far from granting any share of his army or recruits to you, that he is even uneasy to see so many volunteers going over to you. His reason I take it is, that he thinks no forces too great for the demands of our affairs in Italy: for as to what many suspect, that he has no mind to see you too strong, I have no suspicion of it."ⁱ Pansa seems to have been much in the right for refusing to part with any troops out of Italy, where the stress of the war now lay, on the success of which the fate of the whole republic depended.

But there came news of a different kind about the same time to Rome, of Dolabella's successful exploits in Asia. He left the city, as it is said above, before the expiration of his consulship, to possess himself of Syria, which had been allotted to him by Antony's management, and taking his way through Greece and Macedonia, to gather what money and troops he could raise in those countries he passed over into Asia in hopes of inducing the province to abandon Trebonius and declare for him. Having sent his emissaries therefore before him to prepare for his reception, he arrived before Smyrna, where Trebonius resided, without any show of hostility, or forces sufficient to give an great alarm, pretending to desire nothing more than a free passage through the country to his own province. Trebonius refused to admit him into the town, but consented to supply him with refreshments without the gates: where many civilities passed between them, with great professions of Dolabella's part of amity and friendship to Trebonius, who promised in his turn that if Dolabella would depart quietly from Smyrna, he should receive into Ephesus in order to pass forward towards Syria. To this Dolabella seemingly agreed, and finding it impracticable to take Smyrna by open force, contrived to surprise it by stratagem. Embracing, therefore, Trebonius's offer, he set forward towards Ephesus; but after he had march several miles, and Trebonius's men, who were sent after to observe him, were retired, he turned back instantly in the night, and arriving again at Smyrna before day, found it as he expected negligently guarded and without any apprehension an assault, so that his soldiers, by the help of ladders, presently mounting the walls, possessed himself of it without opposition, and seized Trebonius himself in his bed before he knew anything of his danger^k.

ⁱ Quod egeret te duabus necessariis rebus scribis, sapienter et pecunia, difficile consilium est. Non enim in occurrent facultate, quibus uti te posse videam, praefiliis, quas senatus decrevit, ut pecunias a civitatibus mutuas sumeras. De supplemento autem non video, quod fieri possit. Tantum enim adest ut Pansa de exercitu aut delectu tibi aliquid tribuat, ut etiam moleste fecerim multos ad te ire voluntarios: quomodo equidem crederem quod his rebus quae in Italia decernuntur, nullas eo nimis magnas arbitretur: quomodo autem multi exsultant, quod ne te quidem nimis firmum esse vellet; quod ego non suspicio.—Ad Brut. li. 6.

Dolabella treated him with the utmost cruelty; kept him two days under torture to extort a discovery of all the money in his custody, then ordered his head to be cut off and carried about on a spear, and his body to be dragged about the streets and thrown into the sea^l. This was the first blood that was spilt on the account of Cæsar's death, which was now revenged in kind upon one of the principal conspirators, and the only one who was of consular rank. It had been projected without doubt in concert with Antony, to make the revenge of Cæsar's death the avowed cause of their war, in order to draw the veterans to their side, make them unwilling at least to act against him; and it gave a clear warning to Brutus and his associates what they were to expect if their sides prevailed, as well as a sad presage to all good men of the cruel effects and merciless fury of the impending war.

On the news of Trebonius's death the senate was summoned by the consul, where Dolabella was unanimously declared a public enemy, and his estate confiscated. Calenus himself first proposed a vote, and said that if anything more severe should be thought of, he would be for it. The indignation of the city was so inflamed that he was not to comply with the popular humour, and perhaps to put some difficulty upon Cicero, for, for his relation to Dolabella, would as he argued be for moderating the punishment. But when Calenus was mistaken in this, he was confined to moving another question which greatly pleased Cicero, about the choice of a general to wage this new war against Dolabella. Two names were proposed; the one that P. Servilius should be sent with an extraordinary commission, whether that the two consuls should jointly prosecute that war, with the provinces of Syria and Galatia allotted to them. This was very agreeable to him; and pushed therefore not only by his friends but by all Antony's party, who fancied that it would take off the attention of the consuls from the war of Italy, give Dolabella time to strengthen himself in Asia, raise a coldness between the consuls and Cicero if he ventured to oppose it, and so all put a public affront upon Cassius, who his presence in those parts seemed to have the pretension to that commission. The debate continued through the first day without coming to a close, and was adjourned to the next. In the meanwhile Cassius's mother-in-law Servilia, and her friends, were endeavouring to prevail with Antony to drop the opposition for fear of alienating him,—but in vain; for he resolved at all hazards to defend the honour of Cassius; and when the next morning resumed the next morning, exerted all his talent and eloquence to procure a decree in favour.

^k Syllab. lib. p. 542.

^l Incunctus est Dolabella, nulla suspitione bellum. — collationes familiares cum Trebonio; complexus necesse est benevolentia — nocturnus introitus in Smyrnam, quasi in hostium urbem: oppressus Trebonius — captum statim noluit, ne nimis, credo, in tanta libertate videretur. Cum verborum contumeliis vitam incerto ore lacerasset, tum verberibus ac mentis questionem habuit pecunie publicæ, idque per

He began his speech by observing, "that in their present grief for the lamentable fate of Trebonius, the republic however would reap some good from it, since they now saw the barbarous cruelty of those who had taken arms against their country; for of the two chiefs of the present war, the one by effecting what he wished had discovered what the other aimed at^m. That they both meant nothing less than the death and destruction of all honest men, nor would be satisfied it seemed with simple death, for that was the punishment of nature, but thought the rack and tortures due to their revenge; that what Dolabella had executed was the picture of what Antony intended; that they were a true pair, exactly matched, marching by concert and equal paces in the execution of their wicked purposes." This he illustrates by parallel instances from the conduct of each; and after displaying the inhumanity of Dolabella and the unhappy fate of Trebonius, in a manner proper to excite indignation against the one and compassion for the other, he shows, "that Dolabella was still the more unhappy of the two, and must needs suffer more from the guilt of his mind than Trebonius from the tortures of his body. What doubt (says he) can there be which of them is the most miserable?—he whose death the senate and people are eager to revenge, or he who is adjudged to be a traitor by the unanimous vote of the senate? For in all other respects it is the greatest injury to Trebonius to compare his life with Dolabella's. As to the one, everybody knows his wisdom, wit, humanity, innocence, greatness of mind in freeing his country; but as to the other, cruelty was his delight from a boy, with a lawlessness so shameless and abandoned, that he used to value himself for doing what his very adversaries could not object to him with modesty. Yet this man, good gods! was once mine; for I was not very curious to inquire into his vices,—nor should I now perhaps have been his enemy had he not shown himself an enemy to you, to his country, to the domestic gods and altars of us all,—nay, even to nature and humanity itself." He exhorts them, "from this warning given by Dolabella, to act with the greater vigour against Antony; for if he, who had about him but a few of those capital incendiaries, the ringleaders of rapine and rebellion, durst attempt an act so abominable, what barbarity were they not to expect from Antony, who had the whole crew of them in his camp?"—the principal of whom he describes by name and character; and adds, "that as he had often dissented unwillingly from Calenus, so now at last he had the pleasure to agree with him, and to let them see that he had no dislike to the man but to the cause; that in this case he not only concurred with him, but thanked him for propounding a vote so severe and worthy of the republic, in decreeing Dolabella an enemy and his estate to be confiscated." Then as to the second point, which was of greater delicacy, the nomination of a general to be sent against Dolabella, he proceeds to give his reasons for rejecting the two opinions proposed,—the one for sending Servilius, the other for the two consuls. Of the first, he biduum. Post cervicibus fractis caput abscidit, idque adfixum gestari jussit in pilo; reliquum corpus tractum ac lanistam philicem in mare, &c.—Phil. xi. 2, 3.

^m Phil. xi. 1.

ⁿ Ibid. 4.

^o Ibid. 5, 6.

says, "that extraordinary commissions were always odious where they were not necessary; and wherever they had been granted, it was in cases very different from this. That if the commission in debate should be decreed to Servilius, it would seem an affront to all the rest of the same rank, that being equal in dignity they should be thought unworthy of the same honour. That he himself indeed had voted an extraordinary commission to young Cæsar, but Cæsar had first given an extraordinary protection and deliverance to them. That they must either have taken his army from him or decreed the command of it to him, which could not therefore be so properly said to be given as not taken away; but that no such commission had ever been granted to any one who was wholly idle and unemployed". As to the second opinion, of decreeing that province to the consuls, he shows it to be both against the dignity of the consuls themselves and against the public service. That when D. Brutus, a consul elect, was actually besieged, on the preservation of whom their common safety depended, and when a dreadful war was on foot, already entrusted to the two consuls, the very mention of Asia and Syria would give a handle to jealousy and envy; and though the decree was not to take place till D. Brutus should first be relieved, yet a new commission would necessarily take off some part of their thoughts and attention from the old." Then addressing himself to Pansa, he says, "that though his mind, he knew, was intent on delivering D. Brutus, yet the nature of things would force him to turn it sometimes towards Dolabella, and that if he had more minds than one they should all be directed and wholly fixed on Modena". That for his own part he had resigned in his consulship a rich and well-furnished province, that nothing might interrupt his endeavours to quench that flame which was then raised in his country. He wished that Pansa would imitate him whom he used to commend; that if the consuls, however, desired to have provinces, as other great men had usually done, let them first bring D. Brutus safe home to them,—who ought to be guarded with the same care as the image that fell from heaven and was kept in the temple of Vesta, in the safety of which they were all safe. That this decree would create great delay and obstruction to the war against Dolabella, which required a general prepared, equipped, and already invested with command,—one who had authority, reputation, an army, and a resolution tried in the service of his country. That it must, therefore, either be Brutus or Cassius, or both of them. That Brutus could not be spared from Macedonia, where he was quelling the last efforts of the faction, and oppressing C. Antony, who, with the remains of a broken army, was still in possession of some considerable places. That when he had finished that work, if he found it of use to the commonwealth to pursue Dolabella he would do it of himself, as he had hitherto done, without waiting for their orders; for both he and Cassius had on many occasions been a senate to themselves. That in such a season of general confusion, it was necessary to be governed by the times rather than by rules. That Brutus and Cassius ever held the safety and liberty of their country to be the most sacred rule of acting. For by what law (says he) by right have they hitherto been acting, the or Greece the other in Syria, but by that which Ju himself ordained, that all things beneficial to community should be esteemed lawful and just for law is nothing else but right reason derivus from the gods, enjoining what is honest, hibiting the contrary. This was the law. Cassius obeyed when he went into Syria; an man's province, if we judge by written law when these are overturned, his own by the nature." But that Cassius's acts might be conf also by the authority of the senate, he propo decree to this effect, "that whereas the senat declared P. Dolabella to be an enemy of the R people, and ordered him to be pursued by war, to the intent that he may suffer the pu ment due to him both from gods and men; the will of the senate that C. Cassius, proco shall hold the province of Syria in the same ner as if he had obtained it by right of law that he receive the several armies from Q. M. Crispus, proconsul, L. Statius Murcus, proco A. Allienus, lieutenant, which they are b required to deliver to him. That with the what other forces he can procure he shall p Dolabella both by land and sea. That fo occasions of the war he shall have a power t mand ships, seamen, money, and all things t to him, from whomsoever he thinks fit, in Asia, Bithynia, Pontus; and that whatever vince he comes into in prosecuting the war he have an authority superior to that of the p governor. That if king Deiotarus, the fat the son, shall assist C. Cassius, proconsul, their troops, as they have oft assisted the R people in other wars, their conduct will be ac able to the senate and people. That if any other kings, tetrarchs, and potentates, shall d like, the senate and people will not be unmi of their services. That as soon as the public were settled, C. Pansa and A. Hirtius, the co one or both of them, should take the first o tunity of moving the senate about the dispos the consular and prætorian provinces; and t the meanwhile they should all continue i hands of those who now held them, till succ were appointed by the senate."

^p Phil. xl. 7, 8.

^r Ibid. 10.

^a Ibid. 9.

From the senate, Cicero went directly int forum, to give the people an account of the d and recommend to them the interests of Cæ hither Pansa followed him; and, to weaken t fluence of his authority, declared to the ci that what Cicero contended for was against th and advice of Cassius's nearest friends and tions: of which Cicero gives the following ac in a letter to Cassius.

M. T. Cicero to C. Cassius.

"With what zeal I defended your dignity in the senate and with the people, I would you learn rather from your other friends than me. My opinion would easily have prevailed in the senate, had not Pansa eagerly opposed. After I had proposed that vote, I was produced before the people by Servilius, the tribune, and everything which I could of you with a strong voice that filled the forum; and with clamour and approbation of the people, that I had never seen the like before. You will pardon me, I hope, for doing it against the will of your mother-in-law. The timorous woman was afraid that Pansa would be disgusted. Pansa indeed declared to the assembly that both your mother and brother were against it; but that did not move me—I had other considerations more at heart: my regard was to the republic, to which I have always wished well, and to your dignity and glory. But there is one thing which I enlarged upon in the senate, and mentioned also to the people, in which I must desire you to make my words good; for I promised, and in a manner assured them, that you neither had nor would wait for our decrees, but would defend the republic yourself in your own way: and though we had heard nothing, either where you were or what places you had, yet I took it for granted that all the forces in those parts were yours; and was content that you had already recovered the province of Asia to the republic. Let it be your care to do yourself, in endeavouring still to advance your own glory. Adieu."

^p Phil. xl. 11.

^r Ibid. 12, &c.

As to the issue of the contest, some writers tell that it ended as Cicero desired: but it is evident, from the letter just recited, and more clearly from other letters, that Pansa's authority prevailed against him for granting the commission to the consuls. Cassius, however, as Cicero advised declared, had little regard to what they were doing at Rome; but undertook the whole affair himself, and soon put an end to Dolabella's troubles, as will be mentioned hereafter in its proper place.

The statue of Minerva, which Cicero, upon his going into exile, had dedicated in the capitol by title of the Guardian of the City, was, about the end of the last year, thrown down and shattered in pieces by a tempest of thunder and lightning. The later writers take notice of as ominous presaging the fall of Cicero himself: though neither Cicero nor any of that time made any such allusion upon it. The senate, however, out of respect to him, passed a decree, in a full house, on the eighteenth of March, that the statue should be raised and restored to its place. So that it was made by public authority what he himself had said it to be—a standing monument to posterity that the safety of the republic had been the great object of his counsels.

Brutus was reduced by this time to such a state in Modena, that his friends began to be greatly alarmed for him; taking it for granted, that if he fell into Antony's hands, he would be treated no better than Trebonius. The mention therefore of a pacification being revived in the senate, and recommended by Pansa himself, upon an intimation given by Antony's friends that he was in a disposition to submit to reason, Cicero, out of a concern for Brutus' safety, consented to a decree of a second embassy, to be executed by himself and Servilius, together with three other consular senators: but finding upon recollection that there appeared no symptoms of any change in Antony, and that his friends produced no proofs of it, nor anything new in his conduct, he was convinced that he had made a false step, and that nothing more was intended than to gain time; which was of great use to Antony, as it would retard the attempts of relieving Modena, and give an opportunity to Ventidius to join him, who was marching towards him at that time with three legions. At the next meeting therefore of the senate, he retracted his opinion, and declared against the late decree as dangerous and insidious; and in a warm and pathetic speech pressed them to rescind it. He owns, "that it was indecent for one, whose authority they had so often followed in the most important debates, to declare himself mistaken and deceived; yet his comfort was, that it was in common with them all, and with a consul of the greatest wisdom: that when Piso and Calenus, who knew Antony's secret—the one of whom entertained his wife and children at his house, the other was perpetually sending and receiving letters from him,—began to renew what they had long intermitted, their exhortations to peace; and when the consul thought fit to exhort the same thing, a man whose prudence could not easily be imposed upon, whose virtue approved no peace but on Antony's submission; whose greatness of mind preferred death to slavery; it was natural to imagine that there was some special reason for all this; some secret wound in Antony's affairs which the public was unacquainted with: especially when it was reported that Antony's family were under some unusual affliction, and his friends in the senate betrayed a dejection in their looks: for if there was nothing in it, why should Piso and Calenus above all others—why at that time—why so unexpectedly, so suddenly, move for peace? Yet now, when they had entangled the senate in a pacific embassy, they both denied that there was anything new or particular which induced them to it: that there could be no occasion therefore for new measures when there was nothing new in the case itself; that they were drawn in and deceived by Antony's friends, who were serving his private, not the public interest: that he had seen it from the first, though but darkly, his concern for Brutus having dazzled his eyes; for whose liberty, if a substitute could be accepted, he would freely offer himself to be shut up in his place: that if Antony would humble himself, and sue to them for anything, he should perhaps be for hearing him; but while he stood to his arms, and acted offensively, their business was to resist force by force. But they would tell him, perhaps, that the thing was not in their power, since an embassy was actually decreed: but what is it (says he,) that is not free to the wise, which it is possible to retrieve? It is the case of every man to err, but the part only of a fool to persevere in error. If we have been drawn away by false and fallacious hopes, let us turn again into the way; for the surest harbour to a penitent is a change of his conduct." He then shows how "the embassy, so far from being of service, would certainly hurt, nay, had already hurt the republic, by checking the zeal of the towns and colonies of Italy, and the courage of the legions which had declared for them, who could never be eager to fight

Ep. Fam. xii. 7.

Quam consilium decreta est Asia, et permissum est ut hinc ipse veniret; darent negotium qui ipse ob-

—Ep. Fam. xii. 14.

His die senatus decrevit, ut Minerva nostra, Custos est, quæ turbo dejectæ, restitueretur.—Ep. Fam. xii.

Ep. Fam. xii. 7.

Phil. xii. 1.

ibid. 2

while the senate was sounding a retreat^b. That nothing was more unjust than to determine anything about peace without the consent of those who were carrying on the war; and not only without, but against their consent: that Hirtius and Cæsar had no thoughts of peace; from whom he had letters then in his hands, declaring their hopes of victory: for their desire was to conquer, and to acquire peace, not by treaty, but by victory^c. That there could not possibly be any peace with one to whom nothing could be granted: they had voted him to have forged several decrees of the senate; would they vote them again to be genuine? They had annulled his laws, as made by violence; would they now consent to restore them? They had decreed him to have embezzled five millions of money: could such a waste be absolved from a charge of fraud? That immunities, priesthoods, kingdoms, had been sold by him; could those bargains be confirmed which their decrees had made void^d? That if they should grant him the farther Gaul and an army, what would it be else but to defer the war, not to make peace? nay, not only to prolong the war, but to yield him the victory^e. Was it for this (says he) that we have put on the robe of war, taken arms, sent out all the youth of Italy, that, with a most flourishing and numerous army, we should send an embassy at last for peace? and must I bear a part in that embassy, or assist in that council, where, if I differ from the rest, the people of Rome can never know it? so that whatever concessions are made to Antony, or whatever mischief he may do hereafter, it must be at the hazard of my credit." He then shows, "that if an embassy must needs be sent, he, of all men, was the most improper to be employed in it: that he had ever been against any embassy; was the mover of their taking the habit of war; was always for the severest proceedings both against Antony and his associates: that all that party looked upon him as prejudiced; and Antony would be offended at the sight of him^f. That if they did not trouble themselves how Antony might take it, he begged them at least to spare him the pain of seeing Antony, which he should never be able to bear: who, in a speech lately to his parricides, when he was distributing rewards to the boldest of them, had promised Cicero's estate to Petissius: that he should never endure the sight of L. Antony, whose cruelty he could not have escaped, but by the defence of his walls and gates, and the zeal of his native town: that though he might be able to command himself, and dissemble his uneasiness at the sight of Antony and his crew, yet some regard should be had to his life,—not that he set any value upon it himself, but it ought not to be thought despicable by the senate and people of Rome: since, if he did not deceive himself, it was he who, by his watchings, cares, and votes, had managed matters so that all the attempts of their enemies had not hitherto been able to do them any harm^g. That if his life had been oft attempted at home, where the fidelity of his friends and the eyes of all Rome were his guard, what might he not apprehend from so long a journey? that there were three roads from Rome to Modena,—the Flaminian, along the upper sea; the Aurelian, along the lower; the Cassian, in the middle: that they were all of them beset by Antony's allies, his own utter enemies; the Cassian, by Lento; the Flaminian, by Ventidius; the Aurelian, by the whole Clodian family^h. That he would stay therefore in the city, if the senate would give leave, which was his proper seat, his watch, and station: that others might enjoy camps, kingdoms, military commands; he would take care of the city and the affairs at home, in partnership with them; that he did not refuse the charge, but it was the people who refused it for him: for no man was less timorous, though none more cautious than he. That a statesman ought to leave behind him a reputation of glory in dying; not the reproach of error and folly. Who (says he) does not bewail the death of Trebonius? yet there are some who say, though it is hard indeed to say it, that he is the less to be pitied for not keeping a better guard against a base and detestable villain: for wise men tell us, that he who professes to guard the lives of others ought, in the first place, to keep a guard upon his ownⁱ. That if he should happen to escape all the snares of the road, that Antony's rage was so furious that he would never suffer him to return alive from the congress. That when he was a young volunteer in the wars of Italy he was present at a conference of Cn. Pompey, the consul, and P. Vettius, the general of the Marsi held between the two camps; there was no fear, no suspicion, nor any violent hatred on either side: that there was an interview likewise between Syll and Scipio, in their civil wars, where, though fait was not strictly observed, yet no violence was offered^k. But the case was different in treating with Antony, where, if others could be safe, he at least could not: that Antony would never come into their camp, much less they into his: that they transacted affairs by letter, his opinion would always be one and the same,—to reduce everything to the will of the senate; that this would be misrepresented to the veterans as severe and pervers and might excite them perhaps to some violence. Let my life, therefore, (says he,) be reserved to the service of my country as long as either dignity or nature will allow: let my death fall by the necessary course of fate; or, if I must meet it sooner, let me meet it with glory. Since the republic then, speak the most moderately, has no occasion for this embassy, yet, if I can undertake it with safety, will go; and in this whole affair will govern myself entirely, fathers, not by a regard to my own danger but to the service of the state; and, after the most mature deliberation, will resolve to do that which shall judge to be most useful to the public interest.

Though he did not absolutely refuse the employment, yet he dissuaded it so strongly that the thing was wholly dropped; and Pansa, about the end of the month, marched away towards Gaul, at the head of his new-raised army, in order to join Hirtius; Octavius, and without farther delay to attempt decisive battle with Antony for the delivery of Brutus.

Antony, at the same time, while he was perplexing the counsels of the senate by the intrigues of his friends, was endeavouring also by his letters to shake the resolution of Hirtius and Octavius, to draw them off from the cause which they were serving; but their answers seem to have been solid and firm, referring him constantly to the authority of the senate: yet, as things were now drawing towards a crisis, he made one effort more upon them; and in the following expostulatory letter reproached them with great freedom for deserting their true interest, and suffering themselves to be misled and drawn in by Cicero to revive the Pompeian cause, and establish a power which in the end would destroy them.

^b Phil. xii. 3.^d Ibid. 6.^f Ibid. 7.^c Ibid. 4.^e Ibid. 6.^g Ibid. 8.^h Phil. xii. 9.ⁱ Ibid. 11.^k Ibid. 10.

Antony to Hirtius and Cæsar.

"Upon the news of Trebonius's death, I was equally affected both with joy and with grief. It was matter of real joy to me to see a villain suffer the vengeance due to the ashes of the most illustrious of men; and that within the circle of the current year the divine providence has displayed itself in the punishment of parricide, inflicted already on him, and ready to fall upon the rest. But on the other hand, it is a subject of just grief to me that Dolabella should be declared an enemy because he killed a murderer; and that the son of a buffoon should be dearer to the people of Rome than Cæsar, the father of his country: but the cruellest reflection of all is, that you, Hirtius, covered with Cæsar's scars, and left by him in a condition which you must wonder at, and you too, young man, who do everything to his name, are doing all which is in your power that Dolabella may be thought justly punished; that this wretch be delivered from the hands of the senate; and Cassius and Brutus be invested with all power. You look upon the present state of things as a punishment upon the past, call Pompey's camp the senate; have made the vanquished Cicero your enemy; are strengthening Macedonia with armies; are in Africa to Varus, twice a prisoner; have driven Cassius into Syria; suffered Casca to act as he pleased; suppressed the revenues of the Julian colonies; abolished the colonies of veterans, established by law and the decree of the senate; promise to give to the people of Marseilles what was taken from them by right of war; forget that a Pompeian made incapable of any dignity by Hirtius's sword, supplied Brutus with Appuleius's money; ordered the putting to death Pectus and Menæchmus, Cæsar's friends, whom he made free of the senate; took no notice of Theopompus, when stripped of his property by Trebonius; he fled to Alexandria: he sent Ser. Galba in your camp, armed with the sword with which he stabbed Cæsar; have surrounded my soldiers and other veterans on pretence of destroying those who killed Cæsar, and then employ them, before they know what they are doing, as their questor, or their general, or their friends. What have you not done which Pompey would not have done? Were he alive, or his son, if he could, would he not? In short, you deny that any peace can be made, unless I set Brutus at liberty, or supply him with provisions: can this please those veterans who have not yet declared themselves? for as to your army, you have sold yourselves to the flatteries and empty honours of the senate. But you come, you say, to preserve the troops which are besieged, not against their being saved, or going wherever they please, if they will but leave him to perish who has deserved it. You write me word, that the memory of concord has been revived in the senate, and that consular ambassadors appointed: it is hard to believe that those who have driven me to this extremity, when I offered the fairest conditions, and was willing to remit some part of them, should do anything with moderation or humanity: nor is it probable that the same men, who voted Dolabella an enemy for a most laudable act, can ever forgive me, who am in the same sentiments with him. Wherefore it is your business to reflect which of the two is the more eligible or more useful to our common interest: to revenge the death of Trebonius, or of Cæsar: and which the more equitable; for us to act against each other, that the Pompeian cause, so often defeated, may recover itself; or to join our forces, lest we become at last the sport of our enemies; who, which of us soever may happen to fall, are sure to be the gainers. But fortune has hitherto prevented that spectacle; unwilling to see two armies, like members of the same body, fighting against each other, and Cicero all the while, like a master of gladiators, matching us, and ordering the combat; who is so far happy, as to have caught you with the same bait with which he brags to have caught Cæsar. For my part, I am resolved to suffer no affront either to myself or my friends; nor to desert the party which Pompey hated; nor to see the veterans driven out of their possessions, and dragged one by one to the rack; nor to break my word with Dolabella; nor to violate my league with Lepidus, a most religious man; nor to betray Plancus, the partner of all my counsels. If the immortal gods support me, as I hope they will, in the pursuit of so good a cause, I shall live with pleasure; but if any other fate expects me, I taste a joy however beforehand in the sure foresight of your punishment: for if the Pompeians are so insolent when conquered, how much more they will be so when conquerors, it will be your lot to feel. In a word, this is the sum of my resolution: I can forgive the injuries of my friends, if they themselves are disposed either to forget them, or prepared in conjunction with me to revenge the death of Cæsar. I cannot believe that any ambassadors will come; when they do, I shall know what they have to demand." Hirtius and Cæsar, instead of answering this letter, sent it directly to Cicero at Rome, to make what use of it he thought fit with the senate or the people.

In this interval Lepidus wrote a public letter to the senate, to exhort them to measures of peace and to save the effusion of civil blood, by contriving some way of reconciling Antony and his friends to the service of their country, without giving the least intimation of his thanks for the public honours which they had lately decreed to him. This was not at all agreeable to the senate, and confirmed their former jealousy of his disaffection to the republic and good understanding with Antony. They agreed, however, to a vote proposed by Servilius, "that Lepidus should be thanked for his love of peace and care of the citizens, yet should be desired not to trouble himself any further about it, but to leave that affair to them, who thought that there could be no peace unless Antony should lay down his arms and sue for it." This letter gave Antony's friends a fresh handle to renew their instances for a treaty, for the sake of obliging Lepidus, who had it in his power, they said, to force them to it; which put Cicero once more to the trouble of confuting and exposing all their arguments. He told them, "that he was ever afraid from the first lest an insidious offer of peace should damp the common zeal for the recovery of their liberty. That whoever delighted in discord, and the blood of citizens, ought to be expelled from the society of human-kind; yet it was to be considered whether there were not some wars wholly inexpiable, where no peace could be made, and where a treaty of peace was but a stipulation of slavery^m. That the war now on foot was of this sort, undertaken against a set of men who were natural enemies to society, whose only pleasure it was to oppress, plunder, and murder their fellow-creatures,—and to restore such to the city was to destroy the city itselfⁿ. That they ought to remember what decrees they had already made against them, such as had never been made against a foreign enemy or any with whom there could be peace. That since wisdom as well as fortitude was expected from men of their rank, though these indeed could hardly be separated, yet he was willing to consider them separately and follow what wisdom the more cautious and guarded of the two prescribed. If wisdom then (says he) should command me to hold nothing so dear as life, to decree nothing at the hazard of my head, to avoid all danger, though slavery was sure to be the consequence, I would reject that wisdom be it ever so learned; but if it teaches us to preserve our lives, our fortunes, our families, yet so as to think them inferior to liberty, to wish to enjoy them no longer than we can do it in a free republic, not to part with our liberty for them, but to throw them all away for liberty, as exposing us only to greater mischief without it, I would then listen to her voice and obey her as a god^o. That no man had a greater respect for Lepidus than himself; and though there had been an old friendship between them, yet he valued him not so much for that as his services to the public, in prevailing with young Pompey to lay down his arms and free his country from the misery of a cruel war. That the republic had many pledges of fidelity from Lepidus,—his great nobility, great honours, high priesthood; many parts of the city adorned by him and his ancestors; his wife, children, great fortunes, pure from any taint of civil blood; no citizen ever hurt, many preserved by him,—that such a man might err in judgment, but could never wilfully be an enemy to his country. That his desire of peace was laudable if he could make such a peace for them now as when he restored Pompey to them. That for this they had decreed him greater honours than had been given before to any man,—a statue with a splendid inscription, and a triumph even in absence^p. That by good fortune they had managed matters so that Pompey's return might consist with the validity of Caesar's acts, which for the sake of peace they had confirmed; since they had decreed to Pompey the five millions and half which was raised by the sale of his estates, to enable him to buy them again. He desired that the task of replacing him in the possessions of his ancestors might be committed to him for his old friendship with his father. That it should be his first care to nominate him an augur, and repay the same favour to the son which he himself received from the father^q. That those who had seen him lately at Marseilles brought word that he was ready to come with his troops to the relief of Modena, but that he was afraid of giving offence to the fathers; which showed him to be the true son of that father who used to act with as much prudence as courage. That it was Lepidus's business to take care not to be thought to act with more arrogance than became him: that if he meant to frighten them with his army, he should remember that it was the army of the senate and people of Rome, not his own^r. That if he interposed his authority without arms, that was indeed the more laudable, but would hardly be thought necessary. For though his authority was as great with them as that of the noblest citizen ought to be, yet the senate was not unmindful of their own dignity; and there never was a graver, firmer, stouter senate than the present. That they were all so incensed against the enemies of their liberty, that no man's authority could repress their ardour or extort their arms from them. That they hoped the best, but would rather suffer the worst than live slaves^s. That there was no danger to be apprehended from Lepidus, since he could not enjoy the splendour of his own fortunes but with the safety of all honest men. That nature first makes men honest, but fortune confirms them; for though it was the common interest of all to promote the safety of the public, yet it was more particularly of those who were happy in their fortunes. That nobody was more so than Lepidus, and nobody therefore better disposed; of which the people saw a remarkable instance, in the concern which he expressed when Antony offered a diadem to Cæsar and chose to be his slave rather than his colleague for which single act, if he had been guilty of nothing else, he had richly deserved the worst punishment^t. Then after inveighing, as usual against Antony through several pages, he declared all thoughts of peace with him to be vain, and gave a fresh proof of it produced his last letter to Hirtius and Octavius, and read it publicly to the assembly. "Not that he thought it worth reading he says, "but to let them see his traitorous views openly avowed and confessed by himself." I read it to them paragraph by paragraph, with my own comment and remarks upon it; rallying along, with great wit and spirit, "the rage, extravagance, the inconsistency, the folly, and the inaccuracy of each sentence." On the whole, he says, "that if Lepidus had seen it he would never have advised or thought any peace with him possible. That fire and water would sooner unite than the Antonys be reconciled to the republic. That the first and best thing therefore was to conquer,—the second to decline no danger for the liberty of their country; that there was no third thing,—but the last and worst of all, to submit the utmost baseness through a desire of living. For which reasons he declared his concurrence with Servilius in the vote upon Lepidus's letter and proposed an additional decree, either to be joined to the other or published separately, "That Pompey the Great, the son of Cnæus, in offer his service and his troops to the senate and people of Rome, had acted agreeably to the courage and zeal of his father and ancestors, and to his virtues, industry, and good disposition to the public; and that the thing was grateful and acceptable to the senate and people, and would hereafter be an honour to himself."

^m Phil. xiii. 1.ⁿ Ibid. 2.^o Ibid. 3.^p Ibid. 4.^q Ibid. 5.^r Phil. xiii. 6.^s Ibid. 7.^t Ibid. 8.

After the debate, which ended as Cicero wished, he sent the following short letter to Lepidus, which, by the coldness and negligence with which it is drawn, seems to be designed to let Lepidus see that they were perfectly easy and secure at Rome, whatever measures he might think fit to take.

Cicero to Lepidus.

"While, out of the great respect which I bear to you, I am making it my particular care to advance your dignity as much as possible, it was a concern to me to see that you did not think it worth while to return your thanks to the senate for the extraordinary honours which they have lately conferred upon you. I rejoice, however, that you are so desirous of making peace among citizens. If you can separate that peace from slavery, you will consult both the good of the republic and your own dignity; but if the effect of it be to restore a desperate man to an arbitrary dominion, I would have you to know that all men of sense have taken a resolution to prefer death to servitude. You will act more wisely, therefore, in my judgment, if you meddle no farther with that affair of peace,—which is not agreeable either to the senate or the people, or to any honest man: but you will hear enough of this from others or be informed of it by letters, and will be directed by your own prudence what is the best for you to do."

Plancus too, who commanded in Gaul, and now resided near Lyons, at the head of a brave army, enforced Lepidus's advice by a letter likewise to the senate on the same subject of peace,—to which Cicero wrote the following answer:—

Cicero to Plancus.

"The account which our friend Furnius brought of your affection to the republic was highly agreeable both to the senate and people of Rome; but your letter, when read in the senate, did not seem to agree with Furnius's report: for you advised us to peace, when your colleague, a man of the greatest eminence, was besieged by most infamous plunderers, who ought either to sue for peace by laying down their arms, or if they demand it with sword in hand, it must be procured by victory, not treaty. But in what manner your letters, as well as Lepidus's also, were received, you will understand from that excellent man your brother, and from Furnius," &c."

C. Antony, whom we mentioned above to have retreated with seven cohorts to Apollonia, not daring to wait for Brutus's arrival, who was now advancing towards him, marched out to Buthrotum to seek his fortune elsewhere, in quarters more secure and remote: but being overtaken and attacked on his march by a part of Brutus's army, he lost three of his cohorts in the action,—and in a second engagement with another body of troops, which young Cicero commanded, was entirely routed and taken prisoner; which made Brutus absolute master of the country without any farther opposition*. This fresh success gave occasion for a second letter from Brutus to the senate, of which Cicero makes the following mention: "Your letter," says he, "which was read in the senate, shows the counsel of the general, the virtue of your soldiers, the industry of your officers, and in particular of my Cicero. If your friends had been willing to move the senate upon it, and if it had not fallen into most turbulent times, since the departure of Pansa, some just and proper honour would have been decreed for it to the gods."

The taking C. Antony prisoner put Brutus under some difficulty in what manner he should treat him. If he set him at liberty, to which he was inclined, he had reason to apprehend fresh trouble from him, both to himself and the republic; if he kept him prisoner in his camp, he was afraid lest some sedition might be raised, on his account and by his intrigues, in his own army, or if he put him to death that it would be thought an act of cruelty, which his nature abhorred. He consulted Cicero, therefore, upon it by letter. "C. Antony," says he, "is still with me; but in truth I am moved with the prayers of the man, and afraid lest the madness of some should make him the occasion of mischief to me. I am wholly at a loss what to do with him. If I knew your mind I should be at ease; for I should think that the best which you advised." Cicero's advice was to keep him under a safe guard till they knew the fate of D. Brutus in Modena.^b Brutus, however, treated him with great lenity, and seemed much disposed to give him his liberty; for which purpose he not only wrote to the senate about it himself, but permitted Antony to write too, and with the style of proconsul, which surprised and shocked all his friends at Rome, and especially Cicero, who expostulates with him for it in the following terms:—

"On the thirteenth of April (says he) your messenger Pilas brought us two letters, the one in your name the other in Antony's, and gave them to Servilius the tribune, he to Cornutus the praetor. They were read in the senate. Antony proconsul raised as much wonder as if it had been Dolabella emperor, from whom also there came an express, but nobody, like your Pilas, was so hardy as to produce the letters or deliver them to the magistrates. Your letter was read; short indeed, but extremely mild towards Antony: the senate was amazed at it. For my part I did not know how to act. Should I affirm it to be forged? What if you should own it? Should I admit it to be genuine? that was not for your honour. I chose therefore to be silent that day. On the next, when the affair had made some noise, and Pilus's carriage had given offence, I began the debate, said much of proconsul Antony; Sextius performed his part, and observed to me afterwards in private what danger his son and mine would be liable to

* Tue littere, quae in senatu recitatae sunt, et Imperatoris consilium et militum virtutem, et industriam tuorum, in quibus Ciceronis mihi declarant. Quod si tuis placuisse de his litteris referri, et nisi in tempus turbulentissimum post discessum Pansae incidissent, honores quoque justus ac debitis diis immortalibus decretus esset.
—Ad Brut. li. 7.

^a Antonius adhuc est nobiscum: sed medius fidius et moveat hominis precibus, et timeo ne illum aliquorum furor exiciat. Plane scito. Quod si scirem quid tibi placeret, rine sollicitudine essem. Id enim optimum esse persuasum esset mihi.—Ad Brut. li. 8.

^b Quod me de Antonio consulis; quoad Brutus exitum cognovimus, custodiendum puto.—Ibid. 4.

* Ep. Fam. i. 27.

* Ibid. 6.

* Hist. in Brut.

if they had really taken up arms against a proconsul. You know the man; he did justice to the cause. Others also spoke; but our friend Laeoe took notice that your seal was not put to the letter, nor any date added, nor had you written about it, as usual, to your friends,—from which he maintained the letter to be forged; and, in short, convinced the house of it. It is now your part, Brutus, to consider the whole state and nature of the war: you are delighted, I perceive, with lenity, and think it the best way of proceeding. This indeed is generally right, but the proper place of clemency is in cases and seasons very different from the present: for what are we doing now, Brutus? we see a needy and desperate crew threatening the very temples of the gods, and that the war must necessarily decide whether we are to live or not. Who is it then whom we are sparing, or what is it that we mean? Are we consulting the safety of those who, if they get the better, are sure not to leave the least remains of us? For what difference is there between Dolabella and any one of the three Antonys! If we spare any of these, we have been too severe to Dolabella. It was owing chiefly to my advice and authority that the senate and people are in this way of thinking, though the thing itself indeed also obliged them to it. If you do not approve this policy I shall defend your opinion, but cannot depart from my own: the world expects from you nothing either remiss or cruel. It is easy to moderate the matter by severity to the leaders, generosity to the soldiers.”^c

Cicero had now done everything that human prudence could do, towards the recovery of the republic; for all that vigour with which it was making this last effort for itself was entirely owing to his counsels and authority. As Antony was the most immediate and desperate enemy who threatened it, so he had armed against him the whole strength of Italy, and raised up a force sufficient to oppress him. Young Octavius, next to Antony, was the most formidable to the friends of liberty; but from the contrast of their personal interests, and their jealousy of each other's views, Cicero managed the opportunity to employ the one to the ruin of the other; yet so as to provide at the same time against any present danger from Octavius, by throwing a superiority of power into the hands of the consuls, whom, from being the late ministers of Caesar's tyranny, he had gained over to the interests of liberty. But besides the difficulties which he had to struggle with at home, in bringing matters to this point, he had greater discouragements abroad, from the commanders of the several provinces: they were all promoted to those governments by Caesar, the proper creatures of his power, and the abettors of his tyranny^d, and were now full of hopes, either of advancing themselves to dominion, or to a share of it at least, by espousing the cause of some more powerful pretender. Men of this turn, at the head of great and veteran armies, could not easily be persuaded to submit to a senate which they had been taught to despise, or to reduce the military power, which had long governed all, to a dependence on the civil. Yet Cicero omitted no pains of exhorting them by letters, and inviting them by honours, to prefer the glory of saving their country to all other views whatsoever. Those whom he most distrusted, and for that reason most particularly pressed, were Lepidus, Pollio, and Plancus, who, by the strength of their armies, and their possession of Gaul and Spain, were the best qualified to serve or distress the republican cause. He had little hopes of the two first, yet managed them so well, by representing the strength of the honest party, the unanimity of the senate, of the consuls, and all Italy, that he forced them at least to dissemble their disaffection, and make great professions of their duty; and above all, to stand neuter till the affairs of Italy were decided, on which the fate of the republic seemed chiefly to depend. Nay, he seems to have drawn Plancus entirely into his measures—as appears from his account of him to Brutus^e, and from Plancus's own letters, in which he gives the strongest assurances of his fidelity, and offers to lead his troops to the relief of Modena, and was actually upon his march towards it, when he heard upon the road of Antony's defeat.—Not long before which, Cicero sent him the following letter

Cicero to Plancus.

“Though I understood, from the account of our friend Furnius, what your design and resolution was, with regard to the republic, yet, after reading your letters, I was able to form a clearer judgment of your whole purpose. Wherefore, though the fate of the commonwealth depends wholly on one battle, which will be decided, I believe, when you are reading this letter, yet you have acquired great applause by the very fame, which was everywhere spread, of your good intentions; and if there had been a consul at Rome, the senate, by decreeing some considerable honour to you, would have declared how acceptable your endeavours and preparations were. But that time is not only not yet past, but was not in my judgment even ripe; for after all, that alone passes with me for honour which is conferred on great men, not for the hopes of future, but the experience of past services. If, then, there be any republic in which honour can have its proper lustre, take my word for it, you shall have your share of the greatest; though that which can truly be called honour is not an invitation to a temporary, but the reward of an habitual virtue. Wherefore, my dear Plancus, turn your whole thoughts towards glory—help your country—fly to the relief of your colleague—support this wonderful consent and concurrence of all nations: you will ever find me the promoter of your counsels, the favourer of your dignity, and on all occasions most friendly and faithful to you: for to all the other motives of our union, our mutual affection, good offices, old acquaintance, the love of our country, which is now added, makes me prefer your life to my own.—Mar. 29th^f.”

Plancus in the mean time sent a second letter to the senate, to assure them of his zeal and resolution to adhere to them, and to acquaint them with the steps which he had already taken for their service; upon which they decreed him some extraordinary honours, at the motion of Cicero, who sent him the following account of it.

^c Planci animus in republicam egregium, legiones, auxilia, copias ex literis ejus, quarum exemplum tibi missum arbitror, perspicere potuisti.—Ad Brut. li. 2.

^f Ep. Fam. x. 10.

^c Ad Brut. li. 7.

^d Vides tyranni satellites in imperiis: vides ejusdem exercitus in latere veteranos.—Ad Att. xiv. 5.

Cicero to Plancus.

"Though, out of regard to the republic, my greatest joy ought to be for your bringing such relief and help to it, in a time almost of extremity, yet may I so embrace you after victory and the recovery of our liberty, as it is your dignity that gives me the chief part of my pleasure, which already is, and ever will be, I perceive, as great as possible. For I would not have you think that any letters were ever read in the senate of greater weight than yours, both for the eminent merit of your services, and the gravity of your words and sentiments, which was not at all new to me, who was so well acquainted with you, and remembered the promises of your letters to me, and understood the whole purpose of your counsels from our Furnia; but they appeared greater to the senate than was expected; not that they ever had any doubt of your inclinations, but did not fully understand how much you were able to do, or how far you would expose yourself in the cause. When M. Varisidius, therefore, brought me your letters very early, on the 7th of April, I was transported with joy upon reading them; and as a great multitude of excellent citizens were then waiting to attend my going abroad, I instantly gave them all a part of my pleasure. In the mean while our friend Munatius, according to custom, came to join me: I presently showed him your letter, of which he knew nothing before; for Varisidius came first to me, as you, he said, had ordered him: soon after, the same Munatius returned to me with the other two letters; that which you had sent to him, and that to the senate: we resolved to carry the last directly to the prætor, Cornutus, who, by the custom of our ancestors, supplies the place of the consuls in their absence. The senate was immediately called; and, upon the fame and expectation of your letters, made up a full house. After they were read, a scruple of religion was objected to Cornutus, from the report of the guardians of the chickens, that he had not duly consulted the auspices, which was confirmed likewise by our college; so that the affair was adjourned to the next day. On that day I had a great contest about your dignity with Servilius, who procured by his interest to have his opinion declared the first; but the senate left him, and all went the contrary way: but when they were coming into my opinion, which was delivered the second, the tribune Titius, at his request, interposed his negative; and so the debate was put off again to the day following. Servilius came prepared to support his opposition, though against Jupiter himself, in whose temple the thing passed. In what manner I handled him, and what a struggle I had to throw off Titius's negative, I would have you learn rather from other people's letters: take this, however, from mine, that the senate could not possibly act with more gravity, firmness, and regard to your honour, than it did on this occasion; nor is the senate more friendly to you than the whole city; for the body of the people, and all ranks and orders of men, are wonderfully united in the defence of the republic. Go on, therefore, as you have begun, and recommend your name to immortality; and for all these things, which, from the vain badges of outward splendour, carry a show of glory, despise them; look upon them as trifling, transitory, perishing. True honour is placed singly in virtue, which is illustrated with most advantage by great services to our country. You have the best opportunity for this in the world; which, since you have embraced, persevere, and go through with it, that the republic may not owe less to you than you to the republic. You will find me not only the favourer, but the advancer of your dignity: this I take myself to owe, both to the republic, which is dearer to me than my life, and to our friendship, &c.—April the eleventh^s."

Plancus answered him, not long after, to the following effect.

Plancus to Cicero.

"It is a pleasure to me to reflect that I have never promised anything rashly of myself to you; nor you, for me to others. In this you have the clearer proof of my love, that I desire to make you acquainted with my designs before any man else. You already see, I hope, that my services to the public will grow greater every day: I promise that you shall soon be convinced of it. As for me, my dear Cicero, may the republic be so delivered by my help from its present dangers, as I esteem your honours and rewards equal to an immortality; yet were I still without them, I would remit nothing of my present zeal and perseverance. If, in the multitude of excellent citizens, I do not distinguish myself by a singular vigour and industry, I desire no accession to my dignity from your favour; but, in truth, I desire nothing at all for myself at present; nay, am even against it, and willingly make you the arbiter both of the time and the thing itself: a citizen can think nothing late or little, which is given by his country. I passed the Rhone with my army by great journeys, on the 26th of April; sent a thousand horse before me by a shorter way from Vienna. As for myself, if I am not hindered by Lepidus, none shall complain of my want of expedition. If he opposes me on my road, I shall take my measures from the occasion. The troops, which I bring are, for number, kind, and fidelity, extremely firm. I beg the continuance of your affection, as long as you find yourself assured of mine. Adieu^h."

Pollio likewise, who now commanded the farther Spain, with three good legions, though he was Antony's particular friend, yet made the strongest professions to Cicero of his resolution to defend the republic against all invaders. In one of his letters, after excusing himself for not having written earlier and oftener, he says: "Both my nature and studies draw me to the desire of peace and liberty; for which reason I always lamented the occasion of the late war: but as it was not possible for me to be of no party, because I had great enemies everywhere, I ran from that camp where I could not be safe from the treachery of an enemy, and being driven whither I least desired, freely exposed myself to dangers, that I might not make a contemptible figure among those of my rank. As for Cæsar himself, I loved him with the utmost piety and fidelity, because he treated me on the foot of his oldest friends, though known to him only in the height of his fortunes. When I was at liberty to act after my own mind, I acted so that the best men should most applaud me: what I was commanded to do, I did so as to show that it was done by command, and not by inclination. The unjust odium which I suffered on that account has sufficiently convinced me how sweet a thing liberty is, and how wretched is life under the dominion of another. If the contest then be, to bring us all again under the power of one : whoever that one be, I profess myself his enemy ; nor is there any danger which I would decline, or wish to avoid, for the sake of liberty. But the consuls have not, either by decree or letters, given me any orders what to do. I have had but one letter from Pansa since the ides of March, in which he exhorts me to signify to the senate that I and my army would be in their power ; but when Lepidus was declaring openly to his army, and writing to everybody, that he was in the same sentiments with Antony, that step would have been wholly absurd and improper for me ; for how could I get forage for my troops against his will, in marching through his province ? or if I had surmounted all other difficulties, could I fly over the Alps, which were possessed by his garrisons ? Nobody will deny that I declared publicly to my soldiers, at Corduba, that I would not deliver the province to any man, unless he were commissioned by the senate. — Wherefore you are to look upon me as one, who, in the first place, am extremely desirous of peace, and the safety of all the citizens ; in the second, prepared to assert my own and my country's liberty. I am more pleased than you can imagine that my friend Gallus is so dear to you : I envy him for walking and joking with you : you will ask, perhaps, at what rate I value that privilege : you shall know by experience, if ever it be in our power to live in quiet ; for I will never stir one step from you. I am surprised that you never signified in your letters how I should be able to do the most service, by staying in the province, or bringing my army into Italy. For my part, though to stay be more safe, and less troublesome, yet, since I see, that in such a time as this there is more want of legions than of provinces, which may easily be recovered, I am resolved, as things now stand, to come away with my army. — From Corduba, the fifteenth of March¹.

^s Ep. Fam. x. 12.^h Ep. Fam. x. 9.

There are several letters, also still extant, written at this time from Cicero to Cornificius, who governed Africa, exhorting him in the same manner to firmness in the defence of the republic, and to guard his province from all invaders who should attempt to extort it from him ; and this man, after all, was the only commander who kept his word with him, and performed his part to his country, and lost his life at last in maintaining that province in its allegiance to the republic².

P. Servilius, who has often been mentioned in the debates of the senate, was a person of great rank and nobility ; had been consul with J. Cæsar, in the beginning of the civil war ; the son of that Servilius, who, by his conquests near mount Taurus, obtained the surname of Isauricus. He affected the character of a patriot ; but having had a particular friendship with Antony, was much courted by that party, who took the advantage of his vanity, to set him up as a rival to Cicero in the management of public affairs, in which he frequently obstructed Cicero's measures, and took a pride to thwart and disappoint whatever he proposed : Cicero had long suffered this with patience, out of regard to the public service, till, provoked by his late opposition in the affair of Plancus, he could not forbear treating him with an unusual severity and resentment, of which he gives an account in a letter to Brutus.

Cicero to Brutus.

"From Plancus's letters, of which a copy, I imagine, has been sent to you, you will perceive his excellent disposition towards the republic, with the condition of his legions, auxiliaries, and whole forces. Your own people have informed you, I guess, by this time, of the levity, inconstancy, and perpetual disaffection of your friend Lepidus ; who, next to his own brother, hates you, his near relations, the most. We are anxious with an expectation which is now reduced to the last crisis ; all our hopes are fixed on the delivery of D. Brutus ; for whom we have been in great apprehension. For my part, I have business enough on my hands at home with the madman Servilius, whom I have endured longer than became my dignity ; but I did it for the sake of the republic, lest I should give the disaffected a leader not well affected indeed himself, yet noble to resort to, which nevertheless they still do. But I was not for alienating him wholly from the republic ; I have now put an end to my forbearance of him, for he began to be so insolent that he looked upon no man as free. But in Plancus's debate he was strangely mortified ; and after two days' contest was so roughly handled by me, that he will be the modester, I dare say, for the future. In the midst of our contention on the nineteenth of April, I had letters delivered to me in the senate from our friend Lentulus in Asia, with an account of Cassius, the legions, and Syria, which when I read presently in public, Servilius sunk, and many more besides ; for there are some of eminent rank who think most wickedly : but Servilius was most sensibly chagrined, for the senate's agreeing to my motion about Plancus. The part which he acts is monstrous !"

The news which is mentioned in this letter to have been sent by Lentulus, of Cassius' success, was soon after confirmed by particular letters to Cicero, from Brutus and Cassius themselves ; signifying, "that Cassius had possessed himself of Syria before Dolabella had arrived there : that the generals, L. Marcus and Q. Crispus had given up their armies to him : that a separate legion under Cælius Bassus had submitted to him against the will of their leader : that four other legions, sent by Cleopatra from Egypt, to the assistance of Dolabella, under his lieutenant Allienus, had all declared for him :"³ and lest the first letter should miscarry, as they often did, from such a distance, by passing through the enemy's quarters, Cassius sent him a second, with a more full and distinct account of all particulars.

Cassius, Proconsul, to his friend M. Cicero.

"If you are in health, it is a pleasure to me ; I am also very well. I have read your letter in which I perceived your wonderful affection for me ; for you not only wish me well, which indeed you have always done, both for my own sake and the republic's, but entertain an uncommon concern and solicitude for me. Wherefore, as I imagined, in the first place, that you would think it impossible for me to sit still and see the republic oppressed; and in the second, that whenever you supposed me to be in action, you would be solicitous about my safety and success; so, as soon as I was master of the legions which Allienus brought from Egypt, I immediately wrote to you, and sent several expresses to Rome: I wrote letters also to the senate, but forbade the delivery of them till they had been first shown to you. If these letters have not reached you, I make no doubt but that Dolabella, who, by the wicked murder of Trebonius, is master of Asia, has seized my messengers and intercepted them. I have all the armies which were in Syria under my command; and having been forced to sit still awhile, till I had discharged my promises to them, am now ready to take the field. I beg of you to take my honour and interests under your especial care: for you know that I have never refused any danger or labour for the service of my country: that by your advice and authority I took arms against these infamous robbers: that I have not only raised armies for the defence of the republic and our liberty, but have snatched them from the hands of the most cruel tyrants; which if Dolabella had seized before me, he would have given fresh spirit to Antony's cause, not only by the approach, but by the very fame and expectation of his troops: for which reasons take my soldiers, I beseech you, under your protection, if you think them to have deserved well of the state; and let none of them have reason to repent that they have preferred the cause of the republic to the hopes of plunder and rapine. Take care, also, as far as it is in your power, that due honour be paid to the emperors Marcus and Crispus: for Bassus was miserably unwilling to deliver up his legion; and if his soldiers had not sent a deputation to me in spite of him, would have held out Apamea against me, till it could be taken by force. I beg this of you, not only for the sake of the republic, which of all things was ever the dearest to you, but of our friendship also, which I am confident has a great weight with you. Take my word for it, the army which I have in the senate's, and every honest man's, and above all, yours: for by bearing perpetually of your good disposition, they have conceived a wonderful affection for you; and when they come to understand that you make their interests your special care, they will think themselves indebted to you for everything. Since I wrote this, I have heard that Dolabella is come into Cilicia with all his forces: I will follow him thither, and take care that you shall soon be informed of what I have done. I wish only that my success may be answerable to my good intentions. Continue the care of your health and your love to me."

¹ Ep. Fam. x. 31.

² Ep. Fam. xii. 24, &c. ; App. iv. 621 : Dio, xlviii. 307.

³ Ad Brut. ii. 2.

Brutus, who had sent this good news before to Cicero, as well as to his mother and sister Tertia, charged the latter not to make it public till they had first consulted Cicero, whether it was proper to do so or not^a. He was afraid lest the great prosperity of Cassius might give umbrage to the Cæsarian party, and raise a jealousy in the leaders who were acting against Antony, that the republican interest would grow too strong for them. But Cicero sent him word, that the news was already known at Rome before his letters arrived; and though there was some ground for his apprehensions, yet on the whole they thought it more advisable to publish than to suppress it^b.

Thus Cicero, as he declared to the senate by his letters, expresses, and exhortations, was perpetually exciting all who had power or command in any part of the empire, to the common defence of their liberty^c; and for his pains, had all the rage and malice of the factious to struggle with at home. These were particularly troublesome to him at this time, by spreading false reports every day from Modena, of Antony's success, or what was more to be apprehended, of his union with the consuls against D. Brutus; which raised such a terror through the city, that all honest men were preparing to run away to Brutus or Cassius^d. Cicero however was not disheartened at it, but in the general consternation appeared cheerful and easy; and, as he sends word to Brutus, had a perfect confidence in the consuls, while the majority of his friends distrusted them; and from the number and firmness of their troops, had but little doubt of their victory, if ever they came to a battle with Antony^e. But what touched him more sensibly was a story, kept up for some days with great industry, that he had formed a design to make himself master of the city and declare himself dictator; and would appear publicly with the fasces within a day or two. The report, as groundless as it was, seems to have disturbed him; but when Appuleius, the tribune, one of his warm friends, was taking pains to confute it, and justify him in a speech to the people, they all cried out with one voice, that Cicero had never done, nor designed to do anything, but what was the best and most beneficial to the republic^f: this gave him some comfort; but what brought him much greater was, the certain news of a victory gained over Antony at Modena, which arrived within a few hours after Appuleius's speech^g.

The siege of Modena, which lasted near four months, was one of the most memorable in all antiquity, for the vigour both of the attack and the defence. Antony had invested it so closely and posted himself so advantageously, that no succours

^a Video te veritum esse, id quod verendum fuit, ne animi partium Cæsariæ—vehementer commoverentur. Sed antequam tuas literas accepimus, audita res erat et per vulgata.—Ad Brut. li. 6.

^b Meis litoris, meis nunciis, meis cohortationibus, omnes, qui ubique essent, ad patriæ præsidium excitatos.—Phil. xiv. 7.

^c Triduo vero aut quadriduo—timore quodam pericula civitas tota ad te cum conjugibus et liberis effundebat.—Ad Brut. 3: Ep. Fam. xii. 8.

^d Tristes enim de Bruto nostro literæ, nuncique afferbantur, me quidem non maxime conturbabant. His enim exercitiis, duobusque quos habemus, nullo modo poteram diffidere. Neque assentibar majori parti hominum. Fidem enim consulum non condemnabam, quæ suspecta vehementer erat. Desiderabam nonnullis in rebus prudentem et celeritatem.—Ad Brut. li. 1.

^e Itaque P. Appuleius—doloris mei concionem habuit maximam—in qua, cum me—liberare suspicione fascium vellet; una voce cuncta concio declaravit, nihil esse a me unquam de republica nisi optime cogitatum.—Phil. xiv. 6.

^f Post hanc concionem duabus tribusve horis optatissimi nuntii et literæ venerunt.—Ibid.

^a Ep. Fam. xii. 12; it. ibid. 11.

^b Ego scripsi ad Tertiam sororem et matrem, ne prius ederent hoc, quod optime ac felicissime gessit Cassius, quam tuum consilium cognovissent.—Ad Brut. li. 3.

could be thrown into it; and Brutus, though reduced to the utmost straits, defended it still with the greatest resolution. The old writers have recorded some stratagems which are said to have been put in practice on this occasion: "how Hirtius provided men skilled in diving, with letters written on lead, to pass into the tower under the river which runs through it; till Antony obstructed that passage by nets and straps placed under water; which gave occasion to another contrivance, of sending their intelligence backwards and forwards by pigeons*."

Pansa was now upon the point of joining Hirtius with four legions of new levies, which he brought from Rome; but when he was advanced within a few miles of Hirtius's camp, Antony privately drew out some of his best troops, with design to surprise him on the road before that union, and to draw him, if possible, to an engagement against his will. We have a particular account of the action, in a letter to Cicero from Ser. Galba, one of the conspirators against Caesar, who bore a principal part and command in it.

Galba to Cicero.

"On the fifteenth of April, the day on which Pansa was to arrive in Hirtius's camp, (in whose company I was, for I went a hundred miles to meet him, on purpose to hasten his march) Antony drew out two of his legions, the second and thirty-fifth, and two prætorian cohorts; the one his own, the other Silanus's, with part of the Evocati, and came forward towards us, imagining that we had nothing but four legions of new levies. But in the night, to secure our march to the camp, Hirtius had sent us the Martial legion which I used to command, and two prætorian cohorts. As soon as Antony's horse appeared in sight, neither the Martial legion nor the prætorian cohorts could be restrained from attacking them; so that when we could not hold them in, we were obliged to follow them against our wills. Antony kept his forces within Castel-Franco†; and being unwilling to have it known that he had his legions with him, showed only his horse and light-armed foot. When Pansa saw the Martial legion running forward against his orders, he commanded two of the new-raised legions to follow him. As soon as we got through the straits of the morass and the woods, we drew up the twelve cohorts in order of battle. The other two legions were not yet come up. Antony immediately brought all his troops out of the village ranged likewise in order of battle, and without delay engaged us. At first they fought so briskly on both sides, that nothing could possibly be fiercer: though the right wing, in which I was, with eight cohorts of the Martial legion, put Antony's thirty-fifth legion to flight at the first onset, and pursued it above five hundred paces from the place where the action began: wherefore observing the enemy's horse attempting to surround our wing, I began to retreat, and ordered the light-armed troops to make head against the Moorish horse, and prevent their coming upon us behind. In the meanwhile I perceived myself in the midst of Antony's men, and Antony himself but a little way behind me: upon which, with my shield thrown over my shoulder, I pushed on my horse with all speed towards the new legion that was coming towards us from the camp: and whilst Antony's men were pursuing me, and ours by mistake throwing javelins at me, I was preserved, I know not how, by being presently known to our soldiers. Caesar's prætorian cohort sustained the fight a long time on the Æmilian road: but our left wing, which was the weaker, consisting of two cohorts of the Martial legion, and the prætorian of Hirtius, began to give ground, being surrounded by Antony's horse, in which he is very strong. When all our ranks had made good their retreat, I retreated myself the last to our camp. Antony, as the conqueror, fancied that he could take it; but upon trial lost many of his men in the attempt, without being able to do us any hurt. Hirtius in the mean time, hearing of the engagement, marched out with twenty veteran cohorts, and meeting Antony on his return, entirely routed and put to flight his whole army, in the very same place where they had fought before at Castel-Franco. About ten at night Antony regained his camp at Modena, with all his horse. Hirtius retired to that camp which Pansa had quitted in the morning, and where he left the two legions which Antony attacked. Thus Antony has lost the greater part of his veteran troops, yet not without some loss of our prætorian cohorts and the Martial legion: we took two of Antony's eagles and sixty standards, and have gained a considerable advantage."

Besides this letter from Galba, there came letters also severally, from the two consuls and Octavius, confirming the other account, with the addition of some farther particulars: that Pansa, fighting bravely at the head of his troops, had received two dangerous wounds, and was carried off the field to Bologna: that Hirtius had scarce lost a single man: and that to animate his soldiers the better, he took up the eagle of the fourth legion and carried it forward himself: that Caesar was left to the guard of their camp; where he was attacked likewise by another body of the enemy, whom he repulsed with great loss*. Antony reproached him afterwards with running away from this engagement in such a fright, that he did not appear again till two days after, and without his horse or general's habit: but the account just mentioned was given by Cicero from letters that were read to the senate, in which Hirtius declared him to have acted with the greatest courage^b.

* Ep. Fam. x. 30.

^a Cum—ipse in primis Pansa pugnaret, duobus periculis vulneribus acceptis, sublatu e prælio.—Phil. xiv. 9.

Hirtius ipse, aquilam quartæ legionis cum inferret, qua nullius pulchriorem speciem imperatoris accepimus, cum tribus Antoni legionibus, equitatuque confligit.—Ibid. 10.

Caesar—adulescens maximæ animi, ut verissime scribit Hirtius, castra multarum legionum paucis cohortibus tutatus est, secundumque prælium fecit.—Ibid.; Appian. iii. 571.

^b Priore prælio Antonius eum fugisse scribit, ac sine paludamento equoque post biduum demum apparuisse.—Suet. in Aug. 10.

* Frontin. De Stratagem. iii. 13; Plin. Hist. Nat. x. 37. Dio, p. 315.

* The evocati were a choice body of veteran soldiers, who, after their dismissal from service, being yet vigorous and fit for war, were invited to it again, as a sort of volunteers, by the consul or general, and distinguished from the rest by peculiar privileges.

† Ad Forum Gallorum: now called Castel-Franco, a small village on the Æmilian-way between Modena and Bologna.—Cluver. Ital. Ant. i. c. 28.

The news reached Rome on the twentieth of April, where it raised an incredible joy; and the greater, we may imagine, for the late terrors which they had suffered from contrary reports. The whole body of the people assembled presently about Cicero's house, and carried him in a kind of triumph to the capitol, whence, on their return, they placed him in the rostra to give them an account of the victory; and then conducted him home with infinite acclamations: so that in a letter upon it to Brutus, he says, that he reaped on that day the full fruit of all his toils, if there be any fruit in true and solid glory^c.

The day following the senate was summoned by M. Cornutus, the prætor, to deliberate on the letters of the consuls and Octavius. Servilius's opinion was, "that the city should now quit the sagum, and take the common gown again; and that a public thanksgiving should be decreed jointly in the honour of the consuls and Octavius. Cicero spoke next, and declared strongly against quitting the sagum, till D. Brutus was first delivered from the siege; that it would be ridiculous to put it off, if they should see him in safety, for whose sake they had put it on; that the motion for quitting it proceeded from envy to D. Brutus: to deprive him of the glory that it would be to his name, to have it reserved to posterity that the people of Rome should put on the sagum for the danger, and resumed the gown for the preservation of one citizen. He urged them therefore to continue in their former way, of thinking the whole danger and stress of war to depend on D. Brutus, and though there was reason to hope that he was already safe, or would shortly be so, yet they should reserve the hope of that hope to fact and the event, lest they might be found too hasty in snatching the favour of the gods, or foolish in condemning the power of fortune^d." Then as to the decree of the thanksgiving, he urges Servilius with omitting two things, which ought necessarily to have accompanied it: the giving Antony the title of enemy, to his own generals, of emperors. "The swords of our soldiers are dyed," says he, "or rather stained only as yet, with blood; if it was the blood of enemies, it was an act of the utmost piety: citizens, the most detestable wickedness; how then shall he, who has outdone all enemies, go without the name of enemy? He is now waging an inexorable war with four consuls, the senate and people of Rome; denounces, and execrates, devastation, the rack and tortures to us confesses that Dolabella's horrid act, which barbarians would own, was done by his advice: what he would have done to this city, by the calamity of the people of Parma; honest and valiant men, firm to the interests of the senate and people, whom L. Antony, the portent and disaster of his species, put to death by all the methods of cruelty^e." That Hannibal was never so barbarous to any city, as Antony to Parma. He conjures them to remember how much they had all been obliged for two days past by villanous reports spread about the city, and were expecting either a wretched death or lamentable flight, and could they scruple to call those men enemies, from whom they feared such dreadful things? He then proposed to enlarge the number of days of the thanksgiving, since it was not to be decreed to one, but to three generals jointly; to whom, in the first place, he would give the title of emperors, since there had not been a supplication decreed without it for twenty years past, so that Servilius should not either have decreed it at all, or allowed the usual honour to those, to whom even new and unusual honours were due^f. That if, according to the present custom, the title of emperor was commonly given for killing a thousand or two of Spaniards, Gauls, or Thracians, how could they refuse it now when so many legions were routed, and such a multitude slain? for with what honours, (says he) and congratulations, should our deliverers themselves be received into this temple, when yesterday, on the account of what they have done, the people of Rome carried me into the capitol in a kind of triumph? for that, after all, is a just and real triumph, when, by the general voice of the city, a public testimony is given to those who have deserved well of the commonwealth. For if, in the common joy of the whole city, they congratulated me singly, it is a great declaration of their judgment: if they thanked me, still greater: if both, nothing can be imagined more glorious; that he was forced to say so much of himself against his will, by the strange envy and injuries which he had lately suffered: that the insolence of the factious, as they all knew, had raised a report and suspicion upon him, of his aiming at a tyranny, though his whole life had been spent in defending the republic from it; as if he, who had destroyed Catiline for that very crime, was of a sudden become a Catiline himself^g. That if the report had found credit in the city, their design was, by a sudden assault upon his person, as upon a tyrant, to have taken away his life. That the thing itself was manifest, and the whole affair should be laid open in proper time. That he had said all this not to purge himself to them, to whom he should be sorry to want an apology, but to admonish certain persons of jejune and narrow minds, to look upon the virtue of excellent citizens as the object of their imitation, not of their envy, since the republic was a wide field, where the course of glory was open to many^h. That if any man contested with him the first place in the government, he acted foolishly, if he meant to do it by opposing vice to virtue: that as the race was gained by running the fastest, so virtue was only to be conquered by a superior virtue; that they could never get the better of him by bad votes—by good ones perhaps they might—and he himself should be glad of it: that the people of Rome were perpetually inquiring, how men of their rank voted and acted? and formed their judgment of them accordingly. That they all remembered, how in December last he was the author of the first step towards recovering their liberty; how from the 1st of January he had been continually watching over the safety of the commonwealth: how his house and his ears were open day and night to the advices and informations of

^c Cum hæsterno die me ovantem ac prope triumphantem cum Romanis in Capitolium domo tulerit domum reverterit.—Phil. xiv. 5.

^d Quis geldem die magnorum meorum laborum.—fructum æque maximum; si modo est aliqua fructus ex solida reperi gloria, &c.—Ad Brut. 2.

^e Phil. xiv. 1, 2.

^f Ibid. 3.

^g Phil. xiv. 4.

^h Ibid. 5.

ⁱ Ibid. 6.

all who came to him. How his opinion always was, against an embassy to Antony: how he had always voted him an enemy, and their present state, a war, but as oft as he mentioned an enemy or a war, the consuls had always dropped his motion, from the number of those that were proposed¹, which could not however be done in the present case, because he, who had already voted a thanksgiving, had unwarily voted Antony an enemy, since a thanksgiving had never been decreed but against enemies, and never asked or granted in what was properly a civil war: that they should either have denied it, or must of course decree those to be enemies, for whose defeat it was granted." Then after flourishing on the particular merit of the three generals, Pansa, Hirtius, Octavius; and showing how well they had each deserved the name of emperor, he decrees a thanksgiving of fifty days in the name of the three jointly². In the last place, he proceeds to speak of the rewards due to the soldiers, and especially of the honours to be paid to those who had lost their lives in the defence of their country. For these he proposes "a splendid monument to be erected in common to them all, at the public charge, with their names and services inscribed;" and in recommending it, breaks out into a kind of funeral eulogium upon them:—"O happy death," says he, "which when due to nature, was paid to your country! for I cannot but look upon you as born for your country, whose name is even derived from Mars: as if the same god who gave birth to this city, for the good of nations, had given birth also to you, for the good of this city. Death in flight is scandalous: in victory, glorious; wherefore whilst those impious wretches, whom you slew, will suffer the punishment of their parricide in the infernal regions; you, who breathed your last in victory, have obtained the place and seat of the pious. The life given to us by nature is short, but the memory of a life well spent, everlasting. If it were not longer than this life, who would be so mad, at the expense of the greatest pains and dangers, to contend for the prize of glory? Your lot therefore is happy, O you, while you lived, the bravest, now the holiest of soldiers; for the fame of your virtue can never be lost, either by the forgetfulness of those who are now alive, or the silence of those who shall come hereafter; since the senate and people of Rome have raised to you, as it were with their own hands, an immortal monument. There have been many great and famous armies in the Punic, Gallic, Italic wars; yet no such honour was ever done to any of them. I wish that we could still do greater, since you have done the greatest services to us; you drove Antony mad with rage, from the city: you repulsed him, when he attempted to return. A fabric therefore shall be erected of magnificent work, and letters engraved upon it, the eternal witnesses of your divine virtue; nor will those who see or hear of your monument, ever cease talking of you: so that, instead of this frail and mortal condition of life, you have now acquired an immortality³." He then renews their former assurances to the old legions, "of the full and punctual payment of all which had been promised to them, as soon as the war should be over;" and for those, in the mean time, who had lost their lives for their country, he proposes that "the same rewards which would have been given to them if they had lived, should be given immediately to their parents, children, wives or brothers." All which he includes, as usual, in the form of a decree, which was ratified by the senate.

Antony being cruelly mortified by this defeat, kept himself close within his camp, and resolved to hazard nothing farther, but to act only on the defensive; except by harassing the enemy with his horse, in which he was far superior. He still hoped to make himself master of Modena, which was reduced to extremity, and, by the strength of his works, to prevent their throwing any relief into it. Hirtius and Octavius, on the other hand, elate with victory, were determined at all hazards to relieve it: and after two or three days spent in finding the most likely place of breaking through the entrenchments, they made their attack with such vigour, that Antony, rather than suffer the town to be snatched at last out of his hands, chose to draw out his legions, and come to a general battle. The fight was bloody and obstinate, and Antony's men, though obliged to give ground, bravely disputed every inch of it: till D. Brutus, taking the opportunity at the same time to rally out of the town at the head of his garrison, helped greatly to determine and complete the victory. Hirtius pushed his advantage with great spirit, and forced his way into Antony's camp; but when he had gained the middle of it, was unfortunately killed near the general's tent. Pontius Aquila, one of the conspirators, was killed likewise in the same place: but Octavius, who followed to support them, made good their attempt, and kept possession of the camp, with the entire defeat and destruction of Antony's best troops: while Antony himself, with all his horse, fled with great precipitation towards the Alps. Some writers give a different relation of this action, but from the facts and circumstances of it delivered by Cicero, this appears to be the genuine account. The consul Pansa died the day following of his wounds at Bologna⁴.

SECTION XI.

THE entire defeat of Antony's army made all people presently imagine, that the war was at an end, and the liberty of Rome established, which would probably have been the case, if Antony had either perished in the action, or the consuls survived it. But the death of the consuls, though not felt so sensibly at first, in the midst of their joy for the victory, gave the fatal blow to all Cicero's schemes, and was the immediate cause of the ruin of the republic⁵. Hirtius was a man of letters and polite-

¹ Cum alia laudo, et gaudeo accidisse, tum quod Brutus eruptio non solum ipsi salutaris fuit, sed etiam maximo ad victoriam adiumento.—Ad Brut. 4.

² Ibi Hirtium quoque perisse et Pontium Aquilam, &c.—Ep. Fam. x. 33; It. Ep. Fam. xi. 13; Appian. l. 3. p. 372.

³ Hirtium quidem et Pansam.—In consulatu reipublice salutare, alieno sane tempore amissum.—Ep. Fam. xii. 23.

⁴ Pansa amissio, quantum detrimenti reipublica accepit, non te præterit. [Ep. Fam. xi. 9.] Quanto sit in periculo

¹ Phil. xiv. 7.

² Ibid. 8, 9, 10, 11.

³ Ibid. 12.

ness, intimately entrusted with Cæsar's counsels, and employed to write his acts; but as he was the proper creature of Cæsar, and strongly infected with party, so his views were all bent on supporting the power that had raised him, and serving his patron, not the public. In the beginning therefore of the civil war, when he was tribune of the people, he published a law to exclude all who were in arms with Pompey from any employment or office in the state³; which made him particularly obnoxious to the Pompeians, who considered him as their most inveterate enemy. Pansa, whose father had been proscribed by Sylla⁴, was attached with equal zeal to Cæsar, as to the head and reviver of the Marian cause, and served him in all his wars with singular affection and fidelity: he was a grave, sincere, and worthy man; and being naturally more moderate and benevolent than Hirtius, was touched with the ruin of his country, and the miseries of the oppressed Pompeians; many of whom he relieved by his humanity, and restored by his interest to the city and their estates⁵. This made him very popular, and gained him the esteem of all the honest: so that Cassius, in defending his Epicurism to Cicero, alleges Pansa as an example of those genuine Epicureans, who placed their pleasure or chief good in virtuous acts⁶. Before their entrance into the consulship, Quintus Cicero gave a most wretched account of them both: "as of a lewd, luxurious pair, not fit to be trusted with the command of a paltry town, much less of the empire;" and says, that "if they were not removed from the helm, the republic would certainly be lost; since Antony would easily draw them into a partnership of his crimes; for when he served with them in Gaul, he had seen incredible instances of their effeminacy and debauchery, in the face even of the enemy⁷." But we must charge a great part of this character to the peevishness and envy of Quintus: for whatever they had been before, they were certainly good consuls; and out of their affection to Cicero, and regard to his authority, governed themselves generally in all great affairs by his maxims. They were persuaded that the design of revenging Cæsar's death would throw the republic again into convulsions, and sowed no other motive than the ambition of possessing Cæsar's place, and resolved therefore to quell by open force all attempts against the public peace. From their long adherence to Cæsar, they retained indeed some prejudices in favour of that party, and were loath to proceed to extremities, till pacific measures were found ineffectual. This gave Cicero some reason to blame, but never to distrust them; to complain of their respublicam quam potero brevissime exponam. Primum omnium, quantum perturbationem rerum urbanarum affert obitus consulum, &c.—Ep. Fam. x.

³ Neminem Pompeianum qui vivas tenere lego Hirtia dignitatem.—Phil. xiii. 16.

⁴ Dio, l. xlv. 278.

⁵ Pansa, gravis homo et certus.—Ep. Fam. vi. 12.

⁶ Quod multis miseriis levavit, et quod se in his malis hominum prebuit, mirabile eum virorum bonorum benevolentiam prosecuta est.—Ep. Fam. xv. 17.

⁷ Itaque et Pansa, qui hñorñ sequitur, virtutem retinet, &c.—Ibid. 19.

⁸ Quos ego penitus novi libidinum et languoris effeminationum animi plene: qui nisi a gubernaculis recesserint, maximum ab universo naufragio periculum est, &c.—Ep. Fam. xvi. 27.

phlegm and want of vigour, as detrimental to the common cause: yet while they were generally suspected by others, he always thought them sincere, though they did not in all cases act up to his wishes. The event confirmed his judgment of them: for they both not only exposed, but lost their lives with the greatest courage in the defence of the republic; and showed themselves to be the very men which Cicero had constantly affirmed them to be; and though he imputes some little blame to Hirtius, yet of Pansa he declares, "that he wanted neither courage from the first, nor fidelity to the last⁸."

If they had lived to reap the fruits of their victory, their power and authority would have been sufficient to restrain Octavius within the bounds of his duty, and sustain the tottering republic till Brutus and Cassius could arrive to their assistance; and Plancus and D. Brutus unite themselves in the same cause, and give it a firm establishment in their consulship of the next year; all whose armies, together with the African legions, were far superior to any force that could have been brought against them. But the death of the two consuls placed Octavius at once above control, by leaving him the master of both their armies; especially of all the veterans, who were disaffected to D. Brutus, and could not be induced to follow him; and it fell out so lucky and apposite to all Octavius's views, as to give birth to a general persuasion, that they had received foul play, and were both of them killed by his contrivance: for he was observed to be the first man who took up Hirtius's body in the camp, where some imagined him to have been killed by his own soldiers; and Pansa's physician, Glyco, was actually thrown into prison by Torquatus, Pansa's questor, upon a suspicion of having poisoned his wounds⁹. But the chief ground of that notion seems to have lain in the fortunate coincidence of the fact with the interests of Octavius: for M. Brutus thought it incredible, and in the most pressing manner begged of Cicero to procure Glyco's enlargement, and protect him from any harm, as being a worthy, modest man, incapable of such a villany; and who, of all others, suffered the greatest loss by Pansa's death¹⁰.

⁹ Quales tibi sæpe scripsi consules, tales extiterunt. [Ad Brut. 3.] Erat in senatu satis vehemens et acer Pansa; cum in ceteros hujus generis, tum maxime in soecorum; cui consuli non animus ab initio, non fides ad extremum defuit. Bellum ad Mutinam gerebatur; nihil ut in Cæsare reprehenderes, nonnulla in Hirtio.—Ibid. 10.

¹⁰ N.B. Several medals were struck by the senate on the occasion of this victory; particularly one in honour of Pansa, exhibiting the head of the Goddess Liberty, crowned with laurel, and the inscription, LIBERTATIS; and on the reverse, Rome sitting upon the spoils of enemies, holding a spear in her right hand, and a dagger in her left, with her foot upon the globe, and victory flying towards her to crown her with laurel; and the inscription,—C. PANSA. O.F.C.N.—See Morel. Fam. Rom.

¹¹ Rumor increbuit, amboe opera ejus occisos: ut Antonio fugato, republic consuliibus orbata, solus victores exercitus occuparet. Pansa quidem adeo suspecta mors fuit, ut Glyco medicus custoditus sit, quasi venenum vulneri indidisset.—Suet. in Aug. 11; Dio, l. xlv. 317; Appian. p. 572.

¹² Tibi Glycon medicum Pansæ—diligentissime commendando; audimus eum venisse in suspitionem Torquato de morte Pansæ, custoditque ut parricidam. Nihil minus credendum, &c.—Rogo te et quidem valde rogo, eripias eum ex custodia.—Ad Brut. 6.

Cicero was soon aware of the dangerous turn which this event was likely to give to their affairs; and within a day or two after the news, intimates his apprehension of it to Brutus: "Young Cæsar," says he, "has a wonderful disposition to virtue; I wish that I may govern him as easily, in all this height of honour and power, as I have hitherto done: the thing is now much harder; yet I do not despair of it: for the youth is persuaded, and chiefly by me, that we owe our present safety to him: and in truth, if he had not at first driven Antony from the city, all had been lost." But as he found Octavius grow daily more and more untractable, so he began to exhort and implore Brutus, in every letter, to bring his army into Italy, as the only thing which could save them in their present circumstances: and to enforce his own authority, he procured a vote also of the senate, to call him home with his legions to the defence of the republic.¹

At Rome, however, the general rejoicings stifled all present attention to the loss of their consuls; and Antony's friends were so dejected for some time, that they gave Cicero no more opposition in the senate; where he poured out all imaginable honours on the deceased, Hirtius, Pansa, and Aquila, decreed an ovation to Cæsar, and added a number of days to their thanksgiving in honour of D. Brutus; whose deliverance happening to fall upon his birth-day, he decreed likewise that his name should be ascribed ever after to that day in the fasti or public calendars, for a perpetual memorial of the victory. Antony's adherents were also declared enemies: in which number Servilius himself included Ventidius; and moved, to give Cassius the command of the war against Dolabella; to whom Cicero joined Brutus, in case that he should find it useful to the republic.²

The decree of an ovation to Octavius was blamed by Brutus and his friends; yet seems to have been wisely and artfully designed: for while it carried an appearance of honour, it would regularly have stripped him of his power if he had made use of it: since his commission was to expire of course, and his army to be dissolved upon his first entrance into the city: but the confusion of the times made laws and customs of little effect with those who had the power to dispense with them.

The commanders abroad were so struck with Antony's defeat, that they redoubled their assurances to Cicero of their firmness and zeal for the common cause. Lepidus especially, who had suffered two of his lieutenants, Silanus and Culleo, to carry succours to Antony at Modena, labours to excuse it in a civil and humble strain, and to persuade Cicero, "That they had done it against his orders; and though, for their former relation to him, he was unwilling to punish them with the last severity, yet he had not since employed them, or received them even into his camp. He acquaints him that Antony was arrived in his province with one legion, and a great multitude of men unarmed, but with all his horse, which was very strong; and that Ventidius had joined him with three legions: that he was marching out against him with all his forces; and that many of Antony's horse and foot daily deserted him: that for himself, he would never be wanting in his duty to the senate and the republic; thanks him for not giving credit to the false reports which were spread of him: and above all, for the late honours that he had decreed to him; begs him to expect everything from him which could be expected from an honest man, and to take him under his special protection."³

Pollio still more explicitly, "That there was no time now for loitering, or expecting the orders of the senate; that all who wished to preserve the empire, and the very name of the Roman people, ought to lend their present help; that nothing was more dangerous than to give Antony leisure to recollect himself; that for his part, he would neither desert nor survive the republic; was grieved only for his being at such a distance that he could not come so soon as he wished to its relief," &c.

Plancus sent word, "That he was taking all possible care to oppress Antony, if he came into that country; that if he came without any considerable body of troops, he should be able to give a good account of him, though he should be received by Lepidus; or if he brought any force with him, would undertake that he should do no harm in those parts till they could send him succours sufficient to destroy him; that he was then in a treaty with Lepidus, about uniting their forces in the same cause, by the mediation of Laterensis and Furnius; nor would be hindered by his private quarrel to the man, from concurring with his greatest enemy in the service of the commonwealth."⁴ In another letter he speaks with great contempt of "Antony's shattered forces, though joined with those of Ventidius, the mule-driver (as he calls him); and is confident, that if he could have met with them, they would not have stood an hour before him."

The conquerors at Modena were much censured in the mean time for giving Antony leisure to escape: but Octavius, from the beginning, had no thoughts of pursuing him: he had already gained what he aimed at; had reduced Antony's power so low, and raised his own so high, as to be in condition to make his own terms with him in the partition of the empire, of which he seems to have formed the plan from this moment: whereas if Antony had been wholly destroyed, together with the consuls, the republican party would have probably been too strong for him and Lepidus, who, though master of a good army, was certainly a

¹ Cæsaris vero pueri mirifica indoles virtutis. Utinam tam facile eum florentem et honoribus et gratia regere ac tenere possimus, ut adhuc tenuimus: est omnino illud difficilissimum: sed non diffidimus. Persuasum est enim adolescenti, et maxime per me, ejus opera nos esse salvos: et certe, nisi is Antonium ab urbe avertisset, perisset omnia.—Ad Brut. 3.

² Te, cognita senatus auctoritate, in Italiam adducere exercitum: quod ut faceres, idque maturares, magnopere desiderabat respublica.—Ad Brut. 10.

³ A. D. v. Kalend. Malas cum de his, qui hostes judicati sunt, bello persequendis, sententie discerantur, dixit Servilius etiam de Ventidio, et ut Cassius persequeretur Dolabellam. Cui cum eessen assensus, decrevi hoc amplius, ut tu, si arbitrarere utis—persequerere bello Dolabellam, &c.—Ad Brut. 5; ft. 15.

⁴ Suspicio illud minus tibi probari, quod ab tuis familiaribus—non probatur, quod ut ovanti introire Cæsari liceat, decreverim.—Ad Brut. 15.

⁵ Ep. Fam. x. 34.

⁶ Ibid. 33.

⁷ Ibid. xi.

⁸ Mihi enim at contigisset, ut prior occurrerem Antonio, non mehercule horam constitisset: tantum ego et mihi confido, et sic periculis illius copias, Ventidique mulionis castra despicio.—Ibid. 12.

weak general: when he was pressed therefore to pursue Antony, he contrived still to delay it, till it was too late, taking himself to be more usefully employed in securing to his interests the troops of the consuls.

Cicero was particularly disgusted at Antony's escape; and often expostulates upon it with D. Brutus: he tells him, "That if Antony should ever recover strength again, all his great services to the republic would come to nothing. It was reported (says he) at Rome, and all people believed it, that he was fled with a few unarmed, dispirited men, and himself almost broken-hearted: but if it be so with him, as I hear it is, that you cannot fight him again without danger; he does not seem to have fled from Modena, but to have changed only the seat of the war. Wherefore men are now quite different from what they were: some even complain that you did not pursue him, and think that he might have been destroyed if diligence had been used: such is the temper of people, and, above all, of ours, to abuse their liberty against those by whom they obtained it: it is your part, however, to take care that there be no real ground of complaint. The truth of the case is, he who oppresses Antony, puts an end to the war. What the force of that is it is better for you to consider, than for me to write more explicitly."

D. Brutus in his answer gives him the reasons why he could not follow Antony so soon as he wished: "I had no horse," says he; "no carriages; did not know that Hirtius was killed; had no confidence in Cæsar before I met and talked with him; thus the first day passed. The next morning early I was sent for by Pansa to Bologna, but on the road met with an account of his death: I ran back to my little army, for so I may truly call it; it is extremely reduced, and in sad condition for want of all things: so that Antony gained two days of me, and made much greater journeys in flying than I could in pursuing; for his troops went straggling, mine in order. Wherever he passed, he opened all the prisons, carried away the men, and stopped nowhere till he came to the Ferds. This place lies between the Apennine and the Alps, a most difficult country to march through. When I was thirty miles from him, and Ventidius had already joined him, a copy of his speech was brought to me, in which he begs of his soldiers to follow him across the Alps; and declares that he acted in concert with Lepidus: but the soldiers cried out, especially those of Ventidius, for he has very few of his own, that they would either conquer or perish in Italy; and began to beg that he would go to Pollentia: when he could not overrule them, he put off his march to the next day. Upon this intelligence, I presently sent five cohorts before me to Pollentia, and followed them myself with the army; my detachment came to the place an hour before Trebellius, with Antony's horse: this gave me an exceeding joy, for I esteem it equal to a victory." &c.

In another letter he says, "That if Cæsar would have been persuaded by him to cross the Apennine, he could have reduced Antony to such straits that he must have been destroyed by want rather than the sword: but that they could neither command Cæsar, nor Cæsar his own troops; both which circumstances were very bad;" &c. This authentic account from D. Brutus confutes two facts, which are delivered by an old historian, and generally received by all the moderns; first, that Octavius, after the victory, refused to have any conference with D. Brutus; and that Brutus, for that reason, forbade him to enter his province, or to pursue Antony: secondly, that Pansa, in his last moments, sent for Octavius, and advised him to a union with Antony against the senate⁷. For it is evident, that on the very day of the victory, there was actually a conference between the two first, which passed in so amicable a manner as to ease Brutus of the jealousy which he had before conceived of Octavius: and Pansa's death happened so early the next morning, that it left no room for the pretended advice and speech which is made for him to Octavius; especially since it appears on the contrary, that instead of Octavius, Pansa really sent for D. Brutus, when he found himself dying, as if disposed rather to communicate something for the service of that cause in which he had lost his life. But both the stories were undoubtedly forged afterwards, to save Octavius's honour, and give a better colour to that sudden change of measures which from this hour he was determined to pursue⁸.

C. Antony was still a prisoner with M. Brutus, whose indulgence gave him an opportunity of practising upon the soldiers, and raising a sedition in the camp, which created no small trouble to Brutus. The soldiers, however, soon repented of their rashness, and killed the authors of it; and would have killed Antony too, if Brutus would have delivered him into their hands: but he could not be induced to take his life, though this was the second offence of the same kind; but pretending that he would order him to be thrown into the sea, sent him to be secured on ship-board either from doing or suffering any farther mischief; of which he wrote an account to Cicero, who returned the following answer.

"As to the sedition in the fourth legion about C. Antony, you will take what I say in good part; I am better pleased with the severity of the soldiers than with yours. I am extremely glad that you have had a trial of the affection of your legions and the horse. As to what you write, that I am pursuing the Antonys much at my ease, and praise me for it—I suppose you really think so: but I do not by any means approve your distinction,

⁷ Quod si me Cæsar audisset, atque Apenninum transisset, in tantas angustias Antonium compulsem, ut inopiam potius quam ferro conficeretur. Sed neque Cæsari imperari potest, nec Cæsar exoritur suo: quod utrumque possumus est.—Ep. Fam. x.

⁸ Appian. l. iii. 573; It. Hist. Rom. par Castrou et Rouillé, t. xvii. l. iv. p. 433, &c.

⁹ There is an original medal still remaining that gives no small confirmation to this notion; and was struck probably at Rome, either by Pansa himself, upon his marching out towards Modena, or by the senate soon after Pansa's death, in testimony of the strict union that subsisted between him and D. Brutus Albinus. For on the one side there is the head of a Silenus, as it is called, or rather of Pan, which is frequent on Pansa's coins, with the inscription also of his name, C. PANSA: and on the other, ALBINVS. BART. F. with two right hands joined, holding a caduceus, as an emblem of the strictest amity and concord.—See Famil. Vibie in Vaillant or Morel.

¹⁰ Cum et Lepido omnes imperatores forent meliores, et sanctis Antonibus, cum erat sobrius.—Vall. Pat. li. 63.

¹¹ Ep. Fam. xi. 12.

¹² Ibid. 13.

¹³ Dio, l. xlviii. p. 340.

when you say, that our animosity ought to be exerted rather in preventing civil wars, than in revenging ourselves on the vanquished. I differ widely from you, Brutus; not that I yield to you in clemency, but a salutary severity is always preferable to a specious show of mercy. If we are so fond of pardoning, there will be no end of civil wars: but you are to look to that; for I can say of myself, what Plautus's old man says in the Trinummus, Life is almost over with me; it is you who are the most interested in it. You will be undone, Brutus, believe me, if you do not take care: for you will not always have the people, nor the senate, nor a leader of the senate, the same as now. Take this, as from the Pythian oracle; nothing can be more true^b."

Brutus's wife, Porcia, notwithstanding the tragical story which the old writers have dressed up, of the manner of her killing herself upon the news of her husband's unhappy fate^c, died most probably about this time at Rome, of a lingering illness. She seems to have been in a bad state of health when Brutus left Italy, where she is said to have parted from him with the utmost grief and floods of tears, as if conscious that she was taking her last leave of him: and Plutarch says, "that there was a letter of Brutus extant in his days, if it was genuine, in which he lamented her death, and complained of his friends for neglecting her in her last sickness:" this however is certain, that in a letter to Atticus, he gives a hint of Porcia's indisposition, with a slight compliment to Atticus for his care of her^d: and the following letter of condolence to him from Cicero, can hardly be applied to any other occasion but that of her death.

Cicero to Brutus.

"I should perform the same office which you formerly did in my loss, of comforting you by letter, did I not know that you cannot want those remedies in your grief, with which you relieved mine. I wish only that you may now cure yourself more easily than at that time you cured me: for it would be strange in so great a man as you, not to be able to practise what he had prescribed to another. As for me, not only the reasons which you then collected, but your very authority, deterred me from indulging my sorrow to excess. For when you thought me to behave myself with greater softness than became a man, especially one who used to comfort others, you chid me with more severity than it was usual for you to express: so that, out of a reverence to your judgment, I roused myself; and by the accession of your authority, took everything that I had learned or read, or heard on that subject, to have the greater weight. Yet my part, Brutus, at that time, was only to act agreeably to duty and to nature: but yours, as we say, is to be acted on the stage, and before the people. For when the eyes, not only of your army, but of all the city, nay, of all the world, are upon you, it is wholly indecent for one, by whom we other mortals are made the stouter, to betray any dejection or want of courage. You have suffered indeed a great loss (for you have lost that which has not left its fellow on earth), and must be allowed to grieve under so cruel a blow, lest to want all sense of grief should be thought more wretched than grief itself: but to do it with moderation, is both useful to others and necessary to yourself. I would write more if this was not already too much: we expect you and your army: without which, though all other things succeed to our wishes, we shall hardly ever be free^e."

As the time of choosing magistrates now drew on, and particularly of filling up the colleges of priests, in which there were many vacancies, so Brutus was sending home many of his young nobles to appear as candidates at the election; the two Bibuluses, Domitius, Cato, Lentulus, whom he severally recommends to Cicero's protection. Cicero was desirous that his son also should come with them, to be elected a priest; and wrote to Brutus to know his mind about it, and, if he thought proper, to send him away immediately; for though he might be chosen in absence, yet his success would be much easier if he was present^f. He touches this little affair in several of his letters; but finding the public disorders increase still every day, he procured the election of priests to be thrown off to the next year: and Brutus having sent him word in the mean while that his son had actually left him, and was coming towards Rome, he instantly despatched a messenger to meet him on the road, with orders to send him back again, though he found him landed in Italy: "since nothing," he says, "could be more agreeable either to himself, or more honourable to his son, than his continuance with Brutus^g."

Not long after the battle of Modena, the news of Dolabella's defeat, and death, from Asia, brought a fresh occasion of joy to Cicero, and his friends at Rome. Dolabella, after his success against Trebonius, having pillaged that province of its money, and of all things useful for war, marched forward to execute his grand design upon Syria; for which he had been making all this preparation: but Cassius was beforehand with him, and having got possession of that country, and of all the armies in it, was much superior to him in force. Dolabella, however, made his way with some success through Cilicia, and came before Antioch in Syria, but was denied admittance into it; and after some vain attempts to take it, being repulsed with loss, marched to Laodicea, which had before invited, and now opened its gates to him. Here Cassius came up with him, and presently invested the place, where, after he had destroyed Dolabella's fleet, in two or three naval engagements, he shut him up closely by sea, as well as land; till Dolabella, seeing no way to escape, and the town unable to hold out any longer, killed himself, to prevent his falling alive into Cassius's hands, and suffering the same treatment which he had shown to Trebonius; but Cassius generously ordered his

^a Ad Brut. 9.

^b Sed quamvis liceat absentis rationem haberi, tamen omnia sunt presentibus faciliora.—Ad Brut. 5.

^c Ego autem, cum ad me de Ciceronis abs te discessu scripsisses, statim extrual tabellarios, literaque ad Ciceronem; ut etiam si in Italiam venisset, ad te rediret. Nihil enim mihi jucundius, illi honestius. Quamquam aliquoties ei scriperam, sacerdotum comitia, mea summa contentione in alterum annum esse rejecta, &c.—Ad Brut. 14; it. 5, 6, 7.

^b Ad Brut. 2.

^c App. l. iv. 669; Dio, l. xlviii. 356; Val. Max. iv. 6.

^d Valetudinem Porciæ mæ tibi curæ esse, non miror.—Ad Brut. 17.

body to be buried, with that of his lieutenant Octavius, who killed himself also with him¹.

D. Brutus was now at last pursuing Antony, or rather observing the motions of his fight: he had with him, besides his own forces, the new legions of the late consuls, while all the veterans put themselves under the command of Octavius: so that after Antony was joined by Ventidius with three legions, Brutus was hardly strong enough either to fight with him, or, what he rather aimed at, to hinder his crossing the Alps to Lepidus. He desired Cicero, therefore, to write to Lepidus not to receive him, "though he was sure," he says, "that Lepidus would never do anything that was right;" and wishes likewise that Cicero would confirm Plancus; since by some of Antony's papers which fell into his hands he perceived that Antony had not lost all hopes of him, and thought himself sure of Lepidus and Pollio; of which he gave Plancus immediate notice, and signified, that he was coming forward with all expedition to join with him¹. But he complains much in all his letters of his want of money, and the sad condition of his army; which was not contemptible for the number, but the kind of his troops, being for the most part new-raised men, bare and needy of all things². "I cannot," says he, "maintain my soldiers any longer. When I first undertook to free the republic, I had above three hundred thousand pounds of my own in money; but am now so far from having anything, that I have involved all my friends in debt for me. I have seven legions to provide for: consider with what difficulty. Had I the treasures of Varro, I could not support the expense!" He desired therefore a present supply of money, and some veteran legions, especially the fourth and Martial, which continued still with Octavius. This was decreed to him readily by the senate, at the motion of Drusus and Paullus, Lepidus's brother³: but Cicero wrote him word, "that all who knew those legions the best, affirmed, that they would not be induced by any terms to serve under him: that money, however, should certainly be provided for him:" and concludes by observing, "that if Lepidus should receive Antony, it would throw them again into great difficulties: but that it was Brutus's part to take care that they should have no cause to fear the event: for as to himself, that he could not possibly do more than he had already done; but wished to see D. Brutus the greatest and most illustrious of men⁴."

¹ Ep. Fam. 12, 13, 15; Appian. l. iv. 625; Dio, l. xlvii. 344.

² In primis rogo te, ad hominem ventosissimum Lepidum mitti, me bellum nobis redintegrare possit, Antonio sibi con-juncto.—Mihi persuasissimum est, Lepidum recte facturum nunquam—Plancum quoque confirmari, oro; quem spero, pulso Antonio, reipublice non defuturum.—Ep. Fam. xi. 2.

Antonius ad Lepidum proficiscitur, ne de Planco quidem sperem adhuc abiecit, ut ex libellis suis animadverti, qui in me incidierunt.—Ibid. 11.

³ Cum sim cum tironibus egentissimis.—Ibid. 19.

⁴ Alere jam milites non possum. Cum ad rempublicam liberandum accessi, H.S. mihi fuit pecunie cocc amplius. Tandem abest ut meo rei familiaris liberum sit quidquam, ut etiam jam meos amicos ere alieno obstrinxerim. Septuaginta numerum nunc legionum alo, qua difficultate, tu arbitrare. Non, si Varronis thesauros haberem, subistere sumptum possem.—Ibid. 10.

—Ep. Fam. xi. 19.

⁵ Legiones Martiam et quartam negant, qui illas norunt.

Plancus, as it is hinted above, was carrying on a negotiation with Lepidus to unite their forces against Antony: it was managed on Plancus's side by Furnius; on Lepidus's by Laterensis, one of his lieutenants, a true friend to the republic, and zealous to engage his general to its interests; and Lepidus himself dissembled so well as to persuade them of his sincerity; so that Plancus was marching forward in great haste to join with him, of which he gave Cicero a particular account.

Plancus to Cicero.

"After I had written my letters, I thought it of service to the public that you should be informed of what has since happened. My diligence, I hope, has been of use both to myself and to the commonwealth: for I have been treating with Lepidus by perpetual messages; that laying aside all former quarrels, he would be reconciled, and succour the republic in common with me, and show more regard to himself, his children, and the city, than to a desperate abandoned robber; in which case he might depend on my service and assistance for all occasions: I transacted the affair by Laterensis. He pawned his faith, that if he could not keep Antony out of his province, he would pursue him by open war; begged that I would come and join forces with him, and so much the more, because Antony was said to be strong in horse; whereas Lepidus's could hardly be called indifferent: for not many days before, even out of his small number, ten, who were reckoned his best, came over to me. As soon as I was informed of this, I resolved without delay to support Lepidus in the execution of his good intentions: I saw of what benefit my joining him would be, either for pursuing and destroying Antony's horse with mine, or for correcting and restraining, by the presence of my army, the corrupt and disaffected part of Lepidus's. Having made a bridge therefore in one day over the Isere, a very great river in the territory of the Allobroges, I passed with my army on the twelfth of May: but having been informed that L. Antony was sent before with some horse and cohorts to Forum Julii, I had sent my brother the day before with four thousand horse to meet with him, intending to follow myself by great journeys with four legions and the rest of my horse, without the heavy baggage. If we have any tolerable fortune for the republic, we shall here put an end to the audaciousness of the desperate, and to all our own trouble: but if the robber, upon hearing of my arrival, should run back again into Italy, it will be Brutus's part to meet with him there: who will not be wanting, I know, either in counsel or courage: but if that should happen, I will send my brother also with the horse, to follow and preserve Italy from being ravaged by him. Take care of your health, and love me as I love you."

But Lepidus was acting all the while a treacherous part, being determined at all hazards to support Antony; and though he kept him at a distance for some time, and seemed to be constrained at last by his own soldiers to receive him, yet that was only to save appearances, till he could ulla conditione ad te posse perducere. Pecuniam, quam desideras, ratio potest haberi, eaque habebitur—ego plus quam feci, facere non possum. Te tamen, id quod spero, omnium maximum et clarissimum videre cupio.—Ep. Fam. xi. 14.

o Ep. Fam. x. 15.

do it with advantage and security to them both : his view in treating with Plancus was probably to amuse and draw him so near to them, that when he and Antony were actually joined, they might force him into the same measures, without his being able to help it, or to retreat from them. When he was upon the point therefore of joining camps with Antony, he sent word to Plancus, who was within forty miles of him, to stay where he then was till he should come up to him : but Plancus, suspecting nothing, thought it better still to march on ; till Laterensis, perceiving how things were turning, wrote him word in all haste that neither Lepidus nor his army were to be trusted, and that he himself was deserted ; " exhorting Plancus to look to himself, lest he should be drawn into a snare, and to perform his duty to the republic ; for that he had discharged his faith by giving him this warning," &c.

Plancus gave Cicero a particular account of all these transactions : he acquaints him " that Lepidus and Antony joined their camps on the twenty-eighth of May, and the same day marched forward towards him : of all which he knew nothing till they were come within twenty miles of him : that upon the first intelligence of it he retreated in all haste, repassed the Isere, and broke down the bridges which he had built upon it, that he might have leisure to draw all his forces together, and join them with his colleague D. Brutus, whom he expected in three days : that Laterensis, whose singular fidelity he should ever acknowledge, when he found himself duped by Lepidus, laid violent hands upon himself ; but being interrupted in the act, was thought likely to live. He desires that Octavius might be sent to him with his forces ; or if he could not come in person, that his army however might be sent, since his interest was so much concerned in it : that as the whole body of the rebels was now drawn into one camp, they ought to act against them with the whole force of the republic," &c.¹

The day after his union with Antony, Lepidus wrote a short letter to the senate, wherein " he calls the gods and men to witness, that he had nothing so much at heart as the public safety and liberty ; of which he should shortly have given them proofs, had not fortune prevented him : for that his soldiers, by a general mutiny and sedition, had plainly forced him to take so great a multitude of citizens under his protection." He beseeches them, " that laying aside all their private grudges, they would consult the good of the whole republic ; nor in a time of civil dissention treat his clemency, and that of his army, as criminal and traitorous."

D. Brutus on the other hand joined his army with Plancus, who acted with him for some time with great concord, and the affection of the whole province on their side : which being signified in their common letters to Rome, gave great hopes still and courage to all the honest there. In a letter of Plancus to Cicero,—" You know," says he, " I imagine, the state of our forces : in my camp there are three veteran legions, with one new, but the best of all others of that sort : in Brutus's one veteran legion, another of two years' standing, eight of new levies : so that our whole army is great in number, little in strength : for what small dependence there is on a fresh soldier we have oft experienced to our cost. If the African troops, which are veteran, or Caesar's, should join us, we should willingly put all to the hazard of a battle : as I saw Caesar's to be the nearest, so I have never ceased to press him, nor he to assure me, that he would come instantly, though I perceive that he had no such thought, and is quite gone off into other measures : yet I have sent our friend Furnius again to him, with letters and instructions, if he can possibly do any good with him. You know, my dear Cicero, that as to the love of young Caesar, it belongs to me in common with you : for on the account either of my intimacy with his uncle when alive, it was necessary for me to protect and cherish him ; or because he himself, as far as I have been able to observe, is of a most moderate and gentle disposition ; or that after so remarkable a friendship with C. Caesar, it would be a shame for me not to love him, even as my own child, whom he had adopted for his son. But what I now write, I write out of grief, rather than ill-will : that Antony now lives ; that Lepidus is joined with him ; that they have no contemptible army ; that they have hopes, and dare pursue them ; is all entirely owing to Caesar. I will not recall what is long since passed : but if he had come at the time when he himself declared that he would, the war would have been either now ended, or removed, to their great disadvantage, into Spain, a province utterly averse to them. What motive or whose counsels drew him off from a part so glorious, nay, so necessary too, and salutary to himself, and turned him so absurdly to the thoughts of a two months' consulship, to the terror of all people, I cannot possibly comprehend. His friends seem capable of doing much good on this occasion, both to himself and the republic ; and, above all others, you, to whom he has greater obligations than any man living, except myself ; for I shall never forget that I am indebted to you for the greatest. I have given orders to Furnius to treat with him on these affairs ; and if I had as much authority with him as I ought, should do him great service. We in the mean time have a very hard part to sustain in the war : for we neither think it safe to venture a battle, nor yet, by turning our backs, to give the enemy an opportunity of doing greater mischief to the republic : but if either Caesar would regard his honour, or the African legions come quickly, we shall make you all easy from this quarter. I beg you to continue your affection to me, and assure yourself that I am strictly yours."

Upon the news of Lepidus's union with Antony, the senate, after some little time spent in considering the effects of it, being encouraged by the concord of D. Brutus and Plancus, and depending on the fidelity of their united forces, voted Lepidus an enemy, on the thirtieth of June ; and demolished the gilt statue which they had lately erected to him ; reserving still a liberty to him and his adherents of returning to their duty by the first of September¹. Lepidus's wife was

¹ Ep. Fam. x. 24.

² At Laterensis, vir sanctissimus, suo chirographo mittit mihi literas, in easque desperans de se, de exercitu, de Lepidi fide, querensque se destitutum : in quibus aperte denuntiat, videoam ne fallar : eam fidem solutam esse, republice ne desim.—Ep. Fam. x. 21.

³ Ibid. 23.

⁴ Ibid. 35.

⁵ Lepidus tuus affinis, meus familiaris, prid. Kal. Quint. sententiis omnibus hostis a senatu judicatus est : ceterique qui una cum illo a republica defeecerunt : quibus tamen ad

M. Brutus's sister, by whom he had sons, whose fortunes were necessarily ruined by this vote, which confiscated the father's estate; for which reason Servilia, their grandmother, and Cassius's wife, their aunt, solicited Cicero very earnestly either that the decree itself might not pass, or that the children should be excepted out of it: but Cicero could not consent to oblige them: for since the first was thought necessary, the second followed of course. He gave Brutus, however, a particular account of the case by letter.

Cicero to Brutus.

"Though I was just going to write to you by Messala Corvinus, yet I would not let our friend Vetus come without a letter. The republic, Brutus, is now in the utmost danger: and after we had conquered, we are forced again to fight, by the perfidy and madness of M. Lepidus. On which occasion, when for the care with which I have charged myself of the republic, I had many things to make me uneasy, yet nothing vexed me more than that I could not yield to the prayers of your mother and sister; for I imagined that I should easily satisfy you, on which I lay the greatest stress. For Lepidus's case could not by any means be distinguished from Antony's; nay, in all people's judgment was even worse, since after he had received the highest honours from the senate, and but a few days before had sent an excellent letter to them, on a sudden he not only received the broken remains of our enemies, but now wages a most cruel war against us by land and sea, the event of which is wholly uncertain. When we are desired therefore to extend mercy to his children, not a word is said why, if their father should conquer (which the gods forbid), we are not to expect the last punishment from him. I am not ignorant how hard it is, that children should suffer for the crimes of their parents: but it was wisely contrived by the laws, that the love of their children should make parents more affectionate to their country. Wherefore it is Lepidus who is cruel to his children, not he who adjudges Lepidus an enemy; for if, laying down his arms, he were to be condemned only of violence, in which no defence could be made for him, his children would suffer the same calamity by the confiscation of his estate. Yet what your mother and sister are now soliciting against, in favour of the children, the very same and much worse Lepidus, Antony, and our other enemies, are at this very moment threatening to us all. Wherefore, our greatest hope is in you and your army. It is of the utmost consequence both to the republic in general, and to your honour and glory in particular, that, as I wrote to you before, you come as soon as possible into Italy; for the republic is in great want not only of your forces, but of your counsels. I served Vetus with pleasure as you desired me, for his singular benevolence and duty to you: I found him extremely zealous and affectionate both to you and the republic: I shall see my son, I hope, very soon, for I depend on his coming with you quickly to Italy."

Brutus, before he had received this letter, having heard from other friends what they were designing at Rome against Lepidus, wrote about the same time, and on the same subject, to Cicero.

amicentem redeundi ante Kal. Sept. potestas facta est.—Ep. Fam. xii. 16.

* Ad Brut. 12.

Brutus to Cicero.

"Other people's fears oblige me to entertain some apprehensions myself on Lepidus's account: if he should withdraw himself from us (which will prove, I hope, a rash and injurious suspicion of him), I beg and beseech you, Cicero, conjuring you by our friendship and your affection to me, to forget that my sister's children are Lepidus's sons, and to consider me in the place of their father. If I obtain this of you, you will not scruple, I am sure, to do whatever you can for them. Other people live differently with their friends, but I can never do enough for my sister's children, to satisfy either my inclination or my duty. But what is there in which honest men can oblige me (if in reality I have deserved to be obliged in anything), or in which I can be of service to my mother, sister, and the boys, if their uncle Brutus has not as much weight with you and the senate to protect, as their father Lepidus to hurt them? I feel so much uneasiness and indignation, that I neither can nor ought to write more fully to you; for if, in a case so important and so necessary, there could be any occasion for words to excite and confirm you, there is no hope that you will do what I wish, and what is proper. Do not expect therefore any long prayers from me: consider only what I am; and that I ought to obtain it either from Cicero, a man the most intimately united with me; or without regard to our private friendship, from a consular senator of such eminence. Pray send me word as soon as you can what you resolve to do. July the 1st."

Cicero perceiving from this letter, what he had no notion of before, how great a stress Brutus laid on procuring this favour for his nephews, prevailed with the senate to suspend the execution of their act, as far as it related to them, till the times were more settled.

Lepidus and Antony were no sooner joined, than a correspondence was set on foot between them and Octavius, who, from the death of the consuls, showed but little regard to the authority of Cicero or the senate; and wanted only a pretence for breaking with them. He waited however a while to see what became of Antony; till finding him received and supported by Lepidus, he began to think it his best scheme to enter into the league with them, and to concur in what seemed to be more peculiarly his own part, the design of revenging the death of his uncle. Instead therefore of prosecuting the war any farther, he was persuaded by his friends to make a demand of the consulship, though he was not yet above twenty years old. This step shocked and terrified the city; not that the consulship could give him any power which his army had not already given, but as it indicated a dangerous and unseasonable ambition, grounded on a contempt of the laws and the senate; and above all, raised a just apprehension of some attempt against the public liberty: since, instead of leading his army where it was wanted and desired, against their enemies abroad, he chose to march with it towards Rome, as if he intended to subdue the republic itself.

* Ad Brut. 13.

† Sororis tue filius quam diligenter consulam, spero te ex matris et ex sororis literis cogniturum, &c.—Ibid. 15; it. 18.

There was a report spread in the mean while through the empire, that Cicero was chosen consul. Brutus mentioning it in a letter to him, says, "If I should ever see that day, I shall then begin to figure to myself the true form of a republic subsisting by its own strength^a." It is certain that he might have been declared consul by the unanimous suffrage of the people, if he had desired it; but in times of such violence, the title of supreme magistrate, without a real power to support it, would have exposed him only to more immediate danger and insults from the soldiers; whose fastidious insolence in their demands was grown, as he complains, insupportable^a. Some old writers say, what the moderns take implicitly from them, that he was duped, and drawn in by Octavius to favour his pretensions to the consulship, by the hopes of being made his colleague, and governing him in the office^b. But the contrary is evident from several of his letters: and that of all men he was the most averse to Octavius's design, and the most active in dissuading him from pursuing it. Writing upon it to Brutus: "As to Cæsar, (says he) who has been governed hitherto by my advice, and is indeed of an excellent disposition and wonderful firmness, some people, by most wicked letters, messages, and fallacious accounts of things, have pushed him to an assured hope of the consulship. As soon as I perceived it, I never ceased admonishing him in absence, nor reproaching his friends who are present, and who seem to encourage his ambition; nor did I scruple to lay open the source of those traitorous counsels in the senate: nor do I ever remember the senate or the magistrates to have behaved better on any occasion; for it never happened before, in voting an extraordinary honour to a powerful or rather most powerful man (since power is now measured by force and arms), that no tribune, or any other magistrate, nor so much as a private senator, would move for it: yet in the midst of all this firmness and virtue the city is greatly alarmed; for we are abused, Brutus, both by the licentiousness of the soldiers, and the insolence of the general. Every one demands to have as much power in the state as he has means to extort it; no reason, no moderation, no law, no custom, no duty, is at all regarded; no judgment or opinion of the citizens, no shame of posterity," &c.

What Cicero says in this letter is very remarkable: that in all this height of young Cæsar's power, there was not a magistrate, nor so much as a single senator, who would move for the decree of his consulship: the demand of it therefore was made by a deputation of his officers; and when the senate received it more coldly than they expected, Cornelius, a centurion, throwing back his robe and showing them his sword, boldly declared that if they would not make him consul, that should. But Octavius himself soon put an end to their scruples, by marching with his legions in a hostile manner to the city^d, where he was chosen consul with Q.

^a His literis scriptis, te consulens factum audivimus; tum vero incipiam proponere mihi rempublicam justam et jam suis nitentem viribus, si istud videro.—Ad Brut. 4.

^b Illudmur, Brute, cum militum deliciis, tum imperatoris insolentia.—Ibid. 10.

^c Plut. in Cic.

^d Ad Brut. 10.

^e Consulatum vigesimo ætatis anno invasit, admittis

Pedius, his kinsman and co-heir, in part of his uncle's estate, in the month of Sextilis; which, on the account of this fortunate beginning of his honours, was called afterwards, from his own surname, Augustus^a.

The first act of his magistracy was to secure all the public money which he found in Rome, and make a dividend of it to his soldiers. He complained loudly of the senate, "that instead of paying his army the rewards which they had decreed to them, they were contriving to harass them with perpetual toils, and to engage them in fresh wars against Lepidus and Antony; and likewise, that in the commission granted to ten senators to provide lands for the legions after the war, they had not named him^b." But there was no just ground for any such complaints; for those rewards were not decreed, nor intended to be distributed, till the war was quite ended; and the leaving Cæsar out of the commission, was not from any particular slight, but a general exception of all who had the command of armies, as improper to be employed in such a charge: though Cicero indeed was of a different opinion, and pressed for their being taken in. D. Brutus and Plancus were excluded as well as Cæsar, and both of them seem likewise to have been disgusted at it, so that Cicero, who was one of the number, in order to retrieve the imprudence of a step which gave such offence, would not suffer his colleagues to do anything of moment, but reserved the whole affair to the arrival of Cæsar and the rest^c.

But Cæsar, being now wholly bent on changing sides and measures, was glad to catch at every occasion of quarrelling with the senate; he charged them with calling him a boy, and treating him as such^b: and found a pretext also against Cicero himself, whom, after all the services received from him, his present views obliged him to abandon; for some busy informers had told him, that Cicero had spoken of him in certain ambiguous terms which carried a double meaning, either of advancing or taking him off, which Octavius was desirous to have reported everywhere, and believed in the worst sense. D. Brutus gave Cicero the first notice of it in the following letter:

D. Brutus, Emperor, Consul elect, to M. T. Cicero.

"What I do not feel on my own account, my love and obligations to you make me feel on yours: that is, fear. For after I had been often told what I did not wholly slight, Labeo Segulius, a man always like himself, just now informs me that he has been with Cæsar, where there was much dishostilitas ad urbem legionibus, missaque, qui sibi exercitus nomine pœrocerent. Cum quidem cunctante senatu, Cornelius centurio, princeps legationis, rejecto sagulo, ostendens gladii capulum, non dubitasset in curia dicere; hic faciet, si vos non feceritis.—Sueton. in Aug. 26.

^a Sextilium mensem e suo cognomine nominavit, magis quam Septembrem, in quo erat natus, quia hoc sibi et primus consulatus, &c.—Sueton. in Aug. 31.

^b Applian. lib. 361.

^c Cum ego sensissem, de his qui exercitus haberent, sententiam ferri oportere, lidem illi, qui solent, reclamant. Itaque excepti etiam estis, me vehementer repugnante—Itaque cum quidam de collegis nostris agrariam curationem ligurent, disturbavi rem, totaque integram vobis reservavi.—Ep. Fam. xi. 21; it. 20, 23.

^d Dio, l. xlv. 318; Sueton. in Aug. 12.

as on you; that Caesar himself had no other complaint against you but for a certain saying which he declared to have been spoken by you: 'that the young man was to be praised, adorned, taken off'; but he would not be so silly, he said, as to put it into any man's power to take him off. This, I dare say, was first carried to him, or forged by Segulius himself, and did not come from the young man. Segulius had a mind likewise to persuade me, that the veterans talk most angrily against you, and that you are in danger from them: and that the chief cause of their anger is, because neither Caesar nor I am in the commission of the sin, but all things transacted by your will and measure. Upon hearing this, though I was then on my march, I did not think it proper to pass the Alps, till I could first learn how matters were going amongst you," &c.

To this Cicero answered:

"The gods confound that Segulius, the greatest liar that is, or was, or ever will be. What! do you imagine that he told his story only to you and to Caesar? he told the same to every soul he could speak with. I love you however, Brutus, as I ought, for acquainting me with how trifling soever it be: 'tis a sure sign of affection; for as to what Segulius says of the complaint of the veterans, because you and Caesar were not in the commission, I wish I was not in it myself; for what can be more blameless? But when I proposed that those who had the command of armies should be blamed in it, the same men who used to use everything remonstrated against it; so that you were excepted, wholly against my vote and opinion!" &c.

As for the story of the words, he treats it, we may say, as too contemptible to deserve an apology, and as the pains of disclaiming it; and it seems indeed probable that a man of his prudence could ever avoid them. If he had harboured such a thought, he had been tempted on any occasion to throw out a hint, we might have expected to find in his letters to Brutus; yet on the contrary, he speaks always of Octavius in terms highly advantageous, even where he was likely to give disgust. But nothing was more common than to see sayings forged for his, which he had never said: and this was one of that sort, contrived to stir a jealousy into Octavius, or to give him a handle at least for breaking with Cicero, which in the present circumstances he was glad to lay hold of, and when the story was once become public, he supposed to have gained credit with Octavius, is not strange to find it taken up by the writers of the following ages, Velleius and Suetonius; though not without an intimation from the latter that he suspected credit."

While the city was in the utmost consternation at Caesar's approach with his army, two veteran soldiers from Africa happened to arrive in the city, and were received as a succour sent to them from heaven. But this joy lasted not long: for immediately after their landing, being corrupted by other soldiers, they deserted the senate, who which last word signifies, either to raise to honour, or to carry off.

Landandum, adolescentem, ornandum, tollendum.

^a Ep. Fam. xi. 20.

^b Vell. Pat. ii. 62; Sueton. in Aug. 12.

¹ Ibid. 31.

sent for them, and joined themselves to Caesar. Pollio likewise, about the same time, with two of his best legions from Spain, came to the assistance of Antony and Lepidus, so that all the veterans of the western part of the empire were now plainly forming themselves into one body, to revenge the death of their old general. The consent of all these armies, and the unexpected turn of Antony's affairs, staggered the fidelity of Plancus, and induced him also at last to desert his colleague D. Brutus, with whom he had hitherto acted with much seeming concord; Pollio made his peace and good terms for him with Antony and Lepidus, and soon after brought him over to their camp with all his troops.

D. Brutus, being thus abandoned and left to shift for himself, with a needy, mutinous army, eager to desert, and ready to give him up to his enemies, had no other way to save himself than by flying to his namesake in Macedonia; but the distance was so great, and the country so guarded, that he was often forced to change his road, for fear of being taken, till having dismissed all his attendants, and wandered for some time alone in disguise and distress, he committed himself to the protection of an old acquaintance and host whom he had formerly obliged; where, either through treachery or accident, he was surprised by Antony's soldiers, who immediately killed him, and returned with his head to their general."

Several of the old writers have reproached his memory with a shameful cowardice in the manner of suffering his death: unworthy of the man who had killed Caesar, and commanded armies. But their accounts are so various, and so inconsistent with the character of his former life, that we may reasonably suspect them to be forged by those who were disposed to throw all kinds of contumely on the murderers of Caesar.

But what gave the greatest shock to the whole republican party, was a law contrived by Caesar, and published by his colleague Peditus, to bring to trial and justice all those who had been concerned either in advising or effecting Caesar's death; in consequence of which all the conspirators were presently impeached in form by different accusers, and as none of them ventured to appear to their citations, they were all condemned of course; and by a second law interdicted from fire and water. Pompey also, though he had borne no part in that act, was added to the number, as an irreconcilable enemy to the Cæsarian cause: after which Caesar, to make amends for the unpopularity of his law, distributed to the citizens the legacies which his uncle had left them by will.

Cicero foresaw that things might possibly take this turn, and Plancus himself prove treacherous; and for that reason was constantly pressing Brutus and Cassius to hasten to Italy as the most effectual means to prevent it: every step that Caesar took confirmed his apprehensions, and made him more importunate with them to come, especially after the union of Antony and Lepidus. In his letters to Brutus, "Fly to us," says he, "I beseech you, and exhort Cassius to the same, for there is no hope of liberty but from your troops." If you

^a Vell. Pat. ii. 64; Appian. l. iii. 588.

^b Senec. Ep. 82. 543; Dio, l. xlv. 325; Val. Max. ix. 13.

^c Appian. l. iii. 586; Dio, xlv. 322.

^d Quamobrem advola, obsecro—hortare idem per litteras have any regard for the republic, for which you were born, you must do it instantly; for the war is renewed by the inconstancy of Lepidus; and Caesar's army, which was the best, is not only of no service to us, but even obliges us to call for yours: as soon as ever you touch Italy, there is not a man whom we can call a citizen who will not immediately be in your camp. We have D. Brutus indeed happily united with Plancus: but you are not ignorant how changeable men's minds are, and how infected with party, and how uncertain the events of war: nay, should we conquer, as I hope we shall, there will be a want of your advice and authority to settle all affairs. Help us, therefore, for God's sake, and as soon as possible; and assure yourself that you did not do a greater service to your country on the ides of March, when you freed it from slavery, than you will do by coming quickly."

After many remonstrances of the same kind, he wrote also the following letter.

Cicero to Brutus.

"After I had often exhorted you by letters to come as soon as possible to the relief of the republic, and bring your army into Italy, and never imagined that your own people had any scruples about it; I was desired by that most prudent and diligent woman your mother, all whose thoughts and cares are employed on you, that I would come to her on the twenty-fourth of July; which I did, as I ought, without delay. When I came, I found Casca, Labeo, and Scaptius, with her. She presently entered into the affair, and asked my opinion whether we should send for you to Italy; and whether I thought it best for you to come or to continue abroad. I declared, what I took to be the most for your honour and reputation, that without loss of time you should bring present help to the tottering and declining state. For what mischief may not one expect from that war, where the conquering armies refused to pursue a flying enemy? where a general unhurt, unprovoked, possessed of the highest honours, and the greatest fortunes, with a wife, children, and near relation to you, has declared war against the commonwealth? I may add, where, in so great a concord of the senate and people, there resides still so much disorder within the walls? but the greatest grief which I feel, while I am now writing, is to reflect that when the republic had taken my word for a youth, or rather a boy, I shall hardly have it in my power to make good what I promised for him. For it is a thing of much greater delicacy and moment, to engage oneself for another's sentiments and principles, especially in affairs of importance, than for money; for money may be paid, and the loss itself be tolerable; but how can you pay what you are engaged for to the republic, unless he for whom you stand engaged will suffer it to be paid? yet I am still in hopes to hold him, though many are plucking him away from me: for his disposition seems good, though his age be flexible, and many always at hand to corrupt him; who, by throwing in his way the splendour of false honour, think themselves sure of dazzling his good sense and understanding. Wherefore to all my other labours this new one is added, of setting all engines at work to hold fast the young man, lest I incur the imputation of rashness. Though what rashness is it after all? for, in reality, I bound him for whom I was engaged more strongly than myself; nor has the republic as yet any cause to repent that I was his sponsor, since he has hitherto been the more firm and constant in acting for us, as well from his own temper as for my promise. The greatest difficulty in the republic, if I mistake not, is the want of money; for honest men grow every day more and more averse to the name of tribute, and what was gathered from the hundredth penny, where the rich are shamefully rated, is all spent in rewarding the two legions. There is an infinite expense upon us to support the armies which now defend us, and also yours, for our Cassius seems likely to come sufficiently provided. But I long to talk over this, and many other things with you in person, and that quickly. As to your sister's children, I did not wait, Brutus, for your writing to me: the times themselves, since the war will be drawn into length, reserve the whole affair to you; but from the first, when I could not foresee the continuance of the war, I pleaded the cause of the children in the senate, in a manner which you have been informed of, I guess, by your mother's letters: nor can there ever be any case where I will not both say and do, even at the hazard of my life, whatever I think agreeable either to your inclination or to your interest. The twenty-sixth of July*."

In a letter likewise to Cassius, he says, "We wish to see you in Italy as soon as possible, and shall imagine that we have recovered the republic when we have you with us. We had conquered nobly if Lepidus had not received the routed, disarmed, fugitive, Antony; wherefore Antony himself was never so odious to the city as Lepidus is now; for he began a war upon us from a turbulent state of things, this man from peace and victory. We have the consuls-elect to oppose him, in whom indeed we have great hopes, yet not without an anxious care for the uncertain events of battles. Assure yourself, therefore, that all our dependence is on you and your Brutus; that you are both expected, but Brutus immediately," &c.[†]

But after all these repeated remonstrances of Cicero, neither Brutus nor Cassius seems to have entertained the least thought of coming with their armies to Italy. Cassius, indeed, by being more remote, could not come so readily, and was not so much expected as Brutus; who, before the battle of Modena, had drawn down all his legions to the sea-coast, and kept them at Apollonia and Dyrrhachium waiting the event of that action, and ready to embark for Italy, if any accident had made his assistance necessary, for which Cicero highly commends him". But upon the news of Antony's defeat, taking all the danger to be over, he marched away directly to the remotest parts of Greece and Macedonia, to oppose the attempts of Dolabella:

Cassidum. Spes libertatis nunquam nisi in vestrorum auxilium principis est.—Ad Brut. 10.

* Subveni igitur, per deos, idque quam primum; tibi que per me, non te idibus Martiis, quibus servitutem a tuis civibus repulisti, plus profuisse patrie, quam, si mature veneris, profuturum.—Ibid. 14.

* Ad Brut. 18.

† Ep. Fam. xii. 10.

* Tuum consilium vehementer laudo, quod non prius exercitum Apollonia Dyrrhachioque movisset, quam de Antoni fuga audisset, Bruti eruptione, populi Romani victoria.—Ad Brut. 2.

and from that time seemed deaf to the call of the senate, and to all Cicero's letters, which urged him so strongly to come to their relief. It is difficult at this distance to penetrate the motives of his conduct: he had a better opinion of Lepidus than the rest of his party had; and being naturally positive, might affect to slight the apprehensions of Lepidus's treachery, which was the chief ground of their calling so earnestly for him. But he had other reasons also which were thought to be good; since some of his friends at Rome, as we may collect from Cicero's letter, were of a different mind from Cicero, on the subject of his coming. They might suspect the fidelity of his troops; and that they were not sufficiently confirmed and attached to him to be trusted in the field against the veterans in Italy; whose example and invitation, when they came to face each other, might possibly induce them to desert as the other armies had done, and betray their commanders. But whatever was their real motive, D. Brutus, who was the best judge of the state of things at home, was entirely of Cicero's opinion: he saw himself surrounded with veteran armies, disaffected to the cause of liberty; knew the perfidy of Lepidus; the ambition of young Caesar; and the irresolution of his colleague Plancus; and admonished Cicero, therefore, in all his letters, to urge his namesake to hasten his march to them². So that, on the whole, it seems reasonable to believe, that if Brutus and Cassius had marched with their armies towards Italy at the time when Cicero first pressed it, before the defection of Plancus and the death of Decimus, it must have prevented the immediate ruin of the republic.

The want of money of which Cicero complains at this time, as the greatest evil that they had to struggle with, is expressed also very strongly in another letter to Cornificius, the proconsul of Africa, who was urging him to provide a fund for the support of the legions: "As to the expense," says he, "which you have made, and are making in your military preparations, it is not in my power to help you; because the senate is now without a head, by the death of the consuls, and there is an incredible scarcity of money in the treasury, which we are gathering however from all quarters, to make good our promises to the troops that have deserved it of us, which cannot be done, in my opinion, without a tribute³." This tribute was a sort of capitation-tax, proportioned to each man's substance, but had been wholly disused in Rome from the conquest of Macedonia by Paulus Æmilius, which furnished money and rents sufficient to ease the city ever after of that burden, till the necessity of the present times obliged them to renew it⁴. But from what Cicero intimates of the general aversion to the revival of it, one cannot help observing the fatal effects of that indolence and luxury which had infected even the honest part of Rome; who, in this utmost exigency of the republic, were shocked at the very mention of an extraordinary tax, and would not part with the least share of their money for the defence even of their liberty; the consequence of which was, what it must always be in the like case, that by starving the cause, they found not only their fortunes, but their lives also soon after, at the mercy of their enemies. Cicero has a reflection in one of his speeches that seems applicable also to the present case, and to be verified by the example of these times. "The republic (says he) is attacked always with greater vigour than it is defended; for the audacious and profligate, prompted by their natural enmity to it, are easily impelled to act upon the least nod of their leaders: whereas the honest, I know not why, are generally slow and unwilling to stir; and neglecting always the beginnings of things, are never roused to exert themselves but by the last necessity: so that through irresolution and delay, when they would be glad to compound at last for their quiet, at the expense even of their honour, they commonly lose them both⁵."

This observation will serve to vindicate the conduct of Cassius from that charge of violence and cruelty which he is said to have practised, in exacting money and other necessities from the cities of Asia. He was engaged in an inexorable war, where he must either conquer or perish with the republic itself, and where his legions were not only to be supported but rewarded: the revenues of the empire were exhausted; contributions came in sparingly; and the states abroad were all desirous to stand neuter; as doubtful of the issue, and unwilling to offend either side. Under these difficulties, where money was necessary, and no way of procuring it but force, extortion became lawful; the necessity of the end justified the means; and when the safety of the empire and the liberty of Rome were at stake, it was no time to listen to scruples. This was Cassius's way of reasoning, and the ground of his acting; who applied all his thoughts to support the cause that he had undertaken; and kept his eyes (as Appian says) wholly fixed upon the war, as a gladiator upon his antagonist⁶.

Brutus, on the other hand, being of a temper more mild and scrupulous, contented himself generally with the regular methods of raising money; and from his love of philosophy and the politer studies, having contracted an affection for the cities of Greece, instead of levying contributions, used to divert himself, wherever he passed, with seeing their games and exercises, and presiding at their philosophical disputations, as if travelling rather for curiosity than to provide materials for a bloody war⁷. When he and Cassius, therefore, met, the difference of their circumstances showed the different effects of their conduct. Cassius, without receiving a penny from Rome, came rich and amply furnished with all the stores of war; Brutus, who had received large remittances from

² Pro Sextio, 47.

³ Ὁ μὲν Κάσσιος ἀμεταστρεπτῇ, καθάπερ ἐς τὸν ἀγωνιστὴν οἱ μονομαχοῦντες, ἐς ὥραν τὸν πόλεμον ἀφεώρα.—Appian. l. iv. 887.

⁴ Ὁ δὲ Βρούτος, δὴν γίγνοντο, καὶ φιλοθεάμενος ἦν καὶ φιλάκοος, ὅτε καὶ φιλοσοφῆσαι οὐκ ἀγενῆως.—Ibid.

² De Bruto autem nihil adhuc certi. Quem ego, quem admodum præcipue, privatæ literæ ad bellum commune vocare non desino.—Ep. Fam. xi. 25; it. 26.

³ De sumis, quem se in rem militarem facere et fecisse dicte, nihil sane possum tibi optulari, propterea quod et curibus senatus, consiliiis amicis, et incredibiles angustias pecunie publice, &c.—Ep. Fam. xii. 30.

⁴ At Perse rege devicto Paulus, cum Macedonicis optibus veterum atque hereditariam urbis nostre pauperatorem esse neque sentisset, ut illo tempore primum populus Romanus tributis præstandi onere se liberaret.—Val. Max. iv. 3; in Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3.

Italy, came empty and poor, and unable to support himself without the help of Cassius, who was forced to give him a third part of that treasure which he had been gathering with so much envy to himself for the common service*.

While Cicero was taking all this pains, and struggling thus gloriously in the support of their expiring liberty, Brutus, who was naturally peevish and querulous, being particularly chagrined by the unhappy turn of affairs in Italy, and judging of counsels by events, was disposed at last to throw all the blame upon him; charging him chiefly, that, by a profusion of honours on young Cæsar, he had inspired him with an ambition incompatible with the safety of the republic, and armed him with that power which he was now employing to oppress it: whereas the truth is, that by those honours Cicero did not intend to give Cæsar any new power, but to apply that which he had acquired by his own vigour to the public service and the ruin of Antony; in which he succeeded even beyond expectation, and would certainly have gained his end, had he not been prevented by accidents which could not be foreseen. For it is evident from the facts above-mentioned, that he was always jealous of Cæsar, and instead of increasing, was contriving some check to his authority, till by the death of the consuls, he slipped out of his hands and became too strong to be managed by him any longer. Brutus, by being at such a distance, was not well apprised of the particular grounds of granting those honours; but Decimus, who was all the while in Italy, saw the use and necessity of them, and seems to hint in some of his letters that they ought to have decreed still greater*.

But whatever Brutus or any one else may have said, if we reflect on Cicero's conduct from the time of Cæsar's death to his own, we shall find it in all respects uniform, great, and glorious; never deviating from the grand point which he had in view, the liberty of his country: whereas, if we attend to Brutus's, we cannot help observing in it something strangely various and inconsistent with itself. In his outward manners and behaviour, he affected the rigour of a Stoic, and the severity of an old Roman; yet by a natural tenderness and compassion, was oft betrayed into acts of an effeminate weakness. To restore the liberty of his country, he killed his friend and benefactor; and declares, that for the same cause he would have killed even his father†: yet he would not take Antony's life, though it was a necessary sacrifice to the same cause. When Dolabella had basely murdered Trebonius, and Antony openly approved the act, he could not be persuaded to make reprisals on C. Antony: but through a vain ostentation of clemency, suffered him to live, though with danger to himself. When his brother-in-law, Lepidus, was declared an enemy, he expressed an absurd and peevish resentment of it for the sake of his nephews, as if it would not have been in his power to have repaired their fortunes if the republic was ever restored; or if not, in their father's. How contrary is this to the spirit of that old Brutus from whom he derived his descent, and whom in his general conduct he pretended to imitate! He blames Cicero for dispensing honours too largely, yet claims an infinite share of them to himself; and when he had seized by his private authority what the senate at Cicero's motion confirmed to him, the most extraordinary command which had been granted to any man, he declares himself an enemy to all extraordinary commissions, in what hands soever they were lodged: this inconsistency in his character would tempt us to believe that he was governed in many cases by the pride and haughtiness of his temper, rather than by any constant and settled principles of philosophy, of which he is commonly thought so strict an observer.

Cicero, however, notwithstanding the peevishness of Brutus, omitted no opportunity of serving and supporting him to the very last: as soon as he perceived Cæsar's intention of revenging his uncle's death, he took all imaginable pains to dissuade him from it, and never ceased from exhorting him by letters to a reconciliation with Brutus, and the observance of that amnesty which the senate had decreed as the foundation of the public peace. This was certainly the best service which he could do, either to Brutus or the republic: and Atticus, imagining that Brutus would be pleased with it, sent him a copy of what Cicero had written on that subject; but instead of pleasing, it provoked Brutus only the more: he treated it as base and dishonourable to ask anything of a boy, or to imagine the safety of Brutus to depend on any one but himself; and signified his mind upon it, both to Cicero and Atticus, in such a style as confirms what Cicero had long before observed, and more than once declared of him, that his letters were generally churlish, unmannerly, and arrogant; and that he regarded neither what, nor to whom he was writing^b. But their own letters to each other will be the best vouchers of what I have been remarking, and enable us to form the surest judgment of the different spirit and conduct of the men. After Brutus, therefore, had frequently intimated his dissatisfaction and dislike of Cicero's management, Cicero took occasion, in the following letter, to lay open the whole progress of it from the time of Cæsar's death, in order to show the reasonableness and necessity of each step.

Cicero to Brutus.

"You have Messala now with you. It is not possible, therefore, for me to explain by letter, though ever so accurately drawn, the present state of our affairs so exactly as he, who not only knows them all more perfectly, but can describe them more elegantly than any man: for I would not have you imagine, Brutus (though there is no occasion to tell you what you know already yourself, but that I cannot pass over in silence such an excellence of all good qualities); I would not have you imagine, I say, that for probity, constancy, and zeal for the republic, there is any one equal to him: so that eloquence, in which he wonderfully

* Plutarch, in Brut.

† Mirabiliter, mi Brute, letor, mea consilia, measque sententias a te probari, de decemviris, de ornando adolescento.—Ep. Fam. xi. 14; it. 20.

† —Non concesserim, quod in illo non tuli, sed ne patri quidem meo, si reviviscat, ut, patiente me, plus legibus ac senatu possit. [Ad Brut. 16.] Sed dominum, ne parentis u idem, majores nostri voluerunt esse.—Ibid. 17.

† Ego certe—cum ipsa re bellum geram, hoc est cum regno, et imperiis extraordinariis et dominatione et potentia.—Ad Brut. 17.

^b Ad Att. vi. 1, 3.

exceeds, scarce finds a place among his other praises; since even in that his wisdom shines the most eminent, by his having formed himself with so much judgment and skill to the truest manner of speaking. Yet his industry all the while is so remarkable, and he spends so much of his time in study, that he seems to owe but little to his parts, which still are the greatest. But I am carried too far by my love for him: for it is not the purpose of this epistle to praise Messala, especially to Brutus, to whom his virtue is not less known than to myself, and these very studies which I am praising still more; whom, when I could not part with without regret, I comforted myself with reflecting, that by his going away to you, as it were to my second self, he both discharged his duty, and pursued the surest path to glory. But so much for that! I come now, after a long interval, to consider a certain letter of yours, in which, while you allow me to have done well in many things, you find fault with me for one; that in conferring honours I was too free, and even prodigal. You charge me with this; others probably with being too severe in punishing, or you yourself perhaps with both. If so, I desire that my judgment and sentiments on each may be clearly explained to you: not that I mean to justify myself by the authority of Solon, the wisest of the seven, and the only legislator of them all, who used to say that the public weal was comprised in two things, † Publius Valerius Messala Corvinus, of whom Cicero here gives so fine a character, was one of the noblest as well as the most accomplished persons of his age, who lived long afterwards the general favourite of all parties, and a principal ornament of Augustus's court. Being in arms with Brutus, he was proscribed of course by the triumvirate, yet was excepted soon after by a special edict, but refused the benefit of that grace, and adhered to the cause of liberty, till he saw it expire with his friend. After the battle of Philippi, the troops that remained freely offered themselves to his command; but he chose to accept peace, to which he was invited by the conquerors, and surrendered himself to Antony, with whom he had a particular acquaintance. When Cæsar was defeated not long after by S. Pompey, on the coast of Sicily, being in the utmost distress and danger of life, he committed himself with one domestic to the fidelity of Messala; who, instead of revenging himself on one who had so lately proscribed and set a price upon his head, generously protected and preserved him. He continued still in the friendship of Antony, till the scandal of Antony's life, and slavish obsequiousness to Cleopatra, threw him wholly into the interests of Cæsar, by whom he was declared consul in Antony's place, greatly entrusted in the battle of Actium, and honoured at last with a triumph, for reducing the rebellious Gauls to their obedience. He is celebrated by all writers as one of the first orators of Rome; and having been the disciple of Cicerone, was thought by some to excel even his master in the sweetness and correctness of his style; preserving always a dignity, and demonstrating his nobility, by the very manner of his speaking. To the perfection of his eloquence he had added all the accomplishments of the other liberal arts; was a great admirer of Socrates, and the severer studies of philosophy, yet an eminent patron of all the wits and poets of those times. Tibullus was the constant companion of all his foreign expeditions, which he celebrates in his Elegies; and Horace, in one of his odes, calls for his choicest wines, for the entertainment of so noble a guest. Yet this polite and amiable man, impaired by sickness, and worn out at last by age, is said to have outlived his senses and memory, till he had forgotten even his very name.—See Appian. p. 611, 736; Tacit. Dial. 18; Quintil. x. 1; Tibull. Eleg. l. 7; Hor. Carm. lib. 21; Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 24.

rewards and punishments; in which, however, as in everything else, a certain medium and temperance is to be observed. But it is not my design at this time to discuss so great a subject. I think it proper only to open the reasons of my votes and opinions in the senate from the beginning of this war. After the death of Cæsar, and those your memorable ides of March, you cannot forget, Brutus, what I declared to have been omitted by you, and what a tempest I foresaw hanging over the republic. You had freed us from a great plague, wiped off a great stain from the Roman people, acquired to yourselves divine glory, yet all the equipage and furniture of kingly power was left still to Lepidus and Antony—the one inconstant, the other vicious; both of them afraid of peace, and enemies to the public quiet. While these men were eager to raise fresh disturbances in the republic, we had no guard about us to oppose them, though the whole city was eager and unanimous in asserting its liberty: I was then thought too violent, while you, perhaps more wisely, withdrew yourselves from that city which you had delivered, and refused the help of all Italy, which offered to arm itself in your cause. Wherefore, when I saw the city in the hands of traitors, oppressed by the arms of Antony, and that neither you nor Cassius could be safe in it, I thought it time for me to quit it too: for a city overpowered by traitors, without the means of relieving itself, is a wretched spectacle. Yet my mind, always the same, and ever fixed on the love of my country, could not bear the thought of leaving it in its distress. In the midst, therefore, of my voyage to Greece, and in the very season of the Etesian winds, when an uncommon south wind, as if displeased with my resolution, had driven me back to Italy, I found you at Velia, and was greatly concerned at it; for you were retreating, Brutus—were retreating, I say, since your Stoics will not allow their wise man to fly. As soon as I came to Rome, I exposed myself to the wickedness and rage of Antony; and when I had exasperated him against me, began to enter into measures in the very manner of the Brutuses (for such are peculiar to your blood), for delivering the republic. I shall omit the long recital of what followed, since it all relates to myself, and observe only, that young Cæsar, by whom, if we will confess the truth, we subsist at this day, flowed from the source of my counsels. I decreed him no honours, Brutus, but what were due, none but what were necessary; for as soon as we began to recover any liberty, and before the virtue of D. Brutus had yet shown itself so far that we could know its divine force, and while our whole defence was in the boy, who repelled Antony from our necks, what honour was not really due to him! though I gave him nothing yet but the praise of words, and that but moderate. I decreed him indeed a legal command, which, though it seemed honourable to one of that age, was yet necessary to one who had an army; for what is an army without the command of it? Philip voted him a statue, Servius the privilege of suing for offices before the legal time, which was shortened still by Servilius; nothing was then thought too much; but we are apt, I know not how, to be more liberal in fear than grateful in success. When D. Brutus was delivered from the siege, a day of all others the most joyous to the city, which happened also to be his birth-day, I decreed that his name should be ascribed for ever to that day in the public calendars : in which I followed the example of our ancestors, who paid the same honour to a woman, Larentia, at whose altar you priests perform sacred rites in the velabrum. By giving this to D. Brutus, my design was to fix in the calendars a perpetual memorial of a most acceptable victory ; but I perceived on that day that there was more malevolence than gratitude in many of the senate. During these same days I poured out honours (since you will have it so) on the deceased Hirtius, Pansa, and Aquila : and who can find fault with it but those who, when fear is once over, forget their past danger ? But besides the grateful remembrance of services, there was a use in it which reached to posterity ; for I was desirous that there should remain an eternal monument of the public hatred to our most cruel enemies. There is one thing, I doubt, which does not please you—for it does not please your friends here, who, though excellent men, have but little experience in public affairs—that I decreed an ovation to Cæsar ; but for my part (though I may perhaps be mistaken, for I am not one of those who approve nothing but what is my own), I cannot but think that I have advised nothing more prudent during this war. Why it is so, is not proper to be explained, lest I be thought to have been more provident in it than grateful. But even this is too much. Let us pass, therefore, to other things. I decreed honours to D. Brutus—decreed them to Plancus. They must be men of great souls who are attracted by glory. But the senate also is certainly wise in trying every art that is honest by which it can engage any one to the service of the republic. But I am blamed in the case of Lepidus, to whom, after I had raised a statue in the rostra, I presently threw it down. My view in that honour was, to reclaim him from desperate measures ; but the madness of an inconstant man got the better of my prudence ; nor was there yet so much harm in erecting, as good in demolishing, the statue. But I have said enough concerning honours, and must say a word or two about punishments ; for I have often observed, from your letters, that you are fond of acquiring a reputation of clemency, by your treatment of those whom you have conquered in war. I can imagine nothing to be done by you but what is wisely done : but to omit the punishing of wickedness (which we call pardoning) though it be tolerable in other cases, I hold to be pernicious in this war. Of all the civil wars that have been in my memory, there was not one in which, what side soever got the better, there would not have remained some form of a commonwealth ; yet in this, what sort of a republic we are like to have, if we conquer, I would not easily affirm ; but if we are conquered, we are sure to have none. My votes therefore were severe against Antony, severe against Lepidus, not from any spirit of revenge, but to deter wicked citizens at present from making war against their country, and to leave an example to posterity, that none hereafter should imitate such rashness. Yet this very vote was not more mine than it was everybody's ; in which there seems, I own, to be something cruel, that the punishment should reach to children, who have done nothing to deserve it : but the constitution is both ancient and of all cities ; for even Themistocles's children were reduced to want ; and since the same punishment falls upon citizens condemned of public crimes, how was it possible for us to be more gentle towards enemies ? But how can that man complain of me, who, if he had conquered, must needs confess that he would have treated me even with more severity ? You have now the motives of my opinions in the case of rewards and punishments ; for as to other points, you have heard, I imagine, what my sentiments and votes have been. But to talk of these things now is not necessary : what I am going to say is extremely so, Brutus :—that you come to Italy with your army as soon as possible. We are in the utmost expectation of you : whenever you set foot in Italy, all the world will fly to you ; for whether it be our lot to conquer (as we had already done, if Lepidus had not been desirous to overturn all, and perish himself with his friends), there will be a great want of your authority, for the settling some state of a city amongst us ; or, if there be any danger and struggle still behind, hasten to us, for God's sake ; for you know how much depends on opportunity, how much on despatch. What diligence I shall use in the care of your sister's children you will soon know, I hope, from your mother's and sister's letters, in whose cause I have more regard to your will, which is ever most dear to me, than, as some think, to my own constancy. But it is my desire both to be and to appear constant in nothing so much as in loving you.¹²

Brutus to Cicero.

"I have read a part of your letter, which you sent to Octavius, transmitted to me by Atticus. Your zeal and concern for my safety gave me no new pleasure ; for it is not only common, but our daily news, to hear something, which you have said or done with your usual fidelity, in the support of my honour and dignity. Yet that same part of your letter affected me with the most sensible grief which my mind could possibly receive. For you compliment him so highly for his services to the republic ; and in a strain so suppliant and abject that—what shall I say ?—I am ashamed of the wretched state to which we are reduced,—yet it must be said,—you recommend my safety to him, to which what death is not preferable ? and plainly show, that our servitude is not yet abolished, but our master only changed. Recollect your words, and deny them, if you dare, to be the prayers of a slave to his king. There is one thing you say which is required and expected from him,—that he would allow those citizens to live in safety, of whom all honest men and the people of Rome think well. But what if he will not allow it ? Shall we be the less safe for that ? It is better not to be safe, than to be saved by him. For my part, I can never think all the gods so averse to the preservation of the Roman people, that Octavius must be entreated for the life of any one citizen, much less for the deliverers of the world. It is a pleasure to me to talk thus magnificently ; and it even becomes me to those, who know not either what to fear for any one, or what to ask of any one. Can you allow Octavius to have this power, and yet be his friend ? or if you have any value for me, would you wish to see me at Rome, when I must first be recommended to the boy, that he would permit me to be there? what reason can you have to thank him, if you think it necessary to beg of him that he would grant and suffer us to live with safety? or is it to be reckoned a kindness, that he chooses to see himself rather than Antony in the condition to have such petitions addressed to him; one may supplicate instead the successor, but never the abolisher of a tyranny, that those who have deserved well of the republic may be safe. It was this weakness and despair, not more blamable indeed in you than in all, which first pushed Cæsar to the ambition of reigning, and, after his death, encouraged Antony to think of seizing his place; and has now raised this boy so high that you judge it necessary to address your prayers to him for the preservation of men of our rank; and that we can be saved only by the mercy of one scarce yet a man, and by no other means. But if we had remembered ourselves to be Romans, these infamous men would not be more daring to aim at dominion, than we to rebel it: nor would Antony be more encouraged by Cæsar's reign, than deterred by his fate. How can you, a consular senator, and the avenger of so many treasons (by suppressing which you have but postponed our ruin I fear for a time), reflect on what you have done, and yet approve these things, or bear them so tamely, as to seem at least to approve them? for what particular grudge had you to Antony? no other, but that he assumed all this to himself; that our lives should be begged of him; our safety be precarious, from whom he had received his liberty; and the republic depend on his will and pleasure. You thought it necessary to take arms, to prevent him from tyrannizing at this rate: but was it your intent, that by preventing him, we might sue to another who would suffer himself to be advanced into his place, or that the republic might be free and mistress of itself? as if our quarrel was not perhaps to slavery, but to the conditions of it. But we might have had, not only an easy master in Antony, if we would have been content with that, but whatever share with him we pleased of favours and honours. For what could he deny to those whose patience he saw was the best support of his government? but nothing was of such value to us, that we would sell our faith and our liberty for it. This very boy, whom the name of Cæsar seems to incite against the destroyers of Cæsar, at what rate would he value it (if there was any room to traffic with him), to be enabled by our help to maintain his present power, since we have a mind to live, and to be rich, and to be called consulars? but then Cæsar must have perished in vain: for what reason had we to rejoice at his death, if after it we were still to continue slaves? Let other people be as indolent as they please; but may the gods and goddesses deprive me sooner of everything than the resolution, not to allow to the heir of him whom I killed what I did not allow to the man himself—nor would suffer, even in my father, were he living—to have more power than the laws and the senate. How can you imagine, that any one can be free under him, without whose leave there is no place for us in that city? or how is it possible for you, after all, to obtain what you ask? You ask, that he would allow us to be safe. Shall we then receive safety, think you, when we receive life? But how can we receive it, if we first part with our honour and our liberty? Do you fancy, that to live at Rome is to be safe? It is the thing, and not the place, which must secure that to me; for I was never safe while Cæsar lived, till I had resolved on that attempt; nor can I in any place live in exile, as long as I hate slavery and affronts above all other evils. Is not this to fall back again into the same state of darkness; when he, who has taken upon him the name of the tyrant (though in the cities of Greece, when the tyrants are destroyed, their children also perish with them), must be entreated, that the avengers of tyranny may be safe? Can I ever wish to see that city, or think it a city, which would not accept liberty when offered, and even forced upon it, but has more dread of the name of their late king, in the person of a boy, than confidence in itself; though it has seen that very king taken off in the height of all his power by the virtue of a few? As for me, do not recommend me any more to your Cæsar, nor indeed yourself, if you will hearken to me. You set a very high value on the few years which remain to you at that age, if for the sake of them you can supplicate that boy. But take care after all, lest what you have done and are doing so laudably against Antony, instead of being praised, as the effect of a great mind, be charged to the account of your fear. For if you are so pleased with Octavius as to petition him for our safety, you will be thought not to have disliked a master, but to have wanted a more friendly one. As to your praising him for the things that he has hitherto done, I entirely approve it: for they deserve to be praised, provided that he undertook them to repel other men's power, not to advance his own. But when you adjudge him not only to have this power, but that you ought to submit to it so far as to entreat him that he would not destroy us, you pay him too great a recompense: for you ascribe that very thing to him which the republic seemed to enjoy through him: nor does it ever enter into your thoughts, that if Octavius be worthy of any honours, because he wages war with Antony; that those who extirpated the very evil of which these are but the relics, can never be sufficiently requited by the Roman people; though they were to heap upon them everything which they could bestow: but see how much stronger people's fears are than their memories, because Antony still lives, and is in arms. As to Cæsar, all that could and ought to be done is past, and cannot be recalled: is Octavius then a person of so great importance, that the people of Rome are to expect from him what he will determine upon us? or are we of so little, that any single man is to be entreated for our safety? As for me, may I never return to you if ever I either supplicate any man, or do not restrain those who are disposed to do it, from supplicating for themselves: or I will remove to a distance from all such who can be slaves, and fancy myself at Rome, wherever I can live free; and shall pity you, whose fond desire of life neither age, nor honours, nor the example of other men's virtue, can moderate. For my part, I shall ever think myself happy as long as I can please myself with the persuasion that my piety has been fully requited. For what can be happier, than for a man, conscious of virtuous acts, and content with liberty, to despise all human affairs? Yet I will never yield to those who are fond of yielding, or be conquered by those who are willing to be conquered themselves, but will first try and attempt everything, nor ever desist from dragging our city out of slavery. If such fortune attends me as I ought to have, we shall all rejoice; if not, I shall rejoice myself. For how could this life be spent better than in acts and thoughts which tend to make my countrymen free? I beg and beseech you, Cicero, not to desert the cause through weariness or diffidence: in repelling present evils, have your eye always on the future, lest they insinuate themselves before you are aware. Consider, that the fortitude and courage with which you delivered the republic when consul, and now again when consular, are nothing without constancy and equability. The case of tried virtue, I own, is harder than of untried: we require services from it, as debts; and if anything disappoints us, we blame with resentment, as if we had been deceived. Wherefore for Cicero to withstand Antony, though it be a part highly commendable, yet because such a consul seemed of course to promise us such a consular, nobody wonders at it: but if the same Cicero, in the case of others, should waver at last in that resolution, which he exerted with such firmness and greatness of mind against Antony, he would deprive himself not only of the hopes of future glory, but forfeit even that which is past: for nothing is great in itself but what flows from the result of our judgment: nor does it become any man more than you to love the republic, and to be the patron of liberty, on the account either of your natural talents or your former acts, or the wishes and expectation of all men. Octavius, therefore, must not be entreated to suffer us to live in safety. Do you rather rouse yourself so far as to think that city, in which you have acted the noblest part, free and flourishing, as long as there are leaders still to the people, to resist the designs of traitors!."

¹² Ad Brut. 15.

¹ Ad Brut. 16.

N.B. There is a passage indeed in Brutus's letter to Atticus, where he intimates a reason of his complaint against Cicero, which was certainly a just one. If the fact of which he complains had been true—that Cicero had reproached Casca with the murder of Cæsar, and called him an assassin. "I do not know," says he, "what I can write to you but this, that the ambition and licentiousness of the boy has been inflamed rather than restrained by Cicero, who carries his indulgence of him to such a length, as not to refrain from abuses upon Casca, and such as must return doubly upon himself, who has put to death more citizens than one, and must first own himself to be an assassin before he can reproach Casca with what he objects to him." [Ep. ad Brut. 17.] Manutius professes himself unable to conceive how Cicero should ever call Casca a murderer; yet cannot collect anything less from Brutus's words. But the thing is impossible, and inconsistent with every word that Cicero had been saying, and every act that he had been doing from the time of Cæsar's death: and in relation particularly to Casca, we have seen above, how he refused to enter into any measures with Octavius, but upon the express condition of his suffering Casca to take quiet possession of the tribunate: It is certain therefore, that Brutus had either been misinformed, or was charging Cicero with the consequential meaning of some saying which was never intended by him; in advising Casca perhaps to manage Octavius, in that height of his power, with more temper and moderation, lest he should otherwise be provoked to consider him as an assassin, and treat him as such: for an intimation of that kind would have been sufficient to the fierce spirit of Brutus, for taking it as a direct condemnation of Casca's act of

If we compare these two letters, we shall perceive in Cicero's an extensive view and true judgment of things, tempered with the greatest politeness and affection for his friend, and an unwillingness to disgust where he thought it necessary even to blame. In Brutus's a churlish and morose arrogance, claiming infinite honours to himself, yet allowing none to anybody else; insolently chiding and dictating to one, as much superior to him in wisdom as he was in years; the whole turning upon that romantic maxim of the Stoics, enforced without any regard to times and circumstances: that a wise man has a sufficiency of all things within himself. There are indeed many noble sentiments in it worthy of old Rome, which Cicero in a proper season would have recommended as warmly as he; yet they were not principles to act upon in a conjuncture so critical; and the rigid application of them is the less excusable in Brutus, because he himself did not always practise what he professed; but was too apt to forget both the Stoic and the Roman.

Octavius had no sooner settled the affairs of the city, and subdued the senate to his mind, than he marched back towards Gaul to meet Antony and Lepidus, who had already passed the Alps, and brought their armies into Italy, in order to have a personal interview with him, which had been privately concerted for settling the terms of a triple league, and dividing the power and provinces of the empire among themselves. All the three were natural enemies to each other; competitors for empire, and aiming severally to possess what could not be obtained but with the ruin of the rest: their meeting therefore was not to establish any real amity or lasting concord, for that was impossible, but to suspend their own quarrels for the present, and with common forces to oppress their common enemies, the friends of liberty and the republic: without which all their several hopes and ambitious views must inevitably be blasted.

The place appointed for the interview was a small island, about two miles from Bononia, formed by the river Rhenus, which runs near to that city*: here they met, as men of their character must necessarily meet, not without jealousy and suspicion of danger from each other, being all attended by their choicest troops, each with five legions, disposed in separate camps within sight of the island. Lepidus entered it the first, as an equal friend to the other two, to see that the place was clear and free from treachery; and when he had given the signal agreed upon, Antony and Octavius advanced from the opposite banks of the river, and passed into the island by bridges, which they left guarded on each side by three hundred of their own men. Their first care, instead of embracing, was to search one another, whether they had not brought daggers concealed under their clothes; and when that ceremony was over, Octavius took his seat betwixt the other two, in the most honourable place, on the account of his being consul.

In this situation they spent three days in a close conference, to adjust the plan of their accommodation; the substance of which was, that the stabbing Cæsar, to which Cicero had always given the highest applause.

* Vide. Cluver. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxviii. p. 187.

three should be invested jointly with supreme power for the term of five years, with the title of Triumvirs, for settling the state of the republic: that they should act in all cases by common consent, nominate the magistrates and governors both at home and abroad, and determine all affairs relating to the public by their sole will and pleasure: that Octavius should have for his peculiar province, Africa, with Sicily, Sardinia, and the other islands of the Mediterranean; Lepidus, Spain, with the Narbonese Gaul; Antony, the other two Gauls on both sides of the Alps: and to put them all upon a level, both in title and authority, that Octavius should resign the consulship to Ventidius for the remainder of the year: that Antony and Octavius should prosecute the war against Brutus and Cassius, each of them at the head of twenty legions; and Lepidus, with three legions, be left to guard the city: and at the end of the war, that eighteen cities or colonies, the best and richest of Italy, together with their lands and districts, should be taken from their owners, and assigned to the perpetual possession of the soldiers, as the reward of their faithful services. These conditions were published to their several armies, and received by them with acclamations of joy, and mutual gratulations for this happy union of their chiefs; which, at the desire of the soldiers, was ratified likewise by a marriage, agreed to be consummated between Octavius and Claudia, the daughter of Antony's wife, Fulvia, by her first husband, P. Clodius.

The last thing that they adjusted was the list of a proscription, which they were determined to make of their enemies. This, as the writers tell us, occasioned much difficulty and warm contests amongst them, till each of them in his turn consented to sacrifice some of his best friends to the revenge and resentment of his colleagues. The whole list is said to have consisted of three hundred senators and two thousand knights, all doomed to die for a crime the most unpardonable to tyrants, their adherence to the cause of liberty. They reserved the publication of the general list to their arrival at Rome, excepting only a few of the most obnoxious; the heads of the republican party, about seventeen in all, the chief of whom was Cicero. These they marked out for immediate destruction; and sent their emissaries away directly to surprise and murder them, before any notice could reach them of their danger: four of this number were presently taken and killed in the company of their friends, and the rest hunted out by the soldiers in private houses and temples, which presently filled the city with a universal terror and consternation, as if it had been taken by an enemy: so that the consul Pedius was forced to run about the streets all the night, to quiet the minds and appease the fears of the people; and, as soon as it was light, published the names of the seventeen who were principally sought for, with an assurance of safety and indemnity to all others: but he himself was so shocked and fatigued by the horror of this night's work, that he died the day following^c.

We have no hint from any of Cicero's letters (for none remain to us of so low a date), what his sentiments were on this interview of the three chiefs, or what resolution he had taken in consequence of it. He could not but foresee that it must needs be fatal to him, if it passed to the satisfaction of Antony and Lepidus; for he had several times declared, that he expected the last severity from them if ever they got the better. But whatever he had cause to apprehend, it is certain that it was still in his power to avoid it, by going over to Brutus in Macedonia: but he seems to have thought that remedy worse than the evil; and had so great an abhorrence of entering again, in his advanced age, into a civil war, and so little value for the few years of life which remained to him, that he declares it a thousand times better to die than to seek his safety from camps^d: and he was the more indifferent about what might happen to himself, since his son was removed from all immediate danger by being already with Brutus.

^c Appian. l. iv. init.; Dio, p. 336; Plut. in Anton. et Cic.; Vell. Pat. ii. 65.

The old historians endeavour to persuade us that Cæsar did not give him up to the revenge of his colleagues without the greatest reluctance, and after a struggle of two days to preserve him^e: but all that tenderness was artificial, and a part assumed, to give the better colour to his desertion of him. For Cicero's death was the natural effect of their union, and a necessary sacrifice to the common interest of the three: those who met to destroy liberty must come determined to destroy him, since his authority was too great to be suffered in an enemy; and experience had shown that nothing could make him a friend to the oppressors of his country.

Cæsar therefore was pleased with it undoubtedly as much as the rest; and when his pretended squeamishness was overuled, showed himself more cruel and bloody in urging the proscription than either of the other two^f. "Nothing," says Velleius, "was so shameful on this occasion as that Cæsar should be forced to proscribe any man, or that Cicero especially should be proscribed by him^g." But there was no force in the case: for though, to save Cæsar's honour, and to extort as it were Cicero from him, Lepidus gave up his own brother, Paullus, and Antony his uncle, L. Cæsar, who were both actually put into the list, yet neither of them lost their lives, but were protected from any harm by the power of their relations^h.

If we look back a little, to take a general view of the conduct of these triumvirs, we shall see Antony, roused at once by Cæsar's death from the midst of pleasure and debauch, and a most abject obsequiousness to Cæsar's power, forming the true plan of his interest, and pursuing it with a surprising vigour and address; till, after many and almost insuperable difficulties, he obtained the sovereign dominion which he aimed at. Lepidus was the chief instrument that he made use of, whom he employed very successfully at home till he found himself in condi-

^d Reipublica vixem dolebo, que immortalis esse debet; mihi quidem quantum reliquit esse? [Ad Brut. 10.] Iræor ergo in castra? milles mori melius, huius præsertim ætati: [Ad Att. xiv. 22.] sed abesse hanc ætatem longe a sepulchro negant oportere.—Ibid. xvi. 7.

^e Plut. in Cic.; Vell. Pat. ii. 66.

^f Resistit aliquandiu collegis, ne qua fieret proscriptio, sed inceptam utroque acerbius exercebat, &c.—Suet. in Aug. 37.

^g Nihil tam indignum illo tempore fuit, quam quod aut Cæsar aliquem proscribere coactus est, aut ab illo Cicero proscripsi est.—Vell. Pat. ii. 66.

^h Appian. l. iv. 610; Dio, l. xlviii. 330.

tion to support his pretensions alone, and then sent to the other side of the Alps, that, in case of any disaster in Italy, he might be provided with a secure resource in his army. By this management, he had ordered his affairs so artfully, that, by conquering at Modena, he would have made himself probably the sole master of Rome; while the only difference of being conquered was, to admit two partners with him into the empire; the one of whom at least he was sure always to govern.

Octavius's conduct was not less politic or vigorous: he had great parts, and an admirable genius, with a dissimulation sufficient to persuade that he had good inclinations too. As his want of years and authority made it impossible for him to succeed immediately to his uncle's power, so his first business was to keep the place vacant till he should be more ripe for it, and to give the exclusion in the mean while to everybody else. With this view, he acted the republican with great gravity; put himself under the direction of Cicero; and was wholly governed by his advice as far as his interest carried him—that is, to depress Antony, and drive him out of Italy; who was his immediate and most dangerous rival. Here he stopped short, and paused awhile to consider what new measures this new state of things would suggest: when, by the unexpected death of the two consuls, finding himself at once the master of everything at home, and Antony, by the help of Lepidus, rising again the stronger from his fall, he saw presently that his best chance for empire was to content himself with a share of it till he should be in condition to seize the whole; and from the same policy with which he joined himself with the republic to destroy Antony, he now joined with Antony to oppress the republic as the best means of securing and advancing his own power.

Lepidus was the dupe of them both; a vain, weak, inconstant man, incapable of empire, yet aspiring to the possession of it, and abusing the most glorious opportunity of serving his country, to the ruin both of his country and himself. His wife was the sister of M. Brutus, and his true interest lay in adhering to that alliance: for if, by the advice of Laterensis, he had joined with Plancus and D. Brutus to oppress Antony, and give liberty to Rome, the merit of that service, added to the dignity of his family and fortunes, would necessarily have made him the first citizen of a free republic. But his weakness deprived him of that glory: he flattered himself that the first share of power which he seemed at present to possess would give him likewise the first share of empire, not considering that military power depends on the reputation and abilities of him who possesses it: in which, as his colleagues far excelled him, so they would be sure always to eclipse, and, whenever they thought it proper, to destroy him. This he found afterwards to be the case; when Cæsar forced him to beg his life upon his knees, though at the head of twenty legions, and deposed him from that dignity which he knew not how to sustain*.

Cicero was at his Tusculan villa, with his brother and nephew, when he first received the news of the proscription, and of their being included in it. It was the design of the triumvirate to keep it a secret if possible to the moment of execution, in order to surprise those whom they had destined to destruction before they were aware of the danger, or had time to escape. But some of Cicero's friends found means to give him early notice of it; upon which he set forward presently with his brother and nephew towards Astura, the nearest villa which he had upon the sea, with intent to transport themselves directly out of the reach of their enemies. But Quintus being wholly unprepared for so sudden a voyage, resolved to turn back with his son to Rome, in confidence of lying concealed there till they could provide money and necessaries for their support abroad. Cicero in the mean while found a vessel ready for him at Astura, in which he presently embarked: but the winds being cross and turbulent, and the sea wholly uneasy to him, after he had sailed about two leagues along the coast, he landed at Circæum, and spent a night near that place in great anxiety and irresolution: the question was, what course he should steer, and whether he should fly to Brutus, or to Cassius, or to S. Pompeius; but after all his deliberations, none of them pleased him so much as the expedient of dying[†]; so that, as Plutarch says, he had some thoughts of returning to the city, and killing himself in Cæsar's house, in order to leave the guilt and curse of his blood upon Cæsar's perfidy and ingratitude: but the importunity of his servants prevailed with him to sail forwards to Cajeta, where he went again on shore to repose himself in his Formian villa, about a mile from the coast, weary of life and the sea; and declaring that he would die in that country which he had so often saved[‡]. Here he slept soundly for several hours; though, as some writers tell us, "a great number of crows were fluttering all the while, and making a strange noise about his windows, as if to rouse and warn him of his approaching fate; and that one of them made its way into the chamber, and pulled away his very bed-clothes; till his slaves, admonished by this prodigy, and ashamed to see brute creatures more solicitous for his safety than themselves, forced him into his litter, or portable chair," and carried him away towards the ship, through the private ways and walks of his woods; having just heard that soldiers were already come into the country in quest of him, and not far from the villa. As soon as they were gone, the soldiers arrived at the house; and perceiving him to be fled, pursued immediately towards the sea, and overtook him in the wood. Their leader was one Popilius Lænas, a tribune, or colonel of the army, whom Cicero had formerly defended and preserved in a capital cause. As soon as the soldiers appeared, the servants prepared themselves to fight, being resolved to defend their master's life at the hazard of their own; but Cicero commanded them to set him down, and to make no resistance[§]: then looking upon his executioners with a presence and firmness which almost daunted them, and thrusting his neck as forwardly as he could out of the litter, he bade them do their work, and take what they wanted. Upon which they presently cut off his head and both his hands, and returned with them in all haste and great joy towards Rome, as the most agreeable present which they could possibly carry to Antony. Popilius charged himself with the conveyance, without reflecting on the infamy of carrying that head which had saved his own². He found Antony in the forum, surrounded with guards and crowds of people; but upon showing from a distance the spoils which he brought, he was rewarded upon the spot with the honour of a crown and about eight thousand pounds sterling. Antony ordered the head to be fixed upon the rostra, between the two hands: a sad spectacle to the city, and what drew tears from every eye; to see those mangled members, which used to exert themselves so gloriously from that place in defence of the lives, the fortunes, and the liberties of the Roman people, so lamentably exposed to the scorn of sycophants and traitors. "The deaths of the rest," says an historian of that age, "caused only a private and particular sorrow; but Cicero's, a universal one³." It was a triumph over the republic itself; and seemed to confirm and establish the perpetual slavery of Rome. Antony considered it as such; and, satiated with Cicero's blood, declared the proscription at an end.

* Spoliata, quam tueri non poterat, dignitas.—Vell. Pat. II. 8.

† Crematulus Cordus ait, Ciceroni, cum cogitasset, unumne Brutum, an Cassium, an S. Pompeium peteret, omnia displicuisse præter mortem.—Senec. Suasor. 6.

‡ Tedium tandem eum et fuge et vite cepit: regressusque ad superiorem villam, quæ paulo plus mille passibus a mari abest, moriar inquit in patria, sæpe servata.—Liv. Fragn. apud Senec. Suasor. 1; it. Plut. in Cic.

§ Satis constat servos fortiter fideliterque paratos fuisse ad dimicandum: ipsum deponi lecticam, et quietos pati, quod sors iniqua cogeret, jussum.—Liv. Fragn. ibid.

He was killed on the seventh of December, about ten days from the settlement of the triumvirate; after he had lived sixty-three years, eleven months, and five days⁴.

SECTION XII.

THE story of Cicero's death continued fresh on the minds of the Romans for many ages after it; and was delivered down to posterity, with all its circumstances, as one of the most affecting and memorable events of their history: so that the spot on which it happened seems to have been visited by travellers with a kind of religious reverence⁵. The odium of it fell chiefly on Antony; yet it left a stain of perfidy and ingratitude also on Augustus: which explains the reason of that silence which is observed about him by the writers of that age; and why his name is not so much as mentioned either by Horace or Virgil. For though his character would have furnished a glorious subject for many noble lines, yet it was no subject for court poets; since the very mention of him must have been a satire on the prince, especially while Antony lived, among the sycophants of whose court it was fashionable to insult his memory by all the methods of calumny that wit and malice could invent: nay Virgil, on an occasion that could hardly fail of bringing him to his mind, instead of doing justice to his merit, chose to do an injustice rather to Rome itself, by yielding the superiority of eloquence to the Greeks, which they themselves had been forced to yield to Cicero⁶.

Livy however, whose candour made Augustus call him a Pompeian⁷, while, out of complaisance to the times, he seems to extenuate the crime of Cicero's murder, yet, after a high encomium of his virtues, declares, "that to praise him as he deserved, required the eloquence of Cicero himself⁸." Augustus too, as Plutarch tells us, happening one day to catch his grandson reading one of Cicero's books, which, for fear of the emperor's displeasure, the boy endeavoured to hide under his gown, took the book into his hands, and turning over a great part of it gave it back again, and said, "This was a learned man, my child, and a lover of his country⁹."

In the succeeding generation, as the particular envy to Cicero subsided by the death of those whom private interests and personal quarrels had engaged to hate him when living, and defame him when dead, so his name and memory began to shine out in its proper lustre: and in the reign even of Tiberius, when an eminent senator and historian, Crematius Cordus, was condemned to die for praising Brutus, yet Paternulus could not forbear breaking out into the following warm expostulation with Antony on the subject of Cicero's death: "Thou hast done nothing, Antony; hast done nothing, I say, by setting a price on that divine and illustrious head, and, by a detestable reward, procuring the death of so great a consul and preserver of the republic. Thou hast snatched from Cicero a troublesome being; a declining age; a life more miserable under thy dominion than death itself; but so far from diminishing the glory of his deeds and sayings, thou hast increased it. He lives, and will live, in the memory of all ages; and as long as this system of nature, whether by chance or providence, or what way soever formed, which he alone of all the Romans comprehended in his mind and illustrated by his eloquence, shall remain entire, it will draw the praises of Cicero along with it; and all posterity will admire his writings against thee, curse thy act against him¹⁰."

From this period all the Roman writers, whether poets or historians, seem to vie with each other in celebrating the praises of Cicero as the most ² Orabant causas melius, &c.—Æn. vi. 840.

³ T. Livius Cn.—Pompeium tantis laudibus tulit, ut Pompeianum eum Augustus appellaret.—Tac. Ann. iv. 34.

⁴ Si quis tamen virtutibus vitia pensarit, vir magnus, acer, memorabile fuit, et in ejus laudes sequendas Cicerone laudatore opus fuerit.—Liv. Fragm. apud Senec. Suasor. 6.

⁵ Plut. in Cio.—There is another story of the same kind recorded by Macrobius, to show Augustus's moderation with regard also to Cato: that Augustus being one day in the house which had belonged to Cato, where the master of it, out of compliment to his great guest, took occasion to reflect on Cato's perverseness, he stopped him short by saying, that he who would suffer no change in the constitution of his city, was a good citizen, and honest man: but by this character of Cato's honesty, he gave a severe wound to his own, who not only changed but usurped the government of his country.—Macrobi. Saturn. ii. 4.

⁶ Vell. Pat. ii. 66.

⁷ En marcha, tanquam optimis spoliis, alacer in urbem reversus est. Neque ei aeternum portanti onus succurrit, Nihil se caput ferre, quod pro capite ejus quondam percussurum.—Val. Max. v. 3.

⁸ Ceterorumque cedes privato luctu excitaverunt; illa una communem.—[Crematius Cordus, apud Senec.] Civitas incrimina tenere non potuit, quum rectum Ciceronis caput in illis suis rostris videretur.—Flor. iv. 6.

⁹ Plut. in Cio.; Vell. Pat. ii. 64; Liv. Fragm. apud Senec.; Appian. l. iv. 601; Dio, l. xlvii. p. 330; Fighlii Annal. ad A. C. 714.

¹⁰ Super Clodio Ciceronem expellenti et Antonio occidenti, videtur irasci.—Sen. De Ira. li. 2.

Κατέρας—φύγας εἰς τὴν χερσον, ὃ καὶ ἱστορίας τοῦτε τοῦ πᾶντος εἶδον.—App. p. 600.

illustrious of all their patriots, and the parent of the Roman wit and eloquence; who had done more honour to his country by his writings than all their conquerors by their arms; and extended the bounds of their learning beyond those of their empire^a. So that their very emperors, near three centuries after his death, began to reverence him in the class of their inferior deities^b: a rank which he would have preserved to this day, if he had happened to live in papal Rome, where he could not have failed, as Erasmus says, from "the innocence of his life, of obtaining the honour and title of a saint!"

As to his person, he was tall and slender, with a neck particularly long; yet his features were regular and manly, preserving a comeliness and dignity to the last, with a certain air of cheerfulness and serenity that imprinted both affection and respect^c. His constitution was naturally weak, yet was so confirmed by his management of it as to enable him to support all the fatigues of the most active as well as the most studious life with perpetual health and vigour. The care that he employed upon his body consisted chiefly in bathing and rubbing, with a few turns every day in his gardens for the refreshment of his voice from the labour of the bar^d: yet, in the summer, he generally gave himself the exercise of a journey, to visit his several estates and villas in different parts of Italy. But his principal instrument of health was diet and temperance: by these he preserved himself from all violent distempers; and when he happened to be attacked by any slight indisposition, used to enforce the severity of his abstinence, and starve it presently by fasting^e.

In his clothes and dress, which the wise have usually considered as an index of the mind, he observed what he prescribes in his book of "Offices," a modesty and decency adapted to his rank and character; a perpetual cleanliness, without the appearance of pains; free from the affectation of singularity; and avoiding the extremes of a rustic negligence and foppish delicacy^f: both of which are equally contrary to true dignity—the one implying an ignorance, or illiberal contempt of it—the other, a childish pride and ostentation of proclaiming our pretensions to it.

In his domestic and social life, his behaviour was very amiable: he was a most indulgent parent, a sincere and zealous friend, a kind and generous master. His letters are full of the tenderest ex-

^a Facundia, latinarumque literarum parens—atque omnium triumphantium lauream adepto majorem, quanto plus est ingenui Romani terminos in tantum promovisse, quam imperii.—Plin. Hist. Nat. lib. 30.

^b Qui esset, ne quorum arma viceceramus, eorum ingenio vinceretur.—Vell. Pat. lib. 34.

^c Lamprid. vit. Alex. Sever. c. xxxl.

^d Quem arbitror, si Christianam philosophiam didicisset, in eorum numero censendum fuisse, qui nunc ob vitam innocentem pique transactam, pro Divis honorantur.—Eras. Ciceronian. vers. finem.

^e El quidem facies decora ad senectutem, prosperaque-permansit valetudo.—Aul. Poll. apud Senec. Suasor. 6.

^f Cum recreande vocule causas, mihi necesse esset ambulare.—Ad Att. lib. 23; Plut. in Cio.

^g Cum quidem biduum ita jejunus fuisset, ut ne aquam quidem gustaram.—Ep. Fam. vii. 26; Plut. in Cio.

^h Adhibenda munditia non odiosa, neque exquisita nimis; tantum quæ fugiat agrestem et inhumanam negligentiam. Eadem ratio est habenda vestitus: in quo, sicut in plicisque rebus, modicitas optima est.—De Offic. lib. 36.

pressions of his love for his children; in whose endearing conversation, as he often tells us, he used to drop all his cares, and relieve himself from all his struggles in the senate and the forum^g. The same affection, in an inferior degree, was extended also to his slaves, when by their fidelity and services they had recommended themselves to his favour. We have seen a remarkable instance of it in Tiro, whose case was no otherwise different from the rest than as it was distinguished by the superiority of his merit. In one of his letters to Atticus, "I have nothing more (says he,) to write; and my mind, indeed, is somewhat ruffled at present, for Sositheus my reader is dead—a hopeful youth,—which has afflicted me more than one would imagine the death of a slave ought to do^h."

He entertained very high notions of friendship, and of its excellent use and benefit to human life, which he has beautifully illustrated in his entertaining treatise on that subject; where he lays down no other rules than what he exemplified by his practice. For in all the variety of friendships in which his eminent rank engaged him, he was never charged with deceiving, deserting, or even slighting any one whom he had once called his friend, or esteemed an honest man. It was his delight to advance their prosperity, to relieve their adversity; the same friend to both fortunes; but more zealous only in the bad, where his help was the most wanted, and his services the most disinterested; looking upon it not as a friendship, but a sordid traffic and merchandise of benefits, where good offices are to be weighed by a nice estimate of gain and lossⁱ. He calls gratitude the mother of virtues; reckons it the most capital of all duties; and uses the words grateful and good as terms synonymous, and inseparably united in the same character. His writings abound with sentiments of this sort, as his life did with the examples of them^j; so that one of his friends, in apologising for the importunity of a request, observes to him with great truth, that "the tenor of his life would be a sufficient excuse for it, since he had established such a custom of doing everything for his friends, that they no longer requested, but claimed a right to command him^k."

Yet he was not more generous to his friends than placable to his enemies,—readily pardoning the greatest injuries upon the slightest submission; and though no man ever had greater abilities or opportunities of revenging himself, yet when it was in his power to hurt he sought out reasons to

^o Ut tantum requietis habeam, quantum cum uxore, et filio, et mellito Cicerone consumitur.—Ad Att. lib. 18.

^p Nam puer festinus, anagnosces nos, Sositheus decesserat, neque plus quam servi mors debere videbatur, commoverat.—Ad Att. lib. 12.

^q Ubi illa sancta amicitia? si non ipse amicus per se amatur toto pectore. (De Leg. lib. 18.) quam si ad fructum nostrum referemus, non ad illius commodum, quem diligimus, non erit ista amicitia, sed mercatura quedam utilitatum suarum.—De Nat. Deor. lib. 44.

^r Cum omnibus virtutibus me affectum esse cupiam, tamen nihil est quod malim, quam me et gratum esse et videri. Est enim hæc una virtus non solum maxima, sed etiam mater virtutum omnium—quæ potest esse jucunditas vitæ sublatiis amicitia? quæ porro amicitia potest esse inter ingratos?—Pro Planc. 33; De Fin. lib. 22.

^s Nam quod ita consuevis pro amicis laborare, non jam sic sperant abs te, sed etiam sic imperant tibi familiares.—Ep. Fam. vi. 7.

forgive, and whenever he was invited to it never declined a reconciliation with his most inveterate enemies, of which there are numerous instances in his history. He declared nothing to be more laudable and worthy of a great man than placability; and laid it down for a natural duty to moderate our revenge and observe a temper in punishing, and held repentance to be a sufficient ground for remitting it: and it was one of his sayings, delivered to a public assembly, that his enemies were mortal, his friendships immortal¹.

His manner of living was agreeable to the dignity of his character,—splendid and noble; his house was open to all the learned strangers and philosophers of Greece and Asia, several of whom were constantly entertained in it as part of his family, and spent their whole lives with him². His levee was perpetually crowded with multitudes of all ranks; even Pompey himself not disdaining to frequent it. The greatest part came, not only to pay their compliments, but to attend him on days of business to the senate or the forum, where upon any debate or transaction of moment they constantly waited to conduct him home again; but on ordinary days when these morning visits were over, as they usually were before ten, he retired to his books and shut himself up in his library, without seeking any other diversion but what his children afforded to the short intervals of his leisure³. His supper was his greatest meal, and the usual season with all the great of enjoying their friends at table, which was frequently prolonged to a late hour of the night; yet he was out of his bed every morning before it was light, and never used to sleep again at noon as all others generally did, and as it is commonly practised in Rome to this day⁷.

But though he was so temperate and studious, yet when he was engaged to sup with others, either at home or abroad, he laid aside his rules and forgot the invalid, and was gay and sprightly, and the very soul of the company. When friends were met together, to heighten the comforts of social life, he thought it inhospitable not to contribute his share to their common mirth, or to damp it by a churlish reservedness. But he was really a lover

¹ Est enim ulciscendi et puniendi modus. Atque haud nota, an satis sit, eum, qui laceraverit, injurie suae penitere. [De Offic. l. II.] nihil enim laudabilius, nihil magno viro dignius, placabilitate et clementia.—Ibid. 25.

Cum parcere vel ledere potuissem, ignoscendi querebam occasus, non puniendi occasiones.—Fragm. Cic. ex Marcelino.

Neque vero me penitet mortales inimicitias, sempiternas amicitias habere.—Pro C. Rabir. Post. 12.

² Doctissimum hominum familiaritates, quibus semper domus nostra floruit, et principes illi, Diodotus, Philo, Antiochus, Posidonius, a quibus instituti sumus.—De Nat. Deor. l. 3.

Eram cum Diodoto Stoico; qui cum habitavisset apud me, mecumque vixisset, nuper est domi meae mortuus.—Brut. 433.

³ Cum bene completa domus est tempore matutino, cum ad forum stipati gregibus, amicorum descendimus.—Ad Att. l. 18.

Mane salutamus domi bonos viros multos—ubi salutatio defuxit literis me involvo. [Ep. Fam. ix. 20.] Cum salutacioni nos dedimus amicorum—abdo me in bibliothecam.—Ep. Fam. vii. 28.

Post horum quartam molesti ceteri non sunt.—Ad Att. li. 14.

⁷ Nunc quidem propter intermissionem forensis operæ, et lucubrationes detraxi et meritationes addidi, quibus uti antea non solebam.—De Div. ii. 58.

of cheerful entertainments, being of a nature remarkably facetious, and singularly turned to raillery⁴, a talent which was of great service to him at the bar, to correct the petulance of an adversary, relieve the satiety of a tedious cause, divert the minds of the judges, and mitigate the rigour of a sentence, by making both the bench and audience merry at the expense of the accuser⁵.

This use of it was always thought fair, and greatly applauded in public trials; but in private conversations he was charged sometimes with pushing his raillery too far, and, through a consciousness of his superior wit, exerting it often intemperately, without reflecting what cruel wounds his lashes inflicted⁶. Yet of all his sarcastical jokes, which are transmitted to us by antiquity, we shall not observe any but what were pointed against characters either ridiculous or profligate, such as he despised for their follies or hated for their vices; and though he might provoke the spleen and quicken the malice of enemies more than was consistent with a regard to his own ease, yet he never appears to have hurt or lost a friend, or any one whom he valued, by the levity of jesting.

It is certain that the fame of his wit was as celebrated as that of his eloquence, and that several spurious collections of his sayings were handed about in Rome in his lifetime⁶; till his friend Trebonius, after he had been consul, thought it worth while to publish an authentic edition of them in a volume which he addressed to Cicero himself⁴. Caesar likewise, in the height of his power, having taken a fancy to collect the apophthegms or memorable sayings of eminent men, gave strict orders to all his friends who used to frequent Cicero, to bring him everything of that sort which happened to drop from him in their company⁶. But Tiro, Cicero's freedman, who served him chiefly in his studies and literary affairs, published after his death the most perfect collection of his sayings, in three books; where Quintilian however wishes that he had been more sparing in the number and judicious in the choice of them⁴.

⁴ Ego autem, existimes quod lubet, mirifice caplor facetiis, maximo nostratibus. [Ep. Fam. ix. 15.] Nec id ad voluptatem refero, sed ad communiter vitæ atque victus, remissionemque animorum, quæ maxime sermone efficitur familiari, qui est in convivis dulcissimus [Ibid. 24.] convivio delector. Ibi loquor quod in solum, ut dicitur, et gemitum etiam in risu maximos transfero.—Ibid. 26.

⁵ Suavis est et vehementer sæpe utilis jocus et facetiæ—multum in causis persæpe lepore et facetiis profici videt.—De Orat. ii. 84.

Quæ risum judicis movendo et illos tristes solvit affectus, et animum ab intentione rerum frequenter avertit, et aliquando etiam reficit, et a satietate vel a fatione renovat.—Quint. vi. 3.

⁶ Noster vero non solum extra judicia, sed in ipsa etiam orationibus habitus est nimis risus affectator.—Ibid.; Plut. in Cic.

⁶ Als enim, ut ego discessem, omnia omnium dicta—in me conferri.—Ep. Fam. vii. 32; it. ix. 16.

⁴ Liber iste, quem mihi misisti, quantum habet declarationem amoris tui? primum, quod tibi facetum videtur quicquid ego dixi, quod alis fortasse non item: deinde, quod illa, sive facta sunt, sive sic fiunt, narrante te, venustissima.—Ep. Fam. xv. 21.

⁶ Audio Cæsarem, cum volumina jam confecerit ἀποφειγμάτων, si quod afferatur pro meo, quod meum non sit, rejicere solere—hæc ad illum cum reliquis actis perferuntur; ita enim ipse mandavit.—Ep. Fam. ix. 16.

⁴ Utinam libertus ejus Tiro, aut alius quisque fuit, qui

None of these books are now remaining, nor any other specimen of the jests but what are incidentally scattered in different parts of his own and other people's writings, which, as the same judicious critic observes, through the change of taste in different ages, and the want of that action or gesture which gave the chief spirit to many of them, could never be explained to advantage, though several had attempted it. How much more cold then and insipid must they needs appear to us, who are unacquainted with the particular characters and stories to which they relate, as well as the peculiar fashions, humour, and taste of wit in that age? Yet even in these, as Quintilian also tells us, as well as in his other compositions, people would sooner find what they might reject than what they could add to them^s.

He had a great number of fine houses in different parts of Italy; some writers reckon up eighteen,—which, excepting the family-seat at Arpinum, seem to have been all purchased or built by himself. They were situated generally near to the sea, and placed at proper distances along the lower coast between Rome and Pompeii, which was about four leagues beyond Naples; and for the elegance of structure and the delights of their situation, are called by him the eyes, or the beauties, of Italy^h. Those in which he took the most pleasure and usually spent some part of every year, were his Tusculum, Antium, Astura, Arpinum; his Formian, Cuman, Puteolan, and Pompeian villas, all of them large enough for the reception not only of his own family but of his friends and numerous guests, many of whom of the first quality used to pass several days with him in their excursions from Rome. But besides these that may properly be reckoned seats, with large plantations and gardens around them, he had several little inns, as he calls them, or baiting-places on the road, built for his accommodation in passing from one house to another.

His Tusculan house had been Sylla's the dictator, and in one of its apartments had a painting of his memorable victory near Nola, in the Marsic war, in which Cicero had served under him as a volunteer^k. It was about four leagues from Rome, on the top of a beautiful hill, covered with the villas of the nobility, and affording an agreeable prospect of the city and the country around it; with plenty of water flowing through his grounds in a large stream or canal, for which he paid a rent to the corporation of Tusculum^l. Its neighbourhood to Rome gave him the opportunity of a retreat at any hour from the fatigues of the bar or the senate, to breathe a little fresh air and divert himtres hac de re libros edidit, parcius dictorum numero indulisset—et plus iudicii in eligendis, quam in congedendis studiis adhibuisset.—Quint. vi. 3.

^s Qui tamen nunc quoque, ut in omni ejus ingenio, facilius quid rejici, quam quid adici possit, invenient.—Ibid.; vide etiam Macrob. Sat. ii. 1.

^h Quodque temporis in prediis nostris, et belle edificatis, et satis amenis consumi potuit, in peregrinatione consumimus [Ad Att. xvi. 3.] cur oculos Italie, villulas meas non video?—Ibid. 6.

^l Ego accepi in diversorio Sinesimano, tuas literas.—Ad Att. xiv. 8.

^k Idque etiam in villa sua Tusculana, que postea fuit Circennia, Sylla pinxit.—Plin. Hist. Nat. xxii. 6.

^l Ego Tusculanum pro Aqua Crabra vectigal pendam, quia a municipio fundum accepi.—Con. Rull. iii. 2.

self with his friends or family; so that this was the place in which he took the most delight and spent the greatest share of his leisure, and for that reason improved and adorned it beyond all his other houses^m.

When a greater satiety of the city or a longer vacation in the forum disposed him to seek a calmer scene and more undisturbed retirement, he used to remove to Antium or Astura. At Antium he placed his best collection of books, and as it was not above thirty miles from Rome, he could have daily intelligence there of everything that passed in the city. Astura was a little island at the mouth of a river of the same name about two leagues farther towards the south, between the promontories of Antium and Circeum, and in the view of them both; a place peculiarly adapted to the purposes of solitude and a severe retreat, covered with a thick wood cut out into shady walks, in which he used to spend the gloomy and splenetic moments of his life.

In the height of summer the mansion-house at Arpinum and the little island adjoining, by the advantage of its groves and cascades, afforded the best defence against the inconvenience of the heats; where, in the greatest that he had ever remembered, we find him refreshing himself, as he writes to his brother, with the utmost pleasure, in the cool stream of his Fibrenusⁿ.

His other villas were situated in the more public parts of Italy, where all the best company of Rome had their houses of pleasure. He had two at Formiæ, a lower and upper villa, the one near to the port of Cajeta, the other upon the mountains adjoining; he had a third on the shore of Baïæ, between the lake Avernus and Puteoli, which he calls his Puteolan; a fourth on the hills of old Cumæ, called his Cuman villa; and a fifth at Pompeii, four leagues beyond Naples, in a country famed for the purity of its air, fertility of its soil, and delicacy of its fruits. His Puteolan house was built after the plan of the Academy at Athens, and called by that name, being adorned with a portico and a grove, for the same use of philosophical conferences. Some time after his death it fell into the hands of Antistius Vetus, who repaired and improved it, when a spring of warm water, which happened to burst out in one part of it, gave occasion to the following epigram, made by Laurea Tullius, one of Cicero's freed men.

Quo tua Romane vindex clarissime lingue
Sylvia loco melius surgere jussa vires,

^m Que mihi antea signa misisti,—ea omnia in Tusculanum deportabo. [Ad Att. i. 4.] Nos ex omnibus laboribus et molestiis uno illo in loco conquelescimus. [Ibid. 5.] Nos Tusculano ita delectamur, ut nobismet ipsi tum denique, cum illo venimus, placeamus.—Ibid. 6.

The situation of this Tusculan house, which had been built perhaps by Sylla, confirms what Seneca has observed of the villas of all the other great captains of Rome, Marius, Pompey, Cæsar; that they were placed always on hills, or the highest ground that they could find; it being thought more military to command the view of the country beneath them, and that houses so situated had the appearance of a camp rather than a villa. [Seneca Epist. 51.] But this delightful spot is now possessed by a convent of monks, called Grotta Ferrata, where they still show the remains of Cicero's columns and fine buildings, and the ducts of water that flowed through his gardens.

ⁿ Ego ex magnis caloribus, non enim meminimus majores, in Arpinati, summa cum amenitate fluminis, me refeci ludorum diebus.—Ad Quint. Frat. ii. 1.

Atque Academicæ celebratam nomine villam
Nunc reparat cultu sub potiore Vetus,
Hic etiam apparent lymphæ non ante repertæ,
Languida quæ infuso lumina rore levant.
Nimirum locus ipse sui Ciceronis honori
Hoc dedit, hæc fontes cum patefecit ope.
Ut quoniam totum legitur sine fine per orbem,
Sint plures, oculis quæ medeantur, æquæ¹.

Where groves, once thine, now with fresh verdure bloom,
Great parent of the eloquence of Rome,
And where thy Academy, favourite seat,
Now to Antistius yields its sweet retreat,
A gushing stream bursts out, of wondrous power,
To heal the eyes, and weaken'd sight restore.
The place, which all its pride from Cicero drew,
Repays this honour to his memory due,
That since his works throughout the world are spread,
And with such eagerness by all are read,
New springs of healing quality should rise,
To ease the increase of labour to the eyes.

The furniture of his houses was suitable to the elegance of his taste and the magnificence of his buildings; his galleries were adorned with statues and paintings of the best Grecian masters, and his vessels and moveables were of the best work and choicest materials. There was a cedar table of his remaining in Pliny's time, said to be the first which was ever seen in Rome, and to have cost him eighty pounds². He thought it the part of an eminent citizen to preserve a uniformity of character in every article of his conduct, and to illustrate his dignity by the splendour of his life. This was the reason of the great variety of his houses, and of their situation in the most conspicuous parts of Italy, along the course of the Appian road, that they might occur at every stage to the observation of travellers, and lie commodious for the reception and entertainment of his friends.

The reader, perhaps, when he reflects on what the old writers have said of the mediocrity of his paternal estate, will be at a loss to conceive whence all his revenues flowed that enabled him to sustain the vast expense of building and maintaining such a number of noble houses; but the solution will be easy when we recollect the great opportunities that he had of improving his original fortunes. The two principal funds of wealth to the leading men of Rome were, first, the public magistracies and

